The AUTHOR to the READER.

THE long and ſtill declining ſtate of the Chriſtian Commonweal, with the utter ruin and ſubverſion of the Empire of the Eaſt, and many other moſt glorious Kingdoms and Provinces of the Chriſtians, never to be ſufficiently lamented, might, with the due conſideration thereof, worthily move even a right ſtony heart to ruth: but therewith alſo to call to remembrance the diſhonour done unto the bleſſed Name of our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, the deſolation of his Church here militant upon Earth, the dreadful danger daily threatned unto the poor remainder thereof, the millions of Souls caſt headlong into eternal Deſtruction, the infininit number of woful Chriſtians (whoſe grievous groanings under the heavy yoke of Infidelity no tongue is able to expreſs) with the careleſneſs of the Great for the redreſs thereof, might give juſt cauſe unto any good Chriſtian to ſit down, and with the heavy Prophet to ſay, as he did of Jeruſalem, O how hath the Lord darkned the Daughter of Sion in his wrath! and caſt down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Iſrael, and remembred not his footſtool in the day of his wrath! All which miſeries (with many others ſo great as greater there can none be) the Prince of darkneſs and Author of all miſchief hath by the perſecuting Princes of all Ages, and antient Hereticks his Miniſters, labored from time to time to bring upon the Church of God, to the obſcuring of his bleſſed Name, and utter ſubverſion of his moſt ſacred Word; but yet by none, no not by them all together ſo much prevailed, as by the falſe Prophet Mahomet, born in an unhappy hour, to the great deſtruction of Mankind: whoſe moſt groſs and blaſphemous Doctrine firſt fantaſied by himſelf in Arabia; and ſo by him obtruded upon the World, and afterwards by the Saraſin Caliphes (his ſeduced Succeſſors) with greater Forces maintained, was by them, together with their Empire, diſperſed over a great part of the face of the Earth, to the unſpeakable ruin and deſtruction of the Chriſtian Religion and State: eſpecially in Aſia and Africk, with ſome good part of Europe alſo. But the unity of this great Mahometan Monarchy being once diſſolved, and it divided into many Kingdoms, and ſo after the manner of worldly things drawing unto the fatal period of it ſelf, in proceſs of time became of far leſs force than before, and ſo leſs dreadful unto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, by whom theſe Saraſins were again expulſed out of all the parts of Europe, excepting one corner of Spain, which they yet held within the remembrance of our Fathers, until that by their Victorious Forces, they were thence at length happily removed alſo, after that they had poſſeſſed the ſame above the ſpace of 700 Years. In this declination of the Saraſins, the firſt Champions of the Mahometan Superſtition (who though they had loſt much, yet held they many Kingdoms both in Aſia and Africk, taken for the moſt part from the Chriſtians) ariſe the Turks, an obſcure and baſe People, before ſcarce known unto the World, yet fierce and couragious, who by their Valour firſt aſpired unto the Kingdom of Perſia, with divers other large Provinces: from whence they were about 170 Years after again expulſed by the Tartars, and enforced to retire themſelves into the leſſer Aſia: where taking the benefit of the diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes of the Eaſt, and the careleſneſs of the Chriſtians in general, they in ſome good meaſure repaired their former loſſes again, and maintained the ſtate of a Kingdom at Iconium in Cilicia (now of them called Caramania) holding in their ſubjection the greateſt part of that fruitful Country, ſtill ſeeking to gain from the Chriſtians what they had before loſt unto the Tartars. But this Kingdom of the Turks declining alſo, by the diſmembring of the ſame, there ſtept up among the Turks in Bythinia, one Oſman or Othoman, of the Oguzian Tribe or Family, a Man of great ſpirit and valour, who by little and little growing up amongſt the reſt of his Countrymen, and other the effeminate Chriſtians on that ſide of Aſia, at laſt, like another Romulus, took upon him the Name of a Sultan or King, and is right worthily accounted the firſt Founder of the mighty Empire of the Turks; which continued, by many deſcents, directly in the Line of himſelf, even unto Achmat, who now reigneth, is from a ſmall beginning become the greateſt terrour of the World, and holding in ſubjection many great and mighty Kingdoms in Aſia, Europe, and Africk, is grown to that height of pride, as that it threatneth deſtruction unto the reſt of the Kingdoms of the Earth; labouring with nothing more than with the weight of it ſelf. In the greatneſs whereof is ſwallowed up both the Name aud Empire of the Saraſins, the glorious Empire of the Greeks, the renowned Kingdoms of Macedonia, Peloponeſus, Epirus, Bulgaria, Servia, Boſna, Armenia, Cyprus, Syria, Egypt, Judea, Tunes, Algiers, Media, Meſopotamia, with a great part of Hungary, as alſo of the Perſian Kingdom, and all thoſe Churches and Places ſo much ſpoken of in holy Scripture (the Romans only excepted) and in brief, ſo much of Chriſtendom as far exceedeth that which is thereof at this day left. So that at this preſent if you conſider the beginning, progreſs, and perpetual felicity of this the Othoman Empire, there is in this World nothing more admirable and ſtrange; if the greatneſs and luſtre thereof, nothing more magnificent and glorious; if the Power and Strength thereof, nothing more Dreadful or Dangerous: Which wondering at nothing but at the Beauty of it ſelf, and drunk with the pleaſant Wine of perpetual felicity, holdeth all the reſt of the World in Scorn, thundering out nothing ſtill but Bloud and War, with a full perſuaſion in time to Rule over all, prefixing unto it ſelf no other limits than the uttermoſt bounds of the Earth, from the riſing of the Sun unto the going down of the ſame. The cauſes whereof are many and right lamentable, but for the moſt part are ſhut up in the Counſels of the Great, as that for me to ſeek after them, were great Folly: Yet amongſt the reſt, ſome others there be, ſo pregnant and manifeſt, as that the blind World taketh thereof, as it were a general Knowledge, and may therefore without Offence of the Wiſer ſort (as I hope) even in theſe our nice Days be lightly touched. Whereof the firſt and greateſt, is the Juſt and Secret Judgment of the Almighty, who in Juſtice delivereth into the Hands of theſe mercileſs Miſcreants, Nation after Nation, and Kingdom upon Kingdom, as unto the moſt terrible Executioners of his dreadful Wrath, to be puniſhed for their Sins: Others in the mean while, no leſs Sinful than they; in his Mercy enjoying the benefit of a longer time, calling them unto Repentance. Then, the uncertainty of Worldly things, which is ſubject to perpetual Change, cannot long ſtay in one State; but as the Sea is with the Wind, ſo are they in like ſort toſſed up and down with the continual Surges and Waves of alteration and change; ſo that being once grown to their height, they there ſtay not long, but fall again as faſt as ever they riſe, and ſo in time come to nothing: As we ſee the greateſt Monarchies that ever yet were upon Earth have done, their courſe being run; over whom Time now Triumpheth, as no doubt at length it ſhall over this ſo great a Monarchy alſo, when it ſhall but then live by Fame, as the others now do. Next to theſe Cauſes from above, (without Offence be it ſaid) is the ſmall care the Chriſtian Princes, eſpecially thoſe that dwelt further off, have had of the common State of the Chriſtian Commonweal, whereof even the very Greateſt are to account themſelves but as the principal Members of one and the ſame Body; and have, or ought to have, as ſharp a feeling one of anothers Harms, as hath the head of the Wrongs done unto the feet, or rather as if it were done unto themſelves: Inſtead of which Chriſtian Compaſſion and Vnity, they have ever, and even yet at this time are ſo divided amongſt themſelves, with endleſs Quarrels, partly for Queſtions of Religion, (never by the Sword to be determined) partly for Matters touching their own proper State and Sovereignty, and that with ſuch diſtruſt and implacable Hatred, that they never could as yet (although it hath been long wiſhed) joyn their common Forces againſt the common Enemy: But turning their Weapons one upon another, (the more to be lamented) have from time to time Weakend themſelves, and Opened a way for him to Devour them one after another: Whereas with their combined Forces (the greedy Enemies greateſt Terror) they might long ſince not only have repreſſed his Fury, and abated his Pride; but with ſmall Danger and much Glory, (God favoring their ſo Honourable Attempts) have again Recovered from him moſt of thoſe famous Chriſtian Kingdoms, which he by Force, againſt all Right holdeth at this Day, in moſt miſerable Subjection and Thraldom: Many Millions of the poor Oppreſſed Chriſtians, in the mean time out of the Furnace of Tribulation, in the Anguiſh of their Souls crying in vain unto their Chriſtian Brethren for relief. By Civil diſcord the Noble Country of Græcia Periſhed, when as the Father riſing againſt the Son, and the Son againſt the Father, and Brother againſt Brother, they to the mutual Deſtruction of themſelves called the Turk, who like a greedy Lyon lurking in his Den, lay in wait for them all. So Periſhed the Kingdoms of Bulgaria, Servia, Boſna and Epirus, with the famous Iſland of the Rhodes and Cyprus, betray'd as it were by the Chriſtian Princes, their Neighbours, by whom they might have eaſily been relieved. So the moſt Flouriſhing and Strong Kingdom of Hungary, (in the Relicks whereof, the Fortune of the Turkiſh Empire hath longer ſtuck, than in the Conqueſt of any other Kingdom, by it attempted whatſoever) divided in it ſelf by the Ambition of Princes, and Civil diſcord, the Weaker ſtill calling unto his Aid, the mighty Power of the Turk, is long ſince for the moſt part become to him a Prey; the poor remainders thereof, being at this Day hardly Defended by the Forces of the Chriſtian Emperor, and of the Princes his Confederates; ſeldom times meeting together with ſuch Cheerfulneſs or Expedition, as the Neceſſity of ſo great a Matter requireth. Vnto which ſo great a Cauſe of the common decay, may be added the evil Choice of our Souldiers employed in thoſe Wars, who taken up hand over head, out of the promiſcuous common People, are for the moſt part Vntrained men, ſerving rather for ſhew, and the filling up of Number, than for Vſe; and in no reſpect to be compared with the Turks Janizaries, and other his moſt expert Souldiers, continually even from their Youth Exerciſed in feats of Arms. Not to ſpeak in the mean time of the want of the Antient Martial Diſcipline, the wholeſome preſervative of moſt Puiſſant Armies, which breedeth in the Proud Enemy a Contempt of the Chriſtian Forces, with a full perſuaſion of himſelf, that he is not by ſuch Diſordered and Weak means to be withſtood. But to come near unto the Cauſes of the Turks greatneſs, and more proper unto themſelves, as not depending of the improvident Careleſneſs, Weakneſs, Diſcord, and Imperfections of others: Firſt, in them is to be Noted an ardent and infinite Deſire of Sovereignty, wherewith they have long ſince promiſed unto themſelves the Monarchy of the whole World, a quick motive to their ſo haughty Deſigns: Then, ſuch a rare Vnity and Agreement amongſt them, as well in the manner of their Religion, (if it be ſo to be called) as in matters concerning their State; (eſpecially in all their Enterpriſes, to be taken in hand for the augmenting their Empire) as that thereof they call themſelves Iſlami, that is to ſay, Men of one Mind, or at Peace amongſt themſelves; ſo as it is not to be Marvelled, if thereby they grow Strong themſelves, and Dreadful to others: Joyn unto this their Courage, conceived by the wonderful Succeſs of their perpetual Fortune, their notable Vigilancy in taking the advantage of every Occaſion, for the inlarging of their Monarchy; their Frugality and Temperateneſs in their Diet, and other manner of Living, their careful obſerving of their Antient Military Diſcipline, their Cheerful and almoſt Incredible Obedience unto their Princes and Sultans; ſuch, as in that point no Nation in the World was to be worthily compared unto them: All great Cauſes why their Empire hath ſo mightily encreaſed, and ſo long continued. Whereunto may be added the two ſtrongeſt Sinews of every well Governed Commonweal; Reward propounded to the Good, and Puniſhment threatned unto the Offender; where the prize is for Vertue and Valour ſet up, and the way laid open for every common Perſon, be he never ſo meanly Born, to aſpire unto the greateſt Honours and Preferments both of the Court and of the Field, yea even unto the neareſt Affinity of the Great Sultan himſelf; if his Valour or other Worth ſhall ſo Deſerve: When as on the contrary part, the Diſloyal or Cowardly, is to expect from the ſame Sovereign Power, nothing but Diſgrace, Death, and Torture. And yet theſe great ones, not contented by ſuch Commendable and Lawful means, ſtill to extend or eſtabliſh their far ſpreading Empire, if that point once come in queſtion, they ſtick not in their Diveliſh Policy to break and infringe the Laws both of Nations and Nature. Their Leagues, grounded upon the Law of Nations, be they with never ſo Strong Capitulations concluded, or Solemnity of Oath confirmed, have with them no longer Force than ſtandeth with their own Profit, ſerving indeed but as Snares to intangle other Princes in, until they have ſingled out him whom they purpoſe to Devour; the reſt faſt bound by their Leagues, ſtill looking on, as if their own turn ſhould never come; yet with no more aſſurance of their Safety by their Leagues, than had the other whom they ſee Periſh before their faces. As for the kind Law of Nature, what can be thereunto more contrary, than for the Father moſt unnaturally to embrue his Hands in the Blood of his own Children? And the Brother to become the Bloody Executioner of his own Brother? A common matter among the Othoman Emperors. All which moſt Execrable and Inhumane Murthers, they cover with the pretended ſafety of their State, as thereby freed from the fear of all aſpiring Competitors, (the greateſt torment of the Mighty) and by the Preſervation of the Integrity of their Empire, which they thereby keep whole and entire unto themſelves, and ſo deliver it as it were by Hand from one to another, in no part diſmembred or impaired. By theſe and ſuch like means is this Barbarous Empire (of almoſt nothing) grown to that height of Majeſty and Power, as that it hath in Contempt all the reſt; being it ſelf not Inferiour in Greatneſs and Strength, unto the greateſt Monarchies that ever yet were upon the face of the Earth, the Roman Empire only excepted. Which how far it ſhall yet further ſpread, none knoweth, but he that holdeth in his Hand all the Kingdoms of the Earth, and with his Word boundeth the raging of the Sea, ſo that it cannot further paſs. Moved with the Greatneſs and Glory, of this ſo Mighty and Dreadful an Empire, grown for the moſt part out of the Ruin of the Chriſtian Commonweal, with the utter Subverſion of many great and Flouriſhing Kingdoms, and Woful fall of many more, Right Puiſſant and Mighty Princes, not without Grief to be remembred; I long ſince (as many others have) entred into the heavy Conſideration thereof, purpoſing ſo to have contented my ſelf with a light View of that which might well be for ever of all good Chriſtians Lamented, but hardly or never Remedied; until that afterwards led with a more earneſt Deſire to know the Strange and Fatal Mutations by this Barbarous Nation in former time brought upon a great part of the World, as alſo ſo much as I might, to ſee ſo great a Terrour of the preſent time, and on what Terms it ſtandeth with the reſt, I had with long Search and much Labour, mixt with ſome Pleaſure and mine own reaſonable Contentment, paſſed through the whole Melancholy Courſe of their Tragical Hiſtory: Yet without purpoſe ever to have commended the ſame or any part thereof, unto the Remembrance of Poſterity, as deeming it an Argument of too high a reach, and fitter for ſome more happy Wit, better furniſhed with ſuch helps both of Nature and Art, as are of neceſſity requiſite for the Undertaking of ſo great a Charge, than was my ſelf, of many Thouſands the Meaneſt. Being not unmindful alſo of that which the Poet (keeping decorum) ſaith in like caſe, though far leſs matter, of himſelf:

Cum canerem Reges & prælia, Cinthius aurem
Vellit, & admonuit: Paſtorem Titere pingues
Paſcere oportet oves, deductum ducere carmen.

Apollo pluckt me by the Ear, and ſaid I went too far:
Beſeems a Shepherd Titterus, his fatlings for to feed,
And for to fit his Rural Song unto his ſlender Reed.

Beſides that, ſo many Difficulties even at the firſt preſented themſelves unto my View, as to overcome the ſame, if I ſhould take the Labour in hand, ſeemed to me almoſt impoſſible: For beſide the Sea and World of matter I was to paſs through, (requiring both great Labour and Time) full of the moſt rare Example, both of the better and worſe Fortune, in Men of all ſorts and conditions, yeilding more Pleaſure unto the Reader, than Facility to the Writer; I ſaw not any (among ſo many as had taken this Argument in hand) whom I might as a ſure Guide or Load-ſtar, long follow in the Courſe of this ſo great a Hiſtory: Many Right Worthy, and Learned Men (whoſe Memory my Soul honoureth) contenting themſelves, to have with their Learned Pens enrolled in the Records of never dying Fame; ſome, one great Expedition or Action, ſome another, as in their times they fell out; yea, the Turkiſh Hiſtories and Chronicles themſelves (from whom the greateſt light, for the continuation of the Hiſtory, was in reaſon to have been expected) being in the Declaration of their own Affairs, (according to their Barbarous manner) ſo ſparing and ſhort, as that they may of right be accounted rather ſhort rude Notes, than juſt Hiſtories, rather pointing Things out, than declaring the ſame, and that with ſuch Obſcurity, by changing the antient and uſual Names, as well of whole Kingdoms, Countries, and Provinces, as of Cities, Towns, Rivers, Mountains and other Places; yea and oftentimes Men themſelves into other Strange and Barbarous Names of their own deviſing; in ſuch ſort as might well ſtay an intentive Reader, and deprive him of the Pleaſure, together with the Profit he might otherwiſe expect by the Reading thereof; whereunto to give Order, Perſpicuity and Light, would require no ſmall Travail and Pain: Not to ſpeak in the mean time of the diverſity of Reports in the Courſe of the whole Hiſtory, ſuch as is oftentimes moſt hard, if not altogether impoſſible to Reconcile. Notwithſtanding all which Difficulties, with many others more proper unto my ſelf; having with long Labour and diligent Search, paſſed through the Courſe of the whole Hiſtory, and ſo in ſome reaſonable ſort ſatiſfied my ſelf therein, I thought it not amiſs, as well for the Worthineſs of the matter, as for the Zeal I bear to the Chriſtian Common-weal, and for the ſatiſfying alſo of ſome others my good Friends very deſirous of the ſame, to make proof if out of the diſperſed Works of many Right Worthy Men, I could ſet down one orderly and continuate Hiſtory of this ſo Mighty an Empire, with the Great and Fatal mutation, or rather Subverſion of many Right Strong and Flouriſhing Kingdoms and States, (the proper Work of mighty Empires, ſtill encreaſing by the fall of others) wherewith this proud Monarchy hath already daunted a great part of the World, being ſo many and ſo ſtrange, as that more or more wonderful were not ever to be ſeen in any of the greateſt Monarchies of antient Time or Memory; and ſo together, and as it were under one View, and at one Shew, to lay open unto the Chriſtian Reader, what I was glad to ſeek for out of the confuſed Labours of many: A Work ſo Long and Labourious, as might well have deterred a Right Reſolute and Conſtant Mind from the undertaking thereof, being as yet to my Knowledge not undergone or performed by any: Wherein, among ſuch Variety, or more truly to ſay, contrariety of Writers, I did content my ſelf, as a blind man led by his Guide, happily of no better ſight than himſelf, to tread the ſteps of this or that one man, going for a while before me, and by and by leaving me again ſtumbling in the Dark: But out of the Learned and Faithful Works of many, according to my ſimple Judgment, to make Choice of that was moſt probable, ſtill ſupplying with the perfections of the better, what I found wanting or defective in the Weaker, propounding unto my ſelf no other Mark to aim at, than the very Truth of the Hiſtory; as that which is it ſelf of Power to give Life unto the Dead Letter, and to cover the Faults eſcaped in the homely Penning, or compiling thereof. Which the better to perform, I Collected ſo much of the Hiſtory as poſſibly I could, out of the Writings of ſuch as were themſelves preſent, and as it were Eye-witneſſes of the greateſt part of that they Writ, and ſo as of all others beſt able, moſt like alſo to have left unto us the very Truth. Such is the greateſt part of ſo much of the Hiſtory of the Greek Empire, as I have (for the better Underſtanding, of the riſing of the Turks in this Hiſtory ſet down) gathered out of the Doings of Nicetas Choniates, Nicephorus, Gregoras, and Laonicus Chalcocondiles, all Writing ſuch Things as they themſelves ſaw, or were for moſt part in their time, and near unto them done. Such are the Wonderful and almoſt Incredible Wars betwixt old Amurath the Second, and his Foſter-Child the Fortunate Prince of Epirus, of the Turks commonly called Scanderbeg, and by that wayward Tyrant at his Death, together with his Kingdom, delivered, as it were, by Inheritance, unto his Son, the Great and Cruel Sultan Mahomet, all Written by Marinus Barletius, himſelf an Epirot, and in all thoſe troubleſom Times then living in Scodra, a City of the Venetians joying upon Epirus. Such is the Woful Captivity of the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, with the miſerable Death of the Greek Emperor Conſtantinus Palæologus, and the Fatal Ruine of the Greek Empire, Written by Leonardus Chienſis, Archbiſhop of Mytilene, being himſelf then preſent, and there taken Priſoner. Such is the Lamentable Hiſtory of the Rhodes, taken for moſt out of Ja. Fontanus his Three Books de bello Rhodio, a Learned Man then preſent, and in great Credit with Villerius the great Maſter, at ſuch time as that famous Iſland, after it had by him and the other Worthy Knights of the Order, been moſt wonderfully of long Defended, was to the great ruth of Chriſtendom taken by the Great Sultan Solyman. Such is the moſt Tragical Hiſtory of Bajazet, Solymans youngeſt Son, Collected out of the notable Epiſtles of Augerius Busbequius, Legationis Turcicæ, he himſelf then lying Ambaſſadtr for the Empiror Ferdinand at Conſtantinople, and preſent in Solymans Camp, at ſuch time as he himſelf in Perſon, went over with his Army into Aſia, to Countenance his eldeſt Son Selymus, who Succeeded him in the Empire, againſt his Valiant yonger Brother Bajazet, and beſide well acquainted with the Great Baſſaes, Achmet, Ruſtan, Haly, and others, oftentimes mentioned in the Hiſtory following. Such is alſo the Hiſtory of the taking of the antient City of Tripolis in Barbary, from the Knights of Malta, by Sinan the proud Baſſa, Written by Nicholas Nicholy, Lord of Arfeuile, preſent at the ſame time with the Lord of Aramont, then Ambaſſador for the French King unto Solyman. So might I ſay alſo of the miſerable ſpoil of the Fruitful and Pleaſant Iſlands of the Mediterranean, made by Lutzis Baſſa, Solyman his Brother in Law, and Great Admiral, with the ſubmitting of the Iſland of Naxos, to the Turks Obeiſence, Written by John Criſpe, at that time Duke of the ſame Iſland. And ſo likewiſe of diverſe other parts of the Hiſtory, too long to rehearſe. But foraſmuch as every Great and Famous Action, had not the Fortune to have in it a Cæſar, ſuch as both could and would commend unto Poſterity, by Writing that, whereof they might truly ſay, They were themſelves a great part, many Right Excellent Generals contenting themſelves with the Honor of the Field, and their Glory there Won, leaving the Honorable Fame thereof to be by others reported, for lack of ſuch moſt certain Authors, or rather (as I before ſaid) Eye-witneſſes, I gathered ſo much as I could of what remained, out of the Works of ſuch as being themſelves Men of Great Place, and well acquainted with the Great and Worthy Perſonages of their Time, might from their Mouths, as from certain Oracles, Report the undoubted Truth of many moſt Famous Exploits done both by themſelves and others: As might Pau. Jovius from the mouth of Muleaſſes King of Tunes, from Vaſtius the Great General, from Auria the Prince of Melphis, Charles the Emperor his Admiral, and ſuch others: Or, elſe out of the Writings of ſuch as were themſelves great Travellers into the Turks Dominions, and withal, diligent obſervers of their Affairs and State, as were the Phyſitians Pantaleon, Minadoie, and Leunclavius, (of all others a moſt curious Searcher of their Antiquities and Hiſtories) unto which great Clerks, and ſome others of that Learned Profeſſion, we may Worthily attribute the greateſt Light and Certainty of that is Reported, of a great part of the Turkiſh Affairs. But theſe in the Courſe, of ſo long a Hiſtory failing alſo (as by conferring that which is hereafter Written, together with their Hiſtories, is eaſily to be perceived) to perfect that I had taken in Hand, I took my refuge unto the Writings of ſuch other Learned and Credible Authors, as of whoſe Integrity and Faithfulneſs, the World hath not to my Knowledge at any time yet doubted: Yea, for theſe few late Years, I was glad out of the German and Italian Writers in their own Language, in part to borrow the Knowledge of theſe late Affairs: As alſo from the credible and certain Report, of ſome ſuch Honorable minded Gentlemen of our own Country, as have either for their Honors ſake ſerved in theſe late Wars in Hungary, or upon ſome other Occaſions, ſpent ſome good times in Travelling into the Turks Dominions; but eſpecially unto the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, the chief Seat of the Turkiſh Empire, and Place of the Great Turks abode: Amongſt whom, I cannot but deſervedly remember my kind Friend and Couſin M. Rog. Howe, unto whoſe diſcreet and curious Obſervations, during the time of his late abode at Conſtantinople, I juſtly account my ſelf for many things beholden. In which Courſe of my Proceeding, if the Reader find not himſelf ſo fully ſatisfied, as he could deſire, I would be glad, by him my ſelf, to be better informed; as being no leſs deſirous to learn the Truth, of that I know not, than willing to impart to others, that little which I know.

So Wiſhing thee all Happineſs, I bid thee farewell.

The General
TURKS,
Before the Riſing of the Othoman Family,
With all the Noble EXPEDITIONS of the Chriſtian Princes againſt them.

Divers Opinions concerning the beginning of the Turks.

THE glorious Empire of the Turks, the preſent Terror of the World, hath amongſt other things nothing in it more wonderful or ſtrange, than the poor beginning of it ſelf, ſo ſmall and obſcure, as that it is not well known unto themſelves, or agreed upon even among the beſt Writers of their Hiſtories, from whence this barbarous Nation, that now ſo triumpheth over the beſt part of the World, firſt crept out or took their beginning. Some (after the manner of moſt Nations) derive them from the Trojans, led thereunto by the affinity of the words Turci and Teucri, ſuppoſing (but with what probabily I know not) the word Turci or Turks to have been made of the corruption of the word Teucri, the common name of the Trojans: as alſo for that the Turks have of long moſt inhabited the leſſer ASIA, wherein the ancient and moſt famous City of TROY ſometime ſtood. No great reaſon in my deeming; yet give the Authors thereof leave therewith to pleaſe themſelves, as well as ſome others, which dwelling much further off, borrow, or rather force their beginning from thence, without any probability at all; and that with ſuch earneſtneſs, as if they could not elſewhere have found any ſo honorable Anceſtors. Otherſome report them to have firſt come out of PERSIA, and of I wot not what City there to have taken their name: neither want there ſome which affirm them to have taken their beginning out of ARABIA, yea and ſome out of SYRIA, with many other far fet devices concerning the beginning and name of this people: all ſerving to no better purpoſe, than to ſhew the uncertainty thereof. Among others, Philip of MORNAY the noble and learned Frenchman, in his worthy Work concerning the trueneſs of the Chriſtian Religion, ſeemeth (and that not without good reaſon) to derive the Turks, together with the Tartars, from the Jews, namely from the Ten Tribes, which were by Salmanaſer King of ASSIRIA, in the time of Oſeas King of ISRAEL, carried away into Captivity, and by him confined into MEDIA, and the other unpeopled Countries of the North: whoſe going thither is not unaptly deſcribed by Eſdras, where among the great hords of the Tartars, in the fartheſt part of the World Northward, even at this day are found ſome, that ſtill retain the names of Dan, Zabulon and Naphthali, a certain argument of their deſcent: whereunto alſo the word Tartar or Tatar, ſignifying in the Syrian-Tongue, remnants or leavings; and the word Turk, a word of diſgrace, ſignifying in Hebrew, baniſhed men, ſeemeth right well to agree. Beſides that, in the Northern Countries of RUSSIA, SARMATIA, and LYTHUANIA, are found greater ſtore of the Jewiſh Nation, than elſewhere, and ſo nearer unto the Tartarians ſtill the more: whereunto Jo. Leunclavius the moſt curious Searcher out of the Turks Antiquities and Monuments, addeth as a farther Conjecture of the diſcent of thoſe barbarous Northern people from the Jews, That in his travel through LIVONIA into LYTHUANIA in the Country near unto the Metropolitan City of RIGA, he found there the barbarous people of the Lettoes, quite differing in Language from the other Country-people of the Curons and Eſtons, no leſs barbarous than themſelves; who had always in their mouths as a perpetual lamentation, which they with doleful moans daily repeated abroad in the fields, Jeru, Jeru, Maſco Lon: whereby they were thought to lament over JERUSALEM and DAMASCO, as forgetful of all other things in their ancient Country, after ſo many worlds of years, and in a deſolate place ſo far diſtant thence. And Munſter in his Deſcription of LIVONIA, repeating the like words, reporteth, That this rude people being demanded what they meant by theſe words ſo often and ſo lamentably by them without cauſe uttered: anſwered, That they knew no more, than that they had been ſo of long taught by their Anceſtors But to leave theſe Opinions concerning their be-beginning, ſo divers and uncertain, and to follow greater probabilities: as concerning the place from whence they came, it is upon better ground thought by divers others, and thoſe of the beſt Hiſtorians, That this barbarous Nation which hath of late brought ſuch fatal mutations upon ſo great a part, not of Chriſtendom only, but even of the whole World, took their firſt beginning out of the bare and cold Country of SCYTHIA: induced thereunto both by the Authority of the greateſt Coſmographers, as by moſt apparent reaſons. Pomponius Mela the Deſcriber of the World, reckoning up the people near unto the great River TANAIS (the bounder of EUROPE from ASIA Eaſtward) amongſt others maketh mention of the Turks, in theſe words, Geloni urbem ligneam habitant. Juxta Thyrſagetæ Turcæq; vaſtas ſylvas occupant, alunturq; venando. Tum continuis rupibus late aſpera & deſerta regio ad Arympheos uſque permittitur. The Geloni inhabit a City of Wood, and faſt by the Thyrſagets and Turks poſſeſs the vaſt Foreſts, and live by hunting. Then, a rough and deſert Country, with continual Rocks, is ſpaciouſly extended even as far as unto the Arympheians. Pliny alſo in like manner reckoning up the Nations about the Fens of MÆOTIS, agreeing with that Mela reporteth, ſaith, Deinde, Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, Iuſſagetæ, Turcæ, uſque ad ſolitudines ſaltuoſis convallibus aſperas, ultra quos Arymphei qui ad Riphæos pertinent montes: Next unto them, are the Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, the Thuſſagets and Turks, unto the deſerts rough with woody Valleys: beyond whom are the Arympheians, which border upon the Riphean mountains. And Ptolomy in the Deſcription of SARMATIA ASIATICA, maketh mention of the Tuſci, whom many learned men ſuppoſe to have been the ſame Nation with the Turks. Unto which ancient Teſtimonies of reverend Antiquity, add the manners and conditions of the Turks, their ancient attire, their geſture, their gate, their weapons, and manner of riding and fight, their language and dialect, ſo well agreeing with the Scythians; and a man ſhall find matter enough ſufficient to perſwade him in reaſon, that the Turks have undoubtedly taken their beginning from the Scythes; whom they in ſo many things reſemble, and with whom of all other Nations they beſt agree.

Armenia, now called Turcomania, the firſt Seat of the Turks, after their firſt coming out of Scythia.

Now it hath been no leſs doubted alſo, among the Writers of the Turks Hiſtories, at what time, and for what cauſes the Turks (to the trouble of the World) left their natural Seats in the cold Country of SCYTHIA, to ſeek themſelves others in more pleaſant and temperate Countries more Southerly, than it had been of their Original beginning. Blondus and Platina report them, enforced with a general want, to have forſaken their native Country, and followed their better fortune, in the year of our Lord, 755. with whom alſo Segonius agreeth in the cauſe of their departure, but not in the time or place when or whereby they departed: for they (as he ſaith) iſſued out of their dwelling places in the year of Grace, 844. by the Straits of the Mountain CAUCASUS: whereas the other with greater probability ſuppoſe them to have come forth by the Caſpian Straits: which the Turks alſo (as faith Sabellicus) affirm of themſelves, their Anceſtors (as they ſay) being by their Neighbors driven out of the Caſpian Mountains. Some others there be that report them to have forſaken their native Country, neither inforced thereunto by neceſſity, or the power of others; but for their valor ſent for by the Sultan of PERSIA, to aid him in his Wars: unadviſedly ſuppoſing that to have been the cauſe of their firſt coming out, which indeed hapned long time after, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall appear. But whatſoever the aforeſaid cauſes of want, or of the enemies power, might inforce them unto, a greater power no doubt it was that ſtir'd them up, even the hand of the Almighty, who being the Author of all Kingdoms upon Earth, as well thoſe which he hath appointed as Scourges wherewith to puniſh the World, as others more bleſſed, will have his work and purpoſe full of Divine Majeſty, to appear in the ſtirring of them up from right ſmall beginnings, in the increaſing and eſtabliſhing of their greatneſs and power, to the aſtoniſhment of the World; and in the ruine and deſtruction of them again, the courſe of their appointed time once run. As for the difference of the time of their coming forth, before remembred, it may reaſonably be referred to the divers emotions of that people, who being not under the command of any one, but of their divers Governors, as the manner of that people was, are not to be thought to have come forth all at once, either for one cauſe; but at divers times, ſome ſooner, ſome later, and that for divers cauſes. This people thus ſtirred up, and by the Caſpian Ports paſſing thorow the Georgian Country, then called IBERIA, near unto the Caſpian Sea, firſt ſeiſed upon a part of the greater ARMENIA, and that with ſo ſtrong hand, that it is by their Poſterity yet holden at this day, and of them called TURCOMANIA; of all other the moſt true Progeny of the ancient Turks. In which great Country they of long under their divers Leaders, in the manner of their living moſt reſembling their Anceſtors, roamed up and down with their Families and herds of Cattel, after the manner of the Scythian Nomades, their Countrymen, without any certain places of abode, yet at great Unity among themſelves, as not having much to loſe, or wherefore to ſtrive.

The firſt Kingdom of the Turks erected in Perſia by Tangrolipix, Chieftain of the Selzuccian Family: with the ſucceſs thereof.

THis wandring and unregarded people, but now the terror of the world, thus firſt ſeated in ARMENIA, long time there lived in that wide Country, after their rude and wonted manner, (from which the Turcoman Nation their Poſterity in that place, even at this day, as we ſaid, much differeth not) and not only notably defended the Country, thus by them at the firſt poſſeſſed, but ſtill incroaching farther and farther, and gaining by other mens harms, became at length dreadful unto their Neighbours, and of ſome fame alſo farther off: whereunto the effeminate cowardiſe of thoſe delicate people of ASIA, with whom they had to do, gave no leſs furtherance than their own valour; being nevertheleſs an hardy rough people, though not much skilful or trained up in the feats of War.

The fame of theſe Turks, together with their fortune, thus daily increaſing, and the mighty Empire of the Saraſins as faſt declining, which under their Chaliphs, the Succeſſors of that falſe Prophet Mahomet, having in leſs than the ſpace of two hundred years overſpread not only the greateſt part of ASIA and AFRICK, even unto GADES and the Pillars of Hercules; but alſo paſſing over that ſtrait, had overwhelmed almoſt all SPAIN; and not there ſtaying, but paſſing the Pirenei, had pierced even into the heart of France, and divers other parts of Chriſtendom, as namely ITALY, SICILY, the famous Iſland of the RHODES, with many others of the MEDITERRANEAN: now divided in it ſelf, and rent into many Kingdoms, turned their victorious arms from the Chriſtians, upon one another, to the mutual deſtruction of themſelves and their Empire. Amongſt other the Saraſin Sultans, which forgetting their Obedience to their great Caliph, took upon them the Soveraignty of Government (which admitteth no partner) was one Mahomet Sultan of PERSIA, a right great Prince, who hardly beſet on the one ſide with the Indians, and on the other with the Caliph of BABYLON his mortal Enemy, prayed Aid of the Turks his Neighbours, who were now come even to the ſide of ARAXIS, the bounds of his Empire: unto which his requeſt the Turks eaſily granted, in hope thereby to find a way for them afterwards to enter into PERSIA, and ſo ſent him 3000 hardy men under the leading of one Togra Mucalet, the Son of Mikeil a valiant Captain, and chief of the Selzuccian Tribe or Family; whom the Greeks commonly call Tangrolipix, and ſome others, Selduck, or Sadock, names (as I ſuppoſe) corrupted of the great Family whereof he was deſcended. By the aid of this Tangrolipix (for now we will ſo call him, as by the name moſt uſed) Mahomet the Perſian Sultan overcame Piſaſiris the Caliph of BABYLON, his Arabians being not able to endure the force of his Turkiſh Archers. This war thus happily ended, the Turks deſiring to return home, requeſted of the Sultan leave to depart, and with a ſafe convoy to be conducted unto the river ARAXIS, and there to have the paſſage of that ſwift river opened unto them, which was by the Perſians ſtrongly kept by two Caſtles built upon each end of the bridge, whereby the River was to be paſſed. But Mahomet loath to forgo ſuch neceſſary men, by whom he had obtained ſo great a Victory, and purpoſing to imploy them further in his Service againſt the Indians, would by no means hearken unto their requeſt; but ſeeming therewith to be diſcontented, commanded them to ſpeak no more thereof, threatning them violence if they ſhould more preſume to talk of their departure. The Turks therefore doubtful of their eſtate, and fearing further danger, ſecretly withdrew themſelves into the deſart of CARAVONITIS: and for that they were in number but few, and not able to come into the open field againſt ſo many millions of the Saraſins, lived as they might, by continual Incurſions and Roads which they made out of the deſart Foreſt into the Countries adjoyning: wherewith Mahomet greatly incenſed, ſent out an Army of twenty thouſand men under the Conduct of ten of his beſt Captains, againſt them: who for want of water and other neceſſaries, doubting to enter the deſart, encamped themſelves on the ſide of the Foreſt, there to conſult what courſe to take. But Tangrolipix, who with his Turks lay a great way off in the covert of the Woods and Mountains, underſtanding of the coming of his Enemies, and of the manner of their lying, thought it beſt upon the ſudden by night to ſet upon the Saraſins and Perſians, if ſo happily he might overthrow them by policy, whom he was not able to encounter in plain battel. Upon which reſolution having travelled two days long march in the deſart, the third day at night he ſuddenly ſet upon his Enemies, lying negligently in their Trenches, and by his unexpected coming brought ſuch a fear upon them, that they without longer ſtay betook themſelves to flight, every man ſhifting for himſelf, without regard of others. This Victory ſo happily gained, and Tangrolipix now (beyond his hope) throughly furniſhed with Armor, Horſes, and abundance of all things needful for the Wars, kept the Woods and Foreſts no longer as a Thief or Out-law, but ſhewed himſelf in the open field, where daily repaired unto him numbers of Rogues and Vagabonds ſeeking after ſpoil; with many other deſperate Villains, who for fear of puniſhment were glad of ſuch a Refuge: ſo that in a ſhort ſpace his Army was grown to be fifty thouſand ſtrong; and ſo much the ſtronger, for that they had nothing to truſt unto more than the valour of themſelves. Whilſt Tangrolipix thus increaſeth, Mahomet inraged with the overthrow of his Army, in his fury cauſed all thoſe ten Captains which had the leading thereof, to have their eyes pluckt out; threatning alſo to attire all the Souldiers that fled out of the battel, in Womans apparel, and ſo diſgraced to carry them about as Cowards; and withall raiſed a great Army for the ſuppreſſing of the Turks. All things being now in readineſs, he ſet forward; when by the way the Souldiers whom he had ſo threatned to diſgrace, ſuddenly fled to the Enemy: with whoſe coming Tangrolipix greatly encouraged and ſtrengthened, reſolved to give the Sultan battel. And ſo boldly coming on, met with him at ISPAHAN a City of PERSIA, where was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible battel, with wonderful ſlaughter on both ſides. In the heat of which battel, Mahomet unadviſedly riding to and fro to encourage his Souldiers, falling with his horſe, brake his Neck: upon which miſchance both the Armies coming to agreement, by common conſent proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in his ſtead, and ſo made him King of PERSIA, and of all the other large Dominions unto that Kingdom belonging.

This was the firſt Kingdom of the Turks, begun by the good Fortune of Tangrolipix, about 214 years after their coming out of SCYTHIA, in the year alſo of our Lord, 1030. Conſtantinus Monomachus then reigning, or a little before (according to the Turks account) in the Reign of Romanus Argirus, Conſtantine his Predeceſſor. Tangrolipix by rare Fortune, thus of a mean Captain become King of PERSIA, forthwith commanded the Garriſon which kept the bridge over the River ARAXIS, to be removed, and ſo free paſſage to be given unto the Turks his Country-men, at their pleaſure to come over: who in great multitudes repaired into PERSIA, where they were by the new Sultan well provided for, and by little and little promoted unto the greateſt Dignities of that Kingdom; the Perſians and Saraſins, the ancient Inhabitants thereof, being by theſe new come Gueſts now kept under, and as it were trodden under foot. Together with this Kingdom, the Turks received the Mahometan Superſtition, the which they before not much abhorred, as men uſing Circumciſion: So that hard it is to ſay whether Nation loſt more; the Perſians and Saraſins by the loſs of ſo great a Kingdom; or the Turks, by imbracing ſo great a Vanity.

Caliph of BABYLON, whom he in divers battels overthrew; and having at length ſlain him, joyned his Kingdom unto his own. After that, he ſent Cutlu-Muſes his Couſin, with an Army againſt the Arabians, by whom he was overthrown and put to flight. But returning by MEDIA, he requeſted of Stephan the Greek Emperors Lieutenant, leave to paſs with his Army by the confines of his Country: which his requeſt Stephan not only rejected, but alſo by ſtrong hand ſought to ſtop his paſſage; but joyning battel with him, was by the Turks eaſily overthrown, and himſelf taken. So Cutlu-Muſes returning to Tangrolipix, and recounting unto him the ſucceſs of his Wars, perſwaded him to turn his Forces into MEDIA, as a moſt fruitful Country, and eaſie to be ſubdued. But he highly offended with the overthrow given by the Arabians, would not hearken unto him, but raiſing a new Army in hope of better Fortune, went againſt the Arabians in perſon himſelf.

Cutlu-Muſes rebelleth againſt Tangrolipix.

Cutlu-Muſes in the mean time fearing the Sultans diſpleaſure, fled with his Followers and Favourites; and taking for his refuge PASAR a ſtrong City of the Choraſmians, revolted from him; which the Sultan ſeeming not to regard, held on his intended Journey againſt the Arabians, by whom he was alſo put to the worſt, and enforced with diſhonour to return. After that, he with part of his Army beſieged Cutlu-Muſes, who by the ſtrength of the place, and valour of the people, for a great while notably defended himſelf. In the mean time Tangrolipix, not unmindful what Cutlu-Muſes had before ſaid unto him, concerning the eaſineſs of the Conqueſt of MEDIA (a Country, as he ſaid, defended but by Women) ſent Aſan his Brothers Son, ſirnamed the Deaf, with a convenient Army to invade the ſame: who entring into the Frontiers of that Province, was there by the Emperors Lieutenant overthrown, and himſelf with the greateſt part of his Army ſlain. With which loſs the Sultan rather inraged than diſcouraged, ſent Habramy Alim his Brother again, with an Army of an hundred thouſand fighting men: with which ſo great a Power the Emperors Lieutenant thought it not good to encounter, until he had procured further aid from the Emperor, eſpecially out of IBERIA; and therefore kept himſelf with ſuch power as he had, within his ſtrong and fenced places. Which Alim perceiving, and out of hope to draw him unto battel, roaming up and down the Country, at laſt beſieged ARZEN, an open Town, but full of rich Merchants, by whom it was (contrary to his expectation) notably defended for the ſpace of ſix days; until that at length the Turks ſeeing no other way to win it, ſet fire upon it in divers places; by force whereof the Inhabitants were enforced for ſafeguard of their lives to fly, and to leave the Town with an infinite wealth to the ſpoil of the Enemy. By this time was Liparites Governor of IBERIA, come with a great Power to the aid of the Emperors Lieutenant in MEDIA: whereof Alim having intelligence, without delay haſted with his Army towards his Enemies: and meeting with them a little before night, had with them a cruel fight; wherein the Victory fell unto the Chriſtians, who had the Turks in chaſe a great part of the night. Nevertheleſs Liparites valiantly fighting in another wing of the battel, was there taken, and ſo carried away Priſoner: for whoſe ranſome the Emperor ſent a great ſum of money, with certain Preſents to the Sultan; all which he ſent back again, and frankly ſet Liparites at liberty, wiſhing him never to bear Arms more againſt the Turks. And with him ſent the Seriph, a man of great Place among the Mahumetans, his Embaſſador unto the Emperor.

The Turks Embaſſador contemned of the Emperor.

Tangrolipix invadeth the Emperors Dominions.

Who coming to CONSTANTINOPLE, amongſt other things, proudly demanded of the Emperor, to become Tributary unto the Sultan, and ſo to be at Peace with him for ever: Which his unreaſonable demand was by the Emperor with no leſs diſdain ſcornfully rejected, and the Seriph ſo diſmiſſed. Which contempt of his Embaſſador the Sultan taking in evil part, as alſo not a little moved with the death of his Nephew, and loſs of his Army, with all his Power invaded the Roman Provinces; but being come as far as COIME without any notable harm doing, for that the Country people hearing before of his coming, had in time conveyed themſelves with their ſubſtance into their ſtrong holds, whereof there was great ſtore in thoſe Countries; and hearing alſo that the Greek Emperor was raiſing a great Power to come againſt him at CESAREA; not daring to proceed any further, leaving ſo many Enemies behind him, he fretting in himſelf, returned into MEDIA, where finding the people all fled into their ſtrong Towns, he laid ſiege unto MANTZICHIERT, a City ſtanding in a plain Champain Country, but ſtrongly fortified with a triple Wall and deep Ditches. This City he furiouſly aſſaulted by the ſpace of thirty days without intermiſſion, but all in vain, the ſame being ſtill notably defended by Baſilius Governor thereof, and the other Chriſtians therein. The Sultan weary of this ſiege, and about to have riſen, was by Alcan one of his chief Captains, perſwaded yet to ſtay one day, for him to make proof in, what he were able to do for the gaining thereof: whereunto the Sultan yielded, committing the whole charge of the aſſault unto him. Alcan the next day dividing the Army into two parts, and placing the one part upon the higher ground, of purpoſe with the multitude of their ſhot to have overwhelmed the defendants; with the other part of the Army, furniſhed with all things needful for the aſſault, approached to the Walls; the Sultan in the mean time, with certain of the chief Turks, from an high place beholding all that was done. But this ſo forward a Captain in the midſt of his endeavour loſt himſelf, being ſlain with a great number of his Followers in approaching the Wall. His dead body known by the beauty of his Armor, was by two valiant young men that ſallied out of the Gate, drawn by the hair of his head into the City, and his head being forthwith cut off, was caſt over the Wall among the Turks: wherewith the Sultan diſcouraged, and out of hope of gaining the City, roſe with his Army, pretending himſelf with other his urgent affairs to be called home, and threatning withall, the next Spring to return with greater Power, and to do great matters.

Diſſention betwixt Tangrolipix and his brother Habramie Alim.

But not long after, great diſcord aroſe betwixt the Sultan and his Brother Habramie Alim, inſomuch that the Sultan ſought by divers means to have taken him out of the way: which Habramie perceiving, fled to his Nephew Cutlu-Muſes, and joyning his Forces with his, denounced War unto the Sultan his Brother; who meeting with them not far off from PASAR, overcame them in plain battel, wherein Habramie was taken, and preſently by the commandment of his Brother put to death. But Cutlu-Muſes, with his Couſin Melech and 6000 Turks, fled into ARMENIA; and by Meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, requeſted of the Emperor Conſtantinus Monomachus, to be received into his Protection. But the Sultan with his Army following them at the heels, they for their more ſafety were glad to fly into ARABIA. The Sultan afterwards turning into IBERIA, did there great harm, ſpoiling the Country before him: againſt whom the Emperor ſent Michael Acoluthus, a valiant Captain. Of whoſe approach the Sultan hearing, and that he would undoubtedly ere long give him battel, (deeming it no great honour unto him to overcome the Emperors Servant, but an eternal diſhonour to be of him overthrown) retired with his Army back again to TAURIS, leaving behind him one, Samuch with 3000 Turks, to infeſt the Frontiers of the Emperors Territories: which both he and other the Turks Captains afterward more eaſily did, for that Monomachus the Emperor having prodigally ſpent the Treaſures of the Empire, to increaſe his Revenue, had impoſed a Tribute upon the Frontier Countries of his Empire, wont before to be free from all Exactions; in lieu whereof they were bound to defend the paſſages from all incurſions of the Enemy: but now preſſed with new Impoſitions, had diſſolved their wonted Garriſons, and left an eaſie entrance for the barbarous Enemies into the Provinces confining upon them.

Covetouſneſs and lack of reward the decay of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire.

Beſides that, the Emperor's immediately following, and eſpecially Conſtantinus Ducas, abhorring from Wars, and given altogether to the hoarding up of Treaſure, gave little countenance, and leſs maintenance, unto men of Service, which in ſhort time turned to the great weakning, and in fine to the utter ruine of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire.

Eudocia the Empreſs contrary to her Oath deſirous to marry.

At the ſame time alſo the Government of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, by the death of Conſtantinus Ducas the late Emperor, came to his wife Eudocia with her three Sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Conſtantius, all very young: whoſe ſex and tender years the barbarous Nations having in contempt, at their pleaſure grievouſly ſpoiled the Provinces of the Empire, namely MESOPOTAMIA, CILICIA, CAPADOCIA, yea and ſometimes as far as COELOSIRIA. The report whereof much troubled the Empreſs, and gave occaſion for many that loved her not, to ſay, That ſo troubled an Eſtate required the Government of ſome worthy man. Wherefore ſhe fearing leſt that the Senate making choice of ſome other, ſhe and her Children ſhould be removed from the Government, thought it beſt for the preſervation of her State and her Childrens, to make choice of ſome notable and valiant man for her Husband, that for her and hers, ſhould take upon him the managing of ſo weighty Affairs. But to check this her purpoſe (the only remedy of her troubled thoughts) ſhe had at the death of the late Emperor Conſtantine her Husband, at ſuch time as the Soveraignty was by the Senate confirmed unto her and her Sons, ſolemnly ſworn never more to marry; which her Oath was for the more aſſurance conceived into writing, and ſo delivered unto the Patriarch to keep. This troubled her more, than to find out the Man whom ſhe could think worthy of her ſelf, with ſo great honour. She held then in priſon one Diogenes Romanus, a man of great Renown, and honourably deſcended; whoſe Father having married the Neece of the Emperor Romanus Argirus, and aſpiring to the Empire, being convicted thereof, ſlew himſelf for fear to be enforced by Torments, to bewray his Confederates. This Diogenes was by the late Emperor Conſtantine, for his good Service againſt the Scythes (who then much troubled the Empire) highly promoted, with moſt honourable teſtimony in the Charters of his Promotions, That ſuch Honours were beſtowed upon him, not of the Emperors meer Bounty, but as the due Rewards of his worthy Deſerts. Notwithſtanding after the death of the Emperor, he ſick of his Fathers diſeaſe, and ſwelling with the pride of Ambition, ſought by ſecret means to have aſpired unto the Empire: whereof the Empreſs having intelligence, cauſed him to be apprehended and brought in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE, where being found guilty of the foul Treaſon, and ſo committed to ſafe keeping, was ſhortly after brought forth to the Judgment Seat again, to receive the heavy Sentence of death. In which woful plight, ſtanding as a man out of hope, and now utterly forlorn, he moved all the beholders with a ſorrowful compaſſion: for beſide that he was a man of exceeding ſtrength, ſo was he of incomparable feature and beauty, adorned with many other rare qualities and vertues anſwerable thereunto: wherewith the Empreſs moved with the reſt, or pierced with a ſecret good liking, is hard to ſay, revoked the Sentence of Condemnation ready to have been pronounced upon him, and gave him Pardon.

Diogenes Romanus of a Priſoner by the Empreſs made General of her Army.

And ſhortly after having ſet him at liberty, ſent for him as he was going into CAPADOCIA his native Country, and made him General of all her Forces, with a full reſolution in her ſelf to marry him, and to make him Emperor, if ſhe might by any means get the writing out of the Patriarchs hand, wherein her Oath for never marrying again was compriſed. For the compaſſing whereof, ſhe entred into a deep device full of feminine policy with one of her Eunuchs, whom ſhe purpoſed to uſe as her pander for the circumventing of the Patriarch. This crafty Eunuch inſtructed by his Miſtreſs, coming to the Patriarch Joannes Xiliphilmes, a man both for his place and integrity of life much honoured, told him in great ſecret, that the Empreſs had ſo far ſet her good liking upon a young Gentleman, a Nephew of his called Barda (then a Gallant of the Court) as that ſhe could be content to take him to her Husband, and to make him Emperor, if ſhe might by his Holineſs be perſwaded, that ſhe might with ſafe conſcience do it, and by him be diſcharged of the raſh Oath ſhe had unadviſedly taken, never to marry again, whereof he had the keeping. The Patriarch, otherwiſe a Contemner of worldly honours, yet moved with ſo great a Preferment of his Nephew, promiſed the Eunuch to do therein whatſoever the Empreſs had deſired, which he accordingly performed. And ſo ſending for the Senators one by one, in whoſe good liking the matter chiefly reſted, he with much gravity propounded unto them the dangerous eſtate of the Common-weal, with the Troubles daily increaſing, and the continual fear of foreign Enemies, not to be repreſſed by the weak hand of a Woman, or the authority of young Children, but requiring (as he ſaid) the valiant courage of ſome worthy Man. After that, he began to find great fault with the raſh Oath which the Empreſs had taken a little before the death of her Husband, never to marry; and utterly condemning the ſame, as contrary to the Word of God, and unjuſtly exacted of her, rather to ſatisfie the jealous humour of the Emperor her late Husband, than for any good of the Common-weal: he in fine perſwaded them, that the unlawful Oath might be revoked, and the Empreſs ſet at liberty at her pleaſure, by their good liking to make choice of ſuch a man for her Husband, as might better undertake ſo weighty affairs of the Empire, more fit for a Man, than for ſo tender a Lady and three young Children. The greater part of the Senate thus perſwaded by the Patriarch, and the reſt with Gifts and Promiſes overcome by the Empreſs; the Patriarch delivered unto her the Writing ſhe ſo much deſired, and diſcharged her of her Oath: whereupon ſhe forthwith calling unto her certain of her ſecret Friends, married Diogenes, whom ſhe cauſed to be proclaimed Emperor. Now thought Eudocia after the manner of a Woman, to have had her Husband (whom ſhe even from the bottom of diſpair had exalted to the higheſt Type of Honour) in all things Loyal and Pliant: whereunto he for a while at the firſt forced himſelf, but afterwards (being a man of a proud nature, and haughty ſpirit) became weary of ſuch Obſervance, and began by little and little to take every day more and more upon him. And for that the Imperial Provinces in the Eaſt, were in ſome part loſt, and the reſt in no ſmall danger; he as well for the redreſs thereof, as for his own Honour, and to ſhew himſelf an Emperor indeed, and not the Servant of the Empreſs, left the Court, and paſſed over into ASIA, although it were with a ſmall Army and evil appointed: for why, it was no eaſie matter for him to furniſh out the Army with all things neceſſary, which by the ſloth and ſparing of the late Emperors, had, to the great danger and diſhonour of the Empire, been utterly neglected. Nevertheleſs the Turkiſh Sultan, who at the ſame time with a great Power invaded the Provinces of the Empire, hearing of his coming, and that he was a man of great valour, and doubting what Power he might bring with him, retired himſelf; and dividing his Army, ſent the one part thereof into the South part of ASIA, and the other into the North, which ſpoiled all the Country before them as they went, and ſuddenly ſurpriſing the City of NEO-CESARIA, ſacked it, and ſo laded with the ſpoil thereof departed. But the Emperor underſtanding thereof, and not a little grieved therewith, drawing out certain bands and companies of the beſt and moſt readieſt Souldiers in his Army, and with them coaſting the Country to get betwixt the Turks and home, uſed therein ſuch expedition, that he was upon them before they were aware, and ſo ſuddenly charging them, brought ſuch a fear upon them, that they betook themſelves to their heels, leaving behind them for haſt, their Baggage and Carriages, with all the Priſoners and Booty they had before taken at NEO-CESARIA, and in their late Expedition: yet was there no great number of them ſlain, for that the Chriſtians ſore wearied with long travel, were not able far to follow the chace. From thence taking his way unto SIRIA, he ſent part of his Army to MELITENA, and carried himſelf from ALEPPO, a great booty both of men and cattel. At which time alſo the City of HIERAPOLIS was yielded unto him, where he ſhortly after built a ſtrong Caſtle. But whilſt he there ſtayed, news was brought unto him, that the other part of his Army which he had ſent away, was overthrown by the Turks; for the relief of whom, he roſe with all haſt and marched towards them: but being in number far inferior unto his Enemies, he was by them as he lay encamped, incloſed round in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible for him to have eſcaped. At which time alſo the Governor of ALEPPO traiterouſly revolted from him, and joyned his Forces with the Enemy, making now no other reckoning, but aſſuredly to have taken him. But whilſt the Turks thus dream of nothing but of a moſt glorious Victory, and were in mind dividing the ſpoil, the Emperor without ſo much as the ſounding of a Trumpet, ſuddenly iſſuing out of his Trenches, when they leaſt thought he durſt ſo have done, and reſolutely charging them home, put them to flight, and had of them a notable Victory, had he throughly proſecuted the ſame. After that, having taken divers Towns he came to ALEXANDRIA, in CILICIA, and there all about in the Country bilited his Army, becauſe of the approach of Winter, and ſo returned himſelf to CONSTANTINOPLE. The next Spring the Turks, according to their uſual manner invading the Frontiers of the Empire, did much harm about NEO-CESARIA: whereof the Emperor advertiſed, went thither with his Army, and quickly repreſſing their fury, took his Journey to the River EUPHRATES, where leaving part of his Army with Philaretus for the keeping of thoſe Frontiers, he himſelf retired Northward into CAPADOCIA. But after his departure, the Turks ſetting upon Philaretus, put him to flight with his Garriſons: and taking the ſpoil of the Frontiers, entred into CAPADOCIA, waſting all as they went: and afterwards turning into CILICIA, ſacked ICONIUM a rich and populous City. Whereof the Emperor underſtanding at SEBASTIA, made towards them: but hearing by the way that they had ranſackt the City, and were for fear of his coming already retired, he ſent Chatagurio Governor of ANTIOCH, with part of his Army to MOPSIPHESTIA, to ſtop the Turks of their paſſage. But they in the plains of THARSUS were before diſtreſſed by the Armenians, and ſtript of all their rich Prey: and hearing farther of the approach of the Emperors Power, fled by night and ſo eſcaped: which the Emperor underſtanding, and having now well quieted thoſe Provinces, and the year far ſpent, returned again to CONSTANTINOPLE. But after his departure, the Turks again invading the frontier Provinces, he ſent Manuel Comnenus, a valiant young man, General againſt them; who ſo prevailed, that the Emperor envying at his Honour, took from him a great part of his Army, and ſent him with a ſmall Power into SIRIA. But as he was upon the way, he was by the Turks entrapped near unto SEBASTIA, and there taken, moſt part of his Army being at the ſame time overthrown and ſlain: with which loſs, the Emperor troubled, made great preparation to go himſelf in Perſon againſt his Enemies; who encouraged with the former Victory, ceaſed not to infeſt his Territories. In the mean time by great fortune came Manuel Comnenus home, together with the Turk that took him; who being fallen into the diſpleaſure of the Sultan, fled unto the Emperor with his Priſoner, of whom he was honourably entertained. All things now in a readineſs, for ſo great an Expedition as the Emperor had in Perſon purpoſed, he ſet forward: and after long travel having paſſed CESAREA, he incamped at a place called CRYAPEGA: where for ſevere execution done upon certain mutinous Souldiers, one of the Legions of his Army roſe in mutiny againſt him: whom (for all that) he quickly pacified with the terror of the reſt of his Army, which he threatned to turn upon them if they proceeded to forget their duty. After that, removing to THEODOSOPOLIS, he divided his Army, and ſent Ruſelius one of his beſt Captains, with one part thereof againſt Chliat, and another part he ſent to beſiege MANTZICIERTS, retaining with himſelf the reſt, being of no ſtrength. The Turks in MANTZICIERTS finding themſelves not able long to hold out, fell to compoſition, and yielded the City. But ſhortly after, the Souldiers left there in Garriſon for the keeping thereof, going out to ſeek for forrage, were by the Turks ſuddenly oppreſſed: which the Emperor underſtanding, ſent thither one Nicephorus Bryennius, with certain Companies to relieve the City; who encountring with the Turks, and finding himſelf too weak, ſent unto the Emperor for aid: who not knowing the ſtrength of the Enemies, blamed him of cowardiſe, yet ſent unto him Nicephorus Baſilacius with part of his Army; who joyning his Forces with Bryennius, and giving the Turks battel, put them to flight. But following too faſt upon them unto their Trenches, and Bryennius making no great haſt after, he had his horſe ſlain under him, and ſo on foot heavily laden with armor, and not able to ſhift for himſelf, was there taken and brought to the Sultan; who honourably entreated him, and oftentimes queſtioning with him concerning the Emperor, and ſhewing him his own Power, examined him alſo of the Emperors.

Tangrolipix was now dead, and the Sultan now in the field againſt the Emperor, was Axan his Son, a man of great wiſdom and diſcretion; who conſidering the doubtful event of battel, ſent Embaſſadors unto the Emperor to intreat with him of peace. But he (perſwaded by ſome of his Captains, that this motion made by the Sultan for peace, proceeded but of a meer fear and diſtruſt he had in his own Power, or elſe to gain time until ſome greater ſtrength came) had ſmall regard of the Embaſſors or their Meſſage, but proudly willed them to tell their Maſter, That if he were deſirous of Peace, he ſhould get him farther off, and leave the place wherein he lay encamped, for him to lodge in: and ſo without other anſwer, commanded them away. Now had the Emperor (as is before ſaid) ſent away part of his Army by Ruſelius againſt Chliat, whom he ſent now for in haſt again: but he hearing of the approach of the Sultan, by the perſwaſion of Tarchomiates, one of his Captains, was retired for his more ſafety back into the Roman Frontiers, leaving the Emperor deſtitute of his help. At which time alſo a Company of the Scythians which ſerved in the Emperors Camp, revolted unto the Turks; not without ſome ſuſpition, that the reſt of their Fellows which remained, would ere long do the like: nevertheleſs the Emperor preſuming of ſuch ſtrength as he had, or carried headlong with his own Fortune, reſolved to give the Turks battel, and therefore putting his men in Order, ſet upon them. Who ſomewhat troubled with the Emperors ſo ſudden a reſolution, as being yet in ſome hope of Peace, yet having put themſelves in order of battel, received the Enemies Charge; ſtill giving a little ground, as men not greatly deſirous either to fight or to fly. This fight continuing long, and the day now declining, the Emperor doubting leſt the Sultan ſhould ſend part of his Army to aſſault his Camp (from which he was now drawn ſomewhat far, and had left the ſame but weakly manned) cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and ſo began orderly to retire himſelf with them that were about him: which others afar off in the battel beholding, and ſuppoſing him to have fled, began themſelves to fly amain. Of which ſo ſhameful flight and ſudden fear Andronicus (the Son of John Ducas, the late Emperor Conſtantine his Brother, and by him created Cæſar, who with his Sons ſecretly envied at the Honour of Diogenes) was the cauſe: for he commanding a great part of the Army, gave it firſt out unto ſuch as were about him, that the Emperor fled: and to increaſe the fear, turning his horſe about, fled towards the Camp as faſt as he could; after whom all the reſt moſt diſorderly followed: which the Emperor beholding, and therewith not a little troubled, made a ſtand, labouring in vain to have ſtaid the reſt: for now the Turks incouraged with the ſudden flight of the Chriſtians, began hardly to purſue them, as men already overthrown by the hand of God; whom for all that, the Emperor with ſuch as yet ſtood with him, for a ſpace notably reſiſted. But being forſaken by the greater part of his Army, and oppreſſed with the multitude of his Enemies, being wounded himſelf, and his horſe ſlain under him, he was taken all imbrued in his own blood, and the blood of his Enemies, of whom he had wounded and ſlain many. The Sultan advertiſed of his taking, at the firſt believed it not, ſuppoſing it rather to have been ſome other great man: until that he was both by them, whom he had but a little before ſent Embaſſador unto him, and by Baſilacius one of his Captains then Priſoner with him, aſſured that it was undoubtedly he, which Baſilacius brought before him to ſee if he knew him, fell down proſtrate at his feet, as before his dread Lord and Soveraign. The Emperor brought before the Sultan, and humbling himſelf in ſuch ſort as beſt beſeemed his heavy Fortune, the Sultan preſently took him up, and thus chearfully ſpoke unto him, Grieve not noble Emperor (ſaid he) at thy miſhap, for ſuch is the chance of War, overwhelming ſometimes one, ſometimes another: neither fear thou any harm, for I will uſe thee not as my Priſoner, but as an Emperor: which accordingly he did, preſently appointing him a Princely Pavillion, with all things anſwerable to his ſtate, ſetting him oftentimes at his own boord, and for his ſake enlarging ſuch Priſoners as he required. And after he had thus for certain days honourably uſed him, and diſcourſed with him of many things, he concluded a perpetual Peace with him, upon promiſe of a marriage to be made betwixt their Children, and ſo with a ſafe Convoy ſent him away with greater Honour than was at an Enemies hand to have been expected. The Emperor in Turkiſh attire, which the Sultan had beſtowed upon him, coming to THEODOSOPOLIS, there ſtaid the curing of his Wounds, and afterwards accompanied with the Sultans Embaſſadors, ſet forward toward CONSTANTINOPLE. But all was now there changed: for upon the report of his Captivity, John the Cæſar, with Pſellus one of the chief Senators, and others of the ſame Faction, which always envied at the Honour of Diogenes, preſently took the Imperial Government from Eudocia the Empreſs, and thruſting her into a Monaſtery which ſhe had built near to PROPONTIS, ſet up Michael Ducas her eldeſt Son, Emperor, in ſtead of Diogenes: whoſe ſimplicity, Cæſar his Uncle abuſing with the reſt, did now what they liſt. And hearing that Diogenes was now (contrary to their expectation) ſet at liberty by the Sultan, and coming towards the the Emperial City, ſent out Letters every way in the new Emperors Name, unto all the Governors of the Provinces whereby he was to paſs, not to receive him as Emperor, or to do him any Honour: which Diogenes underſtanding, ſtaid at the Caſtle of DOCIA, whither ſome of his Friends with ſuch Power as they were able to make, reſorted unto him. Againſt whom, Cæſar with the contrary Faction firſt ſent his Son Conſtantine, and after that Andronicus his eldeſt Son, both Diogenes his Mortal Enemies, with a great Army;

Army: by whom Diogenes, with his Friends and Followers, were overthrown and diſcomfited. Diogenes himſelf flying to the City of ADANA, was there hardly beſieged by Andronicus, and in the end glad to yield himſelf, upon condition, that he ſhould reſign the Empire, and ſo for ever after to lead a private life. For whoſe ſafety, certain of the chief of the Clergy ſent of purpoſe from Michael the Emperor, gave their Faith: ſo Diogenes all attired in black, yielded himſelf to Andronicus; by whom he was brought to COTAI, then the Metropolitical City of PHRIGIA, there to expect what further Order ſhould be taken for him from the Court: during which time he fell ſick, being (as many ſuppoſed) ſecretly poiſoned. But whilſt he there lay languiſhing, an heavier doom came from the young Emperor, That he ſhould have his Eyes put out: which was forthwith in moſt cruel manner done; the Clergy-men that had before for his ſafety gaged their Faith, crying out in vain againſt ſo horrible a cruelty. Thus deprived of his ſight, he was conveyed into the Iſland of PROTA, where his Eyes for lack of looking to, putrifying, and Worms breeding in them, with ſuch an odious ſmell as that no man could abide to come nigh him, he in ſhort time after died, when he had reigned three years, eight months. All which miſery was thought to have happened unto him through the malice of Cæſar, without the knowledge of the young Emperor his Nephew.

The miſerable death of Diogenes the Emperor.

Axan the Sultan ſeeketh to revenge the death of Diogenes.

Axan hearing of the miſerable end of the late Emperor Diogenes, was therewith much grieved, and the more, for that the League which he had to his good content ſo lately made with him, was thereby come to nought: wherefore in revenge thereof, he with great Power invaded the Imperial Provinces; not for ſpoil and booty only, as in former time, but now to conquer and to hold the ſame. Againſt whom, Michael the Emperor ſent Iſaac Comnenus his Lieutenant, with a great Army: who meeting with the Turks, and joyning battel, was by them overthrown with all his Army, and taken Priſoner; and glad afterwards for a great ſum of money to redeem himſelf. After which overthrow, the Emperor ſent his Uncle Cæſar with another Army againſt them, who was by Ruſelius, that had before revolted from the Emperor, overthrown at the River SANGARIUS, and taken Priſoner; whom he for all that, ſhortly after ſet at liberty again, and joyning with him againſt the Turks, were both together by them diſcomfited and taken Priſoners, but afterwards redeemed; Cæſar by the Emperor, and Ruſelius by his Wife. This Ruſelius was a notable Traytor, who joyning with the Turks, did what he liſt in the Provinces of the Empire in the leſſer ASIA: for the repreſſing of whom, the Emperor ſent Alexius Comnenus, a young man, but very politick and couragious; who ſecretly practiſing with the Turks that were great with Ruſelius, had him at laſt by them for a ſum of money betrayed into his Power: who forthwith ſent him to CONSTANTINOPLE to the Emperor, by whom he was impriſoned, but afterward ſet at liberty and employed againſt Bryennius and his Brother, then up in Rebellion againſt the Emperor.

Cutlu-Muſes with his Sons and Kinſmen take up arms againſt Axan the Sultan.

But to come nearer to the Turkiſh Affairs. Cutlu-Muſes, who with his Couſin Melech and others, were for fear of Tangrolipix their Couſin fled into ARABIA, as is before declared, now in the beginning of the Reign of Axan, returned: and as the envious Competitors of his Kingdom, having raiſed a great Power of their Friends and Partakers, were now ready to have tried the matter with him by plain battel. Againſt whom alſo, the Sultan on the other ſide had brought into the field his whole Forces, and was now likewiſe ready to have incountred them near unto the City of ERES. But whilſt the Turks thus divided, ſtood ready to deſtroy themſelves, the Caliph of BABYLON (from whom though the Turks had taken all Temporal Soveraignty, yet in matters of Religion ſtill held him in great reverence and eſteem, as their chief Biſhop, and the Succeſſor of their great Prophet) conſidering that nothing could be more dangerous to his Sect and Religion, than that civil diſſention, the late confuſion and utter ruine of the Saraſin Empire, and Authoriy of the Caliphs; and fearing the like effect in theſe new Saraſins, now the chief ſtay of the Mahometan Superſtition: ſetting aſide all Pontifical Formality, whereby he was bound not to go out of his own houſe, came with all ſpeed, even as the Armies were now ready to joyn battel, and thruſting himſelf into the midſt betwixt them, what with the reverence of his Perſon, what with his effectual perſwaſion, wrought ſo much, and prevailed ſo far with both Parties, that they were content to lay down their Weapons, and to ſtand to his Order and Judgment: which was, That Axan the Sultan ſhould ſtill injoy his Kingdom and Territories, whole and entire unto himſelf as he did: and that Cutlu-Muſes and his Sons, aided by him, and ſo invading the Provinces of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, ſhould thereof ſubdue ſo much as they could unto themſelves, and to be thereof accounted the only Lords and Governors: which Order as it was unto the Turks, and for the maintenance of the Mahometan Superſtition, very wholeſome and commodious, ſo was it unto the Chriſtian Commonweal and Religion moſt dangerous and hurtful, as in proceſs of time by proof it appeared. For by this mean, in ſhort time after, Cutlu-Muſes with his Couſins and Sons ſubdued all MEDIA, with a great part of ARMENIA, CAPADOCIA, PONTUS, and BYTHINIA, and ſo a great part of the leſſer ASIA. By the aid of this Cutlu-Muſes, and the favour of the Souldiers, Nicephorus Botoniates aſpiring unto the Empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, diſplaced his Maſter, the Emperor, Michael Ducas, after he had reigned ſix years and ſix months, and in the habit of a Monk thruſt him into an Abbey: which Uſurper by the juſt Judgment of God, was at length requited even with the ſame meaſure, and in like manner ſerved by Comnenus; who thruſting him out, ſucceeded himſelf in the Empire. Much it was that this Cutlu-Muſes, with his Sons and Kinſmen did for the inlarging of the Turkiſh Empire, by the help of the great Perſian Sultan whoſe Forces, together with their own, in divers Countries conducted by theſe worthy Leaders his nigh Kinſmen, and doing great matters, gave occaſion for themſelves to be accounted Sultans, though indeed they were none, neither their names ſuch as are by ſome ancient Writers, and others of later time alſo reported; but unto the Turks themſelves by thoſe names, either for Sultans, unknown. Out of theſe great Commanders, all born of the Selzuccian Family, hath Aithonus, and others following his report, derived their Dogriſla, Aſpaſalemus, Meleclas, and Belchiaroc, whom they ſuppoſe to have orderly ſucceeded Zadoc, otherwiſe called Tangrolipix, in the Turkiſh Empire, and to have done great matters: whereas both by the report of the Turks themſelves, and the relation of the Greeks, it appears plainly,

A moſt hurtful Order for the Chriſtian Commonweal.

The ground of the error of divers writers about the Succeſſors of Tangrollpix, otherwiſe of them called Sadoch.

Axan, (more truly called Ax-han, that is to ſay, the White King) to have been the Son of Tangrolipix, and to have ſucceeded him in the Empire: and that by him the Emperor Diogenes was taken, and not by Aſpaſalemus as they vainly imagine. As for Aſpaſalemus, whom the Turks by that name know not any thing of his doings, it ſeemeth to have been a name corrupted of Aſpam Sallarius, the Brother of Tangrolipix and Habrami, and not his Sons Son as they would have it. In like manner Meleclas alſo ſeemeth to have been forged of Melech the Son of Habrami, Tangrolipix his Brother, and not of Aſpaſalemus, as ſome without any good ground report. Whom they finding to have been all great Men in the Selzuccian Family, with ſome others alſo, have both corrupted their names, and given them an imaginary Soveraignty and ſucceſſion in the Turks firſt Empire, ſuch as beſide that the Turks themſelves acknowledge not, is eaſily to be refelled out of the Hiſtories of the Greeks, who had with them ſtill much to do. Wherefore leaving thoſe ſuppoſed Princes of the Turks, with their imaginary ſucceſſion, and doings, unto the Authors thereof, following more certainties, to return again to the courſe of our Hiſtory. Axan the Sultan at the ſame time that he had by the mediation of the Chaliph (or not long after) fallen to agreement with his Couſin Cutlu-Muſes; to increaſe the Honour of his Nation and the Bounds of his Empire, gave unto Ducas and Melech, two of his nigh Kinſmen, the Government of DAMASCO and ALEPPO, with that part of SYRIA which joyneth unto them, of purpoſe that way to incroach upon the Ægyptian Chaliph, who then had under his Juriſdiction, all, as far as LAODICEA in SYRIA; yet not with ſo large Priviledge as had Cutlu-Muſes, unto whom and his Poſterity he had yielded the abſolute Honour of a Sultan or King, over ſuch Countries and Provinces as they ſhould win from the Chriſtians: but unto theſe others his Kinſmen, he gave the Government of the aforeſaid Cities of DAMASCO and ALEPPO, in the Frontiers of his Dominion in SYRIA, conditionally that they ſhould ſtill remain his Vaſſals, and hold of him as of their Soveraign, whatſoever they had; who nevertheleſs in ſhort time mightily prevailed upon the Egyptian, ſtill inceaſing the Turkiſh Territory with the loſs of the Saraſins, whoſe name together with their Empire, was now by the Turks almoſt quite driven out of ASIA.

But theſe proud Branches of the Turkiſh Empire, thus over-ſpreading the leſſer ASIA, with the greateſt part of SYRIA, were in ſhort time after by the Mercy of God, and the valour of the moſt Chriſtian and moſt Religious Princes of the Weſt, cut ſhorter, and brought again into ſome better Order. The full diſcourſe whereof, worthy eternal Memory, by others inrolled in the ancient Records of Fame, I purpoſe not at large to follow, but in brief to touch, for the orderly continuation of the preſent Hiſtory, haſting to the doings of this Victorious Nation of latter times, wherein we are to make a longer ſtay, as more pertinent unto the dangerous eſtate of the preſent time.

Peter a French Hermit goeth on pilgrimage to Jeruſalem.

It fortuned that whilſt Cutlu-Muſes and his Sons, ſupported by the Sultan Axan their Kinſman, thus mightily prevailed againſt the Chriſtians in the leſſer ASIA on the one ſide, and Melech with his Couſin againſt the Egyptian Chaliph in SYRIA on the other ſide: that one Peter a French Hermit moved with a devout zeal, according to the manner of that time, went to viſit the Sepulchre of our Saviour, with the other holy Places at JERUSALEM; who coming into SYRIA, then for the moſt part poſſeſſed by the Turks and Saraſins, diligently noted by the way as he travelled, the Manners and Faſhions of theſe barbarous Nations, their Government, their Cities, their Power and Strength, but above all, the grievous Miſeries of the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians, that there lived in moſt miſerable thraldom among them, without hope of releaſe: all which, he in the habit of a poor Pilgrim, at liberty ſafely viewed, in the midſt of theſe Miſcreants, being withall a little low hard-favoured Fellow, and therefore in ſhew more to be contemned than feared: yet under ſuch ſimple and homely Feature lay unregarded a moſt ſubtil ſharp and piercing wit, fraught with diſcretion and ſound judgment, ſtill applying to ſome uſe what he had in his long and painful travel moſt curiouſly obſerved. He cometh to JERUSALEM, and performing his devotions there, ſaw the grievous miſery of the poor devout Chriſtians, ſo great and heavy, as that greater or more intollerable could none be: wherewith not a little grieved, he entred into a deep diſcourſe thereof with Simon the Patriarch and Abbot of the Monaſtery of the Chriſtians (there before built by certain Italian Merchants) and with the Maſter of the Hoſpitalers, by whom he was fully informed thereof, as of whatſoever elſe he required. After much grave Conference, it was at length agreed upon amongſt them, that the Patriarch and the grand Maſter, ſhould in their own, and the names of the other oppreſſed Chriſtians, write their Letters unto the Pope and the other Chriſtian Princes, concerning their Miſeries; and to crave their Aid for the Recovery of thoſe holy places out of the hands of thoſe cruel Infidels; of which Letters the devout Hermit promiſed himſelf to be the truſty Carrier, and of their Petitions the moſt careful Solicitor. Whereupon the Patriarch and grand Maſter, in the name of the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians wrote their Letters unto this effect:

The deſcription of Peter the Hermit.

The Letters of Simon Patriarch of Jeruſalem, and of the grand Maſter of the Hoſpitalers, unto the Pope and other Chriſtian Princes, in the behalf of the oppreſſed Chriſtians in Jeruſalem.

We the Citizens of the holy City, and Country-men of Chriſt Jeſus, daily ſuffer thoſe things which Chriſt our King ſuffered but once, in the laſt days of his mortality. We are daily buffetted, ſcourged, and pierced: every day ſome of us are brained, beheaded, or crucified. We would fly from City to City, unto the remoteſt parts of the Earth, and remove out of the middle of that Land where our Saviour wrought our Redemption, to lead a poor exiled and vagrant life; were it not impiety to leave the Land (ſacred with the Birth, Doctrin, Death, Reſurrection, and Aſcenſion of our Saviour) without Inhabitants and Prieſts; and that there ſhould firſt lack ſuch as would indure Death and Martyrdom, than ſuch as would inflict the ſame; and that there ſhould not be ſuch which would as willingly die for Chriſt, as in battel, ſo long as there were any that would fight againſt them. Theſe things truly we moſt miſerably ſuffer: yet was there a time when as our Anceſtors feared no ſuch thing, either to themſelves or their Poſterity. And now perhaps the Chriſtian Kingdoms of the Weſt live likewiſe without the leaſt ſuſpicion of fear: but let them be moved by our example and Teſtimony. The ſtrength of the Turks is daily increaſed, and ours diminiſhed: The continual gaining of new Kingdoms giveth them courage: They have already devoured the whole World, in hope. The Forces of the Turks are fiercer and ſtronger than the Forces of the Saraſins, their Policies deeper, their Attempts more deſperate, their Endeavours greater, and their Succeſs fortunater.

Rome and Conſtantinople, which was alſo called Nova Roma, or new Rome.

fortunater. Yet have the Saraſins attempted both Romes; they have beſieged Conſtantinople, and have waſted not only the ſea coaſts of Italy, but even the heart of the Land alſo. Then why ſhould the kingdoms of the Weſt preſume themſelves to ſtand in ſafety and out of all peril, when as the chief fortreſſes of the world have been ſo endangered? What may the reſt of Chriſtendom promiſe unto it ſelf, ſeeing that Jeruſalem (the ſeat and ſpectacle of the Chriſtian Religion) hath been beſieged, taken, ſacked, raſed and triumphed upon? Seeing that of the Chriſtian profeſſion remain but the poor and weak reliques, in compariſon of the ancient whole entire body? This land, which is dayly beſprinkled with our blood, yea the blood it ſelf crieth out for revenge: And we your moſt humble ſuppliants, proſtrate at your feet, call upon the help, aid, mercy, faith, and religion, of you moſt bleſſed Father, of the Kings, Princes, and Potentates; Chriſtians not in name and profeſſion only, but in heart, ſoul, and ſpirit. Before the tempeſt thunder, before the lightning fall upon you, avert from you and your children the ſtorm hanging over your heads: defend us your poor ſuppliants, deliver your religion from moſt wicked and accurſed ſlavery. You ſhall in ſo doing deſerve immortal fame, and God ſhall requite your ſo great valour in this world with terreſtrial kingdoms, and in the world to come with eternal bliſs, whoſe ſacred inheritance you ſhall have defended from the rage of hell.

The Council of Claremont in France.

With theſe Letters, and plenty of other ſecret inſtructions, the devout Hermit returning into Italy, and coming to Rome, delivered his Letters unto Urban the ſecond of that name, then Pope, with a full diſcourſe of the miſeries of the Chriſtians under the Turkiſh Thraldom, which he had ſeen at Jeruſalem and other places as he travelled; requeſting his holy care for the redreſs thereof: with whom he ſo prevailed, that ſhortly after, he calling a Council at Claremont in France, among other things, propounded the miſery of the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians at Jeruſalem, as an eſpecial matter to be conſidered of. And having cauſed the aforeſaid Letters, directed unto him and the other Chriſtian Princes, to be openly read in the Council,whereunto three hundred and ten Biſhops were then out of divers parts of Chriſtendom aſſembled, with the Embaſſadors of all Countries, much moved the whole Aſſembly to compaſſion: at which time alſo the Hermit (whoſe flowing Eloquence fully countervailed what wanted in his feature,) ſtanding up in the midſt of the Council, delivered his meſſage in the name of the afflicted Chriſtians, with their heavy groanings and tears: which as they could not be in Letters expreſſed, ſo were they not hardly by the religious Hermit (as by him who having but lately ſeen both the miſery of the men, and deſolation of the places, and at the heart touched with the grief thereof) ſo lively repreſented, as that it moved the whole Aſſembly with the like ſympathie of heavineſs and grief. Which the Pope perceiving, took thereupon occaſion to enter into a large diſcourſe concerning that matter, with many effectual reaſons perſwading the Fathers and Princes there preſent, of the neceſſity of ſo religious a War to be taken in hand, for the deliverance of their oppreſſed Brethren out of the Thraldom of the Infidels; and now as well with their preſent Decree, as afterwards at their return home into their Countries, by all means to further the ſame. Which notable perſuaſion, with the heavy complaint of the Hermit, and the equity of the cauſe, ſo much moved the whole Council, and the reſt there preſent, that they all as men inſpired with one Spirit, declared their conſent by their often crying out, Deus vult, Deus vult, God willeth it, God willeth it: which words ſo then uttered by way of applauſe, were in the great and moſt ſacred expedition following, much uſed of the devout Chriſtians, as the fortunate ſignal of their cheerful forwardneſs, even in their moſt dangerous enterpriſes. Strange it were to tell, and hardly to be believed (but that the ancient Hiſtories bear witneſs of the like) how far in one days ſpace the report of this religious decreed war was by flying Fame diſperſed.

An expedition agreed upon by the Council, for the relief of the Chriſtians oppreſſed in the Holy Land.

The Council diſſolved, and the reverend Fathers returning every man home into his own Country, it pleaſed God by their effectual perſuaſions ſo to work with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, and people in general, that in all Countries and Provinces in Chriſtendom, were ſhortly to be ſeen men of all ſorts in great number, with red Croſſes on their breaſts (the cogniſance of that ſacred expedition) readie of themſelves to ſpend both life and goods for the defence of the Chriſtian Religion, and recovery of the Holy Land. The number of whom is of divers diverſly reported; but of moſt ſuppoſed to have been three hundred thouſand fighting men: Of whom the chief Commanders were, Godfrey Duke of Lorrain, with his two Brethren, Euſtace and Baldwin, all of the honourable Houſe of Buillon; Hugh ſirnamed the Great, brother to Philip then the French King; Raymund and Robert Earls of Flanders; Robert Duke of Normandy, William the Conquerors Son; Stephen de Valois Earl of Chartiers; Ademar Biſhop of Podie, the Popes Legate; and Peter the Hermit, not to be numbred amongſt the leaſt, as chief Author of this moſt famous expedition: unto whom many other honourable Princes joyned themſelves, as partakers of their travels, though not with like charge.

The chief Commanders of the Chriſtians in their expedition into the Holy Land.

The firſt that ſet forward in this expedition, was one Gualter Senſavier a noble Gentleman, with a great band of men: not long after whom followed Peter the Hermit, with forty thouſand more; who both travelling through Germany, Hungary and Bulgaria, were glad oftentimes, eſpecially in the further part of Hungary and Bulgaria, to open themſelves a way with the ſword; and ſo with much labour, and no leſs loſs, came at length to Conſtantinople: where they were not greatly welcome unto the Emperor Alexius Comnenus; who guilty unto himſelf of the unlawful means whereby he had extorted the Empire from Nicephorus his predeceſſor, had that expedition of the Chriſtians into the Eaſt, in diſtruſt, as purpoſed againſt himſelf; until that fully reſolved to the contrary, by the Hermit and others; and that a far greater power was coming after, for the invaſion of the Turks, and recovery of the Holy Land, he was content to relieve them now weary of their long travel; and afterward to make room for them that were to come, ſhipped them over the ſtrait of Boſphorus into Aſia; who marching forward into Bithynia, encamped their Army in the Country not far from the City of Nice. In the mean time Godfrey with his Brethren, and divers other Princes that had joyned themſelves unto him, with the Germans and Loranois, and the grateſt part of the Army, followed the ſame way that the Hermit had taken before him. At which time alſo Hugh the French Kings Brother, with the Legate, the two Roberts (the one Duke of Normandy, and the other Earl of Flanders) and the reſt of the French Commanders, paſſing over the Mountains into Italy, came to Rome, with a wonderful great Army: where taking their leave of the Pope, becauſe they would be leſs troubleſome unto the Cities and Countries whereby they were to paſs, they divided their great Army into three parts; whereof the one part went to Brunduſium, and the other to Bary, and the third to Hydruntum, unto whom alſo Bohemund one of the great Princes of Apulia, joyned himſelf with twelve thouſand good ſouldiers that followed him. From theſe three Ports the Chriſtian Army departing, and croſſing the Adriatick, arrived in ſafety at Dirrachium, and nigh thereabout upon the coaſt of Dalmatia: from whence they travelled by land through Macedonia, to Conſtantincple; where they met with Duke Godfrey and the reſt of the Army: whom alſo at the firſt, Alexius the Emperor is reported to have but coldly entertained, as jealous of his own eſtate; until that better perſwaded of their deſignments and good meaning towards him, confirmed by many rich Preſents ſent unto him by theſe ſtrange Princes, he joyned with them in league: wherein it was agreed, That the Emperor during the time of this expedition ſhould furniſh them with new ſupplies of men, armour, victuals, and whatſoever elſe they ſhould want: in regard whereof, the Princes on the other ſide promiſed to reſtore again unto the Empire, what Provinces, Countries, or Cities they ſhould happily gain out of the hands of the Turks and Saraſins, the City of Jeruſalem only excepted: which agreement was afterward on the ſuſpitious Emperor's part but ſlenderly performed. Nevertheleſs this league ſo made, he granted them paſſage, and ſo tranſported them over the ſtrait into Aſia: only Bohemund, for an old grudg betwixt the Emperor Alexius and his Father, would not come to Conſtantinople, but marching with his Army through the upper Myſia and Thracia, came ſooner than any man thought, unto the ſtraight of Helleſpontus, and ſo paſſed.

Godfrey Duke of Buillon, and the other Chriſtian Princes, meet together at Conſtantinople.

Now had Gualter, and the Hermit Peter, with their Army, lien two months in the Country about Nice, expecting the coming of the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes: for why, they thought it not good before their coming to attempt any thing againſt the Enemy, whom they knew to lie not far off very ſtrong. But the common Souldiers weary of ſo long lying, and nought doing, and pinched with ſome wants; and withal diſliking of Gualter their chief Commander, and the Hermit Peter, (of whoſe integrity and holineſs they had a greater opinion, than of his proweſs and direction) roſe up in mutiny, and diſplacing Gualter, made choice of one Raymund a valiant German Captain, for their General: by whoſe conduct they took Exorgum, a Town of purpoſe forſaken of the Turks. For they long before underſtanding what a tempeſt of war was growing upon them out of Europe, ſought by all means to cut off theſe that were already come over, as the forerunners of a greater Army following; and therefore had left them this Town, as a bait to train them out of their Trenches. And after that the Chriſtians were thus poſſeſſed of the Town, having laid certain ſtrong ambuſhes, they drave out certain heards of Cattle the more to allure them: all which certain companies of the Chriſtians brought in without any loſs, the Turks ſtill winking thereat. With which booty the Chriſtians encouraged, went out three thouſand of them to take in a little Town not far off; who were by the Turks cut off and ſlain every Mothers Son as they were about to have divided the Spoil. Which overthrow reported into the Town, diſcouraged even the chief Commanders of the Army, ſo that they reſolved no more to try the fortune of the field, before the coming of their friends. Nevertheleſs the common Souldiers condemning them of cowardiſe, choſe them a new General, one Godfrey Burel, whom they now requeſted not, but enforced to go out to revenge the death of their fellows. Which their raſhneſs not long after turned to their own deſtruction: for ten thouſand of them going out of Exorgum, to forrage the Country, were by the Turks intrapped, and almoſt all ſlain, except ſome few, which by ſpeedy flight eſcaped. The Turks proſecuting their victory, laid hard ſiege to them in the Town alſo, until they had partly with famine, and partly with the ſword conſumed the moſt part of them. The Hermit with the poor remainder of his Army took his refuge to Cinite, a Town not far off, before abandoned by the Turks; where with much ado he defended himſelf until the coming of Duke Godfrey and the reſt of the Princes.

Cutlu-Muſes the Turk was now dead, having left unto his Son Sultan Solyman many large Countries and Provinces, altogether gained from the Chriſtians in Aſia, whom he held in great ſubjection and thraldom. This warlike Prince having diſcomfited and almoſt brought to nought the Hermits forces, was no leſs careful for the withſtanding of the great Army following: which now being come into Bithynia, and lying before Nicomedia, removing thence, laid ſiege to the City of Nice, called in ancient time Antigonia, of Antigonus, the Son of Philip that built it; and afterwards Nicea, of Nicea the Wife of King Lyſimachus. In this City dwelt many devout Greeks, Chriſtians; but in ſuch thraldom unto the Turks, that they could not do any thing for the delivery of themſelves. This ſiege indured longer than the Chriſtian Princes had at the firſt ſuppoſed: who although they to the uttermoſt of their power forced the City on three ſides, yet was it ſtill notably defended, new ſupplies ſtill coming from the Turks by the Lake of Aſcanius joyning upon the other ſide of the City. But after that the Chriſtians, poſſeſſed of the Lake, began on that ſide alſo to lay hardly unto the City, the Turks diſcouraged, and ſeeing themſelves beſet round with their enemies, yielded up the City the fifth of July, in the year 1097, after it had been fifty days beſieged. But whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege, the Turks aſſailed that quarter of the Camp where the Legat lay; by whom they were notably repulſed, and with great loſs inforced to retire unto the Mountains. In this City, amongſt the reſt of the Turks, was taken Solymans wife, with two of her Children, whom the Princes ſent priſoners to Conſtantinople. This City ſo won, was according to the agreement before made, reſtored unto Alexius the Emperor, whoſe Fleet had in that ſiege done good ſervice, by taking the Lake from the Turks.

The City of Nice thus won, the Chriſtian Princes removing thence with their Army, and marching through the Country, came the fourth day after unto a River which watered many rich paſtures: where as they were about to have incamped, for the commodiouſneſs of the place, and refreſhing of the Army, ſuddenly news was brought into the quarter where Bohemund lay, now buſie in caſting up his trenches, That the Turks with a great Army were ready even at hand to charge him. For Solyman having raiſed a great power of his own, and aided by the Sultan of Perſia his kinſman, was now come with an Army of 60000 ſtrong to give the Chriſtians battel: of whoſe approach Bohemund advertiſed, left the fortifying of his Trenches, and putting his Souldiers in array, ſet forward to meet him; ſending word to the reſt of the Princes that lay a far off, to be ready as occaſion ſhould require, to relieve him. Theſe two Armies conducted by their moſt reſolute Chieftains, meeting together, joyned a moſt fierce and terrible battel, where in a ſhort ſpace the Turks lay ſlain upon heaps; in ſuch ſort that they ſerved the Chriſtians inſtead of Bulwarks. But whileſt Bohemund thus prevaileth in the battel, certain of the Turks horſemen wheeling about, brake into Bohemunds Camp (not as then altogether fortified, and but ſlenderly manned) where among the Women, and other weak perſons there left, they raiſed a great tumult and outcry, to the great appaling of them that were fighting in the battle: which Bohemund perceiving, withdrew himſelf with certain companies unto the Camp, from whence he with great ſlaughter repulſed the Enemy. But returning again into the battle, he found there a great alteration: for his Souldiers whom before he had left as it were in poſſeſſion of a moſt glorious victory, were now ſo hardly laid on by the Turks, as that they were ready to have turned their backs and fled. Neverthelesſ by his coming in, the battel was notably reſtored, and again made doubtful; when the Enemy perceiving how much the aſſaulting of the Camp had troubled the Chriſtians in battel, ſent out certain Troops of Horſemen again to aſſault the ſame; and had not failed undoubtedly to have taken it, being as aforeſaid not yet fortified, had not Hugh the French Kings Brother come in good time to the reſcue: who coming in with 30000 Horſemen, after he had relieved the Camp, entring directly into the battel, was notably incountred by a Squadron of freſh Souldiers of the Turks, by them of purpoſe reſerved for ſuch event. There began a battel more terrible than the firſt, with moſt doubtful victory: But at the length the Turks weary of the long and cruel fight, and ſeeing moſt of their fellows ſlain, began by little and little to give ground, and ſo retired into the Mountains, which were not far off. In this battel, which continued a great part of the day, were ſlain of the Turks 40000, and of the Chriſtians about 2000. The next morning Bohemund, with the French Kings Brother, came again into the field, in ſuch order as if they ſhould preſently have given or received battel; where after they had ſtayed a great while, and ſaw no Enemy to appear, they fell to the honeſt burial of their dead; which were eaſily known from the Turks, by the red croſſes upon their garments, the cogniſance of their ſacred warfare. Solyman flying with the remainder of his Army, notably diſſembled his loſs, giving it out that he had got the victory: yet by the way as he went he burnt up the Country Villages, and deſtroyed or carried away whatſoever elſe he thought might ſtand the Chriſtians in any ſtead, if they ſhould further follow after him, leaving nothing for them but the bare ground.

Heraclea yielded.

After this victory, Bohemund and the Chriſtian Princes, without reſiſtance marching through the hot and dry Countries of the leſſer Aſia, came to Antiochia a City of Piſidia, which they took with ſmall labour: and ſo marching unto Iconium the principal City of Cilicia, neer unto the Mountain Taurus, were there alſo of the Citzens courteouſly received, where they ſtayed certain days for the refreſhing of the Army. From thence they ſet forward toward Heraclea, where a great power of the Turks were reported to be aſſembled. But they together with the garriſon Souldiers, upon the approach of the victorious Army of the Chriſtians, forſook the City and fled: the Citizens being Chriſtians (as they were yet generally in all the Provinces of the leſſer Aſia, but in great ſubjection to the Turks) and now rid of their cruel maſters the Turkiſh garriſons, came forth, and meeting the Princes, gladly yeilded themſelves with their City unto them, as unto their deliverers. Here the Chriſtian Princes fully inſtructed of the great fear and deſperation of the Turks, who now in no place durſt abide their coming; for the more ſpeedy taking in of thoſe Countries but lately oppreſſed by the Turks, divided their Army into two parts, leaving the one part thereof with Baldwin and Tancred in Cilicia, for the full ſubduing thereof, (who in ſhort time took the Cities of Tarſus, Edeſſa, and Manuſſa, with all the reſt of the Country, the Turks not daring any where to abide their coming:) the other part of the Army in the mean time entring into the leſſer Armenia, took the ſame from the Turks, which the Princes gave to one Palmurus an Armenian, who had in that expedition done them great ſervice. From thence they took their way into Capadocia, which they alſo ſubdued, driving out the Turks in every place, and took the Cities of Cæſarea and Socor, where they ſtaied a few days for the refreſhing of the Army: with like ſucceſs they paſſed through the reſt of the Provinces of the leſſer Aſia, of late poſſeſſed by the Turks, ſtill chaſing them out before them, and ſetting at liberty the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians of thoſe Countries. Whereof Solyman (craving aid of Axan the Perſian Sultan his couſin) grievouſly complained by his Letters to him directed in this ſort: The famous City of Nice with the Country of Romania, which we by your aid and power have gotten from the kingdom of the Greeks, and of your bounty poſſeſſed, the Chriſtians of the kingdom of France have again taken from us. Thus was the late erected Kingdom of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, by theſe valiant Chriſtian Champions again brought low, and they glad to retire themſelves further off into the Mountains and more Eaſtern Countries, until this heat was overpaſt; and that they, taking the benefit of the troubled ſtate of the Greek Empire (afterwards rent in ſunder by ambition and civil diſcord, the ruine of the greateſt Monarchies) recovered not only their former ſtate, but became alſo dreadful unto the Greek Emperors themſelves; upon whom they daily gained in one corner or other, ſtill maintaining the honour of their eſtate until the riſing of the Othoman Family, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall, God willing, be declared.

Sultan Solyman his letters unto the Perſian Sultan Axan.

The Chriſtians bind themſelves by Oath, never to return until they had won the Holy City.

Theſe victorious Princes (then, and to the worlds end famous) not contented, to their immortal praiſe, to have thus driven the Turks out of the leſſer Aſia, and recovered ſo many Countries; bound themſelves, as well the Princes as the common Souldiers, by ſolemn oath, never to return again into their Countries, until they had accompliſhed that ſacred War with the conqueſt of the Holy City. So mounting together the high mountain Taurus, and deſcending thence as into another world, they came to the City Mareſia, which they took without reſiſtance, the Turks there in garriſon being by night before for fear fled: where the Chriſtians for the refreſhing of themſelves certain days ſtaid. In the mean time Robert Earl of Flanders with a thouſand men at arms, was ſent out to give ſummons unto a City called Artaſia, about fifteen miles diſtant from Antioch: when as the Citizens beholding the Enſigns of the Chriſtians, ſuddenly took up Arms againſt the Turks there in Garriſon, which had of long holden them in Subjection, and prevailing upon them, ſlew them every Mothers Son: whoſe heads they preſented unto the Earl, and received him into their City. The Turks to revenge the death of their Friends, and to recover again the City before the coming of the reſt of the Army, ſent out about 10000 men out of Antioch; for thither was aſſembled a great Power of them to have hindred the further proceedings of the Chriſtians: and being come near to Artaſia, they ſent before certain ſtragling Companies, of purpoſe to draw the new-come Chriſtians out of the City, lying in the mean time in ambuſh with the reſt, of purpoſe to intrap them. With theſe ſtragling Companies the Flemings ſallying out, luſtily encountred, and eaſily put them to flight, the Turks indeed flying of purpoſe to bring them within the danger of the other, lying in ambuſh. After whom the Flemings eagerly following, were before they were aware encloſed round with their Enemies, and there had undoubtedly periſhed, had not the Citizens (being Chriſtians) preſently ſallied out and right worthily relieved them.

Antioch in Syria beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The deſcription of the famous City of Antioch

Shortly after, the Chriſtian Princes marching forward with their Army, were incountred by the Turk at the River Orontes, who had there thought to have ſtaid their further paſſage: with whom Robert Duke of Normandy, who had the Leading of the Vantguard, had a hard conflict, until that the Turks, diſcouraged with the ſight of the Army ſtill coming on, forſook the bridge, and betook themſelves to flight. So the Chriſtians paſſing the River, came and incamped with their Army before the famous City of Antioch, the one and twentieth day of October, in the year 1097. the Governor whereof under the Perſian Sultan was one Caſſianus, (of ſome alſo honoured with the name of a King) who at the coming of the Chriſtians, had with him in the City ſeven thouſand Horſemen, and twenty thouſand Foot of the Turks, with great ſtore of Victuals, and all manner of other Proviſions neceſſary for the defence thereof. This City, called in ancient time Epidaphane, or Epiphane, and of the Hebrews, Reblatha, ſometime the Seat of the Syrian Kings, and afterwards the Metropolitical City of Syria, having under it an hundred and fifty Biſhops, (famous for many things, and amongſt others, for that it was the Seat of the bleſſed Apoſtle St. Peter, and firſt place wherein the Profeſſors of the Chriſtian Religion took the name of Chriſtians) is ſituate upon the River Orontes, about twelve miles from the Sea, and was then ſtrongly fortified both by Nature and Art, being compaſſed about with a double Wall; the uttermoſt whereof was of hard ſtone, and the other of brick, with 460 Towers in the ſame, and an impregnable Caſtle at the Eaſt end thereof, whereunto was joyning a deep Lake, coming out of the great River, which watered the South ſide of the City. Round about this ſtrong City (one of the moſt aſſured Refuges of the Turks) although it were in circuit great, lay the Chriſtian Princes encamped, except on that ſide which being defended with the high broken Mountains, is not there to be beſieged. Upon whom the Turks out of the City, during the time of the ſiege made many a fierce and deſperate ſally, being ſtill by the Chriſtians moſt valiantly repulſed: eſpecially at the bridge which the Chriſtians had made of Boats for their commodious paſſage too and fro over the River. In this ſort was the ſiege continued until the beginning of February, with many a bloody Skirmiſh. At which time ſuch abundance of Rain fell, as that hardly could a man find any place to lie dry in; and the ſcarcity of Victual grew ſo great in the Camp, that many (horrible it is to ſay) to aſſwage their hunger, were glad to eat the dead bodies of their ſlain Enemies. In theſe extremities many died of hunger and cold; yea their horſes alſo periſhed for want of meat, ſo that in the whole Camp were ſcarcely left two thouſand horſes fit for Service, the reſt being either all dead, or brought ſo low, as that they were altogether unſerviceable. Theſe miſeries daily increaſing, divers men of great account, whom no terrour of the Enemy could have diſmaid; began ſecretly to withdraw themſelves out of the Camp, with purpoſe to have ſtoln home; among whom were Peter the Hermit Author of this War, and Tancred the Nephew of Bohemund, who taken by the way, and brought back with the reſt as Fugitives, were ſharply reprehended by Hugh the French Kings Brother, as Cowards, and Traytors to their Brethren and fellow Souldiers, and ſo inforced to take a new Oath for their Fidelity and Perſeverance. Bohemund in the mean time going to Arthuſia a Town not far off, by good Fortune cut off a great part of the Turks there in Garriſon; who after their uſual manner ſallying out to have cut off the Forragers of the Chriſtians, were now themſelves caught tardy: whereby the Country for a time was more open for the diſtreſſed Chriſtian Souldiers to ſeek abroad for relief. But this liberty ſo lately gained laſted not long, when news was brought unto the Camp, That the Turks in great number, out of the Provinces about Aleppo and Damaſco, were coming unto the relief of their beſieged Friends in Antioch. Nevertheleſs the Chriſtians truſting to their own ſtrength, and the ſtrength of the place wherein they were incamped, lay ſtill, and at their coming ſo incountred them, that they ſlew 2000 of them, and put the reſt to flight. In which conflict the Chriſtians got great ſtore of Proviſion and Victuals which the Turks had thought to have put into the City. The heads of the ſlain Turks the Chriſtians ſet upon ſtakes before the City, to the more terrour of the Defendants. This overthrow of the Turks, wherein Caſſianus had loſt his eldeſt ſon, with others of his beſt Captains, ſo daunted the beſieged, that they requeſted a Truce for a time of the Chriſtian Princes: which granted, they of the City came oftentimes into the Camp, and they of the Camp likewiſe into the City: Caſſianus ſtill expecting relief from the Perſian Sultan. Whilſt the Chriſtians Princes were thus buſie in Aſia, the Venetians with a great Fleet of two hundred Gallies ſcouring the Seas, under the conduct of Henry Contarenus the Biſhop, and of Vitalis the Dukes ſon, meeting with the Gallies of Piſa at the Rhodes, and falling out with them, had with them a great fight, wherein the Venetians having the upper hand, took eighteen of their Gallies, and in them five thouſand Souldiers: whom they ſeeing to be marked with the red croſs, the cogniſance of the ſacred War, they preſently ſet at liberty, together with the Gallies, detaining only thirty of the better ſort as Hoſtages. After that, the Venetians ſailing into Ionia, took the City of Smyrna, and ſpoiled all along the coaſts of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, before for fear abandoned by the Turks.

The Truce before taken between the Turks and the Chriſtians at the ſiege of Antioch, being in ſhort time after broken by the death of one Vollo a French-man, ſlain by the Turks; the War was again begun, and the City more hardly laid unto than before. At which time the Governor, who in the time of this long ſiege, which had now continued nine months, had loſt moſt part of his beſt Souldiers, was glad for the defence of ſo great a City, to uſe the Service of divers Chriſtians, then dwelling in the City. Among whom was one Pyrrhus, a Citizen of great Reputation, unto whom he had committed the guarding of a Tower, called the two Siſters; but afterward St. Georges Tower. This Pyrrhus had ſecret Intelligence with Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, with whom he agreed to give him there entrance into the City, upon condition, that he ſhould of the other Chriſtian Princes procure the Government of the City to himſelf; and that he, with the reſt of the Chriſtian Citizens in the City, might be at his hands well uſed: which thing being eaſily obtained, all things agreed upon, Bohemund with his Souldiers were by night by Pyrrhus let into the City, who made way for the reſt of the Army to enter. The City thus taken, many of the Turks fled into the Caſtle, the reſt were put to the Sword, Man, Woman, and Child; and among them alſo many of the Chriſtians, the furious Souldiers taking of them no knowledge. Great wealth was there found, but ſmall ſtore of Victuals. Caſſianus the late Governor flying out of the City to ſave himſelf, in wandring through the Mountains, fell into the hands of the Chriſtian Armenians, who lately thruſt out of Jeruſalem, were fled thither for Refuge, by whom he was there ſlain. In the City were ſlain about ten thouſand perſons. Thus was the famous City of Antioch, which the Turks had long before by Famine taken from the Chriſtians, again recovered the third day of June, in the year of our Lord God, 1098. The poor oppreſſed Chriſtians in Jeruſalem hearing of this ſo notable a Victory, gave ſecret Thanks unto God therefore, and began to lift up their heads in hope that their Delivery was now at hand. Of this Victory, the Princes of the Army by ſpeedy Meſſengers and Letters certified their Friends in all Countries, ſo that in ſhort time, the fame thereof had filled a great part of the World. Among others, Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, unto whom the City was delivered, ſent the joyful News thereof unto Roger his Brother Prince of Apulia; whoſe Letters as the moſt certain Witneſſes of the Hiſtory before reported, I thought it not amiſs here to ſet down.

The Letters of Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, to his Brother Roger Prince of Apulia, concerning the winning of Antioch.

I ſuppoſe you to have underſtood by the Letters of your Son Tancred, both of the great fear of ſome of us, and the battels which we have of late with our great Glory fought. But concerning the Truce, and the proceeding of the whole Action, I had rather you ſhould be certified by my Letters, than the Letters of others. King Caſſianus had required a time of Truce: during which, our Souldiers had free Recourſe into the City without danger, until that by the death of Vollo a Frenchman, ſlain by the Enemy, the Truce was broken. But whilſt it yet ſeemed an hard matter to win the City, one Pyrrhus a Citizen of Antioch, of great Authority and much devoted unto me, had Conference with me concerning the yielding up of the City; yet upon condition, That the Government thereof ſhould be committed to me, in whom he had repoſed an eſpecial Truſt. I conferred of the whole matter with the Princes and great Commanders of the Army, and eaſily obtained that the Government of the City was by their general conſent allotted unto me. So our Army entring by a Gate opened by Pyrrhus, took the City. Within a few days after, the Town Aretum was by us aſſaulted, but not without ſome loſs and danger to our Perſon, by reaſon of a Wound I there received. I aſſure you much of the valour of your Son Tancred, of whom I and the whole Army make ſuch account and reckoning, as is to be made of a moſt valiant and reſolute General. Farewel. From Antioch.

Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Antioch, Corbanas (the Perſian Sultan his Lieutenant) with a great Army beſieged Edeſſa, with purpoſe after the taking thereof, to have relieved the City of Antioch. But this being notably defended by Baldwin left there of purpoſe with a ſtrong Garriſon for the defence thereof; the Turk fearing in the mean time to loſe Antioch, the ſafeſt Refuge of the Turks in all thoſe parts, roſe with his Army, and ſet forward againſt the Chriſtians: where by the way, it was his fortune to meet with Sanſadolus, Caſſianus his Son, but lately fled from Antioch, by whom he underſtood of the loſs of the City, and by what means the ſame was moſt like again to be recovered: upon which hope, Corbanas with his mighty Army kept on his way, with a full reſolution to ſet all upon the fortune of a battel. Whoſe coming much troubled the Chriſtians: for that although they were poſſeſſed of the City, yet was the Caſtle ſtill holden by the Turks. Neverthele ſs leaving the Earl of Tholous in the City, with a competent Power for the keeping in of them in the Caſtle, they took the field with the whole ſtrength of the Army, and ſo in order of battel expected the coming of their Enemies; who couragiouſly coming on, as men before reſolved to fight, joyned with them a moſt terrible and bloody battel. Neither were they in the City in the mean time idle, for that the Turks in the Caſtle having received in unto them certain Supplies from Corbanas, ſallied out upon them that were left for the ſafeguard of the City, and had with them a cruel conflict. Thus both within the City and without, was to be ſeen a moſt dreadful fight of reſolute men, with great ſlaughter on both ſides: yet after long fight and much effuſion of blood, the fortune of the Chriſtians prevailing, the Turks began to give ground, and afterwards betook themſelves to plain flight, whom the Chriſtians hardly purſuing, made of them a wonderful ſlaughter. In this battel were ſlain of the Turks above an hundred thouſand, and of the Chriſtians about four thouſand two hundred. There was alſo taken a great Prey; for beſides Horſes and other Beaſts for burden, were taken alſo five thouſand Camels with their lading. The next day, being the 28*th* of June, the Caſtle was by the Turks (now diſpairing of relief) yielded up unto the Chriſtians.

Corbanas the Sultans Lieutenant, with a great Army cometh to recover again the City of Antioch.

Antioch thus taken, Hugh the French Kings Brother, ſirnamed the Great, was ſent from the reſt of the Princes to Conſtantinople, to have delivered the City unto Alexius the Emperor according to the agreement before made. But he, guilty in conſcience of his own foul dealing with them, unto whom he had ſent no relief at all during the long and hard ſiege of Antioch; neither performed any thing of that he had further promiſed, and therefore knowing himſelf hated of them; had in diſtruſt ſo great an offer of the Princes, ſo evil deſerved, and therefore refuſed to accept thereof. Whereupon Bohemund by the general conſent of the whole Army was choſen Prince, or (as ſome call him) King of Antioch.

Bohemund choſen Prince of Antioch.

The Plague in the Chriſtian Army.

After this long ſiege and want of Victuals, enſued a great Plague in the Army of the Chriſtians, the Autumn following, whereof it is reported fifty thouſand men to have died, and amongſt them many of great Account. But the mortality ceaſing, the Chriſtians in November following, Diſcord ariſing upon emulation betwixt Bohemund and Raimund.

following, by force took Rugia and Albaria, two Cities about two days journey from Antioch; where diſſention ariſing betwixt Bohemund and Raimund, who of all others only envied at his Preferment unto the Principality of Antioch: Bohemund for the common cauſes ſake, gave way unto his Adverſary, and retired with his Souldiers back again to Antioch; after whom followed the Duke Godfrey, and the Earl of Flanders with their Regiments. The reſt of the Princes wintred ſome at Rugia, ſome at Albaria, from whence Raimund made ſundry light Expeditions further into the Enemies Country: but the Spring approaching, the Chriſtian Princes with all their Power took the field again. Bohemund with them remained with him, departing from Antioch, beſieged Tortoſa. Raimund in the mean time with the reſt, beſieging the City of Tripolis; who become much more inſolent than before, by reaſon of ſome fortunate Roads he had made upon the Enemies the laſt Winter, ceaſed not ſtill to malign Bohemund and his proceedings: matter enough to have divided the whole Power of the Chriſtians, and to have turned their weapons upon themſelves; which Bohemund well conſidering, roſe with his Army; and becauſe he would not with his preſence trouble the proceeding of the religious War, retired himſelf to Antioch. After whoſe departure, Godfrey and the Earl of Flanders took Gabella, a City about twelve miles from Laodicea, and from thence returned again to the ſiege of Tortoſa, whether Raimund came alſo with his Army, having before driven the Governor of Tripolis to ſuch compoſition as pleaſed himſelf, and to furniſh him with things as he wanted. Thus was Tortoſa hardly on three ſides beſieged by the Chriſtians, but ſo notably defended by the Turks, that after three months hard ſiege, the Chriſtians were glad to depart thence; and marching along the Sea-ſide, ſpoiled the Country about Sidon. But foraſmuch as that City was not eaſily to be won, they left it, and encamped before Ptolemais, which they alſo paſſed by; the Governor thereof ſending them out Victuals, with ſuch other things as they wanted; and upon Summons given, promiſing to yield the City after they had once won the City of Jeruſalem. From thence they came to Ceſarea in Paleſtine, where they ſolemnly kept the Feaſt of Whitſontide; and ſo to Rama, which they found for fear forſaken of the Infidels. Marching from Rama, and drawing near to Jeruſalem, they in the Vantgard of the Army, upon the firſt deſcrying of the Holy City, gave for joy divers great Shouts and Outcries, which with the like applauſe of the whole Army was ſo doubled and redoubled, as if therewith they would have rent the very Mountains, and pierced the higheſt Heavens. There might a man have ſeen the devout paſſions of theſe moſt worthy and zealous Chriſtians, uttered in right divers manners: ſome, with their Eyes and Hands caſt up towards Heaven, called aloud upon the name and help of Chriſt Jeſus; ſome, proſtrate upon their faces, kiſſed the ground, as that whereon the Redeemer of the World ſometime walked; others joyfully ſaluted thoſe holy places which they had heard ſo much of, and then firſt beheld: in brief, every man in ſome ſort expreſſed the joy he had conceived of the ſight of the Holy City, as the end of their long travel.

The exceeding joy of the Chriſtians upon the firſt deſcrying of the holy City.

Jeruſalem re-edified by the great Emperor Ælius Adrianus.

A brief diſcourſe of the ſtate and fortune of the Holy City of Jeruſalem, from the deſtruction thereof, under Veſpaſianus the Emperor, and Titus his ſon, until it was now again recovered out of the hands of the Infidels by Godfrey of Buillon and the other Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt.

This moſt ancient and famous City, ſo much renowned in holy Writ, is ſituate in an hilly Country; not watred with any River or freſh Springs, as other famous Cities for moſt part be; neither yet was it well ſeated for Wood or Paſture ground: but what wanted in theſe, and ſuch other benefits of Nature, was by the extraordinary bleſſings of the moſt High ſo ſupplied, as that the Jews there dwelling, ſo long as they kept the Ordinances of the Lord, were of all other people in the World juſtly accounted the moſt happy and fortunate. Yet in thoſe ſo bleſſed times, was this City for the ſin of the people oftentimes delivered into the Enemies hand, and the glory thereof defaced; as well appeareth by the whole courſe of the Hiſtory of holy Scripture, as alſo by the ancient and approved Hiſtories, as well of the Jews themſelves, as others. Nevertheleſs it ſtill roſe again (though not in like glory as before in the time of King David, Solomon, and the other next ſucceeding Kings) and ſo was ſtill repeopled by the Jews, until that at laſt according to the foretelling of our Saviour Chriſt, it was with a great, and of all others moſt lamentable deſtruction, utterly raſed and deſtroyed by the Romans, under the leading of Veſpaſian the Emperor, and his noble Son Titus, forty years after our Saviour his precious Death and Paſſion. Since which time, it was never until this day again repaired, or yet well inhabited by the Jews; but lying buried in the ruines of it ſelf, all the Reign of Domitian, Nerva, and Trajan, until the time of the great Emperor Ælius Adrianus, it was again by him re-edified about the year 136, and after the name of him called Ælia; who together with the name changed alſo in ſome part the ancient ſituation of the City. For whereas before it was ſeated upon the ſteep riſing of an hill, in ſuch ſort that towards the Eaſt and the South it overlooked the whole ground, having only the Temple and the Caſtle called Antonia, in the higheſt part of the City; Adrian tranſlated the whole City unto the very top of the hill, ſo that the place where our bleſſed Saviour ſuffered his moſt bitter Paſſion, with the Sepulchre wherein he was alſo laid, and from whence he in Glory roſe again, before without the City, were then incloſed within the Walls thereof, as they are at this day to be ſeen. Yet for all that, the Emperor being dead, in proceſs of time this new built City recovered again the ancient name of Jeruſalem, whereby it hath ever ſince, and is at this day yet known. This City ſo re-edified, the Emperor firſt gave unto the Jews, whom he afterwards thruſt out again for their Rebellion, and gave it to the Chriſtians to inhabit; over whom, one Mark, firſt Biſhop of the Gentiles there, had the charge. But foraſmuch as the Roman Emperors were at that time altogether Idolaters and Perſecutors of the poor Chriſtians, the Church alſo at Jeruſalem, with others, endured ſundry and many grievous Perſecutions under the Emperors Antoninus, Commodus, Severus, Maximinus, Valerianus, Aurelianus, Diocleſianus, and Maxentius, until that at length Conſtantine the Great, converted unto the Faith of Chriſt about the year of Grace 320, ſuppreſſing the Pagan Idolatry, gave general Peace to the afflicted Church: whereby the Chriſtian Church at Jeruſalem, for the ſpace of three hundred years after, happily flouriſhed under the Greek Emperors, until the time of the Emperor Phocas; who having moſt cruelly ſlain the good Emperor Maurice with his Children, and ſo poſſeſſed himſelf of the Empire, gave occaſion thereby unto Choſroe the Perſian King, in revenge of the death of Maurice his Father in law, with all his Power to invade Syria: who as a tempeſt bearing down all before him, took alſo by force the City of Jeruſalem, having that year, which was about the year Six hundred and ten, ſlain almoſt an hundred thouſand Chriſtians. But Phocas the Uſurper being by them of his Guard moſt cruelly ſlain, and Heraclius ſucceeding in his ſtead, Choſroe was by him again driven out of Syria, and the Holy City again recovered, about the year 624. In theſe great Wars againſt the Perſians, Heraclius had uſed the help of the Arabians, called Scenite, a warlike people of Arabia Deſerta, altogether given to the Spoil: who, the Wars now ended, expecting to have received their pay, were contrary to their expectation, and without all reaſon rejected by them that ſhould have paid them, with very foul and contumelious words; as, that there was not mony enough to pay the Chriſtian Souldiers of the Latines and the Greeks, much leſs thoſe vile dogs (whom they ſo called, for that they had but a little before received the damnable Doctrin of the falſe Prophet Mahomet, the great Seducer of the World, who even in that time flouriſhed.) Upon which diſcontentment they at their return revolted from the Empire, and joyned themſelves unto their great Prophet, and ſo afterwards unto the Caliphs his Succeſſors, extending his Doctrin, together with his Soveraignty, to the utmoſt of their power: and that with ſo good ſucceſs, that in ſhort time they had overrun all Ægypt, Syria, the Land of Promiſe, and taken the Holy City. With theſe (the Diſciples of Mahomet and his Succeſſors, the Saraſins, for ſo now they would be called) the Greek Emperors enſuing had for certain years divers conflicts, with diverſe fortune, for the poſſeſſion of Syria. But at length wearied out, and by them overcome, they left the aforeſaid Countries wholly to their Devotion. Hereby it came to paſs, that the Saraſins for the ſpace of 370 years following held theſe Countries, with many others in great ſubjection, oppreſſing ſtill the poor Chriſtians in Jeruſalem with moſt grievous Tributes and exactions: unto whom they yet left a third part of the City for them to dwell in, with the Temple of the Sepulchre of our Saviour, and Mount Sion; not for any devotion, either unto them, or thoſe places, but for that it yielded them a great profit by the recourſe of devout Chriſtians travelling thither: reſerving in the mean time unto themſelves, the other two parts of the City, with the Temple of Solomon, before reedified by the Chriſtians. Now whilſt the Saraſins thus triumph it in the Eaſt, and not in the Eaſt only, but over a great part of the Weſt alſo; contenting themſelves with ſuch Tributes as they had impoſed upon the ſubdued Nations and Countries; up ſtart the Turks, a vagrant, fierce, and cruel people; who firſt breaking into Aſia (as is before declared) and by rare fortune aſpiring unto the Kingdom of Perſia, ſubdued the Countries of Meſopotamia, Syria, with the greateſt part of the leſſer Aſia, and Judæa, together with the Holy City: who both there and in all other places, held the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians in ſuch Subjection and Thraldom, as that the former government of the Saraſins ſeemed in compariſon of this to have been but light and eaſie. Neither was there any end or releaſe of theſe ſo great miſeries to have been expected, had not God in mercy by the weak means of a poor Hermit, ſtirred up theſe moſt worthy Princes of the Weſt to take up Arms in their defence, who having with their victorious Armies recovered the leſſer Aſia, with a great part of Syria, were now come unto this Holy City.

Jeruſalem beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The Governour of Jeruſalem underſtanding by his Eſpials, of the proceedings of the Chriſtians, had before their approach, got into the City a great garriſon of right valiant Souldiers, with good ſtore of all things neceſſary for the holding out of a long Siege. The Chrſtians with their Army approaching the City, encamped before it on the North; for that toward the Eaſt, and the South, it was not well to be beſieged, by reaſon of the broken Rocks and Mountains. Next unto the City lay Godfrey the Duke, with the Germans and Lorains: near unto him lay the Earl of Flanders, and Robert the Norman: before the Weſt gate lay Tancred and the Earl of Tholouſe: Bohemund and Baldwin were both abſent; the one at Antioch, the other at Ediſſa. The Chriſtians thus ſtrongly encamped, the fifth day after gave unto the City a fierce aſſault, with ſuch chearfulneſs, as that it was verily ſuppoſed, it might have been even then woon, had they been ſufficiently furniſhed with ſcaling ladders; for want whereof, they were glad to give over the aſſault and retire. But within a few days after, having ſupplied that defect, and provided all things neceſſary, they came on again afreſh, and with all their power gave unto the City a moſt terrible aſſault, wherein was on both ſides ſeen great valour, policy, and cunning, with much ſlaughter, until that at length the Chriſtians weary of the long Fight, and in that hot Country, and moſt fervent time of the year, fainting for lack of Water, were glad again to forſake the aſſault, and to retire into their Trenches: only the Well of Siloe yielded them water, and that not ſufficient for the whole Camp; the reſt of the Wells which were but few, being before by the Enemy either filled up, or elſe poyſoned.

The Genowaies come to the Siege.

Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the Siege of Jeruſalem, a Fleet of the Genowaies arrived at Joppa; at which time alſo a great Fleet of the Ægyptian Sultans lay at Aſcalon, to have brought relief to the beſieged Turks in Jeruſalem, whereof the Genowaies underſtanding, and knowing themſelves too weak to encounter them at Sea, took all ſuch things out of their Ships as they thought good, and ſo ſinking them, marched by Land unto the Camp. There was amongſt theſe Genowaies divers Engineers, men (after the manner of that time) cunning in making of all manner of Engines fit for the beſieging of Cities; by whoſe device, a great moving Tower was framed of timber and thick planks, covered over with raw Hides, to ſave the ſame from fire; out of which the Chriſtians might in ſafety greatly annoy the Defendants. This Tower being by night brought cloſe to the Wall, ſerved the Chriſtians inſtead of a moſt ſure fortreſs in the aſſault the next day; where whilſt they ſtrive with warlike Valour and doubtful Victory on both ſides, from morning until midday, by chance the wind favouring the Chriſtians, carried the flame of the fire into the face of the Turks, wherewith they had thought to have burnt the Tower, with ſuch violence, that the Chriſtians taking the benefit thereof, and holpen by the Tower, gained the top of the Wall; which was firſt footed by the Duke Godfrey, and his Brother Euſtace, with their followers, and the Enſigns of the Duke there firſt ſet up, to the great encouraging of the Chriſtians, who now preſſing in on every ſide, like a violent River that had broken over the Banks, bare down all before them. All were ſlain that came to hand, Men, Women, and Children, without reſpect of Age, Sex, or Condition: the Slaughter was great, and the ſight lamentable, all the Streets were filled with blood and the bodies of the dead, Death triumphing in every place. Yet in this confuſion, a wonderful number of the better ſort of the Turks, retiring to Solomons Temple, there to do their laſt Devoir, made there a great and terrible Fight, armed with diſpair to endure any thing; and the victorious Chriſtians no leſs diſdaining, after the winning winning of the City, to find there ſo great reſiſtance. In this diſperate conflict, fought with wonderful obſtinacy of mind, many fell on both ſides: but the Chriſtians came on ſo fiercely, with deſire of blood, that breaking into the Temple, the foremoſt of them were by the preſs of them that followed after, violently thruſt upon the weapons of their Enemies, and ſo miſerably ſlain. Neither did the Turks thus oppreſſed, give it over, but as men reſolved to dy, deſperately fought it out with invincible courage, not at the gates of the Temple only, but even in the midſt thereof alſo, where was to be ſeen great heaps, both of the Victors and the vanquiſhed; ſlain indiſferently together. All the Pavement of the Temple ſwam with blood, in ſuch ſort, that a man could not ſet his foot, but either upon ſome dead man, or over the ſhooes in blood: Yet for all that, the obſtinate Enemy ſtill held the Vaults and top of the Temple, when as the darkneſs of the night came ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians were glad to make an end of the Slaughter, and to ſound a Retreat. The next day (for Proclamation was made, for mercy to be ſhewed unto all ſuch as ſhould lay down their weapons) the Turks that yet held the upper part of the Temple, came down and yielded themſelves. Thus was the famous City of Jeruſalem with great bloodſhed, but far greater honour, recovered by theſe worthy Chriſtians, in the year 1099, after it had been in the hands of the Infidels above four hundred years.

The next day after, having buried the dead, and cleanſed the City, they gave thanks to God with publick Prayers and great rejoycing. The poor Chriſtians before oppreſſed, now overcome with unexpected joy, welcomed their victorious Brethren with great joy and praiſe; and the Souldiers embracing one another, ſparing to ſpeak of themſelves, freely commended each others valour. Eight days after, the Princes of the Army meeting together, began to conſult about the choice of their King; among whom was no ſuch difference, as might well ſhew which was to be preferred before the others. And although every one of them for prowess and deſert, ſeemed worthy of ſo great an honour, yet by the general conſent of all, it was given to Robert Duke of Normandy; who about the ſame time hearing of the death of the Conqueror his Father, and more in love with his Fathers new gotten Kingdom in England, in hope thereof, refuſed the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, then offered unto him; which at his return he found poſſeſſed by William Rufus his younger Brother, and ſo in hope of a better, refuſing the worſe, upon the matter loſt both.

Godfrey Duke of Buillon by the general conſent of the Chriſtian Army choſen firſt King of Jeruſalem.

After whoſe departure, Godfrey of Buillon Duke of Lorain (whoſe Enſign was firſt diſplayed upon the Walls) was by the general conſent both of the Princes and the Army, ſaluted King: He was a great Souldier, and indued with many Heroical Virtues, brought up in the Court of the Emperor Henry the Fourth, and by him much employed. At the time of his inauguration, he refuſed to be crowned with a Crown of Gold: ſaying, That it became not a Chriſtian man there to wear a Crown of Gold, where Chriſt the Son of God had for the ſalvation of mankind, ſometime worn a Crown of Thorn. Of the greateſt part of theſe proceedings of the Chriſtians, from the time of their departure from Antioch, until the winning of the Holy City, Godfrey by Letters briefly certified Bohemund, as followeth:

Godfrey of Buillon, to Bohemund King of Antioch, Greeting.

After long travel, having firſt taken certain Towns, we came to Jeruſalem; which City is environed with high Hills, without Rivers or Fountains, excepting only that of Solomons, and that a very little one. In it are many Ciſterns, wherein water is kept, both in the City and the Country thereabout. On the Eaſt, are the Arabians, the Moabites and Ammonites. On the South, the Idumæans, Ægyptians and Philiſtians: Weſtward along the Sea-coaſt, lie the Cities of Ptolemais, Tyrus, and Tripolis: and Northward, Tiberias, Cæſarea, Philippi, with the Country Decapolis and Damaſco. In the aſſault of the City, I firſt gained that part of the Wall that fell to my lot to aſſail, and commanded Baldwin to enter the City; who having ſlain certain Companies of the Enemies, broke open one of the Gates for the Chriſtians to enter. Raymond had the City of David, with much rich Spoil yielded unto him. But when we came unto the Temple of Solomon, there we had a great conflict, with ſo great Slaughter of the Enemy, that our men ſtood in blood above the ancles: The night approaching, we could not take the upper part of the Temple, which the next day was yielded, the Turks pitifully crying out for mercy: and ſo the City of Jeruſalem was by us taken, the fifteenth of July, in the year of our Redemption 1099, thirty nine days after the beginning of the Siege, four hundred and nine years after it fell into the hands of the Saraſins in the time of Heraclius the Emperor. Beſides this, the Princes with one conſent ſaluted me (againſt my Will) King of Jeruſalem; who although I fear to take upon me ſo great a Kingdom, yet I will do my devoir, that they ſhall eaſily know me for a Chriſtian King, and well deſerving of the Univerſal Faith; but love you me as you do, and ſo farewell. From Jeruſalem.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing at Jeruſalem, ſuch a multitude of the Turks and Saraſins their Confederates (now in their common calamity all as one) were aſſembled at Aſcalon (a City about five and twenty miles from Jeruſalem) to revenge the injuries they had before received, as had not before met together in all the time of this ſacred War. Againſt whom, Godfrey (the late Duke, and now King) aſſembled the whole Forces of the Chriſtians in thoſe Countries, and leaving a ſtrong Garriſon in the new won City, ſet forward, and meeting with them, joyned a moſt dreadful and cruel battel; wherein (as moſt report) were ſlain of the Infidels, an hundred thouſand men, and the reſt put to flight. The Spoil there taken, far exceeded all that the Chriſtians had before taken in this long Expedition. Godfrey after ſo great a Victory, returning to Jeruſalem, gave unto God moſt humble thanks. The reſt of the Princes returned either to their Charge, as did Bohemund to Antioch, Baldwin to Edeſſa, Tancred into Galilee, whereof he was created Prince; or elſe having now performed the uttermoſt of their Vows, returned with honour into their own Countries. This was of all others the moſt honourable Expedition that ever the Chriſtians took in hand againſt the Infidels, and with the greateſt reſolution performed; for the moſt part, by ſuch voluntary men, as moved with a devout Zeal to their immortal praiſe, ſpared neither life nor living in defence of the Chriſtian Faith and Religion; all Men worthy eternal Fame and Memory. Not long after enſued a great Peſtilence (the ready attendant of long war and want) whereof infinite numbers of People died, and and among the reſt Godfrey, the firſt Chriſtian King of Jeruſalem, never to be ſufficiently commended: who with the general lamentation of all good Chriſtians, was honourably buried in the Church of the Sepulchre of our Saviour, on the Mount Calvary, where our Saviour ſuffered his Paſſion; in which the Chriſtian Kings ſucceeding him were alſo afterwards buried. He departed this life the eighteenth of July, in the year of our Lord, 1100. when he had yet ſcarce reigned a full year. Whoſe Tomb is yet at this day there to be ſeen, with an honourable Inſcription thereupon.

Baldwin Count of Edeſſa, and Brother to Godfrey, Second King of Jeruſalem. 1101.

After the death of Godfrey, the Chriſtians made choice of Baldwin his Brother, Count of Edeſſa, who leaving his former Government to Baldwin ſirnamed Burgenſis, his near Kinſman, came to Jeruſalem honourably accompanied, and was there by the Patriarch on Chriſtmas-day with all Solemnity crowned King, in the year 1101. He aided by the Venetians and Genoways at Sea, and by Bohemund King of Antioch by Land, took from the Infidels the City of Ceſarea Stratonis, ſtanding upon the Sea-ſide, and overthrew certain Companies of the Ægyptian Sultans at Rama. But underſtanding that the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt were coming to his aid with a new Power, he glad thereof, went to meet them, and ſafely conducted them to Jeruſalem alongſt the Sea-coaſt, by the Cities of Berythus, Sidon, Tyre, and Ptolemais, all yet holden by the Enemy. At which time the Turks at Aſcalon having received great aid from the Arabians and Ægyptians, invaded the Country about Rama, where betwixt them and the Chriſtians was fought a moſt cruel battel, wherein the Chriſtians received a moſt notable overthrow, many of their great Commanders being there ſlain; and among the reſt, Stephen Earl of Charters, (but lately returned home from the former Expedition, and now come back again) and Stephen Earl of Burgundy and Tholous: yea, the King himſelf hardly eſcaped the Enemies hands, and after many dangers came at length to Joppa, after it had been conſtantly before reported him to have been in that battel alſo ſlain. Who having there in haſt repaired his Army, came again ſpeedily upon his Enemies, fearing as then nothing leſs; and overthrew them with ſuch a ſlaughter, as that they had ſmall cauſe to rejoyce of their former Victory. Neither were the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes in the other parts of Syria and Paleſtine, in the mean time idle, but ſought by all means to inlarge their Territories. Tancred Prince of Galilee having raiſed a great Power, took Apamea the Metropolitical City of Cœloſyria, and after much toil won alſo the City of Laodicea. Baldwin alſo the Governor of Edeſſa, beſieging the City of Carras, had brought the beſieged Turks to ſuch extremity, that they were about to have yielded the City; when ſuddenly he was ſet upon by a great Army of the Turks ſent from the Perſian Sultan for the relief of the beſieged; and being there overthrown, was himſelf there taken, with Benedict the Biſhop, and one Joſcelin his Kinſman: who after five years Captivity, found means with the Turk that had taken them, to redeem themſelves, to the great offence of the Perſian Sultan, and of the Sultan Solyman.

King Baldwin after the late Victory, lived for a ſeaſon at ſome good reſt in Jeruſalem, unmoleſted of his Enemies: but knowing his greateſt ſafety among ſuch War-like people, to conſiſt in Arms, he upon the ſudden raiſed the whole ſtrength of his Kingdom, and laid ſiege to Ptolemais, otherwiſe called Acon, a City of Phœnicia, ſtanding upon the rivage of the Sea; where he found ſuch reſiſtance, that he was glad to raiſe his ſiege and depart, having done nothing more than ſpoiled the pleaſant places about the City. By the way in his return back again it fortuned him to meet with certain Companies of the Enemies Adventurers, by whom he was in a Skirmiſh mortally wounded, although he died not thereof in long time after: for albeit that the Wound was by his Surgeons healed up, yet was the grief thereof ſo great, that at length it brought him to his end. Yet he notwithſtanding the former repulſe, the next year incouraged by the coming of the Genoa Fleet, laid hard ſiege again to Ptolemais both by Sea and Land, which after twenty days ſiege was by Compoſition yielded unto him.

Ptolemais won by King Baldwin.

Shortly after, the Governor of Aleppo, with certain other of the Turks great Captains in thoſe Quarters, having joyned their Forces together, and ſo invaded the Country about Antioch, were by Tancred (whom Bohemund at his departure into Italy had left Governor of that City) notably incountred and put to flight. At which time alſo the Chaliph of Ægypt ſending great Forces both by Sea and Land againſt the King of Jeruſalem, was in both places diſcomfited, at Land by the Chriſtians, and at Sea by Tempeſt.

Bohemund in the mean time, with a great Army of voluntary men and others (wherein he is reported to have had five thouſand Horſe, and forty thouſand Foot) returning towards the Holy Land, in revenge of many Injuries done by Alexius the Emperor, unto the Souldiers of this ſacred War, contrary to his Faith and Promiſe to them before given; by the way landed his men in Epirus, and grievouſly ſpoiled the Country about Dirrachium, part of the Emperors Dominion. Neither made he an end of ſpoiling, until he had inforced the Emperor for redreſs of ſo great harms, to make peace with him, and again by ſolemn Oath to promiſe all ſecurity and kindneſs unto all ſuch Chriſtian Souldiers as ſhould have occaſion to travel too or fro through his Countries, during the time of this Religious War. After which agreement he put to Sea again, and ſo returned for Jeruſalem; but whilſt he ſtayed at Antioch, he ſhortly after there died in the year 1108. leaving the Principality thereof unto his young Son Bohemund a Child, under the tuition of his Nephew Tancred.

Bohemund dieth at Antioch.

Yet were the Cities of Berytus, Sidon, and Tyre, alongſt the Sea-coaſt, in the Enemies poſſeſſion; for the gaining whereof Baldwin the King raiſed a great Army, and ſo came and laid ſiege to Berytus, which after many ſharp Aſſaults he at length won, the 23. day of April, in the year 1111. and put to Sword moſt part of them that he found therein. The ſame year alſo he, aſſiſted by a Fleet ſent unto him out of Norway, beſieged the City of Sydon; which the Citizens (ſeeing themſelves now beſet both by Sea and Land) at length yielded unto him by compoſition the 19th day of December. After which Victory he diſmiſſed the Fleet, and returned himſelf in Triumph to Jeruſalem. Now of all the famous Cities alongſt the Sea-coaſt of Phœnicia and Paleſtine, from Laodicea to Aſcalon, was only the City of Tyre that remained in the Enemies hands; which City Baldwin alſo hardly beſieged; nevertheleſs it was ſo well defended by the Turks, that after he had all in vain lien before it by the ſpace of four months, he was glad to riſe with his Army and depart.

1111. Sidon wo

It fortuned that within two years after, the Turks with a mighty Army ſent from the Perſian

Sultan, invaded the Country of Cœloſyria, where ſpoiling all before them as they went, they came and incamped upon the Sea-coaſt near unto Tyberias. Againſt whom Baldwin gathered the whole ſtrength of his Kingdom; with whom alſo Tancred (who now reigned in Antioch, the young Bohemund being dead) with the Count of Tripolis, and the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, joyned their Forces: who all together marching forward, came and incamped not far from the Enemy, being in number far more than they. Mendus, General of the Turks Army (for ſo I find him called) underſtanding of their approach, ſent out certain Companies of his Men to skirmiſh with them; againſt whom the Chriſtians alſo ſent out others, who incountring them, eaſily put them to flight, being before commanded ſo to do, of purpoſe to draw the Chriſtians into the danger of a great ſtrength, lying in ambuſh to intrap them; which according to the Turks deſire fell out; for the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing the flying Enemy, fell into the ambuſh, and ſo before they were well aware, were beſet on every ſide with their Enemies; unto the reſcue of whom other Companies of Chriſtians coming in, and others likewiſe from the Turks, both the great Armies were at length drawn into the field, where betwixt them was joyned a moſt fierce and terrible battel, with great ſlaughter on both ſides; but at length the multitude of the Turks prevailing, the Chriſtians were put to the worſe, and ſo glad to fly; after whom the fierce Enemy hardly followed, not without great ſlaughter. In which flight the King himſelf hardly eſcaped, with Arnolphus the Patriarch. Whilſt Baldwin was thus buſied abroad, the Turks and Saraſins from Aſcalon came and beſieged Jeruſalem, being then but weakly manned; but hearing of the Kings coming, and that the Army of the Chriſtians daily increaſed with new Supplies out of the Weſt by Sea, they retired home again, having burnt certain ſtore-houſes full of Corn, and ſpoiled ſuch things as were ſubject to their fury.

Long it were to recount all the hard Conflicts and Combats this King had with the Saraſins and Turks, which for brevity I paſs over, contented to have briefly touched the greateſt. In the laſt year of his Reign, having for certain years before lived in ſome reaſonable Peace, he made an Expedition into Ægypt, where he with much difficulty won Pharamia, a ſtrong City upon the Sea-coaſt, which he joyned unto his own Kingdom. After that, he went to the Mouth of the River Nilus, and with great admiration learned the nature of that ſtrange River; and having therein taken abundance of Fiſh, returned into the City, and there with the ſame feaſted himſelf with his Friends. But after dinner he began to feel the grief of his old Wound, and growing thereof ſicker and ſicker, returned with his Army toward Jeruſalem, where by the way near unto a City called Laris, he died (to the great grief 1118. of all the Chriſtians) in the year 1118. His dead body being brought back unto Jeruſalem, was there Royally buried, near unto his Brother Godfrey, after he had reigned eighteen years, whoſe Sepulchre is yet there alſo to be ſeen, faſt by the Sepulchre of his Brother.

Baldwin Brugenſis choſen King of Jeruſalem.

The late King thus dead and buried, the Chriſtians with one conſent made choice of his Couſin Baldwin, ſirnamed Brugenſis, Governor of Edeſſa; who by the name of Baldwin the Second, 1118. was the ſecond of April, in the year 1118, ſolemnly Crowned King of Jeruſalem. He was of ſtature tall and well proportioned, of countenance comely and gracious, having his Hair thin and yellow, his Beard mingled with ſome gray hairs hanging down to his breaſt; his colour freſh and lively for one of his years. He was a man of great courage, and therefore no leſs redoubted of his Enemies, than beloved of his Subjects, who had in him repoſed great hope both for the defence and inlarging of that new gained Kingdom. Againſt him the ſame Summer the Chaliph of Ægypt, aided by the King of Damaſco and the Turks, in revenge of the loſs he had in the Expedition the year before received, raiſed a great Power to invade him both by Sea and Land. Againſt whom Baldwin alſo oppoſed himſelf with his whole ſtrength, and ſo came and incamped within the ſight of his Enemies. In which ſort, when both Armies had lien the one facing the other by the ſpace of three months, they both roſe; the Chriſtians fearing the multitude of the Turks, and the Turks the valour of the Chriſtians, and ſo retired without any notable thing doing.

This year died Alexius the Greek Emperor, who even from the beginning of this Sacred War ſecretly repined at the good ſucceſs of the Chriſtians in Syria, although his Empire were thereby greatly inlarged; after whom ſucceeded Calo Joannes his Son, who all the time of his Reign right worthily defended his Territories in the leſſer Aſia, againſt the invaſion of the Turks.

Not long after, Gazi one of the greateſt Princes of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, with the King of Damaſco, and Debeis King of Arabia, joyning their Forces together, with a great Army invading the Country about Antioch, came and incamped not far from Aleppo; againſt whom Roger Prince of Antioch, not expecting the coming of Baldwin and the other Chriſtian Princes his Confederates, but preſuming of his own ſtrength, went forth with greater courage than diſcretion, whereunto his Succeſs was anſwerable; for incountring with them at too much odds, he was by them in a great battel overthrown, wherein himſelf was ſlain, with moſt part of his Army. Of which ſo great a ſlaughter, the place wherein this battel was fought was afterward called The field of blood. But whilſt the Turks after ſo great a Victory, careſly and at pleaſure roam up and down the Country, Baldwin ſetting upon them, overthrew them with a great ſlaughter, and ſo put them to flight. After this Victory gained by the Chriſtians the fourteenth of Auguſt, in the year 1120. King Baldwin in great Triumph entred into Antioch, and ſo joyned that Principality unto his own Kingdom.

The year following, the Turks with another Army invaded the ſame Country again; for repreſſing of whom, whilſt Baldwin and the other Chriſtian Princes were making their Preparations, it fortuned that Gazi their great Commander ſuddenly died of an Apoplexy, upon whoſe death they retired without any further harm doing. Nevertheleſs the next Spring, the King of Damaſco, aided by the Arabians, entred again with a great Power into the Country about Antioch, and there did ſome harm; for the Antiochians now deſtitute of their own Prince, and Baldwin (who had taken upon him their Protection) being far off, and otherwiſe buſied at Jeruſalem, were much more ſubject unto the inrodes of their Enemies (ſtill at hand) than before when they had a Prince of their own ſtill preſent amongſt them. But Baldwin advertiſed thereof, was making toward them with a moſt puiſſant Army, ſooner than they had thought it could have been poſſible. Of whoſe approach the Turks underſtanding, retired again out of the Country: after whom the King thinking it not good to make further purſuit, turned a little out of the way, and took Garaze, one of the ſtrongeſt Caſtles of the Kings of Damaſco, built but a year before, which becauſe it was not without great charge and danger to be holden, he raſed down to the ground.

Baldwin notwithſtanding that he had many times thus honourably repulſed his Enemies, wiſely conſidering how he was on the one ſide beſet with the Turks, and on the other ſide with the Saraſins (which yet reigned in Ægypt, the Kingdom of Jeruſalem lying as it were in the mouth of them both) thought it good betime to crave aid of the Chriſtian Princes of Europe; and to that purpoſe had ſent his Embaſſadors unto divers of them, but eſpecially unto the Venetians, whom of all others he thought fitteſt at his need to yield him relief by Sea. It fortuned in the mean time, that Balac the Perſian Sultan with a great Army of the Turks invaded the Country about Antioch; whereof Baldwin underſtanding (although he certainly knew he ſhould ere long receive Aid from the other Chriſtian Princes his Friends, but eſpecially from the Venetians, and might therefore with great reaſon have protracted the War until their coming, yet being therewith much moved, or elſe his deſtiny ſo requiring) raiſed ſuch Forces as he had of his own, and without longer ſtaying for his Friends, with greater courage than good ſpeed ſet forward; and ſo joyning battel with the Enemy, was therein overthrown, with the greateſt part of his Army, and himſelf taken Priſoner in the fight, with certain other of his beſt Commanders; who all together were carried away Captives unto Carras.

Joppa beſieged by the Saraſins.

Upon the report of this overthrow, and taking of the King, the Chaliph of Ægypt on the other ſide took occaſion with all his Power to invade the Kingdom of Jeruſalem; and having in himſelf purpoſed the utter ruine thereof, beſide the great Army which he ſent thither by Land (which lay incamped not far from Aſcalon) he put to Sea an huge Fleet alſo of 700 Sail, for the diſtreſſing of the Sea-Towns, which he well knew were not otherwiſe to be won. This Fleet of the Saraſin Kings (for Ægypt with the Kingdoms of Tunis and Morocco were yet in poſſeſſion of the Saraſins) arriving at Joppa, there put aſhore their Land Forces, and hardly beſieged the Town both by Sea and Land. But whilſt they thus lay in great hope to have won the Town, Dominicus Michael Duke of Venice, ſtirred up by Calixtus then Biſhop of Rome, was come to Cyprus with a Fleet of two hundred Sail, for the Relief of the Chriſtians in Syria and the Holy Land; and hearing of the diſtreſs of Joppa, nothing diſmaid with the number of the Enemies Fleet, haſted thither, and came ſo ſuddenly upon them, that he had (as ſome report) overthrown them before they could put themſelves in order, or be in readineſs to fight. or as ſome others ſay, after a great and doubtful fight, having ſunk or taken a great number of them, and put the reſt to flight, he obtained of them a moſt glorious Victory. With like good Fortune alſo were the Saraſins overthrown in a notable battel at Land, near unto Aſcalon, by the Lord Euſtace, unto whom the defence of the Kingdom was committed after the taking of the King, who not long after ſo great a Victory died.

Tyre beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Joppa relieved (as is aforeſaid) the Duke of Venice travelled by Land to Jeruſalem, where he was honourably received by Guarimund the Patriarch, and the Confederation before made betwixt King Baldwin and the Venetians, upon the ſame conditions ſolemnly again renewed.

The Saraſins thus notably diſcomfited both by Sea and Land, and the Chriſtians thereby not a little incouraged, and joyning their forces together with the Venetians, came, and the firſt of March laid Siege unto the ancient and ſtrong City of Tyre: which they having beſet both by Sea and Land, gave thereunto many a ſharp aſſault; which the Turks as Men fighting for their Lives and Wives, right valiantly repulſed. In which ſort the Siege was continued longer than the Chriſtians had at the firſt thought ſhould have needed; yet at length after four Months ſiege, the Turks ſore weakened with often aſſaults, and hardly pinched with want of Food, all their ſtore being ſpent, yielded the City by compoſition. Thus was the City of Tyre (the moſt famous Port of Phœnicia) yielded unto the Chriſtians the nine and twentieth of June, in the year 1124. The third part of this City was 1124. given to the Venetians, according to the Compoſition made betwixt them and the Kings of Jeruſalem, That of all ſuch Cities as were by their help won from the Infidels in Syria, they ſhould have a third part, with one ſtreet, and free Traffique in all the reſt of the Cities of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem. Shortly after was King Baldwin ſet at liberty for the Ranſome of an hundred thouſand Ducats, after he had been eighteen months Priſoner among the Turks.

The Duke of Venice having now ſpent almoſt three years in this Sacred Expedition, and well confirmed the ſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, returning home, by the way took the Iſlands of Chios, Rhodus, Samos, Mitylen, and Andrus, with the City of Modon in Peloponeſus; all, places belonging unto the Greek Empire. Which he did in revenge of the Injuries done by the Emperor in the time of his abſence, who envying at the ſucceſs of the Chriſtians in Syria, as had his Father Alexius before him, had in the abſence of the Duke infeſted the Territories of the Venetians, for the which he was now juſtly requited, with the loſs of a good part of his own.

Baldwin alſo not unmindful of the Injuries unto him before done by the Turks, in requital thereof, invaded the Country about Damaſco, and there in three notable battels overthrew the King, and ſpoiled the Country; wherein he took ſo great a Prey, that therewith he redeemed his Daughter, whom he had at the time of his deliverance left in Hoſtage with the Turks for the payment of his Ranſome. He alſo overthrew the Saraſins at Aſcalon, who aided by the Chaliph of Ægypt, had ſundry times invaded the Country about Jeruſalem. And ſo having well repreſſed his Enemies, for a ſpace lived in peace.

Damaſco in vain beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Not long after, Hugh Paganus firſt Maſter of the Templars (an Order of Knights firſt begun in the Reign of this Baldwin) before ſent to crave Aid of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, againſt the Turks and Saraſins, returned with a great number of zealous Chriſtians, ready to lay down their Lives for defence of the Chriſtian Faith and Religion: with whom Baldwin and the other Chriſtian Princes of Syria joyning their Forces, ſet forward and beſieged Damaſco, the Regal Seat of the Turks in thoſe quarters. But ſuch was the ſtrength of this City, with the valour of the Defendants, and contagiouſneſs of the Air, that the Chriſtians (the Heavens as it were then fighting againſt them) were glad to raiſe their Siege, in vain begun, and ſo to retire.

Whilſt things thus paſſed in Syria, Fulke Count of Turin, Mayn, and Anjou, a man almoſt of threeſcore years, having as he thought beſt diſpoſed of his things at home, had for devotion ſake taken upon him an expedition into the Holy Land. In the time of which his preparations, Embaſſadors came unto him from King Baldwin, offering him in Marriage Meliſenda (or as ſome call her, Margaret) his eldeſt Daughter, with the Succeſſion of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem in dowry, if he ſhould ſurvive the King; and in the mean time to content himſelf with the Cities of Tyre and Ptolemais; of which offer he accepted, and ſo held on his journey before intended. It fortuned about three years after, that the King fell dangerouſly ſick, and feeling his death drawing on, having laid aſide all Regal Dignity, cauſed himſelf to be removed out of his own Palace, into the Patriarchs houſe, which was neerer unto the Temple of the Sepulchre: and there calling unto him Fulk the Count, his Son-in-Law, with his Daughter and his Son Baldwin, then but two years old, in the preſence of the Patriarch, and divers other Princes and great Commanders, commended unto them the Government and Defence of the Kingdom, appointing Fulk to ſucceed him. And taking unto himſelf the habit and Profeſſion of a Monk (if he ſhould have longer lived) preſently after gave up the ghoſt the two and twentieth day of Auguſt, in the year 1131. whereof he reigned with much trouble thirteen years, and was ſolemnly buried in the Temple upon Mount Calvary, with the other two Kings Godfrey and Baldwin his Predeceſſors.

The death of Baldwin the ſecond, the third King of Jeruſalem.

The Kings Funeral ended, the Princes of the Kingdom with one accord made choice of Fulk the old Count, Earl of Anjou, for their King; who the 16 day of September, was with all ſolemnity by William the Patriarch crowned in Jeruſalem. This man in the beginning of his Reign, beſides his troubles abroad, was alſo vext with domeſtical and inteſtine diſcord: Pontius Count of Tripolis, ſeeking by force of Arms to have rent the Dukedom of Antioch from the Kingdom: and Hugh Count of Joppa, for fear of due puniſhment for his Treaſon, joyning himſelf with the Saraſins of Aſcalon, and ſo with them infeſting the Territories of Jeruſalem, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian State, and advantage of the Infidels. Which troubleſome broyls were yet afterwards by the King, partly by force, partly by the mediation of the Patriarch and other Princes (who ſeeing the danger thereof like to enſue, had interpoſed themſelves) well again appeaſed. Vengeance yet neverthleſs ſtill following both the aforeſaid Traitors: Pontius being ſhortly after ſlain by the Turks, and Hugh dying in exile.

Beſides theſe domeſtical troubles, the Turks alſo invaded the Country about Antioch, where they were by the ſudden coming of the King overthrown, with the loſs of their Tents and exceeding great Riches. And that nothing might be wanting unto the diſquieting of the State of that new erected Kingdom, not long after, John the Conſtantinopolitan Emperor, (together with the Empire, Inheritor alſo of his Fathers malice, againſt the proceeding of the Chriſtians in Syria) with a puiſſant Army paſſing through the leſſer Aſia, and by the way taking by force Tarſus the Metropolitical City of Cilicia, with the whole Province thereunto belonging, came and beſieged Antioch; which Fulk but a little before had, together with Conſtance the Daughter and Heir of the late Duke of Antioch, given in marriage to Raymund Count of Poitou, for that purpoſe ſent out of France. But in this ſo dangerous a ſtate of that Chriſtian Kingdom, the other zealous Chriſtian Princes interpoſed themſelves as Mediators betwixt the Emperor (pretending the ſame to belong unto his Empire) and Raymund that was in poſſeſſion thereof. And in fine brought it to this end, that Raymund for the preſent ſubmitting himſelf unto the Emperor, ſhould from thenceforth hold his Dukedom of him as of his Lord and Sovereign; upon which agreement the Emperor returned unto Tarſus, where he wintered, and ſo afterwards unto Conſtantinople.

Much about the ſame time, Sanguin one of the Turks great Princes, invading the Country about Tripolis, beſieged the Caſtle of Mont-Ferrand, unto the relief whereof Fulk coming with his Army, was by the Turks overthrown, and for the ſafeguard of his life, glad to take the refuge of the Caſtle, the Count himſelf being in that battel taken Priſoner. After which Victory, the Turks laid harder Siege unto the Caſtle than before; the beſieged in the mean time being no leſs pinched within with Famine, than pinched without by the Enemy. In this the Kings hard diſtreſs, the other Princes having raiſed the whole power of the Kingdom, were coming to his relief; whereof the Turk underſtanding, offered of himſelf to give them all leave freely to depart, and to ſet the Count at liberty, ſo that they would deliver unto him the Caſtle; of which his offer they gladly accepting, yielded up the ſtrong Hold, and ſo departed. The King by the way meeting with the Army, thanked his Friends for their forwardneſs, and ſo returned to Jeruſalem.

Calo Joannes the Greek Emperor ſeeketh in vain to have ſurpriſed the City of Antioch.

About four years after, John the Conſtantinopolitan Emperor with a great Army came again into Syria, with purpoſe to have united the famous City of Antioch unto his Empire, and ſo to have made a way into the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, whereafter he had now a good while longed. But coming thither in hope to have found the Cilicians and Syrians ready to have received him, he was deceived of his expectation, being ſhut out by the Latines, and not ſuffered to enter but upon his Oath, and that with ſome few of his followers; and ſo after due reverence done unto him, quietly to depart without any ſtir or innovation in the City. In revenge of which diſgrace, at his departure he gave the Suburbs of the City as a prey to his greedy Souldiers, pretending the ſame to be done for want of Victuals; who made havock of whatſoever came to hand, not ſparing the very Fruit Trees, but cutting them down to dreſs their meat withall. Having thus under colour of neceſſity revenged the diſgrace received, he returned into Cilicia, and there wintered: where one day for his diſport hunting of the wild Boar, and having wounded him with his Boar-Spear, the wild beaſt therewith enraged, and with all his force bearing forward upon the weapon, forced the Emperors hand backward upon the poynt of a poyſoned Arrow that was hanging in a quiver at his back, and ſo was therewith lightly wounded. Neverthleſs as light as the wound was, ſuch was the ſtrength of the Poyſon, that the grief thereof ſtill encreaſing, and his hand and Arm more and more ſwelling, there was no remedie to be found, but that his Arm muſt be cut off; which deſperate and uncertain cure he abhorring, in the extremity of his pain oftentimes pleaſantly ſaying, That the Greek Empire was not to be governed with one hand; overcome with the ſtrength of the Poyſon, died. In whoſe place ſucceded his youngeſt Son Emanuel, Alexius and Andronicus his two Elder Sons being both dead at his ſetting forth unto this ſo unhappy an expedition.

The death of Calo Johannes the Greek Emperor.

It fortuned about this time alſo, that

The miſerable death of Fulk, fourth King of Jeruſalem.

Kingdom of Jeruſalem being now at peace, that Fulk the King, with the Queen his Wife, lying at the City of Ptolemais in the time of Autumn, it pleaſed the Queen for her diſport to walk out of the City, unto certain pleaſant Fountains there by in the Country; for whoſe company the King would needs go alſo, with certain of his Courtiers; where by the way it chanced that certain Boys running along the field, put up an Hare that was ſitting in a furrow; after which all the Courtiers on horſeback galloped amain, with notable outcry and hollowing. Amongſt the reſt, the King to be partaker of the Sport, forcing his horſe to the uttermoſt of his power, in the midſt of his courſe fell, together with his horſe foundring under him, and in falling, chanced to fall his head under the horſe, with whoſe weight, and the hardneſs of his ſaddle, he was ſo cruſhed, that his Brains came out both at his noſe and ears. In this pitiful caſe being taken up for dead, and with great heavineſs being carried back, he yet breathing lay ſpeechleſs three days, and ſo died the thirteenth of November, in the year of Grace 1142. His dead body afterwards brought to Jeruſalem, was there with great magnificence, and the general lamentation of all his Subjects, buried with the other Kings his Predeceſſors.

Baldwin the third of that name fifth King of Jeruſalem.

Now had the late King left behind him two Sons, Baldwin about the age of thirteen years, and Almerick about the age of ſeven. Of the Elder of theſe two, the Chriſtian Princes made choice, who by the name of Baldwin the Third, was together with Meleſinda his Mother, Partner with him in the Kingdom, upon Chriſtmas day with great Solemnity crowned King of Jeruſalem, in the year 1142. About which time, Sanguin the Turk, taking hold of the diſcord betwixt Raymund Prince of Antioch, and Joſcelin Count of Edeſſa, came and with a great power beſieged Edeſſa, the Count being at the ſame time abſent; and did ſo much, that at length he took the City by undermining of it, where the bloody Turk exerciſed all manner of cruelty upon the poor Chriſtians in the City. By the loſs of this famous City, ſo large a Territory fell again into the hands of the Turks, as that three Archbiſhopricks were thereby drawn from the Church of Antioch. The Turk encouraged with this Victory, ſtraightwaies after beſieged Cologenbar, another ſtrong Town of the Chriſtians: One night drinking liberally with his Friends, he was by one of them in his drunkenneſs ſtabbed, and ſo ſlain, and the Siege raiſed. In whoſe ſtead Noradin his Son ſucceeded.

Baldwin, in the firſt year of his Reign, recovered from the Turks the Caſtle of Sobal, a ſtrong hold beyond Jordan, which he notably fortified, for the defence of that ſide of his Kingdom againſt the incurſions of the Turks. But the next year undertaking an expedition againſt the King of Damaſco, he was by Noradin the Turk, the Kings Son-in-Law, ſo hardly beſet in his return, as that it was accounted a thing miraculous, how he with his Army eſcaped his hands.

Conrade third Emperor of Germany taketh upon him an expedition into the Holy Land.

The Report of the loſs of Edeſſa with the miſeries there endured by the Chriſtians, being bruited through all parts of Chriſtendom, greatly moved the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt. Whom Eugenius the Third, then Biſhop of Rome, ceaſed not both by himſelf and by his Legates to ſtir up to take that ſacred War in hand. And therein wrought ſo effectually, that almoſt in every Province of Chriſtendom preparation was made for the relief of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria. Of all others, Conrade the Third then Emperor of Germany, was moſt forward, who aided by the German Princes and others, with an incredible number of Voluntary Men out of all parts of Chriſtendom, had raiſed a moſt puiſſant Army, and therewith ſet forward on this ſacred Expedition. Of this his devout purpoſe he had before certified Emanuel the Greek Emperor, through whoſe Countries he was to paſs, craving that he might by his good Favour ſo do, and for his Mony to be relieved with Victuals, and other ſuch things as he ſhould have need of for himſelf or his people; promiſing in moſt quiet and peaceable manner to paſs, without any harm doing unto his Territories or Subjects. All which the Greek Emperor, commending his zeal, ſeemed in moſt large terms willingly to condeſcend unto. Nevertheleſs he inwardly repined thereat, wiſhing indeed no better ſucceſs to the Chriſtians in this ſo honourable an Expedition, than did the Infidels themſelves, as by the ſequel of his doings well appeared. For Conrade with his populous Army, indeed a terror unto the Greeks, entring into the Frontiers of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, found all things in ſhew friendly (for why, Emanuel had before given out ſtrait command, that good ſtore of Victuals and all other neceſſaries ſhould be ready at all places to be ſold as the Army was to paſs:) but they were not far come into the Country, but that in the tail of the Army ſtill followed certain ſtrong Companies of the Greeks, to keep the Souldiers from ſtragling from their Enſigns, roaming about in the Country, now and then cutting them ſhort, as they took them at advantage. And ſtill the further that they travelled, the more it was to be ſeen in the countenances of the diſcontented Greeks, how unwelcome Gueſts they were. Yet ſtill on they went through the Countries of their diſſembling Friends, little differing from open Enemies, until they came to Philipolis; in departing from whence, ſuch diſcord roſe between them that were in the Rereward of the Army, and the Greeks that followed them, that it was like to have come to plain battel, had not thoſe broyls, by the diſcretion of ſome of the wiſer ſort, been in good time appeaſed. So marching on they came to Adrianople, and in few days after to the Plain called Cherobachi, through which the River Melas hath his courſe; which in Summer being almoſt dry, in Winter or any other great downfall of Water, right ſuddenly overfloweth his banks, and ſo drowneth the whole Country; that then it ſeemeth no more a River, but a Sea; and ſwelling with the Wind, is not to be paſſed over but by great Boats. This River then ſuddenly riſing by night, by reaſon of the great rain that then fell, in ſuch abundance, as if the Flood-Gates of Heaven had been opened, ſo overflowed the place wherein the Army lay encamped on the ſide thereof, that with the violence of the Water were carried away not only many Weapons, Saddels, Garments, and ſuch other the Souldiers neceſſaries, but even the Horſes and Mules, with their burthens; yea, and great numbers of armed Men themſelves alſo; a moſt miſerable and lamentable thing to behold. Many valiant Men there fell without Fight, and died, no men killing them: to be tall, helped not; neither did valour ſtand them in any ſtead; they periſhed like hay, and were carried away like chaff, with ſuch outcries and lamentation, that they which ſaw it, verily ſaid, That the wrath of God was broke into the Camp: ſuch a ſuddain inundation had overwhelmed all, that happy was he who could make ſhift for himſelf, without regarding one another. This miſfortune ſore troubled the Emperor with his whole Army. Nevertheleſs, the Water being again fallen, and all put in ſo good order, as in ſuch a confuſion was poſſible, he marched on to the Imperial City; which the ſuſpitious and malitious Greek had before notably fortified and ſo ſtrongly manned with armed Men gliſtering upon the Walls, in ſuch ſort as if it ſhould have preſently been aſſaulted.

Conrade the Emperor not ſuffered to enter into Conſtantinople.

Conrade approaching the City, was not ſuffered to enter, but perſwaded by the Greek Emperor forthwith to tranſport his Army over the Strait, with promiſe to ſupplie his wants with whatſoever he ſhould require. Which was done with ſuch haſte, as if nothing had been farther to have been regarded, but only to have them ſhipped over; in which ſervice the Greeks ſpared no labour, or kind of Veſſel, that might ſerve to tranſport them. The Greek Emperor in the mean time, by men ſecretly appointed for that purpoſe, keeping account of the number that paſſed, until that they wearied with the multitude, ceaſed further to number them. But when they were once ſhipt over, then began the covert malice of the Greek Emperor forthwith to appear. For, beſides, that they truſting unto his promiſes, had brought little or no Proviſions over with them, the Country People by his appointment brought nothing unto them to ſell, as before; and they of the Towns and Cities ſhut their gates againſt them as they marched, not affording them any thing, but at an extream rate, for which they would firſt receive their Mony by Ropes caſt down from the Walls, and then deliver them what they pleaſed therefore, yea, and oftentimes nought at all. Among many other vile practiſes, not beſeeming Chriſtians, the miſchievous Greeks, to poyſon the Soldiers, mingled Lime with the Meal which they ſold unto the Army, whereof many of the hungry Souldiers greedily feeding, died. Whether the Greek Emperor were privy thereunto, or no, is not certainly known; but certain it is, that he cauſed counterfeit Mony to by coined, of purpoſe to deceive them; and in brief, there was no kind of miſchief to be practiſed againſt them, which either he himſelf deviſed not, or ſet not others to deviſe; to the intent that their Poſterity terrified by this ſo unfortunate an expedition, might for ever be afraid to take the like in hand again. And that nothing might be wanting that malice could deviſe, he had ſecret intelligence with the Turks themſelves,concerning the ſtrength of the Army, plotting unto them the means how the ſame might beſt be defeated; whereby it came to paſs, that ſome part thereof was by Pamplano, a Captain of the Turks, overthrown near Bathis, and many ſlain. But attempting to have done the like unto that part of the Army that paſſed through Phrygia, they were themſelves overtaken in their own device, and overthrown with a great Slaughter. After which, the Turks in great number, to ſtay the Chriſtians further paſſage, kept the River Mæander, encamping upon the farther Bank of that winding River, with a moſt huge Army. There theſe worthy Chriſtians right well declared, that it was but their Patience, that the Grecian Legions that had before ſo long followed them, with their Countries and Cities they had paſſed by, were not to them become a Prey. For the Emperor coming unto the River ſide, where was neither Bridge nor Boat to paſs over, and finding the great Army of the Turks on the other ſide, ready to give him battel if he ſhould adventure the River, with their Archers ſtanding upon the very Bank Side; he retired a little out of the danger of the Shot, and there encamping, commanded his Souldiers to refreſh themſelves and their Horſes that night, and to be ready againſt the next morning to joyn battel with their Enemies they were ſo far come to ſeek for. Little reſt ſerved him that night; early in the morning before day he aroſe, and arming himſelf, put his whole Army in order of battel; as did alſo the Enemy on the other ſide of the River, with their Battalions orderly placed, and their Archers upon the Bank ſide, ready to give the firſt Charge on the Chriſtians, if they ſhould adventure to come over. Both Armies thus ſtanding in readineſs the one in ſight of the other, and nothing but the winding River betwixt them, the Emperor before reſolved to fight, with cheerful Countenance and Speech encouraged his Men as followeth.

A notable ſpeech of Conrade the Emperor, to encourage his Souldiers to adventure the River Mæander.

That this expedition was of us taken in hand, for Chriſt his ſake, and for the glory of God, and not of man,you know right well,fellow Souldiers. For, for this cauſe having contemned a pleaſant life at home, voluntarily ſeparated from our neareſt and deareſt Friends, we indure miſeries in forreign Countries; we are expoſed unto dangers, we pine with hunger, we quake with cold, we languiſh with heat; we have the earth our bed, the heaven our covering; and although we be noble, famous, renowned, rich, ruling over Nations; yet wear we always our gorgets as neceſſary bonds, and are with them and our armour loaded, as was the greateſt Servant of Chriſt, Peter, ſurcharged with two chains, and kept with four quaternions of Souldiers. But theſe Barbarians (divided from us by this River) to be the Enemies of the croſs of Chriſt, whom we of long have deſired to encounter withall, in whoſe blood (as David ſaith) we have vowed to waſh our ſelves: Who is there that knoweth not, except he be altogether blockiſh and will not with open eyes ſee, nor open ears hear? If we wiſh to aſcend ſtraight way into Heaven, (for neither is God unjuſt, that he knoweth not the cauſe of this our journey, or will not in recompence give unto us the immortal Fields, and ſhady dwellings of Paradice, which having forſaken our own dwellings, have choſe rather for his ſake to die than to live) if we call to remembrance what things theſe men of uncircumciſed hearts do commit againſt our Friends and Countrymen, if we remember what grievous tortures they inflict upon them, or if we be any thing touched with the compaſſion of their innocent blood, unworthily ſpilt; ſtand now couragiouſly, and fight valiantly, and let not any fear or terror daunt us. Let theſe Barbarians know, that by how much Chriſt our Maſter and Inſtructer doth excel their falſe Prophet and Seducer, author of their vain impiety; ſo much are we ſuperiors unto them in all things. Seeing therefore we are an holy Camp, and an Army gathered by the power of God, let us not cowardly loſe our ſelves, or fear for Chriſt his ſake honourably to adventure our lives. For if Chriſt died for us, how much more right is it that we for him ſhould die alſo? Unto this ſo honourable Expedition let us alſo give an honourable end; Let us fight in Chriſts name, with a moſt aſſured hope of an eaſie Victory. For none of them (I truſt) ſhall be able to abide our force, but ſhall all give way, even to our firſt Charge. But if we ſhall die (which God forbid) there ſhall be an honourable place of our burial, whereſoever we ſhall for Chriſt fall. Let the Perſian Archer for Chriſt his ſake, ſtrike me, I will die in aſſured hope, and with that Arrow, as with a Chariot, I will come unto that reſt, which ſhall be to me dearer than if I ſhould with a baſe ordinary kind of death in my ſins end my days in a bed. Now at length let us take revenge of them, with whoſe impure feet our Kinſmen and Chriſtian Brethren trodden down, are gone into that common Sanctuary,in which Chriſt our Saviour, Equal and Aſſociate to his Father, is become a Companion of the Dead. We are thoſe mighty men,we all have drawn our Swords, which ſtand about the lively and divine Sepulchre,

Sepulchre, as about Solomons bed. Wherefore we that be free born, let us take out of the way theſe Hagarens, the Children of the Bondwoman; and let us remove them as ſtones of offence out of the way of Chriſt; whom (I know not why) the Grecians feed up as greedy Wolves to their own deſtruction, and with ſhame fat them with their blood; when as with couragious minds and thoughts beſeeming wiſe men, they ought ſo to have been driven from their Provinces and Cities, as ravening wild Beaſts from their Flocks. Now for as much as this River, as it ſeemeth, is not, but by ſome adventure to be paſſed over, I my ſelf will ſhew you the way, and be the firſt that ſhall take it. Let us, ſerred together, forcibly break into the River, and we ſhall well enough ride through it. I know that the water beaten back by our force, will be at a ſtand, and break the Courſe, returning as it were backward. By not unlike means the Iſraelites in ancient time on foot paſſed over Jordan, the courſe of the River being ſtaid. This Attempt ſhall be ſpoken of in all Poſterity, it ſhall by no tract of time be worn out or forgotten, but ſtill remain in freſh Remembrance, to the great diſhonour of the Turks, whoſe dead bodies overthrown at this River, ſhall lie like a Mountain, and be ſeen as a Trophy of our Victory, unto the Worlds end, and our immortal Praiſe and Glory.

The Turks overthrown by the Chriſtians with a wonderful ſlaughter.

Having thus ſaid, and the ſignal of battel given, every man having before by devout prayer commended himſelf unto Almighty God, he was the firſt that put Spurs to his Horſe, and took the River; after whom followed the reſt, ſo cloſe and ſo forcibly, with ſuch a terrible Out-cry, that the courſe of the water, being by the force of their Horſes ſtaid, and as it were beaten back towards the Fountain, the whole Army paſſed over with leſs trouble than was feared. And then charging the Turks, already diſcouraged to have ſeen them ſo deſperately, and contrary to their expectation, to have paſſed the River; after ſome ſmall reſiſtance put them to flight, wherein ſuch infinite numbers of them fell, the Chriſtians like fierce Lions purſuing the Chaſe, that all the Vallies ran with blood, and the fields were covered with the bodies of the dead. Many of the Italians were wounded with the Turks Arrows, and but few or none ſlain. But what a multitude of the Enemies there fell, the ſundry and huge heaps of bones, to be compared unto great hills, did long time after well declare; whereat every man that travelled that way did worthily wonder, as did I my ſelf (ſaith Nicetas Choniates) in reporting this Hiſtory. Not much unlike that, is reported of the Cimbers, ſlain by Marius in ſuch number, that of their bones the Country people about Marcellis where the battel was fought, long time after made Walls for the defence of their Vineyards.

Iconium in vain beſieged by the Chriſtians.

After this ſo great a Victory, the Chriſtians without reſiſtance came to Iconium, the chief Seat of the Turkiſh Kings in the leſſer Aſia, which they hardly beſieged. Nevertheleſs, ſuch was the ſtrength of the City, being ſtrongly fortified both by Nature and Art, together with the valour of the Defendants, that lying there long, they little prevailed, preſſed in the mean time with greater extremities and wants in the Camp, than were the beſieged in the City; whereupon enſued ſuch a Mortality, people daily without number dying in the Army, that the Emperor was glad to raiſe his ſiege and to return into his Country. The chief cauſe as well of this ſo great a Mortality, as of the overthrow of ſo notable an Action, moſt men aſcribe unto the malice of the Greeks; who not without the privity of their Emperor (as it was commonly bruited) mingled Lime with the Meal which they brought to ſell into the Army, whereof the hungry Souldiers deſirouſly feeding, were therewith poiſoned, and ſo miſerably died. Of the certain time of this Journey of the Emperors into Aſia, Authors agree not; howbeit I muſt refer it unto the year 1146.

This Expedition, though not ſo fortunate as it was at the firſt well hoped of, yet profited the Chriſtian Common-weal in this, That the Turks therewith throughly buſied, and doubtful of the event thereof, Baldwin in the mean time fortified Gaza (ſometimes a famous City of the Philiſtines, but as then ruinous) which ſerved as a moſt ſure Bulwark for the defence of that part of his Kingdom towards Ægypt; and alſo for the diſtreſſing of Aſcalon, the only Refuge of the Ægyptians, then left in that Country; which ſtrong City ſtanding upon the Sea-ſide, he with all the Power of his Kingdom afterward beſieged both by Sea and Land; unto the Relief whereof, the Chaliph of Ægypt, after it had been five months by the Chriſtians beſieged, ſent a ſtrong Fleet of threeſcore and ten Gallies. At which time alſo on the other ſide Noradin the Turk, who had now got into his hand all the Kingdom of Damaſco, to withdraw the Chriſtians from the ſiege of Aſcalon, beſieged Paneada, from whence he was by the valour of the Citizens repulſed, as was alſo the Chaliphs Fleet at Sea, and the ſiege at Aſcalon continued. Where at length the Chriſtians after long battery had made a breach in the Wall, but giving thereunto an aſſault, they were with great loſs of their men repulſed, and the breach again by the Enemy repaired; who to the greater deſpight of the Chriſtians, hanged over the Walls in Ropes the dead bodies of their ſlain; with which Spectacle the chief Commanders of the Army were ſo moved, that they with all their Power returned again to the Aſſault, with a full Reſolution to engage thereon their whole Forces; which they ſo couragiouſly performed, that the beſieged diſcouraged with the great ſlaughter of their men, and now with true valour overcome, craved Parley; and ſo covenanting that they might with their Lives in ſafety depart, agreed to yield up the City, which they accordingly performed. The ſpoil of the City was given to the Souldiers, and the Government thereof unto Almerick the Kings Brother, Earl of Joppa. By this Victory, great ſecurity was gained unto that ſide of the Kingdom, the Enemy having now no place left in thoſe Parts whereon to ſet his foot.

The honourable Expedition of Lewis *the French King, by the malice of the Greeks, and envy of other Chriſtian Princes of Sy*ria fruſtrated and brought to nought.

About the ſame time alſo (or as ſome write, even at the ſame time together with the Emperor) Lewis the French King, the Eighth of that name, took upon him the like Expedition for the relief of the Chriſtians in the Holy Land; who ſetting forward with all the Chivalry of France, and accompanied with divers other great Princes, with a right puiſſant Army came to Conſtantinople, where he was by Emanuel the Emperor honourably received, with all the outward ſhews of feigned courteſie that could be deviſed. But having paſſed the Strait, and landed in Aſia, he found nothing anſwerable to that the diſſembling Greek had before moſt largely promiſed. And to diſtreſs him the more, was by falſe Guides before corrupted by the Emperor, conducted through the moſt deſolate and barren Countries, where by the way a wonderful number of his Souldiers periſhed of hunger and thirſt; many of them alſo being cut off in the ſtrait and difficult paſſages, or as they ſtrayed from the Army by the Greeks themſelves, appointed by the malicious Emperor for that purpoſe. Yet after many dangers paſſed, and his Army ſore waſted, he came at length into Syria, and laid ſiege unto Damaſco, the Royal Seat of Noradin the Turkiſh King; which he ſo notably impugned, that the Defendants were almoſt out of hope to be able for any long time to hold out. Neither had it otherwiſe happened, had not Envy, the inſeparable Attendant of all honourable Actions, fruſtrated ſo great an hope; for the beſieged Turks being brought to great extremity, and now even at the point to have yielded the City, certain of the Chriſtian Princes of that Country, underſtanding that the King had promiſed the Government of that ſo famous a City, unto Philip Earl of Flanders, if it ſhould be won; and ſecretly grudging to have a ſtranger preferred before themſelves, corrupted alſo (as ſome ſay) with the Turks gold, fraudulently perſwaded the King to remove from that part of the City where he lay, and might in fine have taken the ſame, unto another far ſtronger; where, after he had lien a great while, ſtriving with no ſmall extremities, he was enforced for want of Victuals to raiſe his ſiege and to depart. And ſo without any thing done worth the Remembrance, returned again into France, deteſting the very name of Emanuel the Greek Emperor; by whoſe ſiniſter dealing, ſo notable an Expedition was brought to be of none effect, to the great diſcouraging of all other Chriſtian Princes for taking the like again in hand.

Paneada taken and ſacked by the Turks.

Now had the ſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, for certain years after the aforeſaid Expeditions, reſted in good peace; when Noradin the Turk (moved with ſome injuries done by the Chriſtians unto the Turks and Arabians, who by the leave of King Baldwin dwelt in the Foreſt of Lybanus) came and ſtraitly beſieged Paneada, a City of the Chriſtians there by; upon whom the Chriſtians in the City, now brought unto great extremity, made a moſt deſperate Sally, and had with the Turks a ſharp and cruel fight; but oppreſſed with the multitude, and inforced to retire, they were ſo hardly purſued, that the Turks together with them entred the City, and put to Sword all that came in their way. Nevertheleſs, the greater part of the Citizens (by good fortune) had in good time before retired themſelves into the Caſtle, which was of great ſtrength, and there ſtood upon their guard. Of whoſe diſtreſs, with the taking of the City, Baldwin hearing, raiſed a great Army, and ſo ſet forward to relieve them. But Noradin hearing of his coming, and doubtful of his own ſtrength, after he had taken the ſpoil of what he could, ſet fire on the City, and ſo departed. The Citizens thus delivered, repaired the Walls of the City, the Kings Power ſtill defending them. Noradin with his Power all the while lying cloſe in the Woods not far off, ſtill awaiting the offer of ſome good opportunity to take the Chriſtians at advantage, which ſhortly after fell out according to his own deſire; for the King doubting no ſuch matter, but ſuppoſing him to have been quite gone, having at his return ſent away all his Footmen, followed after himſelf, accompanied only with his Horſemen, and they alſo not very ſtrong; but as he was paſſing the River Jordan, he was ſuddenly ſet upon by Noradin and the Turks, and after a ſharp Conflict overthrown; the King himſelf with ſome few hardly eſcaped to Saphet, a Town there by; moſt part of his Nobility being there either ſlain or taken Priſoners; amongſt the reſt, Bertrund of Blanquefort, Maſter of the Templars, with divers others of great Name, fell at that time into the Enemies hands, and ſo were carried away Priſoners.

Paneada again repaired by the Chriſtians.

After this Victory, Noradin ſtrengthened with new Supplies from Damaſco, came again and beſieged Paneade, in good hope, that the Citizens diſcouraged with ſo great an Overthrow of the King, and out of hope to be by them relieved, would now either yield the City, or elſe not be able long to hold it out. But the King, contrary to his expectation, had in ſhorter time than was thought poſſible, raiſed a great Power; and aided by the Prince of Antioch, and the Count of Tripolis, was marching to the relief of his City; of which approach Noradin underſtanding, although he had made divers breaches in the Walls, and brought the Citizens almoſt unto utter deſpair, roſe with his Army and departed. And ſo Baldwin having now twice relieved the beſieged City, returned alſo to Jeruſalem.

Many an hard Conflict with the Turks had this young King afterwards, during the fortunate time of his Reign; wherein that troubleſome Kingdom happily flouriſhed amidſt the Miſcreants; all which to recount, were long and tedious. Yet among other things, it is worth the remembrance, how that Noradin the Turk, then King of Damaſco, beſieging Sueta, a Caſtle belonging to the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, was in a ſet battel by Baldwin overthrown and put to flight, with the loſs of the greateſt part of his Army. King Baldwin had before married Emanuel the Greek Emperors Neece; and now the ſame Emperor by Guido Stephanus, and Triſillus his Embaſſadors, requeſted to have given him again in marriage one of the Kings nigh Kinſwomen. Unto whom the King, after mature deliberation had concerning the matter, offered him Matilde, an honourable Lady, the Siſter of the Count of Tripolis, whom the Emperor refuſed; and afterward by the conſent of the King, made choice of Mary the Daughter of Raimund Prince of Antioch lately dead. Which the Count of Tripolis taking in evil part, in revenge thereof, by certain Men of War whom he put to Sea, grievouſly infeſted the Frontiers of the Emperors Dominions. Now during the time that the Marriage was ſolemnizing, the King made his abode at Antioch, at which time he fortified the Caſtle of Pontiſfer upon the River Orantes, againſt the Incurſions of the Enemies. But lying there, he according to his wonted manner, to prevent ſickneſs, upon the approach of Winter took Phyſick of Barac a Jew, the Count of Tripolis his Phyſitian. After the taking whereof, he fell preſently into the Bloody-Flux, and afterward into a Conſumption; whereby it was verily ſuppoſed, that he was poyſoned by the Jew; and the rather, for that ſome little part of the ſame Medicine that was left, being given to a Dog, he thereof in ſhort time died. The King thus languiſhing in pain, to change the Air, removed firſt to Tripolis, and afterward to Berytus, where he departed this troubleſome life, to live with his Saviour Chriſt in bliſs for ever. His dead Body was afterward with general Mourning of his Subjects conveyed to Jeruſalem, and there ſolemnly enterred by the body of his Father. He departed the 13*th* of February, in the year of Grace, 1163. when he had reigned 21 years. He was a man ſo gracious, that not only his Friends, but even the Infidels themſelves (as it is reported) lamented his death. Inſomuch that Noradin King of Damaſco, his antient Enemy, being invited by ſome of his Captains to invade his Kingdom at ſuch time as his Funerals were in ſolemnizing, refuſed ſo to do, anſwering, That compaſſion and regard was to be had of the juſt ſorrow of the Chriſtians his Subjects; for that they had loſt ſuch a King, the like was hardly again to be found in the World.

the greater part of Servia, thus victoriouſly gained from the Infidels; let us for the orderly continuation of our Hiſtory,again return to ſee the proceedings of the Turks at the ſame time in the leſſer Aſia alſo; wherein they yet held the ſtate of a Kingdom, though not ſo great as before the coming of the Princes of the Weſt into thoſe Countries. After the death of Sultan Solyman (with whom Duke Godfrey and the other Chriſtian Princes had much to do as they paſſed into Syria) as is aforeſaid, one Muhamet ſucceeded him; betwixt whom and Maſut, Sultan of Iconium, great diſcord aroſe, which at length broke out into open War, to the further weakning of that late ſhaken Kingdom. For the maintenance of which Quarel, as profitable for his State, John Comnenus the Greek Emperor, gave Aid to Maſut, againſt his Enemy Muhamet. Nevertheleſs in ſhort time the two Infidels (profeſſing both one Superſtition) became Friends, and joyning their Forces, overthrew the Emperor with his whole Army, as he lay at the ſiege of Iconium, at which time he himſelf with much ado eſcaped by flight. Maſut afterwards having got into his hands the whole Kingdom of the Turks, at the time of his death divided the ſame among his three Sons; unto Clizaſthlan his eldeſt Son he gave Iconium his chief City, with the Towns and Provinces ſubject thereunto: unto Jagupaſan his other Son (or rather as ſome will have it, his Son in law) he allotted Amaſia and Ancyra, with the fruitful Country of Cappadocia, and the places adjoyning; but unto Dadune his other Son (or Son in law) he gave the great Cities of Cæſarea and Sebaſtia, with the large Countries thereabouts, all ſometime a part of the Greek Empire, but then the portions of the Turks. Long it was not after this diviſion of the Kingdom, but that theſe Brethren after the manner of ambitious men, forgetful of the bonds both of Love and Nature, fell at diſcord among themſelves; the Sultan ſeeking the deſtruction of Jagupaſan, and he likewiſe of him, and that not by ſecret means, but even by open force of Arms. Emanuel the Greek Emperor in the mean time wiſhing the deſtruction of them both, heartily rejoycing thereat, and by his Embaſſadors ſecretly animating the one againſt the other, yet in open ſhew more favouring of the part of Jagupaſan than of the Sultan, by whoſe Aid he obtained againſt him many notable and bloody Victories; inſomuch that the Sultan weary of the Quarrel, was glad not only by his Embaſſadors to ſeek the Emperors favour, but even in perſon Himſelf to go and meet him, as he came with his Army out of Syria, and ſo to accompany him unto Conſtantinople, where he was together with the Emperor moſt honourably received, with all the ſigns of Joy and Triumph that could poſſibly be deviſed. The Emperor no leſs rejoycing to be ſued unto by ſo great a Prince, than did the Sultan at his ſo honourable entertainment.

Another fooliſh Icarus. Nicetas Choniates, rerum ab imper. Manuele Comneno, geſtar. li. 3. fol.143.

Among other queint devices of many, for the ſolemnizing of ſo great a Triumph, there was an active Turk who had openly given it out, That againſt an appointed time he would from the top of an high Tower in the Tilt-yard fly by the ſpace of a furlong; the report whereof had filled the City with a wonderful expectation of ſo ſtrange a novelty. The time prefixed being come, and the people without number aſſembled, the Turk according to his promiſe, upon the top of an high Tower ſhewed himſelf, girt in a long and large white Garment, gathered into many pleits and foldings, made of purpoſe for the gathering of the Wind; wherewith the fooliſh man had vainly perſwaded himſelf to have hovered in the Air, as do Birds upon their Wings, or to have guided himſelf as are Ships with their Sails. Standing thus hovering a great while, as ready to take his flight; the beholders ſtill laughing, and crying out, Fly Turk, fly, how long ſhall we expect thy flight? The Emperor in the mean time ſtill diſſwading him from ſo deſperate an Attempt; and the Sultan betwixt fear and hope hanging in doubtful ſuſpence what might happen to his Country-man. The Turk, after he had a great while hovered with his Arms abroad, (the better to have gathered the wind, as Birds do with their Wings) and long deluded the expectation of the Beholders, at length finding the Wind fit, as he thought, for his purpoſe, committed himſelf with his vain hope unto the Air; but in ſtead of mounting aloft, this fooliſh Icarus came tumbling down with ſuch violence, that he brake his Neck, his Arms, his Legs, with almoſt all the bones of his Body. This fooliſh flight of the Turk gave ſuch occaſion of ſport and laughter unto the vulgar people (always ready to ſcoff and jeſt at ſuch ridiculous matters) that the Turks attending upon the Sultan could not walk in the ſtreets underided; the Artificers in their ſhops ſhaking their Arms, with their Tools in their Hands, as did the Turk, and ſtill crying out, Fly Turk, fly; whereof the Emperor hearing, although he could not chuſe but thereat ſmile Himſelf, as not ignorant of the ſcoffs and taunts of the vulgar people; yet in Favour of the Sultan, who was not a little grieved therewith, he commanded ſuch their Inſolency to be reſtrained.

The Solemnity of the Triumph overpaſſed (which by an ominous Earthquake at the ſame time hapning,was ſomewhat obſcured) the Emperor to ſhew his Wealth, and to gratifie the Sultan, gave unto him many rich and Royal Preſents, with ſuch a Maſs of Treaſure, as that he much wondred thereat. In requital whereof, and in token of his Thankfulneſs, he again honoured the Emperor with the name of his Father, and terming himſelf by the name of his Son, promiſed to reſtore unto him the City of Sebaſtia, with the Territory thereunto belonging, then part of Dadune his Inheritance. Nevertheleſs all this was nothing elſe but meer diſſimulation, as afterward by proof appeared; for returning home, he thruſt Dadune indeed out of Sebaſtia, which he ſpoiled, with the Country thereabout; but forgetful of his promiſe, kept it wholly to himſelf; and by force took alſo from him the City of Cæſarea, with the Country of Amaſia, by him before but lately poſſeſſed. In like manner he bent his Forces alſo upon Jagupaſan his other Brother, who in the very preparation of thoſe Wars died; by whoſe untimely death the City of Ancyra, with all his Dominions in Cappadocia, fell into the Sultans hands. Who now poſſeſſed of all his Fathers Kingdom, and ſwelling with Pride, forgetting all former courteſies, invaded the Emperors Territories, and took from him the City of Laodicea in Phrygia, where he did great harm, as alſo in the Country thereabouts, killing the people as he went, or elſe carrying them away with him Captives. For the repreſſing of which Outrages,the Emperor with a ſtrong Army paſſed over into Aſia, and there ,in the Frontiers of his Territories fortified Dorileum againſt the Incurſions of the Turks. In performing whereof, he, to the example and ſtirring up of others, carried the firſt Basket of ſtones himſelf upon his ſhoulders; and uſed ſuch further diligence, that in ſhort time the City was compaſſed about with ſtrong Walls, and deep Ditches, maugre the Turks, who ceaſed not with continual Alarms and Skirmiſhes to have hindred the Work. With like care, and for like purpoſe he alſo fortified Subleum, another ſtrong Hold; and leaving in either place a ſtrong Garriſon, returned again to Conſtantinople. Nevertheleſs the Turks ceaſed not with continual Inrodes to do what harms they might upon the Frontiers of the Empire, although not altogether with ſo good Succeſs as before, being many times cut off by the Garriſons of the late fortified Towns; which grievances ſtill increaſing, cauſed the Emperor to expoſtulate with the Sultan, as with an unthankful man, and forgetful of ſo great kindneſs before done unto him, as the eſtabliſhment of him in his Kingdom came unto; who with no leſs vehemency upbraided him again with Inconſtancy and breach of Promiſe, as well for fortifying the aforeſaid Places, contrary to the League betwixt them, as for that having promiſed much more, he had thereof performed nothing. Thus unkindneſs daily growing upon every trifle (as it commonly falleth out among men of great Spirit, and jealous of their own Honours) it was daily expected, when the matter ſhould fall out into open and bloody War; both of them being men of great valour, and apt to revenge the leaſt Injury to them offered. Yet was it the Sultans manner, warily to manage his Wars by his politique and expert Captains; whereas the Emperor being of an hotter nature, and couragious above meaſure, commonly in all his great Expeditions adventured his own Perſon, without reſpect what danger might thereof inſue unto himſelf or his State. Long it was not but that the Emperor, fully reſolved to be revenged of ſo many wrongs done unto him and his Subjects by the Turks, raiſed the whole Power of his Empire, both in Europe and Aſia, in ſuch ſort as if he had therewith purpoſed, not only to have raſed to the ground Iconium the Regal Seat of the Turkiſh Sultan, but even utterly to have deſtroyed the whole Nation of the Turks. Thus with a moſt puiſſant and populous Army, well appointed of all things neceſſary, he paſſed over into Aſia, and ſo in good Order marching through Phrygia, Laodicea, Chonas, (called in ancient time Paſſas) St. Archangel, Lampis, Cælænas, (where the head of the great and famous River Mæander riſeth, whereinto the River Marſyas falleth) and from thence to Chonia, he with evil Luck, and worſe Speed, paſſed by Myriocephalon, an old ruinous Caſtle, ominous by the name thereof, as by the event in ſhort time after it proved. And albeit that he marched very circumſpectly, ſtill intrenching his Army in every place where he lodged; yet could he make but ſmall ſpeed, by reaſon of the multitude of his Carriages, and of the baſe people that attended the ſame. The Turks in the mean while oftentimes ſhewing themſelves in Troops, and in places of advantage ſkirmiſhing ſometime with one part of the Army, and ſometime with another, but never daring to adventure the fortune of a juſt battel; yet by ſuch means were the Victuallers of the Army oftentimes cut off, and the paſſages for the Emperor made very dangerous. And the more to diſtreſs the Chriſtians in their long travel, they found the Country before them of purpoſe deſtroyed by the Turks, and the water in many places poiſoned, whereof the Chriſtians unadviſedly drinking, fell into many grievous Diſeaſes, eſpecially the Flux, and thereof died in great number. The Sultan in the mean time, although he had in readineſs a right puiſſant Army of his own, and had procured great Aid from the Perſian Sultan his Kinſman and chief Supporter; yet fearing the doubtful event of War, and loath to adventure his whole Eſtate upon the fortune of a battel, ſought by his Embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe, to come to ſome peace with the Emperor, and that upon ſuch honourable Conditions, as by the wiſer ſort were thought not to be at any hand refuſed; which large offers, the Sultan as deſirous of Peace, made unto him not once, but again and again; which the Emperor nevertheleſs (repoſing great confidence in his own Power, and prickt forward by the Gallants of the Court, better acquainted with the brave Triumphs of Peace, than the hard Wars of the Turks) proudly rejected, and ſo diſmiſſing the Embaſſadors, ſcornfully willed them to tell their Maſter, That he would give him anſwer unto his Requeſts under the Walls of Iconium. Which cauſed the Sultan, now out of all hope of any Reconciliation to be made betwixt the Emperor and him, with all his Power to take the Straits of Zibrica, whereby the Army of the Chriſtians, departing from Myriocephalon, muſt of neceſſity paſs. The entrance into theſe Straits was by a long Valley, on either ſide incloſed with high Mountains, which towards the North riſing and falling according as the Hills gave leave, opened into divers large Vallies, which by little and little growing again ſtraiter and ſtraiter, with high and craggy Rocks hanging over on either ſide, and almoſt touching one another, gave unto the painful Traveller a moſt hard and difficult paſſage.

A great overſight of the Emperor.

Into this ſo dangerous a Valley the Emperor, not fearing the Enemies force, deſperately entred with his Army, having neither provided for the clearing of the Paſſages, or ſafety of his Carriages, in no other order than as if he had marched through the Plain and Champain Country, although it were before told him (that which he ſhortly after, but too late ſaw) that the Enemy had ſtrongly poſſeſſed both the Straits and Mountains, to hinder his farther paſſage. The Vauward of his Army was conducted by John and Andronicus the Sons of Angelus Conſtantine, accompanied with Macroducas Conſtantine and Lapardas Andronicus; in the right Wing was Baldwin the Emperors Brother in law; and in the left Maurozomes Theodorus: after them followed the Drudges and Scullions, with an infinite number of Carters and other baſe people, attending upon the Carriages, with the Baggage of the whole Army; next unto theſe came the Emperor with the main Battel, conſiſting for the moſt part of right valiant and worthy Souldiers; the Rereward was ſhut up by Andronicus Contoſtephanus, with a number of moſt reſolute men. They were not far entred into theſe Straits, but that the Turks from the Mountains and broken Cliffs ſhewed themſelves on every ſide, delivering their deadly ſhot from the upper ground, upon the Chriſtians below, as thick as hail; nevertheleſs the Sons of Angelus, with Macroducas and Lapardas, and the Vantguard, caſting themſelves into a three-ſquare battel in form of a wedge, with their Targets in manner of a Penthouſe caſt cloſe together over their heads, and their Archers on every ſide luſtily beſtowing their ſhot among the thickeſt of their Enemies, by plain force drove them out of the Straits they had before poſſeſſed, and cauſed them to retire farther off into the Mountains, and ſo having made themſelves way, with little or no loſs paſſed thoſe dangerous Straits; until that at length having recovered the top of a Hill very commodious for their purpoſe, as the caſe ſtood, they there ſtayed, and preſently encamped themſelves. And haply with like good fortune might the reſt of the Army have paſſed alſo, had they in like order, and with like courage preſently followed after; but failing ſo to do, and troubled with the multitude of their Carriages, which could not poſſibly make any way through thoſe ſtrait and rough paſſages, (but troubled themſelves one with another, as alſo the whole Army) they were from the upper ground miſerably overwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh Archers, whoſe Arrows fell as thick upon them from the Mountains, as if it had been a perpetual Tempeſt or ſhower of Hail, to the great diſordering and diſmaying of the whole Army; which the Turks quickly perceiving, and therewith encouraged, in great numbers came down from the Mountains, where they had before hovered over the heads of the Chriſtians, and forcibly entring the plain ground, and coming to handy blows, firſt overthrew the right Wing; where Baldwin himſelf ſeeking to reſtore his diſordered Companies, and to ſtay the fury of the Enemy (now raging in the blood of the Chriſtians) with a Troop of valiant Horſemen breaking into the thickeſt of them, as became a worthy Captain, was there compaſſed in with the multitude of his Enemies, and ſlain, together with all his Followers, and the greateſt part of the whole Wing by him commanded. With this Victory the Turks were ſo encouraged, that coming down with all their Power, they ſtopped all the ways whereby the Chriſtians were to paſs, who as men couped up in thoſe dangerous ſtraits, were not able either to defend themſelves, or to help one another: but incloſed as Deer in a toyl, and one troubling another, were the cauſe both of the deſtruction of themſelves and others. For by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs of the place, neither could they that were before, retire, neither they that were behind in the rereward, come forward to relieve the one the other, as need required; the Carriages alſo which were many, and in the midſt of the Army, ſerving them to no other purpoſe, than to the hurt of themſelves. There were the Beaſts that ſerved for burden, together with the Souldiers, overwhelmed with the Turks ſhot, the Vallies lay full of dead Bodies, the Rivers ran mingled with the blood of Men and Beaſts, in ſuch terrible manner as is not by Pen to be expreſſed. For the Chriſtians not able either to go forward or retire, were there in thoſe ſtraits ſlain like ſheep; if any courage or ſpark of valour were by any ſhewed againſt the Enemy, fighting at ſo great advantage, it was but loſt, ſerving to little or no purpoſe. And to increaſe their miſeries, the Turks in ſcorn ſhewed upon the point of a Lance the head of Andronicus Bataza, the Emperors Nephew, who coming with an Army out of Paphlagonia, and Heraclea Pontica, againſt the Turks of Amaſia, was now by the way by them overthrown and ſlain. The report whereof, confirmed by the ſight of his head, and the conſideration of the deſperate danger wherein the whole Army preſently ſtood, ſo troubled the Emperor, that he was at his wits end; and with dry tears (if it may be ſo ſaid) diſſembling his inward grief, as one out of comfort, ſtood doubtful which way to turn himſelf. For the Turks having ſuffered the Vantguard to paſs, with all their Power charged the Emperors main battel, as his chief ſtrength, nothing doubting, but that having once overthrown it, they ſhould eaſily and at pleaſure overthrow the reſt. Oftentimes had the Emperor attempted to have driven the Enemy out of thoſe ſtraits, and ſo to have opened a way for his Army to have paſſed, but all in vain, the Power of the Turks ſtill increaſing, and they at great advantage notably maintaining the paſſages before by them taken. Nevertheleſs ſeeing no leſs danger in ſtaying ſtill, than in going forward, he with a few of his beſt Souldiers, armed with deſpair, and reſolved to die, (unto which kind of men nothing is terrible) ſet forward directly upon his Enemies, willing the reſt with like reſolution every man to make for himſelf the beſt ſhift he could. And ſo with many wounds and ſturdy blows both given and received, he by plain force and might of Hand brake through the thickeſt of his Enemies, and ſo eſcaped out of thoſe ſtraits as out of a trap; but yet not without many wounds received in his Perſon, and himſelf ſo wearied as that he was not able to lift up his Helmet, being beaten cloſe to his head, and in his Target were found ſticking thirty of the Turks Arrows, or thereabouts, the manifeſt tokens of his danger. The other Legions ſeeking to follow the Emperor, (for other way they had none) were on every ſide hardly aſſailed by the Turks, and infinite numbers of them ſlain, beſide many others that periſhed in thoſe ſtraits, overborn and trodden to death by their own Fellows. Yea ſuch as had the fortune to eſcape out of one of theſe perilous ſtraits, were forthwith ſlain in the next; for this ſo dangerous a paſſage through the Mountains, was divided (as is aforeſaid) into ſeven Vallies, which giving fair and broad entrances, the farther a man went, grew ſtill ſtraiter and ſtraiter, all which ſtraits the Turks had before ſtrongly poſſeſſed. At which time alſo, the more to increaſe the terror of the day, the light ſand raiſed with the feet of the Men and Horſes, was with the violence of a moſt tempeſtuous Wind which then blew, carried ſo forcibly and thick, that both the Armies grapling together, as if it had been in the darkneſs of the night, killed whomſoever they met withall, without reſpect of Friend or Foe; by which errour many were even of their own Friends ſlain. In every place lay great heaps of Turks ſlain together with the Chriſtians, and with them great number of Horſes and other Beaſts for carriage; ſo that thoſe Vallies where this bloody Conflict was, ſeemed to be nothing elſe but a large burying-place of the Turks and Chriſtians with their Horſes; but the greater number was of the Chriſtians that periſhed, and they not altogether of the common ſort, but even of the braveſt Captains, and the Emperors neareſt Kinſmen. The violence of the Wind ceaſing, and the day clearing up, there was of all others to be ſeen (a moſt woful Spectacle) men yet alive, ſome wounded, ſome whole, covered ſome to the middle, ſome to the neck, with dead Carkaſſes, in ſuch ſort as that they were not able with any ſtrugling to get out; who with their hands caſt up towards Heaven, with ruthful Voices cried out for help to ſuch as paſſed by; but all in vain, for every man poſſeſſed with the common fear, and by their danger meaſuring their own, paſſed by them without compaſſion, as more careful of their own ſafety, leaving them yet living, as men to be numbred among the dead.

The miſery of the Chriſtians by the Turks incloſed in the ſtraits.

The Emperor in great perplexity.

The deſperate reſolution of the Emperor.

A moſt miſerable Spectacle.

The Emperor in danger to have been taken, valiantly defendeth himſelf.

The Emperor himſelf, as a man now almoſt ſpent, being got out of the danger, ſtood a while to breath himſelf under the ſhadow of a wild Pear-Tree, without any Page or Man to attend him; whom a poor Common Souldier eſpying, and moved with compaſſion, came unto him, and offering him the beſt Service he could, helped him up with his Helmet, and buckled up his Armor, which before hung dangling here and there about him: when in the mean while a Turk coming in upon him, had taken his Horſe by the bridle, in hope to have led him away Priſoner; whom for all that, the Emperor as weary as he was, with the truncheon of his broken Lance, which he had yet in his hand, ſtruck down to the ground, and ſo cleared himſelf of him. Preſently after came alſo another ſort of the ſtragling Turks, ready alſo to have ſeiſed upon him, and to have taken him Priſoner; of whom he ſlew one with the aforeſaid horſemans Staff, and with his Sword ſtruck off the head of another of them, and ſo kept them off, until that by the coming in of ten of his own Souldiers he was relieved. Departing thence with purpoſe to have joyned himſelf unto the Legions that were gone before in the Vauward, he had not gone far, but that he was troubled by other Turks that he met, and the heaps of the dead bodies that lay in his way; yet at laſt, having with much labour and more danger paſſed the Straights, and a River running thereby, being glad in many places to ride over the dead bodies of his own people, and ſome other of his own Souldiers now reſorting unto him, he there ſaw John Catacuzene, a noble and right valiant Gentleman that had married his Niece, fighting alone againſt a great number of the Turks, to be compaſſed in and ſlain; whom he was no way able to relieve. Which Turks alſo ſeeing him paſs by, followed after him, as after a moſt rich Prey, in hope to have either preſently taken or ſlain him; whom nevertheleſs he (encouraging the ſmall Company he had about him) notably repulſed, and ſo ſometime marching forward, and again as occaſion required making a ſtand, came at length long looked for, but moſt welcome, unto the Legions that were gone before, not ſo ſorry for their own hard eſtate, as careful of his danger.

But before he could come to thoſe his Legions, he ready to faint for thirſt, commanded water to be brought unto him out of the River that ran faſt by; which after he had taſted, and by the unpleaſant taſte thereof percived the ſame to be infected, he fetching a deep ſigh, ſaid, O how unfortunately have I taſted Chriſtian Blood! whereunto an audacious and malapert Souldier there preſent, and more bitter than the cruel time it ſelf, replied, Emperor, thou didst not now, thou didſt not now, I ſay, firſt, but long ſince, and oftentime drink the blood of the Chriſtians, even until thou waſt drunk again, at ſuch time as thou didſt with moſt grievous exaction vex and devour thy poor Subjects. Which reproachful Speech the Emperor put up in ſilence, making as if he had not heard it. With like patience he alſo forbear the ſame railling Companion, at ſuch a time as he ſeeing his Treaſures hardly beſet, and in danger to be taken by the Turks, to animate his Souldiers, willed them to do what they could to reſcue the ſame, and to take it for their labour: This Treaſure (ſaid this impudent Fellow) ſhould before have been given to thy Souldiers, rather than now, when as it cannot be recovered but with great danger and bloodſhed; and therefore if thou be a man of valour, as thou wouldſt be accounted, and as the preſent caſe requireth, valiantly charge the Turks (now ready to carry it away) thy ſelf, and ſo recover thine evill gotten goods. Whereunto the Emperor anſwered no more but, Good words Souldier, and ſo put it up, as did David the railings of Shimei. Shortly after the coming of the Emperor unto thoſe Legions of his Vantguard (the only remainder of his Army that was left whole and unbroken) came alſo Andronicus Contoſtephanus, who had the leading of the Rereward, with divers other of great place, who had by good fortune eſcaped the fury of the Turks. The miſeries of that day (not well to be expreſſed) being ended by the coming on of the night, the Chriſtians ſate in the Camp, oppreſſed with a general heavineſs, leaning their heads on their Elbows, and conſidering the preſent danger wherein they were, ſcarcely accounted themſelves among the living: the Turks in the mean time to increaſe their fear, all the night running about the Camp, and crying aloud unto ſuch of their Countrymen in the Camp, as had abjured their Religion, or for other reſpects had taken part with the Imperials, that they ſhould that night get them out of the Camp, whereas otherwiſe if they ſtayed unto the morning, they ſhould be all but loſt men. In this ſo great an extremity the Emperor not knowing what to do, calling together his chief Commanders, declared unto them the deſperate danger they were in, together with his reſolution; which was, ſecretly himſelf to fly, and to leave the reſt, every man to make what ſhift he could for himſelf. Which his baſe determination, ſo foul as fouler could not be, they all wondering at, as proceeding from a diſtraughted mind; and by chance overheard by one of the Common Souldiers that ſtood without the Tent, the ſame Souldier fetching a deep Sigh, in deteſtation thereof cried out with a loud voice, What means the Emperor? And ſo turning himſelf unto him, ſaid, Art not thou he that haſt thruſt us into this deſolate and ſtraight way, and caſt us into deſtruction? and haſt as it were in a mortar incloſed us in theſe Rocks and Mountains, ready as it were to overwhelm us? What had we to do with this vail of mourning, and mouth of hell? Wherefore came we into theſe miſchievous and rough Straights? What can we particularly complain of the Barbarians, which in theſe inextricable windings and ſtraights have thus intangled and beſet us? Was it not thou that broughtſt us hither? And wilt thou now, as Sheep appointed to the ſlaughter, thy ſelf betray us? With which ſo ſharp a reprehenſion the Emperor throughly peirced, changed his former determination for flight, reſolving now to ſtand by it, whatſoever hapned. But what ſhould he now do, beſet with his Enemies ſtill ready to devour him? Help he ſaw none, either in himſelf, or to be expected from others, nought remained but death and deſpair. In this extremity, all mans help now failing, it pleaſed the moſt Mighty (which chaſtiſeth and healeth again, which ſtriketh, and yet giveth life, and ſuffereth not the ſtaff of the Sinners always to rage into the portion of the Juſt) with merciful eye to look down upon theſe diſtreſſed men, and with an unwonted kind of clemency to touch the Sultans heart, in ſuch ſort, as that he which but the other day ſtood in dread of the Emperor, and now having him as it were in his power, was overcome with his miſery: or as in times paſt he by Huſai overthrew the councel of Achitophel, and changed the mind of Abſalom to follow ſuch advice as ſhould bring him to deſtruction; ſo then alſo he turned the mind of the Turkiſh Sultan, that (perſwaded by certain of the chief men about him, who in time of peace had uſed to receive great Gifts and Preſents from the Emperor) he of his own accord by his Embaſſadors offered Peace unto the Emperor, before that he in ſo great diſtreſs ſued unto him for any; and that upon the ſelf ſame conditions they had made their Leagues before. The Turks in the mean time ignorant of the Sultans reſolution, early in the morning were ready to aſſault the Emperors Camp, in hope at once to have overthrown his whole power; and with a barbarous outcry ſtill riding about it, came ſo nigh, that with their Arrows they ſlew divers of the Chriſtians within their own Trenches; againſt whom the Emperor ſent out John the Son of Conſtantinus Angelus, and after him, Macroducas Conſtantinus, but to little or no purpoſe. In the mean time came one Gabras, a man of greateſt reputation among the Turks, Embaſſador from the Sultan; by by whoſe commandment the Turks ceaſed further to aſſault the Camp. This Gabras coming unto the Emperor, and after the manner of the Barbarians, honouring him with reverence done even down to the ground; firſt preſented him with a goodly Horſe, whoſe furniture was all of Silver, as if it had been for triumph, and a rare two edged Sword. Afterwards falling into a large diſcourſe concerning a Peace to be made, and with many kind words as with an Inchantment appeaſing the Emperors heavineſs conceived of his late loſs; he among other pleaſant conceits then uttered, ſeeing the Emperor in a rich Robe of yellow over his Armor, told him, that the colour was not fit for War, as ominous, and portending evil luck; whereat the Emperor a little ſmiling, gave it him, with the fortune thereof; and receiving the Horſe and Sword ſent him from the Sultan, ſigned the Peace. Amongſt other conditions of the Peace (which the dangerouſneſs of the time ſuffered not the Emperor curiouſly to examine) one was, That Dorileum and Subleum, before by him fortified, and the ground of this unfortunate War, ſhould be again raſed. Peace thus beyond all hope being concluded, and the Emperor delivered of a great fear, purpoſed another way to return home, to avoid the ſight of the Slain: yet was he by his Guides, even of purpoſe as it was thought, led back the ſame way, to behold with his eyes thoſe miſerable ſpectacles of the Slain, which could not with any tears be ſufficiently lamented; for the Straights were made plain, the Vallies were raiſed into Hills, and the Forreſts lay covered with the Carcaſſes of the Slain; no man paſſed by, but with heavineſs and grief, calling by name upon their Friends and Familiars there loſt. Having again paſſed thoſe doleful Straights, the Turks were again in the tail of the Army; for it was reported, That the Sultan repenting himſelf to have ſuffered his Enemies ſo to eſcape out of his hand, had given leave to ſuch as would, to purſue them, but followed not himſelf with his whole Power, as before; for moſt of the better ſort of his Souldiers loaded with the Spoil, were now returned home. Yet theſe that followed after the Army, ſlew many, eſpecially ſuch as were weak or wounded, and ſo unable to follow the reſt; although the Emperor to help the matter, had for the repreſſing of them placed the beſt of his Captains and Souldiers in the Rereward. Being come to Chonas, and now out of fear of his Enemies, he gave unto every one of his hurt Souldiers mony to pay for the curing of their wounds, and to bring them into their Countries; and coming to Philadelphia, there ſtaied for the refreſhing of himſelf after ſo great miſeries. In his return he raſed Subleum, according to his promiſe, but not Dorileum; whereof the Sultan by his Embaſſadors complaining; he anſwered, That what he had promiſed, inforced thereunto by neceſſity, he greatly forced not to perform. In revenge whereof, the Sultan ſent out one of his moſt valiant Captains, called Atapack, with 24000 good Souldiers choſen out of his whole Army, with ſtraight charge to waſte and deſtroy all the Emperors Provinces and Towns even unto the Sea-ſide, without ſparing Man, Woman, or Child; and in token thereof, to bring with him ſome of the Sea-Water, an Oar, and ſome of the Sea-Sand: who according to his Charge ſpoiled Phrygia, with the Cities along the River Mæander, even unto the Sea ſide; and ſo returning with a rich Prey, by the way ſpoyled what before he had left untouched. But in paſſing the River Mæander, when he feared leaſt, he fell into the hands of John Bataza the Emperors Nephew, and of Ducas Conſtantine a moſt valiant Captain; of purpoſe ſent againſt him by the Emperor with a great Power: where he was by them ſlain, together with all his Army, and the rich booty he had taken, all again recovered. Many other hard conflicts paſſed after this, betwixt the Imperials and the Turks, the one continually ſeeking to annoy the other; all which, for that therein nothing fell out much worth the remembrance, I for brevity willingly paſs over. In theſe endleſs troubles died Emanuel the Greek Emperor, when he had by the ſpace of eight and thirty years worthily governed that great Empire, having in the time of his ſickneſs but a little before his death taken upon him the habit of a Monk, in token he had forſaken the World. All the time of his Reign he was no leſs jealous of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, than of the Turks in the Eaſt; and therefore ever dealt with them unkindly. In time of War he was ſo laborious, as if he had never taken felicity but in pain; and again in Peace ſo given over to his pleaſure, as if he had never thought of any thing elſe. After whoſe death the Turkiſh Sultan, without reſiſtance invading the Frontiers of the Empire, took Sozopolis, with divers Towns thereabout in Phrygia, and long beſieged the famous City of Attalia, and ſo daily encroached more and more upon the Provinces of the Empire, joyning the ſame unto his own; which was no great matter for him to do, the Greek Empire being then no better governed than was the Chariot of the Sun (as the Poets feign) by Phaeton, far unfit for ſo great a charge: for Alexius Commenus, otherwiſe called Porphyrogenitus, being then but a Child of about twelve years old, ſucceeding his grave Father in the Empire, after the manner of Children altogether following his pleaſure; his Mother with his Fathers Kinſmen and Friends, who above all things ought to have had an eſpecial care of his Education, neglecting the old Emperors truſt in them repoſed, followed alſo their own Delights, without the regard of the Ruine of the Commonweal. Some enamoured with the Beauty of the young Empreſs, gave themſelves all to bravery, and the courting of her; otherſome in great authority, with no leſs deſire in the mean time, with the common Treaſures filled their empty Cofers; and a third ſort there was (of all the reſt moſt dangerous) who neither reſpecting their ſenſual pleaſure, nor the heaping up of wealth, looked not ſo low, aiming at the very Empire it ſelf. As for the common good, that was of all other things of them all leaſt regarded. Among theſe third ſort of the ambitious, was old Andronicus, the Couſin of the late Emperor Emanuel, a man of an haughty and troubleſom Spirit, whom he the ſaid Emperor Emanuel had for his aſpiring, moſt part of the time of his Reign kept in priſon, or elſe in Exile, as he now was, being by him not long before, for fear of raiſing new troubles, confined to live far off from the Court at Oenum; who now hearing of the death of the Emperor Emanuel, of the Factions in Court, of the Childiſhneſs of the young Emperor Alexius, given wholly to his Sports; and the great men put in truſt to have ſeen to his bringing up, and to the Government of the Empire, ſome like Bees to fly abroad into the Country, ſeeking after Mony as the Bees do for Hony; ſome others in the mean time like Hogs, lying ſtill and fatting themſelves with great and gainful Offices, wallowing in all Exceſs and Pleaſure, to have no regard of the Honour or Profit of the Common-weal; thought it now a fit time (in ſuch diſorder of the State) for him to aſpire unto the Empire after which he had all his his life-time longed. That he was generally beloved of the Conſtantinopolitans, yea, and of ſome of the Nobility alſo, he doubted not; for them he had long before by his popular behavior gained, together with the diſtruſt of the late Emperor, jealous of his Eſtate; which as it coſt him his Liberty, ſo miſſed it not much but that it had coſt him his Life alſo; but now that he was dead, wanted nothing more than ſome fair colour for the ſhadowing of his foul purpoſe. Among many and right divers things by him thought upon, was a clauſe in the Oath of Obedience which he had given to the Emperor Emanuel and Alexius his Son, (which Oath he had delivered unto him in Writing) That if he ſhould ſee, hear or underſtand of any thing dangerous or hurtful to their Honor, Empire, or Perſons, he ſhould forthwith bewray it, and to the utmoſt of his power withſtand it; which words (not ſo to have been wreſted) as beſt ſerving for his purpoſe, he took firſt occaſion to work upon. And as he was a ſtout and imperious man, thereupon writ divers Letters unto the young Emperor his Couſin, unto Theodoſius the Patriarch, and other ſuch as he knew well affected unto the late Emperor Emanuel; wherein among other things which he wiſhed to be amended in the preſent Government, he ſeemed moſt to complain of the immoderate power and authority of Alexius, then Preſident of the Council; who in great favour with the young Emperor, and more inward with the Empreſs his Mother than was ſuppoſed to ſtand with her honour, ruled all things at his pleaſure, inſomuch, as that nothing done by any the great Officers of the Empire, or by the Emperor himſelf was accounted of any force, except his approbation were thereunto annexed: whereby he was grown unto ſuch an exceſſive pride, having all things in his power, as that no man could without danger, as upon the venemous Baſilisk, look upon him. Of which his ſo exceſſive and inſolent power Andronicus by his Letters now greatly complained, moved thereunto (as he would have it believed) with the care he had of the young Emperors ſafety, which could not (as he ſaid) long ſtand with the others ſo great power, which he therefore (as in duty bound) wiſhed to be abridged; aggravating withall the infamous report of Alexius his too much familiarity with the Empreſs; which firſt muttered in Court, afterwards flew (as he ſaid) throughout the whole World. The reformation of which things, as tending to the danger of the Perſon of the Emperor, and Diſhonour of the State, he forſooth as one in conſcience bound, with great Gravity and Eloquence (being a very learned man) both in open Speech and Writing moſt earneſtly deſired: and thereby ſo wrought, as that he was generally accounted for a man of great experience (as indeed he was) and a faithfull Counſellor to the State, a thing much to have been wiſhed. Wherefore leaving Oenum, the place whereunto he was by the Emperor Emanuel in a ſort baniſhed, travelling towards Conſtantinople, he gave it out in every place where he came, what he had ſworn, and what he would for his Oaths ſake do; unto whom men deſirous of the change of the State, and ſuch as gave credit unto the report long before given out, That he at length ſhould become Emperor, flockt in great numbers, as Birds about an Owl, to ſee him, and with vain praiſes to chatter about him. In this ſort he came as far as Paphlagonia; in every place honourably received, as if he had been a deliverer of his Country ſent from God. And in the Imperial City he was not longed for of the Vulgar People only, as their Light and Load-Star, but divers of the Nobility alſo by ſecret Meſſengers and Letters, perſwaded him to haſten his coming, and to take upon him the Government; aſſuring him, that there would be none to reſiſt him, or to oppoſe themſelves againſt his ſhadow, but all ready to receive him; eſpecially Mary the young Emperors Siſter by the Fathers ſide, with her Husband Cæſar (who being a Woman of great ſpirit, and grieving much to ſee her Fathers Empire made a prey unto Alexius the Preſident, and the Empreſs her Step-Mother, whom ſhe naturally hated) had raiſed a great and dangerous tumult in the City againſt them both, which was not without much bloodſhed appeaſed; and now ceaſed not by often and moſt earneſt Letters (to her own deſtruction and her Husbands, as it afterwards fell out) to prick forward Andronicus and to haſten his coming; who by Letters and Meſſengers daily coming unto him from the Court ſtill more and more encouraged, leaving behind him the Country of Paphlagonia, came to Heraclea in Pontus, and ſtill on towards the Imperial City, with great cunning and diſſimulation winning the hearts of the People as he went. For who was ſo ſtonie hearted, whom his ſweet words and abundant tears flowing from his gracious eyes, as from two plentiful Fountains down by his hoary Cheeks, might not have moved? All that he did or deſired, was (as he ſaid) for the common good and liberty of the Emperor. By which means he had drawn unto him a wonderful number of the rude Country People by the way as he came. But coming into Bythinia, he was by John Ducas Governour of the great City of Nice, ſhut out as an Enemy to the State, and ſo at Nicomedia alſo. Nevertheleſs, paſſing by thoſe Cities, he held ſtill on his way, until at length he was near unto a Caſtel called Charace, encountred by Andronicus Angelus, ſent with a great power againſt him, by the great Preſident Alexius; who otherwiſe as an effeminate man, given over to his pleaſure, ſpending the greateſt part of the night in rioting by candle light, and moſt part of the day in his bed, with curtains cloſe drawn as if it had been night; yet doubtful now of the coming of his Enemy, left nothing undone which he thought might help for the aſſuring of his State. Many of the Nobility of whom he ſtood in doubt, he gained unto him by means of the Emperors Mother; who by her rare Beauty, ſweet Words, and gracious Behaviour, as with a Line drew all men to her. Other ſome he overcame with Gifts and great ſums of Mony, whereof he now made no ſpare; And ſo wrought the matter, that no man of any account or mark went over to Andronicus. Who nevertheleſs with ſuch followers as he had, joyning battel with Angelus (ſent againſt him, as is before ſaid) overthrew him and put him to flight. Wherewith Alexius much troubled, in great diſpleaſure and without reaſon, called Angelus (now fled to Conſtantinople) to an account for the Mony delivered unto him for the defraying of the Charges of that unfortunate War; who ſeeing his misfortune to be ſo taken as if he had framed it himſelf, and of purpoſe betrayed the Army committed to his charge; by the Counſel of his ſix Sons, being all men of great Valour and Wiſdom, firſt took the refuge of his own houſe; but finding himſelf there in no ſafety, with his Wife and his ſaid Sons (two of which came afterwards to be Emperors) preſently fled over the Straight to Andronicus; who ſeeing of him coming towards him, is reported to have uſed this Text of Scripture, Behold I will ſend mine Angel before thy face, to prepare thy ways, alluding to his name of Angelus, as the Preſage of his good Succeſs.

Wherefore

Andronicus encampeth in ſight over againſt Conſtantinople.

Wherefore incouraged with the coming of theſe Noblemen his Kinſmen, he without longer ſtay marched directly unto the Sea-ſide, and there a little above Chalcedon encamped almoſt right over againſt Conſtantinople; cauſing many great fires (more than needed) to be made in his Army, to make it ſeem unto them of the City greater than indeed it was; and with the ſight thereof to keep the Citizens in ſuſpence, with the doubtfull expectation of ſome great matter to enſue. Wherein he was no whit deceived; for they having him now as it were in ſight, leaving their work, ran ſome to the Sea-ſide, ſome up to the Hills and high Towers to behold his Army a far off, willing with their friendly looks, if it had been poſſible, to have drawn him over the Straight into the City. Alexius knowing himſelf not able by Land to encounter with ſo ſtrong an Enemy, (for now ſome which on foot could not go over to Andronicus, were ſecretly in heart already with him; otherſome thought themſelves ſufficiently to ſhew their fidelity to the Emperor, if ſitting ſtill at home, they ſhould take part with neither; for ſo have ſubtil heads and aſpiring minds, for the furtherance of their deſires, taught the common people both to ſay and think) thought it beſt by Sea to avert the preſent danger; and therefore comanded all the Emperors Gallies (being before rigged up and ready) to be ſtrongly manned and put to Sea, for the keeping of Propontis and the Straight of Boſphorus, that Andronicus ſhould not that way paſs. Now had he determined to have made eſpecial choice of ſome aſſured Friend of his own to be General of this Fleet, as he had done of the Captains and Maſters, being all of his own Kinſmen and Domeſtical Servants; but as he was about to have ſo done, Contoſtephanus (ſirnamed the great Captain) oppoſed himſelf againſt it, challenging that place as due to himſelf, before all others; ſo that overcome by his Authority (which it was no time for Alexius now to diſpute) he was glad to commit the charge and truſt of the whole Fleet unto him, as General.

Xiphilinus ſent over to Andronicus, dealeth unfaithfully in doing his meſſage.

Thus having (as he thought) made the Sea ſure, he ſent over unto Andronicus, as from the Emperor, (for all was done in his name) one George Xiphilinus, with Letters and other Inſtructions, whereof the effect was, To command him forthwith in peace to return to the place from whence he came, and not farther to trouble the State; promiſing him in ſo doing, the Emperors Favour, with many great Honours and Preferments to be afterwards beſtowed upon him; which otherwiſe might turn to his utter deſtruction. Which Letters Xiphilinus having delivered, and done his Meſſage, is reported to have ſecretly adviſed Andronicus to proceed in his purpoſe, and not in any caſe to yield to that which was of him required:

The proud anſwer of Andronicus.

wherewith Andronicus encouraged, proudly rejected the graces offered, and willed the Meſſenger to tell them that ſent him, that if they would have him to return unto the place from whence he came, they ſhould firſt diſplace the proud Preſident Alexius; and call him to an account for the Villanies he had done; then the Emperors Mother they ſhould deprive of her honours, and ſhut her up as a Nun into ſome Cloyſter, there to learn to amend her life; and laſt of all, that the Emperor according to his Fathers Will, ſhould take upon himſelf the Government, and not be overtopt by others, by whoſe too much Authority, his Majeſty and Honour was (as he ſaid) too much impaired.

Contoſtephanus revolteth to Andronicus.

Alexius in deſpair.

But within a few days after, Contoſtephanus, the great Captain and General, carried over all the Gallies to Andronicus, leaving nothing but their names for the Preſident in his Rolls to look upon, whoſe revolt above all other things encouraged Andronicus, and caſt Alexius even into the bottom of deſpair. For now Andronicus his Friends flockt together in the City, not ſecretly as before, but openly in all places; and ſuch as wiſht a change in the State, impudently ſcoffing at Alexius, paſſed over the Straight to Chalcedon in great numbers to Andronicus, where having filled their Eyes with beholding of his goodly Perſon, his chearful Countenance, and reverent Age; and their Ears with his ſweet words and great Promiſes, returned home merry and joyful, as if they had been in ſome terreſtrial Paradice, filling the City with his praiſes. After that, Andronicus his two Sons, John and Manuel, with divers others, whom the Preſident had caſt in priſon, were ſet a liberty, and other of his chief Favourites laid faſt in their rooms.

A ſtrange alteration.

As for Alexius the Preſident himſelf, with all his Friends and Faction in the Court, they were taken and committed to the keeping of the Guard; a right ſtrange alteration. But about midnight, Alexius himſelf was ſecretly conveyed out of the Court to the Patriarchs Houſe, and there kept with a ſtronger guard than before. A wonderful change and worth marking, a man ſo honourably born, but yeſterday in greateſt honour, attended upon with many thouſands, all at his command, having the power to ſpill or ſave; to day in bonds, in diſgrace, in miſery and deſpair, and not ſo much as a Page to wait upon him. Which he taking very grievouſly, yet complained of nothing more, than that they which had the keeping of him, would not ſuffer him to ſleep or take any reſt. Of whoſe miſery, the Patriarch taking pity (although he had of him very evil deſerved) yet cheered him up with comfortable words, perſwading him with patience to endure his hard fortune, and not with ſuch ſpeeches as fitted not his preſent ſtate, to provoke his Keepers to uſe him evilly.

Alexius brought to Andronicus, hath his eyes put out.

Within a few days after early in the Morning, he was brought out of the Patriarchs Houſe, and ſet upon a very little bad Jade, and ſo with a ragged clout put upon the top of a Reed in manner of an Enſign, carried before him in deriſion, was brought to the Sea-ſide, and there caſt into a little Boat, was ſo brought to Andronicus, by whoſe commandment, with the general conſent of the Nobility, he for his evil Government ſhortly after had his Eyes put out. This was the miſerable end of the immoderate power, or rather of the inſolent Soveraignty of Alexius; who, had he with more moderation and vigilancy governed, might both have kept Andronicus out of the City, and himſelf from ſo great miſery; having at his command all the Emperors Treaſure, his Gallies, with moſt part of the ſtrength of the Empire.

The meeting of the Patriarch and Andronicus.

Now came the Noblemen over apace to Andronicus; the laſt that came, was the reverend Patriarch Theodoſius, with the chief of the Clergy; of whoſe approach, Andronicus hearing, went out of his Tent to meet him, and falling down (as great as he was) flat at his Horſes feet, and in a while after ariſing again, kiſſed the Patriarchs foot, calling him the Emperors Saviour, the Lover of Virtue, the Defender of the Truth; and comparing him with the famous Father John Chryſoſtome, omitted not any honourable Title he could poſſibly deviſe to give him. But the devout Patriarch, that had never ſeen Andronicus before, having now well viewed him, and marked his ſtern Countenance, his ſubtil Nature, his crafty and diſſembling Manners, his exceeding Stature, being almoſt ten foot high, his ſtately Gate, his proud Look, his continual Severity, and melancholy Silence; as it were pitying them that to their own deſtruction had called ſuch a man in, ſaid, Hitherto I have heard, but now I have alſo ſeen, and plainly known; and fetching a deep ſigh, adjoyned thereunto that ſaying of the Prophet David; As we have heard ſo have we alſo ſeen. In which words, he covertly quipped the diſſembled meeting and ſubmiſſion of Andronicus; and withall called to remembrance the words of the Emperor Emanuel, wherewith he had many times ſo painted forth Andronicus unto the Patriarch, as if he would moſt lively have repreſented him unto his view.

Andronicus paſſeth over the Strait.

All things in the City and in the Palace ſet in order according to Andronicus his mind, by his two Sons, and leave given unto the Emperors Friends to come over unto him, and to be acquainted with him; at length Andronicus himſelf departing from Damalum, in a Gally croſſed the Strait, oftentimes by the way merrily ſinging that ſaying of the heavenly Pſalmiſt; Return my Soul into thy reſt, becauſe the Lord hath done well unto thee, having delivered my life from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling. The Emperor with his Mother Xene, then lay not in the Palace at Conſtantinople, but at another Princely Houſe of his in the Country near unto Philopatium, as Andronicus had appointed; whither Andronicus firſt went, and coming unto his preſence, moſt humbly proſtrate before him, with ſobbing and tears, as his deceitful manner was, kiſſed his feet. As for the Empreſs his Mother, he lightly ſaluted her, and as it were but for faſhion ſake, not diſſembling in his countenance the old grudge he bare againſt her. And ſo without longer ſtay went unto his Tent provided for him not far off; round about which, all the great Noblemen had pitched their Tents alſo, flocking unto him as Chickens ſeeking for Refuge under the Hens wings. Having there ſtayed with the Emperor a good while, he was deſirous to go unto the Imperial City, and to ſee the late Emperor Emanuel his Couſins grave. Where entring into the Monaſtery of our Lady, where he was buried, and coming to his Tomb, he wept bitterly, and roared as it were mainly out. So that divers of the ſtanders by, ignorant of his diſſembling nature, by way of admiration ſaid; O what a wonderful thing is this! O how he loved the Emperor, his Couſin, although his fierce and cruel Perſecutor! And when one of his Kinſmen would have pulled him from the Tomb, ſaying, That he had ſorrowed for him enough; he would not be removed, but requeſted them to ſuffer him yet a little to tarry by the Tomb, for that he had ſomething in ſecret, to ſay unto the dead; and ſo with his hands caſt up and cloſe together, as if he had prayed, and his eyes faſt fixed upon the Tomb, he moved his lips, and ſecretly ſaid ſomething, but what, no man could tell. Some ſaid it was ſome charm or incantion. But others more pleaſantly conceited, ſaid, and (as it afterward appeared) more truly, that Andronicus did triumph over the dead Emperor Emanuel, and revel with his ghoſt, with theſe or the like words; I have thee now faſt, my cruel Perſecutor, by whom I have been driven to many great Extremities; and having wandred almoſt all the World over, have thereunto been made by thee a common by-word. But now this Tomb riſing up with ſeven tops, and priſon, out of which thou canſt not ſtart, holdeth thee oppreſſed with a dead ſleep, out of which thou ſhalt not be awaked, but by the ſounding of the laſt Trump. And now will I be revenged of thy Poſterity, and ſatisfie my ſelf as a Lion with a fat Prey; and take ſharp Revenge of all the Wrongs thou haſt done me, when I have once poſſeſſed my ſelf of this Royal City.

Andronicus taketh upon him the Government.

After that, viſiting all the Emperors ſtately Houſes, but ſtaying in no place long, he diſpoſed of all Matters of State, according to his own pleaſure. Unto the young Emperor he allowed Hunting, and other his vain delights, with Keepers joyned unto him, to watch not only his going in and out, but alſo that no man ſhould talk with him of any matter of Importance; for all the Government of the State he took unto himſelf: not for that he wiſhed ſo well thereunto, above others, but ſo to drive from the Court all them of the contrary Faction to himſelf, that were able to do any thing, and had before born ſome Sway. The Souldiers, whoſe help he had uſed in aſpiring to the Government, he rewarded with great bounty; all their Offices and Preferments he beſtowed either upon his own Children, or other his great Favorites; divers of the Nobility of whom he liked not, were by him in ſhort time driven into exile; ſome were by him deprived of their ſight, and ſome others caſt into priſon, not knowing any cauſe why, more than that they were by him ſecretly condemned, for that they were of the Nobility, or had done ſome good Service for the State, or exiled for their Perſonage, or ſome other thing that grieved Andronicus, or elſe for the ſpark of ſome old diſpleaſure which yet lay hid as fire raked up in the aſhes.

A miſerable State of a Commonweal.

So that the State of that time began to grow moſt miſerable; and the treachery even of men neareſt in blood, ſeeking the deſtruction one of another, for to ſerve their own turns, or to gratifie Andronicus, moſt horrible; not only one Brother betray'd another, but even the Father his Son, and the Son his Father, if Andronicus would have it ſo. Some accuſed their neareſt Kinſmen, that they derided Andronicus his proceedings; or that without regard of him, they more favoured Alexius the young Emperor, then, a great offence. Yea, ſuch was the miſchief of the time, that many in accuſing others, were themſelves accuſed; and charging others of Treaſon againſt Andronicus, were themſelves charged by them whom they accuſed, and ſo clapt up both together in one priſon. Neither were they of the Nobility only, which were Enemies to Andronicus, thus hardly dealt withall, but even ſome of his great Favorites and Followers alſo; for ſome whom but yeſterday he had uſed moſt kindly, and enrolled among his beſt Friends, upon them to day he frowned and tyrannized moſt cruelly; ſo that you might have ſeen the ſame man the ſame to day (as it is reported of Xerxes his Admiral) to be crowned and beheaded, to be graced and diſgraced; inſomuch that the wiſer ſort deemed Andronicus his praiſings, the beginning of a mans diſgrace; his bounty, his undoing; and his kindneſs, his death.

Mary the Daughter of Emanuel, with her Husband Cæſar poyſoned by Andronicus.

The firſt that taſted of his Tyranny, was Mary the Daughter of Emanuel the Emperor, who for the hate ſhe bare to Alexius the late Preſident, and the Empreſs her Mother in law had (as is aforeſaid) above all other, wiſht for his coming; but was now by one Pterigionites (ſometime an Eunuch of her Fathers, corrupted by Andronicus, having in his aſpiring mind purpoſed the utter deſtruction of all Emanuels Poſterity) cunningly poyſoned; as was her Husband Cæſar, who lived not long after her, poyſoned alſo (as was ſuppoſed) with the ſame Cup that his Wife was. Now among others of the late Emperors Houſe, none had ever ſtood more in his light, than had the fair Empreſs Xene, the young Emperors Mother, whom now he ceaſed not moſt bitterly (though wrongfully) to accuſe, as an utter Enemy both to the Emperor and the State, making as if he would leave all, and again depart, if ſhe were not removed from the Emperor her Son; and by his cunning ſo incenſed the giddy headed vulgar people againſt her, that they came flocking to Theodoſius the good Patriarch, ready to tear him out of his Cloaths, if he conſented not to the removing of the Empreſs, as Andronicus had deſired. So a Council being called of ſuch his Favorites and others, as were not like indifferently to hear her Cauſe, but aſſuredly to condemn her, the Guiltleſs Empreſs after many things falſly laid to her Charge, was accuſed of Treaſon; as that ſhe ſhould by her Letters have ſolicited Bela King of Hungary, her Brother in law, to invade Brantizoba and Belligrade, two ſtrong places belonging to the Empire. Whereupon ſhe was condemned, and ſhamefully caſt into a moſt filthy Priſon near unto the Monaſtery of St. Diomede. Amongſt other Noblemen called unto this wicked Council, were Leo Monaſteriotes, Demetrius, Tornicius, and Conſtantius Petrenus; who not yet altogether devoted to Andronicus, being asked their Opinions concerning the Empreſs, ſaid, They would be glad firſt to know, Whether that Council againſt his Mother, were called by the Emperors conſent or not? With which Speech, Andronicus pierced to the heart as with a Sword, in great rage ſtarted up and ſaid, Theſe are they which encouraged the wicked Preſident to all his Villanies, lay hands upon them. Whereupon they of his Guard in threatning manner ſhook their Weapons and Swords at them, as if they would even preſently have ſlain them; and the tumultuous common people, catching them by their Cloaks as they came out, pulling them ſome one way, ſome another, were ſo fierce upon them, as that they had much ado to eſcape out of their hands with life. Now lay the fair Empreſs (but the other day one of the greateſt Princes of the Eaſt, and honoured of all her Subjects) in great miſery and deſpair, ſcorned even of her baſe Keepers, every hour expecting the deadly blow of the Hangman. Yet was not the cruelty of Andronicus againſt her, any thing aſſwaged, but grieving that ſhe yet breathed, ſhortly after aſſembled the former Council, the Miniſters of his Wrath, demanding of them, What puniſhment was by Law appointed for ſuch as betrayed any Town or Province of the Empire? whereunto anſwer being given in Writing, That it was by the Law, death; he could no longer hold, but that he muſt in great choler break out againſt the poor Empreſs, as if it had been ſhe that had done it; and thereupon the wicked Counſellors crying out with one voice, That ſhe was to be taken out of the way, as they had before agreed; by and by without longer ſtay, a damned Writing was ſubſcribed by the young Emperor her Son, as if it had been with the blood of his own Mother, whereby ſhe was (I abhor to write it) moſt unworthily condemned to die. The men appointed to ſee this moſt horrible and cruel Execution done, were Manuel, Andronicus his eldeſt Son, and Georgius Auguſtus, his near Kinſman; who both diſmaid at the very mentioning of the matter, not regarding the Emperors Command, ſaid plainly, that they never before conſented to the death of the Empreſs, but had clean hands of ſo hainous an offence, and therefore would now much leſs ſee her innocent Body diſmembred in their ſight. At which unexpected anſwer Andronicus much troubled, with his Fingers oftentimes pluckt himſelf by the hoary Beard, and with burning eyes caſting ſometime up his head, and ſometime down, ſighed at his own moſt miſerable tyrannical eſtate, freting inwardly, that they which were neareſt unto him, whom he thought he might even with a beck have commanded to have done any miſchief, abhorring his cruelty, ſhould refuſe to do the thing he ſo much deſired to have done; yet repreſſing his anger for a while, within a few days after, he again commanded her to be ſtrangled; which was accordingly done by Conſtantinus Tripſicus, and Pterigionites the ungracious Eunuch, by whoſe help he had before poyſoned Mary the Emperors Daughter, with Cæſar her Husband, as is before declared. Thus periſhed this great Empreſs, cruelly ſtrangled in priſon, by theſe two wicked men, the mercileſs Executioners of Andronicus his wrath. Her dead Body lately adorned with all the Graces of Nature, even to the admiration of the Beholders, was without more ado ſecretly raked up in the Sand faſt by the Sea-ſide; a poor Sepulchre for ſo great a Perſon.

Dangerous to ſpeak the truth to a Tyrant.

The miſerable death of the Empreſs.

What might not Andronicus now do to others, that durſt thus cruelly deal with the young Emperors own Mother, and neareſt Friends? yet was all covered under the pretence of the common good, and ſafety of the State and Empire. And the more to ſhadow Andronicus his ſecret purpoſes, as not proceeding of any private or hidden malice, or aſpiring humor, from which he of all men would ſeem moſt free; and the more to manifeſt his Devotion and Loyalty to the young Emperor his Couſin, he was the only Perſwader unto the reſt of the Nobility, to have him ſolemnly Crowned (which as yet by reaſon of his tender Age he was not;) and at the time of his Coronation, with his own ſhoulders ſupported him up, as he was (after the manner of that Solemnity) carried unto the great Church, and ſo back again; the Crocodiles tears ſtill plenteouſly running down his aged face, as if it had been for exceeding joy; which many of the meaner ſort beholding, and deeming thereof the beſt, highly commended his kindneſs, accounting the young Emperor thrice happy, in ſo grave a Governor, and faithful Counſellor; who in love and kind affection towards him, ſeemed not inferior to his natural Father; ſo cunningly had he under the Vail of Piety, ſhadowed his moſt execrable Treachery; as that in the very plotting thereof, he was accounted moſt loving and kind. But hidden Treaſon, be it never ſo well diſſembled, muſt at length ſhew it ſelf. So Andronicus having got into his Power both the Emperor and the Empire, and the chief Friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being taken out of the way, or elſe driven into exile, thought it now high time for himſelf to aſpire unto that high Soveraignty, after which he had ſo many years longed. Wherefore calling together a Council of his Flaterers and Favorites, whom he had for ſuch purpoſe promoted unto the higheſt Places of State (all or the moſt part of the grave Counſellors and friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being now diſplaced, or otherwiſe taken out of the way) he as a man only careful of the common good, declared unto them the dangerous State of the Empire, by reaſon of a Rebellion raiſed in Bythinia at Nice, by Iſaac Angelus, and Theodorus Catacuzenus; and another at Pruſa, by Theodorus Angelus; requiring their grave advice for the ſuppreſſing thereof; who not ignorant of their Lords purpoſe (as thereof before ſufficiently inſtructed) anſwered with one conſent, That of ſuch great Miſchiefs there would be no end, except he were joyned in Fellowſhip of the Empire together with Alexius, by his Gravity and deep Wiſdom to ſupply what wanted for the good Government of the State in the young Emperor his Couſin. At which Speech the ſtanders-by (being in number many, and for the moſt part the Followers of Andronicus his Flatterers) gave a great ſhout, and as if it had been already granted, with one Applauſe cried out, Long live Alexius and Andronicus the Greek Emperors; and that with ſuch a vehemency, as if they would therwith have rent the very Heavens. The bruit thereof flying abroad into the City, forthwith you might have ſeen every ſtreet and corner of the City full of the vulgar people, with ſome alſo of better ſort, ſwarming together like Bees, and ſounding the Praiſes of Andronicus (who now was come out of his Houſe into the Court, with a world of people following him) and crying out, Long live the Emperors Alexius and Andronicus. With which loud acclamation,mixt with the heavy ſighings of many good men, (for all were not mad of that Frenzy) the young Emperor awaked, and ſeeing the Court full of people, and Andronicus by them ſaluted his Fellow in the Empire; knowing now no other remedy, thought it beſt to yield unto the time, and ſo with the reſt flattering the old Tyrant, welcomed him full ſore againſt his will, by the name of his Friend and Companion in the Empire; which he now in diſſembling manner ſeeming unwilling to take upon him, and refuſing the place offered, was by the rout of his flattering Favorites enforced to his own great contentment, to yield to their requeſt; ſome of them with both their hands carrying him up, until they had as it were againſt his will placed him in the Imperial Seat, prepared for him faſt by the young Emperor; others in the mean time no leſs buſied in pulling off his private Attire, and puting upon him the Imperial Robes.

The next day, when this Participation of the Empire ſhould be publiſhed, and they both proclaimed Emperors, the name of Andronicus was ſet before the name of Alexius; whereof his Favorites (though ſome others interpreted it otherwiſe) gave this reaſon, That it fitted not with the Majeſty of the Empire, that the name of a Boy ſhould be ſet before the name of ſo reverend, grave, wiſe, and excellent a man as was Andronicus his Companion in the Empire. Shortly after, Andronicus being brought into the great Temple to be Crowned, then firſt began to ſhew to the people a chearful Countenance, and ſetting aſide his ſtern Look, after his long devotion done, filled the vain peoples heads with many large Promiſes of a more happy form of Government than before. All which proved nothing but meer diſſimulation and deep deceit, that chearfulneſs of Countenance and Speech ſerving but for a while to cover his inward, ſecret, and moſt inhumane Cruelty. And the more to deceive the World, the Ceremonies of his Coronation paſt, at ſuch time as he ſhould for Conſummation and Confirmation of all, receive the ſacred and dreadful Myſtery, the pledge of our Redemption, not without due reverence to be named, much leſs with impure hands touched; after he had received the Bread, and taken the Cup in his hand, he with a moſt devout Countenance framed of purpoſe to deceive, and his eyes caſt up to Heaven, as if his Soul had there already been (the faireſt Maſk of Hypocriſie) ſwore by thoſe dreadful Myſteries,and moſt deeply proteſted in the hearing of the people ſtanding by, that he had taken upon him the Fellowſhip of the Empire for no other end or purpoſe but to aſſiſt Alexius his Couſin in the Government, and to ſtrengthen his Power; whereas his ſecret meaning was nothing leſs, as ſhortly after appeared. For after a few days ſpent in feigned Devotions for the proſperous beginning of his Empire, he forthwith turned his mind unto other his more ſecret, but moſt wicked and execrable Deſigns. And having above all things purpoſed the death of the young Emperor, he called together them of the Council, his own Creatures, and corrupt Miniſters of his Wickedneſs, who had now oftentimes in their mouths that ſaying of the Poet,

Eſt mala res multos dominarier; unicus eſto
——Rex Dominuſque.

An evil thing it is to be ruled by many;
One King and one Lord, if there be any.

And that the old age of an Eagle was better than the youth of a Lark. So by the general conſent of that wicked Aſſembly (unworthy the name of a grave Council) a Decree was made, That Alexius ſhould (as a man unfit to Govern the State) be deprived of all Imperial Dignity, and commanded to live a private life. Which diſloyal Decree of the Conſpirators was yet ſcarcely publiſhed, but that another more cruel came out of the ſame Forge, That he ſhould forthwith be put to death, as one unworthy longer to live. For the execution of which ſo horrible a Sentence Stephanus Hagiochriſtophorites (one of the chief Miniſters of Andronicus his Villanies, and by him promoted even unto the higheſt Degrees of the Honours of the Court) with Conſtantinus Trypſicus, and one Theodorus Badibrenus, Captain of the Tormentors) were ſent out; who entring his Chamber by night, without compaſſion of his tender age, or regard of his Honour or Innocency, cruelly ſtrangled him with a Bow ſtring; which deteſtable murther ſo performed, Andronicus ſhortly after coming in, ſpurned the dead body with his foot, railing at his Father, the late Emperor Emanuel, as a forſworn and injurious man; and at his Mother, as a common Whore. The head was forthwith ſtruck off from this miſerable Carkaſs (the mirror of Honours unſtability) and left for the monſtrous Tyrant to feed his eyes upon; the body wrapped up in Lead, was in a Boat carried to Sea by Jo. Camaterius, and Theodoſius Chumenus, two of Andronicus his noble Favorites; who with great joy and glee returned with the ſame Boat to the Court, as if they had done ſome notable Exploit. But long continueth not the joy of the Miſchievous, Vengeance ſtill following them at the heels; as it did theſe two, who not long after, with the reſt that conſpired the innocent Emperors death, all or moſt part of them came to ſhameful or miſerable ends. Thus periſhed Alexius the Emperor, not yet full fifteen years old, in the third year of his Reign; which time he lived more like a Servant than an Emperor, firſt under the command of his Mother, and afterwards of the Tyrant which brought him to his end.

Who joyeth now but old Andronicus, made young again, as ſhould ſeem, by his new gained Honours? for ſhortly after the murder committed, he married Anne the French Kings Daughter (as ſome report) before betrothed to young Alexius; a tender and moſt beautiful Lady, not yet full eleven years old, an unfit Match for three ſcore and ten. And in ſome ſort as it were to purge himſelf and his Partakers of the ſhameful murther by them committed, and to ſtop the mouths of the people, he by much flattery and large promiſes procured of the Biſhops a general Abſolution for them all, from the Oath of Obedience which they had before given unto the Emperor Emanuel, and Alexius his Son: Which obtained,he for a while had the ſame Biſhops in great Honour, and ſhortly after in greater Contempt, as men forgetful of their Duties and Calling. After that he gave himſelf wholly unto the eſtabliſhing of his Eſtate, never reckoning himſelf thereof aſſured, ſo long as he ſaw any of the Nobility or famous Captains alive,that favoured Emanuel the late Emperor,or Alexius his Son; of whom ſome he ſecretly poyſoned,as Mary the Emperor Emanuels Daughter, with with her Husband Cæſar; ſome for light occaſions he deprived of their ſight, as he did Emanuel and Alexius the Sons of that noble Captain John Comnenus; Andronicus Lapardus, whoſe good Service he had oftentimes uſed; Theodorus Angelus, Alexius Comnenus the Emperor Emanuels baſe Son; ſome he hanged, as Leo Syneſius, Manuel Lachanas, with divers others; ſome he burnt, as Mamalus one of the Emperor Alexius his chief Secretaries; all men of great Honour and place. For colour whereof he pretended himſelf to be ſorry for them, deeply proteſting, that they died by the ſeverity of the Law, not by his will, and by the juſt doom of the Judges, whereunto he was himſelf (as he ſaid) to give place; and that with tears plentifully running down his aged Cheeks, as if he had been the moſt ſorrowful man alive. O deep diſſimulation, and Crocodiles tears, by nature ordained to expreſs the heavineſs of the heart, flowing from the eyes as ſhowers of rain out of the Clouds; in good men the moſt certain ſigns of greateſt grief, and ſureſt teſtimonies of inward torment; but in Andronicus you are not ſo, you are far of another nature, you proceed of joy, you promiſe not unto the diſtreſſed pity or compaſſion, but death and deſtruction! how many mens eyes have you put out? how many have you drowned? how many have you devoured? Moſt of the Nobility that favoured the late Emperor Emanuel and Alexius his Son, thus taken out of the way by Andronicus, ſtruck ſuch a fear into the reſt, that for ſafeguard of their lives they betook themſelves to flight, ſome one way, ſome another, never thinking themſelves in ſafety ſo long as they were within the greedy Tyrants reach; whereof ſhortly after enſued no ſmall Troubles, to the ſhaking of the State of the whole Empire. Iſaac Comnenus the Emperor Emanuels nigh Kinſman, took his Refuge into Cyprus, and kept that Iſland to himſelf. Alexius Comnenus, Emanuels Brothers Son, fled into Silicia, and there ſtir'd up William King of that Iſland, againſt Andronicus, who with a great Army landed at Dyrrachium, took the City, and ſo from thence without reſiſtance paſſing through the heart of Macedonia, ſpoiling the Country before him as he went, met his Fleet at Theſſalonica, which famous City he alſo took by force, and moſt miſerably ſpoiled it, with all the Country thereabout, ſo that he brought a great fear upon the Imperial City it ſelf. Unto which ſo great evils Andronicus (intangled with domeſtick Troubles, and not knowing whom to truſt) was not able to give remedy, although for ſhew he had (to no purpoſe) ſent out certain of his moſt truſty Miniſters with ſuch Forces as he could well ſpare. For the Majeſty of his Authority growing ſtill leſs and leſs, and the number of his Enemies both at home and abroad daily increaſing, and the favour of the unconſtant people (who now began to ſpeak hardly of him) declining; he uncertain which way to turn himſelf, reſted wholly upon Tyranny, proſcribing in his fear, not only the Friends of ſuch as were fled, and whom he diſtruſted, but ſometimes whole Families together, yea and that for light occaſions, ſometime thoſe who were his beſt Favorites, whoſe Service he had many times uſed in the execution of his Cruelty; ſo that now no day paſſed wherein he did not put to death, impriſon, or torture one great Man or other. Whereby it hapned that the Imperial City was filled with ſorrow and heavineſs, every man hanging the head, and with ſilence covering his inward grief, not without danger to have been then uttered. Among many others appointed to this ſlaughter, was one Iſaac Angelus a man of great Nobility, whom Hagiochriſtophorites (the chief Miniſter of Andronicus his Tyranny, and for the ſame by him higly promoted) ſuſpecting, as one that bare no good will to the Emperor (cauſe enough of death) came to his houſe to apprehend him; and finding him at home, after a few hot words commanded him to follow him; whereat the Nobleman making ſome ſtay, and abhorring the very ſight of the Wretch, as unto him ominous and fatal, Hagiochriſtophorites himſelf began to lay hands on him, reviling his Followers, that they had not forthwith drawn him out of his houſe by the hair of his head, unto the Priſon by him appointed. For they, touched with the honour of the Man, and moved with pity, forced him not, but ſtood ſtill as beholders. Iſaac ſeeing himſelf thus beſet, and no way now left for him to eſcape, reſolving rather there preſently to die, than ſhortly after to be murdred in Priſon, drew his Sword as the reſt were laying hands upon him, and at the firſt blow cleft the wicked head of Hagiochriſtophorites down to his ſhoulders; and ſo leaving him wallowing in his own blood, and like a deſperate man laying about him amongſt the reſt, made himſelf way through the midſt of them. And ſo imbrued with blood, with his bloody Sword yet in his hand, running through the midſt of the City, told the people what he had done, and crying unto them for help in defence of his Innocency, fled into the great Temple, there to take the Refuge of the Sanctuary; where he had not long ſat (in the place where the guilty flying thither for Refuge uſed to ſit, and confeſſing their Offence, crave Pardon of ſuch as go in and out) but that the Temple was filled with the multitude of people flocking thither out of all parts of the City, ſome to ſee the Nobleman, ſome to behold what ſhould become of him; for all men thought that he would before Sun-ſet (notwithſtanding the reverence of the place) be drawn thence by Andronicus, and put to ſome ſhameful death. Thither came alſo John Ducas, Iſaacs Uncle, and his Son Iſaac, to increaſe the tumult; not for that they were any thing guilty of the death of Hagiochriſtophorites, but for that they had before become Sureties unto the ſuſpitious Tyrant, for their Kinſman Iſaac, and he likewiſe for them; by whoſe treſpaſs they well knew themſelves now brought into no leſs danger than if they had been Abettors thereunto. And beſide them alſo, many other there were, which doubting of their own eſtate, and fearing the like might happen to themſelves, pricked forward with hard Speeches, the common people flocking thither, inſtantly requeſting them to ſtay there, and to ſtand by them now at their need, being ſo injuriouſly wronged; whoſe pitiful complaints moved many to take part with them. At which time alſo, no man yet coming from the Emperor (being as then out of the City) to repreſs the Sedition, nor any of the Nobility oppoſing themſelves, no Friend of Andronicus appearing, none of his bloody Miniſters or Officers ſhewing themſelves, nor any that did ſo much as ſpeak a good word in his behalf, or in diſlike of the tumult, the boldneſs of the ſeditious people increaſed, every man in ſo great liberty ſaying what he liſt, and after their rude manner one incouraging another. So ſpent Iſaac that long night, not thinking (God wot) of an Empire, but ſtill expecting the deadly ſtroke of Andronicus. Yet had he with great intreating ſo prevailed, that divers of the Aſſembly ſhutting the Church doors, and bringing Lights into the Church, ſtayed there with him all night, and by their example cauſed ſome others to ſtay alſo. The next morning by break of day were all the Citizens flockt again unto the Temple, curſing the Tyrant to the Devil, as the common Enemy of

of mankind, wiſhing unto him a ſhameful death, and the honour of the Empire unto Iſaac. At that time by fortune, or rather God ſo appointing it, Andronicus was out of the City at his Palace of Meludinum, on the Eaſt ſide of Propontis, where he was by nine a clock at night certified of the death of Hagiochriſtophorites, and of the tumult of the people: yet that night ſtirred he not, neither did any thing more, but by ſhort Letters adviſed the people to pacifie themſelves, and not by fooliſh Rebellion to caſt themſelves into further danger. In the Morning Andronicus his Favourites began to ſhew themſelves, and to do what they might to have appeaſed the tumultuous Multitude; yea and preſently after came Andronicus himſelf, and landed with his Imperial Gally at the great Palace in the City. But with the inraged People nought prevailed either the perſuaſions of the one, or report of the preſence of the other; for they all, as upon a ſignal given, and as men inſpired with one ſpirit, or ſtirred up with the ſame fury, flocked together into the Temple of S. Sophia, one encouraging another, and ſcoffing at ſuch as ſtood by as idle lookers on, without Weapons in their hands, reviling them and calling them rotten Limbs that had no feeling of the common harm. After that, they broke open the Priſons and ſet at liberty the Priſoners, as fitteſt inſtruments to increaſe the Tumult, who were not all notable Offenders of the Dregs of the People, but many of them born of good Houſes, and for ſome light Fault, or inconſiderate Word (whereof every man was in thoſe times bound to give an account) or for ſome Friends Offence againſt Andronicus, there laid faſt. Theſe of all others moſt animated the people, in ſuch ſort, as they which before for fear of the danger did but ſoftly murmure to themſelves againſt Andronicus, did now openly joyn with the reſt of the baſe ſeditious. Then might you have ſeen ſome with their Swords and Targets, ſome alſo in their Armour, but the greateſt part armed but with Clubs and Staves, and other ſuch like rude Weapons, Arms of Fury, haſtily taken up in their Shops as by chance they came firſt to hand, running forth in every place. By this Aſſembly of the moſt furious and promiſcuous People was Iſaac hoiſed up, and with a general applauſe ſaluted Emperor. At which time one of the Sextons of the Church, with a ladder took down Conſtantine the Great his Crown of Gold, (which for a Monument hung over the holy Altar and ſet it on Iſaacs Head; which he at the firſt ſeemed unwilling to wear, not for that he was not deſirous enough of the Empire, but for that he feared the extream danger of the matter, and thought thoſe things that were then done to be but as it were a ſick mans dream, like enough ſtraightway to vaniſh; beſide that, he feared in ſo doing, the more to exaſperate Andronicus. Which his Uncle John Ducas (as is ſaid before, ſtanding by him) perceiving, plucking off his own Cap, and ſhewing his old bald Head, requeſted the People, That if his Nephew did refuſe it, they would ſet it upon his; whereunto they with a great outcry anſwered, That they would no more yield their obedience to an old bald Man, as having received many harms from the hoary hairs of old Andronicus; and therefore for his ſake hated every old Man, more fit for Charons Boat, and his Coffin, than for an Empire, and eſpecially if he had a forken Beard, and bald Head, as had Andronicus and this Ducas. Thus was Iſaac by the tumultuous Multitude inveſted in the Empire; and ſo royally mounted upon one of the Emperors Horſes, richly furniſhed with a Saddle and Trappings of Gold, which they had by chance gotten, was by them brought from the Temple unto the Court; Baſilius Camaterus the Patriarch waiting upon him, whom the headſtrong People had inforced againſt his Will to confirm with his Authority what was by them done for the eſtabliſhing of Iſaac in the Empire. Andronicus at his coming to the Palace perceiving firſt by the confuſed cry of the tumultuous Multitude, and afterward by that which he ſaw with his Eyes, how the world went; calling upon his old Friends and flattering Favourites, thought firſt by their help to have repreſſed the Fury of the Rebellious; who as Friends of his better Fortune, and not of himſelf, were now for the moſt part ſhrunk from him; and thoſe that were left, ſo feintly coming on, as if in his quarrel they had had no mind to ſpend their lives; with which heartleſs Company Andronicus fearing to oppoſe himſelf againſt the Fury of the Multitude, with his Bow and Arrows in his hand got him up into the higheſt Tower of the Palace, called Centenaria, and from thence beſtowed certain ſhot among the People. But ſeeing that to be to no purpoſe, and better perſuaded to do more with them by fair words, than ſuch vain force, he from the top of the Tower cried aloud unto them, That if they would be quiet and depart, he would by their conſent reſign the Empire unto his Son Manuel; whereat the People more inraged, ſpared not to pour forth moſt reproachful words in contempt both of himſelf and his Son; and ſo furiouſly brake into the Court by one of the Gates called Carea. Which Andronicus beholding, and now out of all hope, caſting from him all his Habiliments of Honour, and diſguiſing himſelf fled again to his Gally, accompanied only with Anna his Wife, and Maraptica his Minion, and ſo returned to Meludinum, his place from whence he came. Iſaac but yeſterday in the bottom of deſpair, and ſhadowed as it were with the hand of Death, by the ſtrange change of Fortune to day mounted unto the higheſt Type of worldly Honour, entring the Palace, was there again with the greateſt applauſe of the People that might be, ſaluted Emperor. From whence he forthwith ſent out certain Companies of his moſt aſſured Friends and Followers, to apprehend Andronicus; who now as a man at once forſaken both of his Friends and of his better Fortune, ſecretly fled with his Wife and his Paragon, before remembred, to Chele, attended upon only with a few of his truſty Servants, which had of long time ſerved him before he was Emperor. There taking Ship, with purpoſe to have fled unto the Tauroſcythes, (as not thinking himſelf ſafe in any Province of the Empire) he was twice or thrice by foul Weather put back again, the rough Sea abhorring (as it ſeemed) to carry him that had ſo polluted it with the dead bodies of the Innocent by him ſlain, and ſtill threatning (as it were) to devour him. Thus ſtrangely ſtayed by foul Weather, or more truly to ſay, by the revenging hand of the Higheſt, he was found by ſuch as were ſent out to ſeek after him, and being by them apprehended, was with two great Iron Chains faſt lockt about his proud Neck, and heavy Gyves upon his legs, caſt into the Caſtle of Amena; and in that miſerable Habit ſhortly after preſented to the Emperor Iſaac, yet buſied in appeaſing and reforming of the diſordered City; where by the way as he went, he was by the People moſt ſhamefully reviled, and injuriouſly uſed; ſome plucking him by the Beard, ſome by the Hair of the Head, ſome other in the mean time playing with his noſe, and bobbing him in the face, with a thouſand other deſpights done unto him; eſpecially by ſuch Women, as whoſe Husbands he had had before murdred or deprived of their ſight. Afterward being commited to the hateful Fury of the People, he had his right Hand cut off, and was again committed to the ſame Caſtle, without Meat, Drink, or any other comfort; where after he had lien a few days, having one of his Eyes put out, he was ſet upon a foul lean Camel, with his Face towards the tail thereof, and ſo (as it were in Triumph) led through the Market place, his bald Head all bare, as if it had been a dead mans Skull taken out of a Charnel Houſe, in a ſhort old Coat; ſo miſerable a Spectacle, as might have expreſſed a fountain of tears out of the Eyes of a right hard hearted man. But the Bedlam and moſt inſolent Citizens, eſpecially they of the baſer ſort, as Cooks, Coblers, Curriers, and ſuch like, flocking about him like Bees (without regard that he had but the other day worn upon his Head the Imperial Crown, then honoured by them as a God, and extolled unto the Heavens; that they had not long before ſolemnly ſworn unto him Obedience and Loyalty) ran now as men out of their Wits, omitting no kind of Villany they could deviſe to do unto him; ſome thruſt nails into his Head, ſome caſt dirt in his Face, ſome the dung both of Men and Beaſts, ſome prickt him in the Sides with ſpits, ſome caſt Stones at him as at a mad Dog, and other ſome opprobrious and deſpiteful words, no leſs grievous unto him than the reſt; amongſt others, an impudent Drab coming out of the Kitchen, caſt a pot of ſcalding water in his Face; and in brief, their outrage ſo exceeded, as if they had ſtriven among themſelves, who ſhould do him the greateſt Villany. Having thus ſhamefully, as in a ridiculous triumph brought him into the Theater, they there betwixt two Pillars hanged him up by the Heels; where having ſuffered all theſe deſpightful Indignities, with many more, not without offence to be named, he with an invincible Courage yet ſtill held his patience, not giving one evil word, but ſometimes ſaying, Lord have mercy upon me; and otherwhiles, Why do you break a bruiſed Reed? Yet the furious People nothing moved with the Calamity of ſo great a man, (of all others now the moſt miſerable) ſtript him of his bad Cloaths as he hung, and cut off his Privities. One among the reſt, to make an end of him, thruſt his Sword in at his Throat up to the twiſt as he hung; other two with their long Swords proved their Strength, who could ſtrike furtheſt into his Buttocks. Thus miſerably periſhed this famous Emperor, after he had reigned two years. That which was left of his Body (for many had carried away ſome pieces thereof) being taken down from the place where he hung, was caſt into a baſe Vault in the Theater, where it for a ſpace lay, as the loathſome Carkaſs of ſome wild Beaſt, and the miſerable Spectacle of Mans Fragility; for Iſaac the Emperor would not ſuffer it to be buried. Howbeit afterwards (the Fury of the People overpaſſed) it was by ſome more charitable men removed thence, and laid in a low Vault near unto the Monaſtery of the Ephori; which as Nicetas Choniates (Author of this Hiſtory ſpeaking of the time wherein he lived) ſaith, is yet there undiſſolved to be ſeen. He was a man moſt honourably deſcended, of Stature tall, and well proportioned; in his Countenance ſate a certain reverend Majeſty, adorned with ſuch notable Vertues, as might have made him worthily to have been compared unto the greateſt Emperors of his Stock and Family, had he not obſcured the ſame with too much Ambition and Cruelty; whereof the one cauſed him to lead the greateſt part of his Life in Priſon or Exile; the other brought unto him a moſt ſhameful End.

Nicetas Choniates Annal. lib. 1. fol. 161. col. 4.

Iſaac Angelus his Succeſſor, by the Favour of the People thus exalted unto the Empire, at the firſt governed the ſame with great Lenity and Moderation, as if he had altogether abhorred from the Effuſion of his Subjects Blood; but afterwards not a little troubled both with Foreign Enemies, and Domeſtical Rebellion, beſieged in the Imperial City by ſuch of the Nobility as thought themſelves no leſs worthy of the Empire than himſelf; for repreſſing of which Inſolencies, and the aſſuring of his State, he became ſo ſevere in chaſtiſing the Offendors, and ſuch others as he had in diſtruſt, that he was counted of moſt men not inferior in Cruelty to Andronicus his Predeceſſor; few days paſſing without the condemnation or execution of one great Man or other, beſides them of the meaner ſort, of whom he ſeemed to make no great reckoning; whereby he in few years loſt the Love and Favour of his Subjects, who before had him in great honour; and became unto them no leſs odious than was before Andronicus. Upon which general diſlike of the People, his ingrateful younger Brother Alexius (by him before for a great ſum of Mony redeemed from the Turks) took occaſion to riſe up againſt him, and by the Favour of the Souldiers deprived him together both of the Empire and his Sight; and having put out his Eyes, thruſt him into a Monaſtery, there to live as it were out of the World, as a man condemned to perpetual darkneſs, after he had reigned nine years and eight months, being not yet full forty years old. Whither it were the revenging hand of God, for the hard meaſure uſed to Andronicus, or not, I leave it to the wiſer to conſider, who in his deep Providence, wherewith he beſt governeth all things, would have a moderation uſed in puniſhment of our moſt Capital Enemies, as having always before our Eyes the ſlippery State of Power and Authority; and that as all worldly things are ſubject to change, ſo by the juſt Judgment of God it oftentimes falleth out, that what hurt we do unto others, the ſame we may receive again from others. In theſe ſo great and ſtrange mutations of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire (which I have ſomewhat more at large proſecuted, not ſo much for the novelty of the matter, although it were right ſtrange, as for that out of the Loſſes and Ruin thereof, the greatneſs of the Turks for the moſt part grew) Clizaſthlan Sultan of Iconium, after the death of the Emperor Emanuel, found means to take from the Empire divers ſtrong Towns and Caſtels in the leſſer Aſia, together with a great part of the Country of Phrygia; Alexius, Andronicus and Iſaac the ſucceeding Emperors, troubled with dangers nearer home, having nothing to oppoſe againſt him, but fair Intreaty and rich Preſents, ſo redeeming for a while an unſure Peace, with no leſs charge in ſhort time to be renewed again. This victorious Sultan (for ſo he may of right be called) holding in his Subjection a great part of the leſſer Aſia, now a Man of great years, dying, left behind him four Sons, Maſut, Coppatine, Reucratine, and Caichoſores, all men grown. Amongſt whom he divided his Kingdom. Unto Maſut he bequeathed Amaſia, Ancrya, Doryleum, with divers other pleaſant Cities of Pontus; unto Coppatine, he aſſigned Melytene, Ceſarea, and the Colony now called Taxara: unto Reucratine he allotted Aminſum, Docea, with ſome other Cities upon the Sea-Coaſt; but unto Caichoſroes, he left Iconium his Regal Seat, and with it Lycaonia, Pamphilia, and all the Countries thereabouts as far as Cottianyum. Of theſe four, Coppatine long lived not after his Father; for whoſe Inheritance Reucratine Prince of of Docea, and Maſut Prince of Ancyra (his two Brethren) fell at variance, and ſo at laſt into an open War. But Maſut finding himſelf too weak for his warlike Brother Reucratine, yielded unto him the Territories which he ſaw he muſt needs forego; and glad now to keep his own, ſo made peace with him. Reucratine being a man of an ambitious and haughty Spirit, with his Forces thus doubled, denounced War unto his Brother Caichoſroes; who doubting his own Strength, fled unto the Emperor Alexius Angelus for aid, as had his Father done before him unto the Emperor Manuel, although not with like good Fortune. For the Emperor but of late having obtained the Empire by the depoſing of his Brother; and altogether given to pleaſure, repuring alſo thoſe Domeſtical Wars of the Turks, ſome part of his own ſafety; ſent him home without Comfort, as one ſtrong enough of himſelf to defend his own quarrel againſt his Brother.

Howbeit, he was ſcarcely come to Iconium, but he was by Reucratine expulſed thence, and driven to fly into Armenia, where he was by Zebune King of that Country, a Turk alſo, honourably received and courteouſly uſed, but yet denied of the aid he requeſted; the King pretending that he was already in League with Reucratine, and therefore could not; or as ſome thought, fearing the dangerouſneſs of the matter, would not intermeddle therein. Wherewith the poor Sultan utterly diſcouraged, returned again to Conſtantinople, and there in poor Eſtate, as a man forlorne, paſſed out the reſt of his days.

Now having thus paſſed through the Turkiſh affairs in the leſſer Aſia, together with the troubled Eſtate of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, no ſmall cauſe of the Turkiſh greatneſs; the courſe of time calleth us back again before we paſs any farther, to remember their proceedings alſo at the ſame time, and ſhortly after, in Syria, Judæa, Ægypt, and thoſe more Southerly Countries, where theſe reſtleſs People ceaſed not by all means to enlarge their Empire, until they had brought all thoſe great Kingdoms under their Obeyſance.

Almericus ſixth King of Jeruſalem

After the death of Baldwin King of Jeruſalem, of whom we have before ſpoken, Almericus his younger Brother, Earl of Joppa and Aſcalon, being then about ſeven and twenty years old, was by the better good liking of the Clergy and People, then of the Nobility, elected King: not for that there wanted in him any good parts worthy of a Kingdom, but for that ſome of them envied unto him ſo great an honour. Nevertheleſs he was (as we ſaid) by the general conſent of the People, Elected, Proclaimed, and by Almericus the Patriarch with all Solemnity crowned, the ſeventeenth day of February, in the year of Grace, 1163. To begin whoſe troubled Reign, the Egyptians firſt of all denyed to pay unto him their wonted Tribute. In revenge whereof, he in perſon himſelf with a puiſſant Army entred into Egypt; and meeting with Dargan the Sultan, overthrew him in plain Battel, and put him to flight; who to ſtay the further purſuit and paſſage of the Chriſtians, cut the Banks of the River Nilus, and ſo drowned the Country, that the King was glad to content himſelf with the Victory he had already gotten, and ſo to return to Hieruſalem.

The next year Almericus was again drawn down with his power into Egypt, by Dargan the Sultan, to aid him againſt Saracon; whom Noradin the Turk, King of Damaſco, had ſent as General with an Army, to reſtore Sanar the Sultan before expulſed, and to depoſe Dargan. In which Expedition Dargan being ſlain, and Saracon having won certain Towns, kept them to himſelf; Sanar doubtfull of his good meaning, joyned his Forces with Almericus, and by his help expulſed Saracon out of Egypt. But whilſt Almericus was thus buſied in Egypt, Noradin the Turk making an inroad into the Frontiers of the Chriſtians near unto Tripolis, was by Gilbert Lacy, Maſter of the Templars in thoſe quarters, and the other Chriſtians, when he leaſt feared, ſo ſuddenly ſet upon, that he had much ado by flight to ſave himſelf, half naked for haſte, moſt of his followers being at the ſame time ſlain. In revenge of which diſgrace, he not long after with a great power came and beſieged Arethuſa; for relief whereof, Bohemund Prince of Antioch, Raymond the younger, Earl of Tripolis, Calamon Governour of Cilicia, and Toros Prince of Armenia, came with their power. Of whoſe coming the Turk hearing, raiſed his Siege and departed. After whom theſe Chriſtian Princes eagerly following, were by the Turks ſhut up in certain deep and rotten Fenns (whereinto they had unadviſedly too far entred) and there with a great Slaughter overthrown. In which conflict, all the chief Commanders of the Army were taken, except the Prince of Armenia, who forecaſting the danger, had retired, after he had in vain diſſwaded the reſt from the further purſuit of the flying Enemy. The Prince of Antioch there taken, was about a year after for a great ſum of Mony redeemed; but the Count of Tripolis was after eight years ſtraight Captivity hardly delivered. Noradin after this Victory returning again to the Siege of Arethuſa, in few days won the Town; and encouraged with ſuch good ſucceſs, and the abſence of the King, laid Siege to the City of Paneade, which was alſo delivered unto him, upon condition that the Citizens might at their pleaſure in ſafety depart.

Noradin the Turk diſcomfited by the Chriſtians.

At the ſame time Saracon General of Noradin his Forces, took from the Chriſtians two Caſtles, the one in the Country of Sidon, the other beyond Jordan upon the Borders of Arabia, both in the Cuſtody of the Templars; twelve of whom the King at his return hanged up for Treaſon.

Shortly after Saracon, King Noradin his great Man of War, with all the power of the Turks, came down again into Egypt, with purpoſe to have fully ſubdued all that notable Kingdom unto his Lord and Maſter. Of whoſe power, Sanar the Sultan ſtanding in dread, prayed aid of Almericus, promiſing unto him beſide his yearly Tribute, the ſum of forty thouſand Ducats for his pains. The matter fully agreed upon, and all things now in readineſs, Almericus ſet forward with his Army, and encountring with Saracon and his Turks at the River Nilus, overthrew him in a great Battel, yet not without ſome loſs, for the Turks in their Flight lighting upon the Kings Carriages with the whole Baggage of the Army, and overrunning them that had the charge thereof, carried away with them a moſt rich Prey, whereby it came to paſs that as the Chriſtians had the Victory, ſo the Turks injoyed the Spoil.

Saracon after this overthrow having again gathered together his diſperſed Souldiers, took his way to Alexandria, where he was by the Citizens received; after whom the King following, gave no attempt unto the City, for that he knew to be but vain, but incamped cloſe by the ſide of the River Nilus, from whence the City was chiefly to be victualled. Army for want of Victuals, if he ſhould there long ſtay; leaving there his Son Saladin (or as ſome call him his Nephew) with a thouſand Horſemen for the keeping of the City, ſecretly by night departed thence himſelf with the reſt of his Army; and paſſing through the Deſarts, did great harm in the upper parts of Egypt. Of whoſe departure Almericus underſtanding, was about to have followed him, but that he was otherwiſe perſuaded by the Egyptian Captains to continue his former purpoſe for the gaining of the City; wherefore now after the departure of Saracon he began to approach the Walls, and with divers Engines of War to diſturb the Defendants; wherewith the Citizens (better acquainted with the Trade of Merchandize, than the Feats of War) diſcouraged, began now to conſult among themſelves for the turning out of thoſe troubleſome Gueſts whom they had ſo lately received; which Saladin perceiving, certified Saracon his Uncle thereof, requeſting his ſpeedy relief in that his ſo dangerous Eſtate, and with much intreaty perſuaded the Citizens for a while to hold it out, until he might from him receive an anſwer; of all which the Chriſtians and Egyptians without, having intelligence, laid ſo much the harder unto the City. Gladly would Saracon have done what he was by his Nephew requeſted; but perceiving it to be a matter of no leſs danger than difficulty, he by the means of Hugh, Count of Ceſarea, and one Arnolphus another noble Chriſtian, both then Priſoners with him, concluded a peace with the King; whereupon the City was forthwith yielded up, and Saladin with his Turks ſuffered in ſafety to depart. At which time alſo all Priſoners were on both ſides freely and without ranſome ſet at liberty. Thus Saracon for this time diſappointed of this his purpoſe for the Conqueſt of Egypt, returned back again to Damaſco; and Almericus with great glory to Aſcalon, where he arrived with his Army the one and twentieth day of September in the year 1167. 1167.

Peluſium taken by Almericus.

In this late expedition, King Almericus on the one ſide enflamed with the Wealth of Egypt, and on the other encouraged with the Weakneſs of that effeminate People, reſting for the moſt part upon forraign Strength; had purpoſed himſelf to invade the Kingdom, and ſo if poſſible he might, to joyn it to his own. For colour whereof, it was pretended that the Sultan contrary to his faith before given, had ſecretly ſought to joyn in League and Amity with Noradin the Turk, King of Damaſco. The chief ſtirrer up of the King unto this War, was one Gerbert Maſter of the Templars; who in reſpect of the aid by them of his order to be given, had obtained of the King, after the Victory gained, to have the City of Peluſium with all the rich Country about the ſame, given unto him and his Brethren the Knights of the Order for ever; upon which hope, he contrary to the mind of many of the Knights, for the furtherance of that War, gaged his whole Wealth and Credit, with all the Treaſure of his Houſe. So all things now in readyneſs for ſo great an Enterpriſe, Almericus with his Army ſet forward in October, and having in ten days paſſed the ſandy Deſert, came to Peluſium; which City he (after three days Siege) took by force, and put to the Sword all them that were therein, without reſpect of Age, Sex, or Condition; which City, he according to his promiſe before made, gave unto the Templars. After that, he began alſo to beſiege Caire, at which time his Fleet ſacked the City of Tapium. In the mean time, Sanar the Egyptian Sultan, conſidering the danger he was in, to ſatisfie Almericus his greedy deſire, offered to pay him twenty hundred thouſand Ducats to withdraw his Forces; and forthwith ſent him one hundred thouſand, for the ranſom of his Son and his Nephew taken Priſoners at Peluſium; and for the reſt to be paid within five days after, he gave two of his Nephews Hoſtages. Nevertheleſs the payment he deferred from day to day, of purpoſe in the mean time to raiſe the whole power of Egypt, alſo to receive aid from the Turks by Saracon, which he daily expected; of whoſe ſpeedy coming, Almericus underſtanding, left part of his Army at Peluſium, and with the reſt went to have met him; but miſſing him by the way, Saracon with his Turks came in ſafety to Caire unto the Sultan, as he had deſired. Wherefore Almericus diſmaid with the multitude of two ſo great Armies now joyned together, retired back again to Peluſium, and there taking with him the Garriſon before left, returned home to Hieruſalem; having in that expedition (begun with the breach of Faith) laid the foundation of the ruin of his Kingdom, as in few years after, it by proof appeared, by the evil Neighbourhood of the Turks, by that means brought down into Egypt.

The Sultan of Egypt under the colour of Friendſhip ſlain by Saracon.

Saracon the Turk after the departure of Almericus, eaſily perceiving a moſt fit time and opportunity to be offered for him now to obtain that, which he had in vain before both ſought and fought for, encamped with his Army near unto Caire, and notably counterfeited himſelf of all others the moſt devoted Friend of the Sultans; ſo that betwixt them two paſſed all the kind tokens of Love and Friendſhip, that could poſſibly be deviſed; the Sultan oftentimes feaſting the Turk, and in kindneſs likewiſe being feaſted of him; but at length going as his manner was, unto the Camp to viſit him, he was by the Turks ſlain. So Saracon having brought to paſs what he deſired, and entring the City with his Army, was by the great Caliph (from whom the Egyptian Sultans, as from their Superiors, the true Succeſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet, took their Authority) appointed Sultan, the firſt of the Turks that ever enjoyed the ſame; which Royal Dignity he had not poſſeſſed fully a year, but that he was taken away by death. In whoſe ſtead Saladin his Brothers Son, by and by ſtept up; who altogether a Martial Man, not regarding the reverend Majeſty of the Caliph (as had his Uncle Saracon, and all the Egyptian Sultans before him) with his Horſemans Mace ſtruck out his Brains; and not ſo contented, utterly rooted out all his Poſterity, the better to aſſure himſelf and his Succeſſors the Turks in the poſſeſſion of his new begotten Kingdom; and after that divided the great Treaſures of the Egyptians among his Turks, to encourage them the more to follow him in his Wars againſt the Chriſtians.

How the Kingdom of Egypt firſt fell into the hands of the Saraſins, with the notable alterations thereof.

This glorious Kingdom ſo much ſpoken of in Holy Scripture, and renowned of the Learned Hiſtoriographers of all Ages, after the Ruine of the Roman Empire, was ſometime part of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, and a notable Member of the Chriſtian Common Weal; until that about the year of our Lord 704, the Egyptians weary of the Pride and Covetouſneſs of the Grecians, revolted from them unto the Saraſins, whoſe Superſtition they alſo received; and ſo under the Government of the Saraſin Caliphs, the Succeſſors of the falſe Prophet Mahomet lived about 464 years, until that now being invaded by Almericus, they prayed aid of Noradin the Turk, Sultan of Damaſco; who to their relief ſending Saracon with an Army, repulſed indeed the Chriſtians, but oppreſſing their liberty, took to himſelf the Kingdom, which he left unto his Nephew Saladin, in whoſe Poſterity it remained until it was from them again taken by the Circaſſian Slaves the Mamalukes; under whoſe ſervile Government it was holden of long time, till that by the great Emperor of the Turks Selimus the firſt, it was again conquered and the Mamalukes utterly deſtroyed: In the Government of whoſe Proſperity, the mighty Emperors of the Turks, it hath ever ſince remained as part of their Empire, until this day; as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory God willing ſhall appear.

1170. Saladin thus poſſeſſed of the great Kingdom of Egypt, and all things ſet in ſuch order as he thought beſt for the Newneſs of his Eſtate, with a great Army entred into the Land of Paleſtine, in the year, 1170. and there beſieged Daron; which Town he won, and overthrew ſuch as were ſent by King Almericus to have relieved the ſame; with which ſmall Victory contenting himſelf, as with the good beginning of his riſing Fortune, he returned back again into his Kingdom; yet was his Army ſo great and populous, as that the like Army of the Turks had never before been ſeen in the Holy Land. Wherefore Almericus conſidering in what great danger he ſtood, his Kingdom now being on both ſides beſet by the Turks, ſent out his Embaſſadors unto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to crave their Aid for the defence of that Kingdom which their Fathers had won; and for the ſame purpoſe went himſelf in Perſon unto the Emperor of Conſtantinople, of whom he was Royally entertained, and afterward ſent back loaded with the promiſes of great matters, as were alſo his Embaſſadors from the Princes of the Weſt. All which for all that ſorted unto nothing, but vaniſhed into ſmoke.

1171. The year following, viz. 1171. Saladin beſieged Petrea, the Metropolitical City of Arabia; but hearing that Almericus with a great Power was coming to the Relief thereof, he raiſed his Siege, and retired; as he did alſo next year after, having in vain attempted the ſtrong Caſtle of Mont-Royal, on the further ſide of Jordan. In like manner alſo the third year he came again into the Holy Land, and ſpoiled the Country beyond Jordan; but hearing of the Kings coming againſt him, he forthwith returned again into Egypt. All theſe light Expeditions, this politique Prince made not ſo much for hope of Victory, or to prove his Enemies-ſtrength, as to train his Souldiers, eſpecially the effeminate Egyptians, and to make them fitter to ſerve him in his greater deſigns.

1173. Shortly after died Noradin Sultan of Damaſco, and in his time a moſt notable Champion of the Turks, after he had reigned nine and twenty years. Upon whoſe death, Almericus forthwith beſieged the City of Paneade, in hope to have again recovered the ſame; but he was by the Widow of the late dead Sultan, for a great ſum of money and the delivery of certain noble Priſoners, intreated to raiſe his Siege and depart. So having ſent away his Army, and traveling with his ordinary Retinue to Tyberias, where he had the Summer before been ſick of the Flux, feeling himſelf not well, he returned on Horſe-back by Nazareth and Neapolis to Jeruſalem, where his old Diſeaſe increaſing upon him, he was al[illegible] taken with a Fever; wherewith after he had been ſome few days grievouſly tormented, he requeſted his Phyſitians, with ſome gentle potion to looſe his Belly, which was now ſomewhat ſtayed; which they refuſing to do, he commanded the potion to be given him upon his own peril, hap thereon what hap ſhould; which being given him; and his Belly again looſed, he ſeemed therewith to have been at the firſt well eaſed; but his wonted Fever with great vehemency returning, before his weak and ſpent Body could be with convenient meats refreſhed, he ſuddenly died the tenth of July, in the year, 1173. when he had reigned about ten years. His dead Body was with the great lamentation of all his Subjects, ſolemnly buried by his Brothers. He was a moſt wiſe Prince, and withall right valiant, amongſt many moſt fit for the Government and Defence of that troubleſome Kingdom, ſo hardly beſet with the Infidels, if it had pleaſed God to have given him longer life.

Baldwin the Fourth of that Name, ſeventh King of Hieruſalem.

Four days after the death of Almericus, was Baldwin his Son, then a Youth about thirteen years old, by the general conſent of the Nobility choſen King, and by Almericus the Patriarch in the Temple with great Solemnity Crowned in the year, 1173. unto whom as not yet by reaſon of his tender age, fit himſelf to manage the weighty Affairs of the Kingdom, Raymond Count of Tripolis was by the whole conſent of the Nobility appointed Tutor to ſupply what was wanting in the young King.

Noradin Sultan of Damaſco (dead as is aforeſaid) left behind him Melechſala his Son, yet but a Youth, to ſucceed him in his Kingdom. Whoſe Government the Nobility diſdaining, ſent ſecretly for Saladin Sultan of Egypt, unto whom at his coming they betrayed the City of Damaſco, the Regal Seat of the Turks in Syria. Whereof Saladin poſſeſſed, and entring into Cæloſiria without Reſiſtance, took Heliopolis, Emiſſa, with the great City of Cæſarea; and in fine, all the whole Kingdom of Damaſco, the City of Arethuſa only excepted. But thus to ſuffer Melechſala the young Prince to be wronged, and the Kingdom of Damaſco to be joyned to the Kingdom of Egypt, was of the wiſer ſort thought not to ſtand with the ſafety of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, lying in the middle betwixt them both. Wherefore the Count of Tripolis, Governor of that Kingdom, made out certain Forces to have hindred his proceedings. At which time alſo, Cotobed Prince of Parthia, and Melechſala Uncle, ſent certain Troops of Parthian Horſe-men to have aided his diſtreſſed Nephew, who were by Saladin overthrown and almoſt all ſlain, near unto Aleppo where Melechſala lay. As for the Count of Tripolis and the other Chriſtian Princes, with whom Saladin in the newneſs of his Kingdom had no deſire to fall out; he appeaſed them with fair Intreaty and Rewards; unto the Count he ſent freely the Hoſtages, which yet lay for his Ranſome at Emiſſas; unto the other Princes he ſent rich Preſents; and therewith ſo contented them all, that they returned without any thing doing againſt him. After which time, three or four years paſſed in great quietneſs, to the great ſtrengthening of him in thoſe new gotten Kingdoms. At length upon the coming over of Philip Earl of Flanders, the Chriſtian Princes of Syria encouraged, conſulted of an Expedition to be made into Egypt, whereof Saladin having Intelligence, drew down into that Country the greateſt part of his ſtrength. But Philip diſliking of that Expedition, and the rather for that he ſaw no great chearfulneſs in the Count of Tripolis and the reſt thereunto; they with one conſent changed their Purpoſe for Egypt, and turning their Forces a quite contrary way, miſerably and without reſiſtance waſted the Country about Emiſſa and Cæſarea.

Saladin overthrown by King Baldwin.

Whilſt the Chriſtians were thus buſied in Cæloſiria, Saladin on the other ſide took occaſion out of Egypt to invade the Kingdom of Jeruſalem; of whoſe coming, King Baldwin having intelligence, with ſuch ſmall Forces as he had left, haſtned himſelf to Aſcalon. In the mean time Saladin with a great Army was entred into the Holy Land, where burning the Country before him, and raging in the blood of the poor Chriſtians, he came and encamped not far from Aſcalon; and ſtruck ſuch a fear upon the whole Country, that they which dwelt in Jeruſalem, were about to have forſaken the City; as for the King himſelf, he lay cloſe within the City of Aſcalon, not daring to adventure upon ſo ſtrong an Enemy. Wherewith Saladin encouraged, and out of fear of his Enemies, diſperſed his Army, ſome one way, ſome another, to forrage the Country. Which the King perceiving, ſecretly with all his Power iſſued out of the City, if happily ſo he might overtake the Sultan unawares; neither was he deceived in his expectation; for coming ſuddenly upon him, and ſecretly charging him, he had with him for a good ſpace an hard and doubtful battel, until that the Victory by the Power of God, at length inclining to the Chriſtians, Saladin with his Turks fled, overthrown with a great ſlaughter, moſt part of his great Army being either there ſlain, or loſt afterward with hunger and cold. This Victory fell unto the Chriſtians the 25*th* day of November, in the year, 1177. not without the Almighty Hand of God, the Turk having in his Army above ſix and twenty thouſand Horſe-men, and the King not paſt four hundred Horſe, with ſome few Foot-men. After which Victory, Baldwin in great Triumph returned to Jeruſalem, and there ſhortly after with great care and diligence repaired the decayed Walls of the City. Saladin in revenge of this Overthrow, made divers Incurſions into the Frontiers of the Chriſtians, and did great harm, ſpecially in the Country about Sidon. For the repreſſing whereof, the King put himſelf in Arms, and going againſt him, overthrew part of his Army, as they were carrying away a great Booty. Of which overthrow Saladin underſtanding, came in ſuch haſt with the reſt of his Army, as if it had been a ſudden Tempeſt, upon the Chriſtians, then in great ſecurity dividing the Spoil; of whom they ſlew a great number, and put the reſt to flight: In which ſo ſudden a Confuſion, Otto, grand Maſter of the Templars, and Hugh the Earl of Tripolis his Son in law, were both taken Priſoners. The Earl himſelf with a few fled to Tyre; the King alſo at the ſame time was glad to ſhift for Himſelf, and by flight to ſave himſelf as he might; after which Victory, Saladin beſieged a ſtrong Caſtle which the King but the year before had built upon the bank of the River Jordan, and given it to the Templars, with the Country round about; which Caſtle Saladin took by force, and put to Sword all that were therein, except ſome few whom he carried away Priſoners. By this Victory Saladin became dreadful unto the Chriſtians in Syria, which cauſed them, eſpecially ſuch as had any charge, with more vigilancy to look about them. Yet ſhortly after, a Peace was for a time concluded betwixt the Sultan and the King; whereby their troubled Eſtates breathed themſelves almoſt the ſpace of two years.

The Chriſtians dividing the Spoil overthrown by the Turks.

But this ſo welcome a Calm was by domeſtical troubles again by the Kings Friends ſuddenly troubled; for the Count of Tripolis, to whom the Government of the Kingdom was committed, coming towards Jeruſalem, being by the ſuggeſtion of his Enemies brought into ſuſpition with the King, as if he had affected the Kingdom, was to his great diſgrace by the way commanded to ſtay. The chief Authors of which diſcontentment, were the Kings Mother, a Woman of a turbulent nature, and her Brother the Kings Steward; who in the abſence of the Earl, had wrought the Kings ſick mind according to their own appetites. But the reſt of the Nobility, wiſely foreſeeing unto what great danger that diſcord might tend; in deſpight of them, with much labour, cauſed him to be ſent for again, and ſo reconciled unto the King; by which means, that dangerous fire of diſſention was for that time appeaſed, which afterwards brake out again, to the utter ruine of that Kingdom.

Saladin goeth out of Ægypt to Damaſco.

Saladin now weary of the League he had before made with King Baldwin, as no longer ſtanding with his haughty Deſigns, renounced the ſame, and raiſing a great Power in Ægypt, ſet forward toward Damaſco. Of whoſe coming, King Baldwin having knowledge, with the whole Power of his Kingdom went to have met him, not far from the dead Sea, and there encamped at an old Town called Petra. But Saladin turning out of the way, into the Kings Territory, came and encamped before Mount-Royal, a Caſtle which Baldwin had given unto the Templars, about three days march from the place where the King lay.

Galilee ſpoiled, and the Caſtle of Burie taken by the Turks.

There Saladin with the Spoil of the Country, refreſhing his Army, now weary of long travel, ſet forward again, and ſo without reſiſtance arrived with his Army at Damaſco. At the ſame time, the Turks, Captains about Damaſco, Boſtrum, and Emiſſa, perceiving the Frontiers of the Chriſtians thereabout to be kept with ſmall ſtrength, paſſed over Jordan, and ſpoiling a great part of Galilee, beſieged the Caſtle of Burie, at the foot of Mount Tabor, not far from the City of Naim; which Caſtle they in few days took, and having there made a great ſlaughter, carried away with them about five hundred Priſoners. Saladin being come to Damaſco, called together all the Garriſons of that Kingdom, and joyning them unto the Forces he brought out of Ægypt, entred into the Holy Land; at which time the Count of Tripolis, Governor of the Kingdom, lay ſick of a burning Fever. Nevertheleſs the King encouraged by the Knights of the Order, went out with his Army againſt him; and encountring with him near unto a Village called Frebolet, overthrew him in a great battel; wherein, afterward in the flight, moſt part of the Sultans Army periſhed; Saladin himſelf being glad by ſpeedy flight to eſcape the danger, and ſo by long marches to get him again to Damaſco.

Beritus in vain beſieged by the Turks.

In revenge of this overthrow, Saladin having repaired his Army, and ſent for his Fleet out of Egypt, came and beſieged Beritus both by Sea and Land; at which time alſo his Brother, whom he had left Governor in Egypt, beſieged Darum, a ſtrong Town in the uttermoſt bounds of the Kingdom, of Jeruſalem towards Egypt; both whoſe Forces Baldwin being not able at once to repreſs, by the Council of his Nobility, thought it beſt firſt to relieve Beritus, as the place of greateſt Importance. And for that purpoſe ſet forward with his Army by Land, having alſo rigged up three and thirty Gallies at Tyre, for the Relief thereof by Sea. Of which preparation Saladin underſtanding, as alſo of the Kings coming (by Letters intercepted by his Scouts, directed to the beſieged, for the holding out of the ſiege, with promiſe of ſpeedy Relief) he preſently roſe with his Army, and departed; whereof the King being advertiſed, retired to Sephor.

Saladin invading Meſoporamia, is himſelf invaded by the King of Jeruſalem.

Not long after, Saladin according to his ambitious nature; deſirous above meaſure to extend the bounds of his Kingdom, and ſeeing the ſucceſs of his Attempts againſt the King of Jeruſalem not anſwerable to his deſire, converted his Forces unto the Countries more Eaſtward; and paſſing the River Euphrates, and entring into Meſopotamia, partly by force, partly by corruption, got into his hands the Cities of Edeſſa, Carras, and divers others. In which time the King of Jeruſalem took occaſion firſt to ſpoil the Country about Damaſco, and after that divers other places of the Sultans Kingdom, making havock of whatſoever came in his way, and ſo laden with the ſpoil of the Turks, retired to Jeruſalem.

Aleppo betrayed unto the Turks.

Saladin with Victory returning out of Meſopotamia, in revenge of the injuries done unto him in his abſence, marched directly to Aleppo, the ſtrongeſt City of the Chriſtians in that part of Syria, which above all other he longed after; where he had not long lien, but that it was by the treaſon of the Governor delivered into his hands, with all the Country thereabouts; wherewith the Chriſtian Princes were ſo diſcouraged, that they even then began to fear greater matters to enſue. The Prince of Antioch ſold Tarſus the Metropolitical City of Cilicia, to Rupinus Prince of Armenia; for that he ſaw it was not without great charge and danger to be by him defended, being ſo far from him, and Saladin as it were now ſtept in betwixt him and it.

At the ſame time, King Baldwin at Nazareth fell ſick of a Fever, the Leproſie alſo his old Diſeaſe growing daily more and more upon him; inſomuch as deſpairing of his life, he called unto him Guy Luſignan Count of Joppa and Aſcalon, unto whom he had before eſpouſed Sybil his eldeſt Siſter, and in the preſence of his Mother, the Patriarch, and all the chief Commanders of the Souldiers of the Sacred War, appointed him Governor of the Kingdom, reſerving unto himſelf only the Title of a King, with the City of Jeruſalem, and a yearly Penſion of ten thouſand Ducats; all which was done, to the great diſgrace and diſcontentment of the Count of Tripolis the old Governor.

It was not long, but that Saladin having breathed himſelf a little, after ſo great Labours came again into the Holy Land, where he took many Caſtles, and did infinite harm; inſomuch that the Country people were glad for fear to forſake their Houſes, and to fly into Cities. The Chriſtian Army in the mean time lying faſt by at Sephor, not once moving, although many a fair occaſion were offered; for the chief Commanders affectionated unto the Count of Tripolis, and envying the Preferment of Guy the new Governor, were unwilling to fight, but finding one excuſe or other, ſuffered the Enemy at his pleaſure to ſpoil the Country, and ſo in ſafety to depart, which he had never before done in thoſe Quarters.

Petra in vain beſieged by the Turks.

Within leſs than a month after, Saladin with a great Army well appointed with all the Habiliments of War needful for the beſieging of a City or ſtrong Caſtle, came again into the Land of Paleſtine, and paſſing through the Country beyond Jordan, ſate down at laſt before Petra, in hope by the taking thereof to have made his paſſage between Egypt and Damaſco more ſafe. Of which his purpoſe King Baldwin having knowledge, and taught by the evil ſucceſs of late, to what ſmall purpoſe it was to commit the managing of his Wars unto a General ſo evil beloved, and leſs regarded, as way Guy his Brother in law; ſent againſt him with his Army, Raymund the Count of Tripolis, the old Governor, whom he had again reſtored unto the Government, and diſplaced Guy. Of whoſe coming Saladin hearing, raiſed his Siege after he had lien there a month, and ſo departed.

A little before this Expedition, the King ſtill growing ſicker and ſicker, his foul Diſeaſe ſtill increaſing, by the common conſent of the Nobility, appointed Baldwin his Nephew by his Siſter Sybilla, a Child but of five years old, to ſucceed him in the Kingdom; and the Count of Tripolis to have the Government of the State during the time of his Minority. This Sybilla the Kings Siſter was firſt married to William the younger, Marquiſs of Mont-Ferrat, who dying within three months after, left her with child with this his Poſthumus Son Baldwin, now by his Uncle deputed unto the hope of the Kingdom. After whoſe death ſhe was married to Guy Luſignan Count of Joppa and Aſcalon, the late Governor; who taking in evil part this the Kings deſignment, eſpecially for the Government of the Kingdom by the Count of Tripolis, departed from the Court as a man diſcontented, unto his City of Aſcalon; whereof the Patriarch and the Princes of the Sacred War, fearing (and that not without cauſe) great danger to enſue, came to the King, then holding a Parliament in the City of Acon, moſt humbly requeſting him for avoiding of further danger, and the ſafety of his Kingdom, to receive again into his Favour the Count Guy his Brother in law, and to make an atonement betwixt him and the Count of Tripolis. But this their requeſt ſorted to no purpoſe, ſo that the Parliament was diſſolved without any thing for the good of the Common-weal in that point concluded.

Diſſention in the Court of Jeruſalem.

After that time the Kindgom of Jeruſalem began ſtill more and more to decline. In the old King Baldwin (ſick both in body and mind) was almoſt no hope; in the young King (yet unfit for ſo great a burthen) much leſs; and the diſſention betwixt the two Counts Guy and Raymund with their Favorites, was like enough to bring great harm unto the State. Beſides that, the Count of Tripolis fearing the Power of Guy his Enemy, was thought to have ſecret Intelligence with Saladin the Turk, inſomuch as the King was almoſt in purpoſe to have proclaimed him Traytor. Wherefore the King now reſted only upon the Counſel of William Archbiſhop of Tyre, and the Maſters of the Knights of the Sacred War; by whoſe advice he ſent Heraclius Patriarch of Jeruſalem, Roger Molins Maſter of the Knights of St. Johns, and Arnold Maſter of the Templars, Embaſſadors unto Lucius the Third, then Pope, unto Frederick the Emperor, Philip the French King, and Henry the Second, King of England, to declare unto them the dangerous State of that Chriſtian Kingdom, and to crave their Aid againſt the Infidels. Theſe Embaſſadors coming to the Council then holden at Verona, with great gravity and diligence, in the preſence of the Pope and of the Emperor, declared the hard eſtate of the Chriſtians of the Eaſt, with their humble Requeſt unto them for Aid; in ſuch ſort that they moved them, with all the Princes there preſent, to Compaſſion. From thence they were by the Pope directed unto Philip the French King, with whom having diſpatched their Affairs, they from him paſſed over into England, and afterward into Germany; and had at length brought their Negotiation to ſo good paſs, that in every place great preparation was made for a great Expedition to be made againſt the Turks, for the Relief of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt; with which good News the Embaſſadors returning to Jeruſalem, filled the ſick King with the hope of great matters. But greater Quarrels ſhortly after ariſing betwixt the Pope and the Emperor, and ſharp War likewiſe betwixt the French King and the King of England, and the other Chriſtian Princes alſo being at no better quiet, the notable Expedition that had with the expectation thereof ſo filled the King Baldwin ſendeth Embaſſadors unto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt for Aid.

World, was again laid aſide and quite daſhed. Whereof King Baldwin underſtanding, both by Meſſengers and Letters from his Friends, oppreſſed with grief and heavineſs more than with the force of his Diſeaſe, (a man for his proweſs and painfulneſs not inferiour to any his Predeceſſors) died without Iſſue the 16*th* day of May, Anno 1185. being but five and twenty years old, whereof he had reigned twelve. His Body was afterward with the general mourning of his Subjects, ſolemnly buried in the Temple near unto the Mount Calvary, together with his Predeceſſors the Kings of Jeruſalem.

Guy the Ninth, and laſt King of Jeruſalem.

King Baldwin thus buried, Baldwin the Fifth of that name, yet but a Boy, was Crowned King. But then began the Sparks, which had of long lien raked up and hidden in the aſhes, to break out into a great fire; for Raymund Count of Tripolis contended the whole Government of the Kingdom, and tuition of the King to be due unto him, by the appointment of the late King, and conſent of the Nobility; and did ſo much, that he had almoſt obtained it to have been confirmed unto him in open Parliament. But Sybilla a woman of a moſt haughty ſpirit (Siſter unto the late King, and Mother unto the young King yet living) prickt forward her Husband Guy, in no caſe to give place unto his Competitor Raymund; and ſo animated him, that by the help of his own Favorites, and the countenance of Boniface Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, (who even then was come with a great Power into Syria) he extorted from the Nobility whatſoever he deſired. But ſeven months were ſcarce well paſſed, but that this young King Baldwin was dead and buried; poyſoned (as was reported) by his Mother, for the deſire ſhe had of the Kingdom her ſelf; whoſe death ſhe with all ſecrecy concealed, until ſhe had obtained of the Patriarch and other Princes of the Kingdom, that Guy her Husband might be proclaimed King. So by her means it was ſo wrought, that upon one and the ſelf ſame day the young King Baldwin was buried by his Uncle, and Guy the Count Crowned. This young King Baldwin, by reaſon of his tender years and ſhort Reign, is of ſome not reckoned amongſt the Kings of Jeruſalem; howbeit, ſeeing he was by his Uncle and the Princes of that time thought worthy of the Kingdom, let him alſo have his place amongſt the reſt as the Eighth King of Jeruſalem.

Saladin upon the diſcord of the Chriſtians taketh occaſion to invade the Holy Land.

When Guy was thus poſſeſſed of the Kingdom, the Count of Tripolis ſeeing himſelf out of all hope of the Government, and highly therewith diſcontented, did what he might by all means to croſs the doings of the King; whoſe ſick and aſpiring mind Saladin prickt daily more and more forward, promiſing him his helping hand whenſoever he ſhould need; which courteſie the Count deſirouſly embraced. For now the fatal period of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem grew faſt on, and all things tended to deſtruction, diſcord reigning in every place; which Saladin well perceiving (after that he had compacted with the Count) by Meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, invited the Turks, Saraſins, and Ægyptians, as men agreeing in one and the ſame Religion, generally to take up Arms in ſo fit an opportunity of the diſcord of the Chriſtians, aſſuring them of great prey and ſpoil, beſides the Honour of the Conqueſt. The City of Ptolemais was the place by him appointed, where all this Power ſhould meet; whether ſuch a multitude of the barbarous Mahometans (partly for the hatred of the Chriſtian Religion, partly for the hope of the rich ſpoil which Saladin had promiſed them) came flocking out of all places, that in ſhort time there was met together about fifty thouſand Horſemen, beſides an infinite number of Foot; and unto ſuch as could not ſafely paſs by the borders of Jeruſalem, to them the falſe Count gave ſafe conduct, by the Countries of Tiberias, Nazareth, and Galilee.

All the Power of the Infidels thus aſſembled, Saladin laid ſiege unto the City of Ptolemais; which the Templars and the Knights Hoſpitallers had notably fortified, and ſtrongly manned (as before unto them given by the Kings of Jeruſalem, to defend againſt the Infidel) and therein now were both the Maſters of both thoſe honourable Orders, with the whole flower of the Knights of their Profeſſion. Unto this City Saladin gave a moſt terrible Aſſault upon May-day in the morning, in the year, 1187. which was by the Chriſtians notably defended, and the Enemy with great ſlaughter ſtill beaten down. In the heat of this Aſſault, the two great Maſters ſallied with certain Troops of their moſt ready Horſemen, aſſailed the Enemies Camp, and bearing down all before them, raiſed there a great tumult; and by and by turning upon the backs of them that were aſſaulting the City, made there an exceeding great ſlaughter. Inſomuch that Saladin diſmaid, firſt with the confuſion in his Camp, and now with the ſudden danger behind him, was glad to give over the Aſſault, and to turn his whole Forces upon them, where was fought a moſt bloody and terrible battel. Amongſt others that there fought, the Count of Tripolis, now an Enemy unto God and his Country, diſguiſed in the habit of a Turk notably helped the Infidels, and meeting with the great Maſter of the Knights Hoſpitalers, unhorſed him; who ſurcharged with the weight of his Armor, and oppreſſed with the multitude of his Enemies, there died. Nevertheleſs, ſuch was the valour of theſe worthy men, and new Succour ſtill coming out of the City, that Saladin having in that battel, and at the Aſſault loſt fifteen thouſand of his Turks, was glad with the reſt to betake himſelf to flight. Neither was this ſo notable a Victory gained by the Chriſtians without blood, moſt part of the worthy Knights Hoſpitalers being together with their grand Maſter there ſlain.

Saladin by this Overthrow perceiving, that by open Force he ſhould not be able to do much againſt the Chriſtians, thought it good unto his Forces to joyn alſo Policy. Wherein the falſe Count of Tripolis was the man he thought beſt to make choice of, as his fitteſt Inſtrument to work by. Him he compacted withall, to ſeek for grace at the King of Jeruſalems hands, as of his dread Soveraign, and after ſo long diſcord, to ſue to be reconciled unto him, as now weary of the Turks Amity, with whom he ſhould make ſhew to be utterly fallen out. At which time alſo, to give the matter the better grace, Saladin of purpoſe with a great Army came and beſieged Tiberias, a City of the Counts Juriſdiction; for the relief whereof, the traiterous Count craved Aid of the King and the other Princes of the Sacred War. Who with an Army, though not great, yet very well appointed, came according to his deſire, and encamped near unto the Fountain of Sophor; where they had not long ſtayed, but that they met with the huge Army of the Turks, being in number one hundred and twenty thouſand horſe, and one hundred and ſixty thouſand Foot; with whom they joyned a moſt ſharp and terrible battel, which by reaſon of the extremity of the heat of the weather (it then being the twelfth of July) and the approach of the night, was again given over, both Armies (as if it had been by conſent) retiring. The next day the battel was again begun, wherein the Turks, by the treaſon and ſhameful flight of the falſe Count of Tripolis, gained the Victory. In this Battel Guy the King himſelf, with Gerard Maſter of the Templars, Boniface Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, and divers others, Men of great mark; were taken Priſoners. And to ſay the truth, in this Battel was broken the whole Strength of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt.

Jeruſalem taken by Saladin.

The Chriſtian Commonweal by the Treaſon of the falſe Count thus betrayed unto the Infidels, Saladin without any great reſiſtance had the Cities of Ptolemais, Biblis, and Berithus delivered unto him; in all which places he uſed his Victory with great moderation, not enforcing any Chriſtian (more than the Latines) to depart thence, but ſuffering them there ſtill to remain as before, yielding unto him their obedience, with ſuch Tribute as he had impoſed upon them. With like good fortune he within the ſpace of one Month took all the Port-towns betwixt Sidon and Aſcalon alongſt the Sea-coaſt, excepting only the ancient City of Tyre; unto the City of Aſcalon alſo he laid Siege by the ſpace of nine days; but loath to ſtay the courſe of his Victory, by the Valour of the Defendants reſolved there to ſpend their lives, he departed thence, and marched directly unto Jeruſalem the chief City of that Kingdom; and approaching the ſame, gave ſummons thereunto, perſwading the Citizens yet whiles they had time, to yield themſelves, together with the City, unto his mercy. Which they refuſing to do, he incloſed the ſame with his Army, and by the ſpace of fourteen days laid hard Siege unto it, leaving nothing undone or attempted, that might help for the gaining thereof. At which time the Citzens conſidering the danger they were in, and that the Strength of the Kingdom, with the Flower of their Chivalry, were in the late Battel loſt, and that they were not now to expect any forreign aid, agreed upon certain conditions to yield up the City; which were, That ſuch Chriſtians as would, might remain ſtill with their Liberty and Goods; and that ſuch as would not, might in ſafety depart with ſo much of their Goods as they could carry upon their Backs. Theſe Conditions being by Saladin granted, the Holy City was unto him delivered the ſecond of October, in the year 1187. after that it had been by the Chriſtians holden from the time that it was by Godfrey of Bulloin and other Chriſtians won, about 89 years. Saladin entring into the City, prophaned firſt the Temple of the Lord, converting it unto the uſe of his Mahometan Superſtition; the other Churches he uſed as Stables for his Horſes, only the Temple of the Sepulchre was by the Chriſtians for a great ſum of Mony redeemed, and ſo kept undefiled. The Latine Chriſtians he thruſt out of the City, yet with leave to carry with them ſuch things as they were able themſelves to bear; who travelling with heavy Burthens, but much more heavy Hearts, ſome to Tripolis, ſome to Tyre, ſome to Antioch, (for only theſe three Cities were now left unto the Chriſtians in Syria) were by the falſe Count of Tripolis by the way lightened of their Burthens, to the increaſing of the heavyneſs of their Hearts, moſt of them being by him and his Followers ſpoyled of that little they had by the mercy of their Enemies ſaved in the ruin of their State.

The death of Raymund the traiterous Count of Tripolis.

Unto the other Chriſtians that were natural Syrians, Greeks, Armenians, Georgians, and ſuch like, Saladin appointed certain places of the City for them to dwell in, where ſome of their Poſterity were long time after to be found. All the Monuments of the Chriſtians were by the barbarous Mahometans and Turks defaced, only the Sepulchre of our bleſſed Saviour Chriſt, with the Monument of Godfrey of Bulloin, and his Brother Baldwin, for the reverence of the men, were by them ſpared. In theſe ſo great troubles above twenty Thouſand of the Chriſtians periſhed; amongſt the reſt, the Count of Tripolis was ſhortly after found dead in his bed, and (as ſome ſay) circumciſed; a manifeſt token of his Revolt, not from the King only, but from the Chriſtian Faith alſo.

Jeruſalem thus won, Saladin returned again to the Siege of Aſcalon, which after he had by the ſpace of ten days moſt ſtraightly beſieged, was unto him by compoſition delivered; wherein amongſt other things agreed upon for the ſafe departure of the Citizens, was compriſed alſo, that he ſhould freely ſet at liberty Guy the King, and Gerard Maſter of the Templars, both before taken Priſoners, as is before declared; which he afterward performed.

Thus the victorious Turk ſtill urging his good fortune, departing thence attempted to have taken Tripolis; but having made ſome proof of his own Forces, and the Valor of the Defendants, he was glad to give over the Siege, and to depart as he came. Marching thence with his Army, becauſe he would leave no place unattempted, he laid Siege unto the City of Tyre, where Conrade Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat was a little before arrived with Iſaac Angelus the Greek Emperors Fleet, and a ſupply of certain Companies of good Souldiers. Unto which place were come great numbers of the poor diſtreſſed Chriſtians, fled from Jeruſalem and other places, ſo that the City was full of Men.

This City Saladin moſt furiouſly aſſaulted, but was by the Chriſtians notably repulſed, not without the great loſs of his beſt Souldiers. At which time alſo the Admiral of Sicilia diſcomfited his Fleet at Sea, and landing his Forces, came unlookt for upon the back of him; ſo that having his Hands full before by them of the Town, and charged behind by theſe new come Enemies, he was glad to retire in ſuch haſt, as that he left his Tents, with all that therein was, unto the Spoyl of the Chriſtians.

The famous City of Antioch betrayed unto the Turks.

Within a few days after, Saladin having again repaired his Army, invaded the Country about Antioch; with Fire and Sword deſtroying whatſoever was ſubject to his Fury, even to the gates of the City; but knowing that ſo ſtrong a City was not without great charge and long Siege to be won, he thought it good to make proof if it might by policy or corruption be gained. Wherein he ſo cunningly dealt with the Patriarch that he had by his means the Caſtle (otherwiſe almoſt impregnable) for Gold betrayed unto him. By means whereof he in ſhort time became Lord and Maſter of that famous City (about nineteen years before hardly gained by the whole power of the Chriſtians, after eleven months Siege) and with it five and twenty Cities more, that depended on the fortune thereof, with all the Provinces belonging thereunto, always deemed to have been the third part of the Kindom of Jeruſalem.

The loſs of ſo great a City, together with the Ruin of the whole Kingdom, had in a ſhort ſpace filled every corner of Chriſtendom with the heavy Report thereof. Wherewith the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt (namely Frederick the German Emperor, with Frederick his Son Duke of Suevia, Philip the French King, Henry the Second, King of England, Otto Duke of Burgundy, Leopold Duke of Auſtria, with many other great Princes and Prelates of Germany, Italy, and other places) not a little moved, as alſo with the pitiful complaints of the Embaſſadors at the ſame time ſent from the diſtreſſed Chriſtians, and the effectual perſwaſions of Clement the Third, then Pope; promiſed, and all, or moſt part indeed, made great preparations; which they afterwards, though not all at once (as letted by other occaſions) but at divers times imployed, for the moſt part with the danger of their own Perſons, againſt the Turks, for the relief of the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians, and recovery of the Holy Land; but with what ſucceſs ſhall hereafter (God willing) be declared.

Of which ſo great preparations made againſt him, Saladin not ignorant, ſet at liberty Guy the King of Jeruſalem, who contrary to his promiſe made at Aſcalon, he had now detained a year in Priſon; yet before his inlargement exacting of him an Oath, Never by force of Arms afterwards to ſeek to recover his Kingdom, or to revenge the wrongs he had ſuſtained; hoping thereby to ſtay the coming of the other Princes in his quarrel. Which Oath for all that, the Pope diſpenſed withall, as extorted by conſtraint from him, at ſuch time as Saladin had longer detained him in Priſon, than of right he ſhould.

Guy now at liberty, and yet in mind a King, came to Tyre, but could not be there received, the Citizens having before ſworn their Obedience unto Conrade Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, by whom they had been notably defended againſt the Fury of Saladin. Wherefore departing thence with ſuch power as he had, and the diſperſed Chriſtians dayly repairing unto him out of all parts of Syria, he came and beſieged Ptolemais; where he had not long lien, but firſt came unto him the Venetian Fleet, with them alſo of Piſa, and after them the Flemings with a Fleet of fifty Sail, who all joyned their Forces together for the winning of the City. But whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the Siege of Ptolemais, came Saladin with a great Army to the relief of the beſieged; where betwixt him and the Chriſtians was fought a great Battel, wherein the Chriſtians at the firſt had the better; but afterward fainting, and ready to flie, had there undoubtedly received a notable overthrow, had not Geffrey Lyſignan the Kings Brother (left for the guarding of the Camp) in good time come in with new Supplies; and not only ſtaied their Flight, but alſo repreſſed the further purſuit of the fierce Enemy, now allmoſt in poſſeſſion of the deſired Victory. Nevertheleſs there were 2000 Chriſtians there ſlain, and among them Gerard Maſter of the Templars. Saladin by that which was now done, perceiving how hard a matter it would be for him by Land to relieve his City, ſent for the Fleet which he had ſtrongly rigged up at Alexandria, and ſo by force put new ſupplies both of Men and Victuals into the beſieged City. Wherewith the Turks encouraged, made often ſallies upon the Chriſtians; and in deſpight of the Chriſtian Religion, whipped the Image of Chriſt crucified, which they had for that purpoſe in the ſight of the Chriſtians ſet up on the top of the Wall. With the ſame Fleet alſo he ſo ſcoured the Seas, that no Victuals or new Supplies of Men could that way without great danger be brought unto the Camp; whereby ſuch Scarcity and Want of all things began ſhortly after to ariſe among the Chriſtians, that ſome of them not able longer to indure the Famine, fled unto the Turks Camp, then lying not far off, crying out for Bread. Of which diſtreſs in the Camp of the Chriſtians, Saladin knowing right well, both by ſuch Fugitives as dayly came over unto him, and by his own Eſpials, yet made ſhew as if he underſtood nothing thereof; but ſuddenly riſing with his Army (as doubtful of his own Strength) departed, leaving his Camp full of all manner of Victuals. Whereof the Chriſtians underſtanding, and ſuppoſing him to have for fear been gone indeed, in great numbers haſted unto the forſaken Camp, as unto a moſt deſired Prey: where whilſt they were gorging themſelves, Saladin ſuddenly returning, and getting betwixt them and home, made of them a great Slaughter. Nevertheleſs the Chriſtians having now lien before the City ſix months, continued the Siege all the Winter, overcoming with patience the hardeſt difficulties, in hope of aid from the other Chriſtian Princes; whoſe coming they expected with the firſt of the next Spring: during which time many an hot skirmiſh paſſed betwixt them and the Turks both by Sea and Land.

1160. Frederick the Emperor ſetteth forward towards the Holy Land.

Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the Siege of Ptolemais, Frederick the Emperor, with divers of the great German Princes and others, before reſolved upon an expedition for the recovery of the Holy Land, and the relief of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria; having now raiſed a great Army, furniſhed with all things neceſſary for ſo long a journey, ſet forward from Ratisbon, and ſo coming to Vienna, and paſſing through Hungaria, Bulgaria, and Thracia, arrived at length at Conſtantinople; where he was by Iſaac Angelus the Emperor that then reigned, honourably entertained; but indeed more for Fear and Faſhion ſake, than for any Love or good Will; for that he after the ſuſpicious manner of the Greeks, having in diſtruſt ſo great a power of the Latine Emperors, wiſhed rather for his abſence than his preſence. And therefore ceaſed not in what he might, to haſten his paſſage over into Aſia, pretending for colour thereof, the neceſſity the Chriſtians had of his preſent aid. So the Emperor with his Army paſſing over the Straight, and without reſiſtance marching through the greateſt part of the leſſer Aſia, entred into Lycaonia, where meeting with a great power of the Turks, that were come from the Sultan of Iconium to ſtay his further paſſage, he overthrew them in a great Battel, and ſo marching directly on to Iconium, took it by force, and gave the Spoil thereof unto his Souldiers, in revenge of the injuries before done unto his Uncle the Emperor Conrade, by the Sultan of that City. Departing thence, and marching through Cilicia, he in another Battel overthrew the Turks, that having taken the Straights of the Mountains, had thought to have ſtaied his further paſſage into Syria. After that he took the City Philomela, which the Sultan had ſtrongly fortified, which he raſed to the ground, and put to the Sword all the People therein, for that they contrary to the Law of Nations, had ſlain ſuch Meſſengers as he had ſent unto them for the ſummoning of the City. In like manner he entred into the leſſer Armenia, where he took the City Melitene, and ſubdued all the Country thereabouts; unto the relief whereof the Turks coming with a moſt huge Army, were by him with an exceeding great Slaughter overthrown and put to Flight. After that, entring into Comagena, and meeting with Saphadin, Saladin his Son, with a great Army of the Turks, he overthrew him in the plain Field, and diſcomfited his whole Army; but whilſt he too eagerly purſueth the Enemy he had then in chaſe, his Horſe foundring under him as he paſſed the River Saleph, he was ſo overthrown, and his Foot hanging faſt in his Stirrup, drawn through the deep River, and almoſt drowned; and at the farther ſide of the River was ſo plunged by his Horſe, at his landing, that he was taken up for dead; yet breathing a little, and caſting his Eyes up to Heaven, with much ado he uttered theſe few words, Lord receive my Soul; and ſo in the Hands of them that took him up gave up the ghoſt, unto the great grief and hindrance of the Chriſtian Common-weal; for Saladin hearing of his approach, was ſo afraid of him, as that he began to doubt, not how to keep that he had before won in Syria, but how to defend himſelf in Egypt. Thus miſerably periſhed this worthy Emperor, the tenth of June, in the year of Grace, 1190. being then of the age of ſeventy years, whereof he had with much trouble reigned eight and thirty. His dead Body was carried along with the Army, and afterward with all funeral Pomp buried in the Cathedral Church at Tyre.

Frederick the Emperors Son choſen General of the Chriſtian Army.

Frederick the Emperor thus dead, Frederick his Son Duke of Suevia, was by the general conſent of the Princes in the Army choſen General in his ſtead; upon whom, with the reſt of the Army, yet mourning for the death of the Emperor, the Turks gave a ſudden and fierce Charge, in hope ſo to have overthrown them; but finding greater reſiſtance than they had before ſuppoſed, and having loſt ſome of their men, they with like ſpeed that they came, retired again. Now began Famine (one of the ordinary Attendants of great Armies) to increaſe in the Camp; for why, the Turks for that purpoſe had before deſtroyed or carried away all that was in the Country, leaving nothing for the Chriſtians more than the bare ground. Wherefore Frederick turning a little out of the way, came to Antioch, which was eaſily delivered unto him, and his hungry Souldiers well refreſhed by the Citizens, being as yet for the moſt part Chriſtians. But he had not there ſtayed paſt fifteen days for the refreſhing of his Army, but that the Plague (the Hand-Maid of Famine, and another Scourge of the greateſt multitudes) began to rage among his Souldiers, in ſuch ſort, that he was glad with his Army to forſake the City, and to get him abroad again into the open field; where forthwith News was brought unto him, that Dodequin General of ſuch Forces as Saladin had ſent for out of Egypt (which were not ſmall) was by great Journeys coming towards him; againſt whom he in good order ſet forward, with his Fathers Corſe ſtill carried in the midſt of his Army. Theſe two Armies meeting together, and both willing to fight, joyned a great and doubtful battel, fortune now inclining to the one ſide, and by and by to the other; the Chriſtians exceeding their Enemies in valour, and they them again in number. At length the Chriſtians in the Vantguard began to retire, and they that ſeconded them were alſo hardly charged; when Frederick mindful of his Fathers valour, with a Troop of valiant Horſemen brake into the Enemies battel with ſuch force, that the Turks were glad to give ground; after whom Leopold Duke of Auſtria coming preſently on with his Footmen, brought ſuch a fear upon the whole Army of the Turks, that they betook themſelves to ſpeedy flight. In this battel were four thouſand of the Enemies ſlain, with ſmall loſs of the Chriſtians; and about one thouſand more taken Priſoners, with fifteen of their Enſigns. After which Victory, Frederick marching further in Cœlo-Syria, pacified Laodicea then in mutiny, and like to have been delivered unto the Turks. He alſo with a little labour took Berythus, with divers other Cities of Syria, which before belonging unto the Kings of Jeruſalem, were now revolted unto the Turks. So afterward coming to Tyre, he there ſolemnly buried his Father, (dead, as is before ſaid;) and from thence certified Guy the King (ſtill lying with the other Chriſtian Princes at the Siege of Ptolemais) of his coming; who forthwith ſent the Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, with part of the Fleet, to tranſport him with his people that were left, by Sea; for that by Land he could not ſo ſafely have come, being now but weak, for meeting with Saladin; who with a great Army lay ſtill hovering about his beſieged City, intentive to all opportunity. So was Duke Frederick, with his Souldiers yet left, ſafely by Sea conducted from Tyre to the Camp at Ptolemais, and there joyfully received by the King and the other Princes, with the general Applauſe of the whole Camp.

A great battel betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

In the mean time the Turks ſallying out of the City of Ptolemais, had done great harm among the Chriſtians, by whom they were not without ſome loſs again repulſed. But after the coming of Duke of Frederick and his Germans, it was thought good by the general conſent of all the great Commanders in the Army, that the City ſhould be aſſaulted round; and to that purpoſe was every mans Regiment appointed what place to aſſail. The King himſelf with the Templars and the Italians from Piſa, undertook that part of the City which was toward the Sea; unto Duke Frederick and his Germans, was allotted all betwixt the Bridge over the River Bele, and the Biſhops Palace; the Venetians, Genoways, and Knights Hoſpitalers, were appointed unto the reſt of the Wall as far as the Court of Raymund; the Frieſlanders, Flemings, and Hollanders, took up all the reſt of the Wall unto the Sea-ſide. Thus was the City at once on every ſide aſſailed by the Chriſtians, with ſuch fury, as if they had thereon purpoſed to engage their whole Forces; ſeeking by a thouſand Wounds, and a thouſand kinds of death to have by their ſcaling-Ladders gained the top of the Walls; the Turks with no leſs courage ſtill beating them down again. But in the heat of this ſo dreadful and deſperate an Aſſault, Saladin ſtill hovering aloof, came now upon the ſudden and aſſailed the Camp of the Chriſtians, filling the ſame with fear and tumult; whoſe charge they that were left for the defence of the ſame, at the firſt notably received, but finding themſelves too weak, began to give ground; by which means the Turks took certain Tents with ſome Enſigns, and fired ſome other of the Pavillions of the Chriſtians, having ſlain ſomewhat more than an hundred of the Defendants.

Ptolemais aſſaulted by the Chriſtians.

The Chriſtians in the mean time little prevailing in the Aſſault, and troubled with the danger of their Camp, retired to the Relief thereof. But the Turk perceiving himſelf too weak for the whole Power of the Chriſtians, retired alſo; yet not with ſuch haſt, but that he had there almoſt loſt himſelf. This notable Aſſault was given the fourteenth of October; after which, many light skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, but more for booty, than for any other great purpoſe.

In the mean time, divers great Princes of the Weſt that had vowed themſelves unto this Sacred War, came thither, whoſe number rather increaſed the want of Victuals, than furthered the Service. At which time alſo the diſcord betwixt Guy the King (whoſe Wife and Children were now dead) and Conrade Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat (who had married Iſabel the late Queens Siſter, by whom he pretended a Claim unto the Title of the imaginary Kingdom) did much harm unto the proceedings of the Chriſtians; ſo pleaſing a thing theſe haughty ſtyles be unto the lofty minds of the ambitious. Shortly after the Chriſtians yet lying at the Siege, the Contagion and Famine ſtill increaſing, it fortuned that Duke Frederick fell ſick of the Plague, whereof he died; and with the great mourning of the whole Army, was afterward ſolemnly buried faſt by his Father in the Cathedral Church at Tyre; after whoſe death the Chriſtians attempted no great matter againſt the City, although they were oftentimes by the Turks provoked, but lay ſtill ſtrongly intrenched, expecting ſome greater Aid from the Princes of the Weſt.

Now all the hope of the Chriſtian Affairs in Syria, and in the Land of Paleſtine, reſted upon the coming of the two mighty Princes, Philip the Second of that name, King of France, and Richard the Firſt, King of England; who having agreed betwixt themſelves, with their combined Forces to relieve the diſtreſſed Chriſtians of the Eaſt; and again (if it were poſſible) to repair the broken State of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, were now met together at Marſeilles in Provence. From whence the French King firſt departing with his Fleet for Cicilia, and with a proſperous gale for certain days holding on his courſe, and now come nigh unto the Iſland, was by force of a furious tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing, ſo toſſed and tumbled in the deep, that many of his Ships there periſhed, eaten up of the Sea; others by force of Weather driven upon the Sands and Rocks, were there broken all to pieces; and the reſt, ſome with their Maſts broken, ſome with their Tacklings and Sails rent, and all in general ſore Weather-beaten, with much ado arrived at Meſſana, the deſired Port. At which place King Richard afterwards (but with better fortune) arrived with his Fleet alſo. Both the Kings now met together, reſolved there to winter; the French King enforced by neceſſity ſo to do, for the repairing of the late Loſſes he had received, as well in his People and Proviſion, as in his Shipping; all which was to be relieved by new Supplies out of France; and the King of England ſtaying to take Order for the Dowry of his Siſter Joan (Widow of William the late King of Cicilia) with Tancred the baſe Son of Roger, that had now aſpired unto the Kingdom of that Iſland. About which matter great Stirs aroſe betwixt King Richard the Queens Brother, and Tancred the new King, inſomuch that it was like to have broken out into open War, had it not, to the good contentment of King Richard been otherwiſe taken up, and ſo the Controverſie ended. But whilſt theſe two great Kings thus wintred in this fruitful Iſland, and oftentimes as good Friends met together, ſometime for their diſport, and ſometime to confer of their ſo weighty Affairs; the way (as was thought) to have appeaſed all former diſpleaſure, and to have increaſed love; it fell out clean contrary, jealouſie and diſtruſt, not only reviving the old, but alſo ſtill raiſing new Quarrels betwixt them, to the great hindrance of the common good by them intended; which may ſerve for a warning to all great Princes, willing to continue in Amity, and to hold a good Opinion one of another, never to ſee one the other; or coming ſo to an interview, not to converſe or ſtay long together; which as it is not often done without the danger of their perſons, ſo can it not poſſibly be long continued, but that it will engender in themſelves as well as in their Followers, Jealouſie, envy, hatred, and miſtruſt, as we have before ſaid and hereafter in the courſe of this Hiſtory may appear.

An old grudge betwixt Philip the French King, and Richard King of England.

There was an old Quarrel betwixt theſe two great Kings, Richard and Philip, about Adela the French Kings Siſter; whom Richard having before (his Father yet living) affianced, had now rejected, as her whom his aged Father Henry the Second had too familiarly uſed; and in ſtead of her, to the great diſgrace of the French, eſpouſed the Lady Berengaria, Daughter to the King of Navar; which Indignity with divers others, then ariſing betwixt the French and the Engliſh, as then with great heart-burning ſmouldred up in reſpect of the common Cauſe then in Hand, afterwards brake out again, to the ſhameful overthrow of this moſt honourable Expedition, and lamentable diſturbance of both Realms.

King Richard revengeth the injury done to his people by the Cipriots.

King Richard arriveth at Ptolemais.

Winter paſt, and the Spring now come, the French King not altogether the beſt pleaſed, firſt looſed from Meſſana, and with his Fleet in ſafety arrived at Ptolemais, where he was by the Chriſtians, now the third year lying at the Siege, ſo joyfully received, as if he had been to them ſent with Succours from Heaven. After whom, ſhortly after followed alſo King Richard; of whoſe Fleet (by force of Weather ſore beaten and diſperſed) two Ships by the rage of the Tempeſt driven aground upon the coaſt of Cyprus, were by the Iſland people ſpoiled, and the Men that in them had hardly eſcaped the danger of the Sea, with moſt barbarous Inhumanity, ſome ſlain and ſome taken Priſoners; the reſt of the Fleet arriving there alſo, were with like Incivility forbidden to land; the Cipriots ready at hand in all places to keep them off. With which ſo great an Indignity the King juſtly moved, and by force landing his people, with incredible Celerity and Succeſs over-ran the whole Iſland, never ceaſing, until he had made a full Conqueſt thereof, and taken Iſaac Commenus, commonly called The King of that Iſland, and of ſome (for what reaſon I know not) Emperor of the Griffons, Priſoner; yet was he indeed neither King nor Emperor, but being a man of great Nobility and Power, and of the honourable Stock of the Comneni, had in the troubleſome Reign of Andronicus Comnenus the Emperor, his Couſin, laid hold upon that fruitful Iſland, and there tyrannized as a reputed King; until that now he was by King Richard taken Priſoner, and for his unfaithful dealing ſent faſt bound in Chains of Silver into Syria. The King thus poſſeſſed of the whole Iſland, there at Limozin married the Lady Berengaria, the King of Navar's Daughter, brought thither by Joan late Queen of Cicilia, the Kings Siſter. And ſo diſpoſing as he thought beſt of all things for the ſafe keeping of the Iſland, ſet forward again with his Fleet towards Syria. Where by the way he light upon a great Ship of the Sultans, laded with Victuals and other War-like Proviſions for the relief of the beſieged; all which became a Prey unto him. So holding on his courſe, he at length arrived at Ptolemais, where he was by the French King, and the reſt of the Chriſtians there lying, moſt honourably received.

Now had the City of Ptolemais been three years beſieged by the Chriſtians, and notably defended by the Turks; during which time many an hot Aſſault and bloody Skirmiſh had paſſed betwixt them. And now the eyes of all men were fixed upon the two Kings of England and France, unto whom all the reſt offered their Obedience and Service. The Chriſtian Camp was great, compoſed eſpecially of Engliſhmen, Frenchmen, Italians, and Almains; not them that were left of the Emperor Frederick his Army (for they were for the moſt part dead, or elſe returned home again into their Countries) but of ſuch as (moved with the Zeal they bare unto this Religious War) came daily in great numbers thither; as did alſo many others of divers Nations, deſirous in ſome meaſure to be partakers of ſo honourable a War.

Theſe Religious and Venerous Chriſtians thus lying at the Siege, had with much painful labour undermined one of the greateſt Towers of the City, called the accurſed Tower, with ſome part of the Wall alſo, by means whereof they were in hope to find a way into the City. Wherefore all things being now in a readineſs for the firing of the Mine, it was thought good by general conſent, that an aſſault ſhould alſo at the ſame time be given unto the City: and thereupon every Regiment was by lot appointed which part of the Wall to aſſail, which they all with great courage undertook. In the heat of which Aſſault, the aforeſaid undermined Tower, with ſome part of the Wall (the Timber whereon it ſtaied, now burnt) fell down with a great fall, laying open a fair Breach for the Chriſtians to enter: wherewith the Turks diſmaied, forthwith craved to come to parl; which granted, they for ſafeguard of their lives yielded forthwith to give up the City, and to reſtore to the Chriſtians the Holy Croſs, with two thouſand Captives, and two hundred Horſemen, ſuch as they ſhould require of all them that were in the power of Saladin; beſides 200000 Conſtantinopolitan Ducats, to be by him given to the two Kings, for the coſt by them beſtowed in the Siege. For payment whereof the Turks in the City were to remain as hoſtages under the ſafe keeping of the Chriſtians, ſo that if all the Covenants aforeſaid were not within forty days performed by Saladin, they ſhould all for their lives be at the Kings mercy. So was this ſtrong City, after it had been almoſt three years beſieged, delivered up unto the Chriſtians the 12 of July, in the year 1191. 1191. The firſt that entred were the Germans of Auſtria, who as if they had been the only men by whoſe Valour the City had been won, at their firſt entry preſumptuouſly advanced their Enſigns upon the top of the Walls, to the great Offence of all the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, but eſpecially of King Richard, who (not unworthily for his Princely Courage was commonly called Richard Cueur de Lyon) not brooking ſo proud an indignity, cauſed the Enſigns of Leopold their Duke to be pulled down, and foiled underfoot; which ſhortly after gave him occaſion of Repentance, as ſhall hereafter be ſeen.

The two Kings poſſeſſed of the City, divided the ſame, with all the People and Spoil thereof betwixt them, without regard of the reſt of the other noble Chriſtians, that had ſuſtained the whole travel of that long Siege; for which cauſe moſt part of them, ſeeing themſelves ſo deluded, withdrew themſelves from them, and with one conſent ſent them word, That they would forſake them, except they were made partakers of the gains, as they had been of the pains. Which the two Kings to content them, promiſed they ſhould; howbeit, they delayed ſo long their promiſes, that many worthy men, conſtrained by Poverty, departed diſcontented from them into their Countries.

But long it was not, that this one City, ſo lately gained, could contain theſe two great Kings; whom two large Kingdoms could not retain in peace. For albeit that they were in body together preſent, and in one, and that a moſt honourable action, combined, yet were they in hearts far aſunder, and their ſecret deſigns much different; envy and diſtruſt ſtill reviving unkindneſs paſt, and miniſtring new matter of greater diſcontentments. King Richard, according to his noble nature, was of nothing more deſirous, than to have the War continued until they had made a full Conqueſt of Syria and the Land of Paleſtine; and for that cauſe requeſted the French King to bind himſelf together with him by ſolemn Oath, there to ſtay yet three years, for the regaining of thoſe Countries. But he in mind long before eſtranged from King Richard, and in his deep conceit plotting matters nearer home better fitting his purpoſe, would by no means be perſwaded ſo to do, but ſtill found one occaſion or other for to colour his departure. And ſhortly after (as the French Chronicles report) falling extreamly ſick, he requeſted King Richard and the other Chriſtian Princes to come unto him; unto whom being come, he in few words declared his purpoſe of return, as followeth:

I cannot, my Lords, longer endure the inclemency and intemperature of the Air in this extream hot ſeaſon. If my death might profit the Chriſtian Religion, or any one of you, or the Chriſtian Commonweal; there ſhould be no diſtemperature whatſoever, that could ſeparate me from you, or withdraw me from hence. But more may the life of one abſent, ſerve and profit you, than the death of him preſent. I muſt of neceſſity depart, yet at my departure I will leave you five hundred men at Arms, and ten thouſand Footmen, the Flower and Choice of all the Forces of France, under the conduct of my Couſin Odo, Duke of Burgundy, unto whom I will give Pay and Entertainment, with a continual ſupply of all things for them neceſſary.

The French King ſweareth to King Richard in his abſence not to invade his Territories in France.

This excuſe of the French Kings, King Richard could not take in good part; but ſaid, That it was apparent to all men, that he abandoned the Wars in Syria, to return into France, for no other end or purpoſe, but the more eaſily to invade the Provinces of Guien and Normandy, now diſfurniſhed of their Garriſons, and ſo ſubject to his malice. Which point he ſo urged, that the French King could have no leave with his Honour to depart, until ſuch time as he had by ſolemn Oath bound himſelf unto King Richard, not to attempt any thing either by force or fraud againſt him, or any thing of his, until fifty days were expired after King Richard his return home; which how well it was by the French King obſerved, I leave it to the report of the Hiſtories of that time. And ſo the French King, not to be intreated longer to ſtay, leaving behind him the aforeſaid number of men he had promiſed, embarking the reſt of his Army, and accompanied with three tall Ships of the Genewaies his Friends, and Ruffin Volta their Admiral, departed from Ptolemais to Tyre, the firſt of Auguſt, and two days after, looſing thence, ſailed alongſt the Sea-coaſt of Aſia, and cutting through the Mediterranean, arrived at length in the mouth of the River of Tiber, and from thence went to Rome: where after he had viſited Pope Celeſtine, and the famous places of that moſt Renowned City, he returned again to his Fleet, and ſo by Sea arrived in ſafety in France; having in that great expedition, ſo honourably by him entertained, performed nothing anſwerable to that the World looked for.

After the French King, followed Leopold Duke of Auſtria, with his Germans; and not long after him the Venetians alſo, with them of Piſa and Genoa. Of whoſe departure Saladin underſtanding, and that the Chriſtian Forces were thereby much empaired, refuſed either to pay the Mony, or to reſtore the Priſoners, as was promiſed at the giving up of Ptolemais; threatning moreover to chop off the Heads of all ſuch Chriſtian Captives as he had in his power, if the King ſhould ſhew any extremity unto the pledges in the City. Nevertheleſs, shortly after he ſent his Embaſſadors with great Preſents unto the King, requeſting a longer time for the ſparing of his pledges; which his requeſt, together with his Gifts, the King refuſed to grant or accept. Whereupon Saladin forthwith cauſed ſuch Chriſtian Captives as were in his power, to be beheaded; which albeit King Richard underſtood, yet would he not prevent the time before agreed upon for the execution of his Priſoners, being the twentieth day of Auguſt; upon which day he cauſed the Turks Priſoners, to the number of 2500. (or as the French and Germans write, to the number of 7000) in the ſight of Saladins Army to be executed.

The loſs of the ſtrong Town of Ptolemais, much empaired the reputation of Saladin, even among his own People; as it commonly falleth out, that the evil ſucceſs of a great Commander in his affairs, altereth the good Will, Affection, and Opinion, eſpecially of the Vulgar Sort, which judge of all things by the Event. And albeit that his loſſes were great, and ſuch as much daunted him; yet he thought it beſt as the caſe then ſtood, to make them greater, and with his own hands (as it were) to ruinate and overthrow ſuch Towns and Cities as he ſaw he could not keep, rather than to ſuffer them whole and undefaced to fall into the Enemies Hand. So carried headlong with deſpair, he cauſed all the Towns he had along the Sea coaſt in Syria and Paleſtine, to be ſacked and ruinated, and their Walls overthrown; eſpecially ſuch as were of moſt importance, and like to ſtand the Chriſtians in ſtead, namely, Porphiria, Ceſarea, Joppa, Aſcalon, Gaza, and Elam, with divers other Caſtles and Citadels in the Countries thereabouts; moſt part whereof were again by King Richard and the Templars fortified and repeopled, although Saladin in the mean time did what he might to have letted the ſame.

Nothing more hindred the good proceeding of the Chriſtian Princes, in this and other their moſt honourable expeditions againſt the Infidels, than the diſcord among themſelves; one ſtill envying at anothers Honour, and every one jealous of his own. Great ſtrife and heartburning there had been between the two Kings of France and England, during the time they were together in this ſacred Expedition, to the great hindrance of the ſame. No leſs contention had there been betwixt Guy the late King of Jeruſalem, and Conrade Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, about the Title of that loſt Kingdom; whereby the whole power of the Chriſtians in Syria was divided into two Factions. Richard King of England, Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Henry Earl of Champaine, the Knights Hoſpitalers of St. John, the Venetians and Piſans, taking part with Guy; And Philip the French King, Odo Duke of Burgundy, Rodolph Earl of Claremont, the Templars, the Genoways, the Lantgrave of Thurin, Leopold Duke of Auſtria, and Robert Count of Naſſau, taking part with Conrade the Marqueſs. But Conrade ſhortly after the taking of Ptolemais being ſlain, by two of the deſperate Aſſaſſins, or (as ſome others ſay) by two deſperate Ruffians, (ſuborned thereunto by the Prince of Torone, in revenge of the deſpight done unto him by the ſaid Marqueſs, by taking from him Iſabel his Eſpouſed Wife) as he was walking in his City of Tyre, and doubting no ſuch Treaſon; King Richard ſeeing now a fit occaſion offered for the utter extinguiſhing of that claim, and how to entitle himſelf unto that Kingdom; perſwaded the aforeſaid Iſabel (the Widdow of the late Marqueſs, and in whoſe right he had laid claim unto the Kingdom) to relinquiſh that ſo troubleſom a Title, and to take to her Huſband Henry Earl of Champain, his Nephew, unto whom he gave the City Tyre. Guy the King exclaming to the contrary, as of a wrong done unto himſelf. Shortly after he began alſo to tamper with Guy, perſwading him to reſign unto him that little right and intereſt he had in the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, and in lieu thereof to receive at his Hands the Kingdom of Cyprus; which his offer the poor King was glad to accept. By which exchange, Guy became King of Cyprus, and Richard King of Jeruſalem; which honourable Title he afterwards (as ſome report) uſed in his Stile, as did ſome others his Succeſſors the Kings of England after him. So Guy with all his Wealth paſſing over into Cyprus, took poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, where he long lived not. Nevertheleſs that pleaſant Kingdom continued in his Family of the Luſignans, by the ſpace of about 283 years afterwards; untill that at length that Family failing in the Poſthumus Son of James the Baſtard, laſt King of that Iſland, it fell into the Hands of the Venetians; by whom it was holden as a part of their Seigniory almoſt an hundred years, until that it was in our freſh remembrance again from them taken by Selymus the Second, great Emperor of the Turks, in the year 1571. as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall in due place (God willing) be declared.

Now was King Richard, for the increaſe of his honour, more deſirous than before of the City of Jeruſalem, as the moſt precious and honourable prize of all that religious War. And thereupon with all the power of the Chriſtians then at his command, ſet forward from Ptolemaus, and was come on his way as far as Arſua, a Town ſituated betwixt Ceſarea and Joppa. In the Vauward was King Richard himſelf, with the Engliſhmen; after whom followed Odo, Duke of Burgundy, with his French, and in the Rereward Jaques de Avenes, with the Flemings, Brabanders, and Wallons, who after the death of their Count Philip at the Siege of Ptolemais, had put themſelves all under his Regiment. Saladin with a great Army ſtill at hand, and as it were tending upon them, firſt with certain Embuſcadoes charged the Rereward, and ſo afterwards came on with his whole power; upon whom Jaques turning himſelf with his Flemings, received the charge with great aſſurance, and ſo long themſelves endured the ſame, until the French came in to their ſuccors, and after them the Engliſh alſo. There was fought a notable Battel, and great Valour ſhewed both on the one ſide and on the other, but eſpecially by them of the Turks part, who knew well the purpoſe of the Chriſtians for the beſieging of Jeruſalem, and that thereupon depended their only hope, and that he that could hold the ſame, might almoſt aſſure himſelf to carry away the glory of that War. The French and the Engliſh in that Battel honourably ſtrove who might ſhew the greateſt Valour; neither would the low Countrymen under Jaques their General, ſeem to be any thing behind them. This ſharp conflict began about Noon, and continued until the going down of the Sun. King Richard (as ſome write) was there wounded with an Arrow; and Jaques valiantly there fighting was ſlain, having ſold his life dear, to the great admiration of the Infidels, and dying left the Victory unto the Chriſtians. It is reported, that in this Battel was ſlain more Turks and Saraſins, than in any one Battel within the memory of man before; of the Chriſtians were not loſt any great number, either any man of name, more than the aforeſaid Jaques, the valiant General of the Flemings.

A notable Battel fought betwixt King Richard and Saladin.

The next day the Chriſtians removed to Bethlem, a Town a Town about the mid way betwixt Joppa and Jeruſalem. But Winter now coming faſt on, and want of Victuals like enough to increaſe, the King changing his mind for the Siege, returned with the greateſt part of the Army to Aſcalon, which he that Winter new fortified, the Walls thereof being before by Saladin in his diſpair demoliſhed; the Duke of Burgundy , with his Frenchmen, all that while quietly wintring at Tyre. In the mean time the power of the Chriſtians was thus greatly diminiſhed, ſome one way departing from the Camp, and ſome another. The Italians for the moſt part, with them of Piſa (who in theſe three years Wars had ſtriven with the Venetians for the Honour of their Service) were now returned home, as were the Venetians themſelves alſo. Nevertheleſs, Winter now paſt, and the Spring time come, King Richard took the Field again, and came to Bethlem; where by the way he met with an exceeding great number of Camels, charged with great ſtore of Victuals and Munition, ſent by Saladin out of Egypt to Jeruſalem, all which he took; but purpoſing to have gone on to the Siege of Jeruſalem, he was by the backwardneſs of the French glad to change his purpoſe, and to return to Ptolemais; for the Frenchmen, perſwaded by the Duke their General (who well knew the French Kings mind) that if any thing worth remembrance were done, it was to be done by them, and that the glory thereof ſhould wholly redound unto the King of England, as there in perſon preſent, and to his Engliſhmen; ſhewed themſelves ſo unwilling to the Siege, as that therein was nothing done, to the great grief of that worthy Prince. At which time alſo news was brought unto King Richard, how that Philip the French King (forgetful of his ſolemn promiſe made before his departure out of Syria) had now invaded the Country of Normandy, and excited Earl John (the Kings Brother, a man of an haughty and aſpiring nature) to take upon him the Kingdom of England in his abſence; as had before in like caſe William the younger Brother, ſerved Duke Robert his eldeſt Brother, then abſent at his Father the Conquerors death, in the firſt ſacred expedition under Godfrey of Bulloin. Wherefore King Richard beſide the preſent difficulties, fearing leſt while he was ſo far off in Wars for defence of the Chriſtian Commonweal, he might loſe his Kingdom at home; thought it beſt to grow to ſome good end with Saladin, and ſo to make his return; but the politick and wary Sultan, not ignorant of the diſcord of the Chriſtians, and that their Forces daily decayed in Syria; either of the troubled Eſtate of the Kings affairs at home in his Kingdom, or of his deſire to return; would not hearken to any other conditions of Peace, but ſuch as might both for the preſent, weaken the Forces of the Chriſtians in Syria, and diſcourage others that had a mind to come thither afterward, when they ſhould ſee that for nought they ſhould travel to conquer that, which they muſt of neceſſity reſtore again. The conditions he offered, were, That the Chriſtians ſhould forthwith reſtore whatſoever they had won in thoſe three years Wars, Ptolemais only excepted; and from thenceforth for the ſpace of five years, the Turks ſhould not in any thing moleſt the Chriſtians, but to ſuffer them in peace to live by them; which hard conditions (for that no better could be had) the King was glad to accept, and ſo concluded a Peace. Whereby the labour and travel of the two great Kings and ſo many Nations with them, were all become fruſtrate and vain; having now to no purpoſe loſt their Men, their Mony, their Time, their Hope, their Blood, their long Travel, to gain that they muſt now in one hour forego; nothing more left unto the poor Chriſtians in Syria, than the Cities of Antioch, Tyre and Ptolemais.

King Richard purpoſing to have beſieged Jeruſalem, is by the backwardneſs of the French inforced to retire.

King Richard glad upon hard conditions to conclude a peace with Saladin.

King Richard returning out of the Holy Land taken Priſoner by Leopold Duke of Auſtria.

This done, King Richard leaving the affairs of Aſia unto the charge of Henry Count of Champagne his Nephew, ſhipping the greateſt part of his People, with his Wife Berengaria, firſt for Cicilia, and from thence for England, (where they in ſafety at length arrived) followed ſhortly after with ſome few himſelf; where by the way, by extremity of Weather he was in the Adriatique driven to land upon the Coaſt of Hiſtria; where travelling with a ſmall retinue homewards in the Habit of a Templar, he was diſcovered and taken Priſoner by Leopold Duke of Auſtria, whom he had before diſgraced at the winning of Ptolemais, as is before declared: who now glad to have him in his power, made priſe of him, and ſold him to Henry the Emperor, for forty thouſand pounds; by whom he was kept Priſoner by the ſpace of a year and three months, and then ranſomed for the Sum of an hundred and fifty thouſand pounds.

About this time died the great Sultan Saladin, the greateſt terror of the Chriſtians; who mindfull of mans fragility, and the vanity of worldly honours, commanded at the time of his death no Solemnity to be uſed at his burial, but only his Shirt in manner of an Enſign, made faſt unto the point of a Lance, to be carried before his dead body as an Enſign, a plain Prieſt going before, and crying aloud to the People in this ſort; Saladin Conqueror of the Eaſt, of all the greatneſs and riches he had in his life, carrieth not with him after his death any thing more than his ſhirt. A ſight worthy ſo great a King, which wanted nothing to his eternal commendation, more than the true knowledge of his Salvation in Chriſt Jeſus. He reigned about ſixteen years with great honour, and dying left nine Sons, which were all murthered by Sephradin their Uncle, excepting one called alſo Sephradin Sultan of Aleppo, who by the Favour and Support of his Fathers good Friends, ſaved himſelf from the treacherous practiſes of his Uncle. Of this Sephradin the Uncle, deſcended Meludin Sultan of Egypt, and Coradin Sultan of Damaſco and Jeruſalem, Saladin his great Kingdom being by them now again rent in pieces.

The death of Saladin in ſhort time bruited abroad, with the diſcord among the Turks and Saraſins about his Dominions, put Celeſtinus (then Pope) in good hope, that the City of Jeruſalem might in that change and hurly be eaſily again recovered, and that Kingdom eſtabliſhed. But when he had in vain dealt to that purpoſe with the Kings of France and England, (then altogether buſied in their Wars the one againſt the other) he perſwaded Henry the Sixth, then Emperor, to take the matter in hand; who (for that he well could not, or elſe would not himſelf in perſon undertake that long expedition) ſent Henry Duke of Saxony his Lieutenant, with a great Army into Aſia, unto whom were joyned two Legats, Conradus Archbiſhop of Mogunſia another of the Electors, and Conradus the Biſhop of Herbipolis. At which time alſo many other great Princes took upon them that holy War; namely Herman Lantgrave of Thurin, Henry Palatine of Rhine, Henry Duke of Brabant, Conrade Marqueſs of Moravia, Frederick Duke of Auſtria, and Albertus Haſpurgenſis, with ſome others; unto whom alſo joyned themſelves the Biſhops of Rheme, Halberſtat, and Ratisbone, with divers other great Prelats. Who having paſſed through Hungary and Thracia, and by the Greek Emperor Alexius Angelus relieved with all things neceſſarie, were by the Grecian Ships tranſported unto Antioch, and ſo by Land came to Tyre, and from thence to Ptolemais, with purpoſe to have gone to relieve the Germans beſieged in Joppa; who before their coming were all by treaſon ſlain, and the City raſed; wherefore being come to the ruines thereof, they departed thence to Sidon, which they found alſo abandoned by the Turks. After that, they took Berithus, which City they fortified, and ſo went to beſiege Torone; which City when they had brought to the extremity, as that it muſt needs (as it was thought) either yield or be taken, the Turks came on ſo faſt to the relief thereof, that the Chriſtians were glad to raiſe their Siege and to be gone; which they in garriſon at Berithus perceiving, and ſeeing the Enemy to approach them, they abandoned the City, and joyning themſelves unto the reſt of the Army, marched all together to Joppa, a little before ruinated, which they now again fortified. But the Enemy coming to Berithus, and finding it forſaken, raſed it down to the ground, and ſo in few months ſpace was Berithus both repaired and raſed, in the year 1197. 1197.

The Turks overthrown by the Chriſtians

But whilſt the Chriſtians were repairing the City of Joppa, the Turks proud of that they had done at Berithus, came now to diſturb alſo the fortifying of that place. Of whoſe coming the Chriſtians underſtanding, removed by night about five miles from the City, of purpoſe to draw the Turks unto a convenient place for Battle. The Turks thinking them to have been fled for fear, ſent part of their Army to aſſail the City; and with the other followed after them diſorderly, as if it had been after men they had had in chaſe. Upon whom the Chriſtians turning, had with them at the firſt a ſharp encounter, but afterwards put them to flight; in which conflict certain thouſands of the Turks fell; of whom the Chriſtians taking the Spoil, and having put the reſt to flight, returned again to the fortifying of the City. But the joy of this Victory was by the ſudden death of two of the greateſt Princes in the Army greatly diminſhed: for the Duke of Saxony having in the Battle taken great pains in performing the parts both of a worthy General and valiant Souldier, had over-heated himſelf, and thereupon without regard of his health taking cold, died of a Fever the fourth day after. The Duke of Auſtria mortally wounded in the Battel, died alſo the night following.

Joppa repaired by the Chriſtians.

About this time, or not long after, died Celeſtinus the Pope, Author of this Expedition, and Henry alſo the German Emperor; after whoſe death great troubles began to ariſe in Germany about the chooſing of a new Emperor. Whereof the Biſhop of Moguntia (then chief Commander of the Army of the Chriſtians in Syria) one of the Electors, and the other German Princes with him, having intelligence, could not by any entreaty of the poor Chriſtians (in whoſe quarrel they were come) be perſwaded longer to ſtay, but that needs home they would; and indeed home they went the ſame way that they came. After whoſe departure the Turks took Joppa, having one of the Ports betrayed unto them by one of the City, at ſuch time as the Germans there in Garriſon, after the manner of their Country, upon St. Martyns day were careleſly making merry together in their Pots; upon whom ſo ſurcharged with Wine, the Turks entring by the Port given unto them, put them all with the reſt of the Chriſtians to the Sword, and ſo afterward raſed the City down to the ground. Of which Victory they became ſo proud, that they had thought without ſtop to have driven the Chriſtians quite out of Syria; but by the coming of Simon Count of Mont-Fort (a moſt valiant and expert Captain, ſent thither by Philip the French King, with a Regiment of tall Souldiers, at the inſtance of Innocentius the Third, that ſucceeded Celeſtinus in the Papacy) and by civil diſcord then reigning amongſt the Turks themſelves for Soveraignity, their fury was repreſſed, and a peace betwixt them and the Chriſtians concluded for the ſpace of ten years; during which time the Turks promiſed not to moleſt the Chriſtians in Tyre or Ptolemais; which happened in the year 1199, or as ſome others ſay, 1198. 1199. After which peace ſo concluded, the worthy Count returned again with his Souldiers into France; with whom we alſo will repair into the leſſer Aſia (whither the courſe both of the time and of the Hiſtory now calleth us) to ſee the other great affairs of the Turks in thoſe Eaſtern Countries; leaving for a ſeaſon theſe poor remainders of ſo many Chriſtians in Tyre and Ptolemais now for a while in peace, but to be ere long devoured of the Infidels their Enemies, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall in due time and place appear.

The German Princes return home.

The Ruine of the TURKS firſt Empire in PERSIA; with the Succeſs of their Second Kingdom in the leſſer Aſia, under the Aladin Kings.

Kingdoms after the manner of other things, have but their time to flouriſh in, and ſo again decay.

AS no Kingdom or Empire upon Earth (were it never ſo flouriſhing or great) was ever yet ſo aſſured, but that in the Revolution of time, after the manner of other worldly things, it hath as a ſick Body been ſubject unto many ſtrange Innovations and Changes, and at length come to nothing; ſo fared it now with the Turkiſh Empire, which firſt planted by Tangrolipix in Perſia, and the other far Eaſtern Countries, increaſed by Axan his Son, and ſo by the Turkiſh Sultans their Succeſſors (although their names and doings, as too far off, be not unto us all known) for the ſpace of one hundred and ſeventy years continued, muſt now (I ſay) give place unto a greater Power, and ſettle it ſelf elſe-where, the inevitable deſtiny thereof ſo requiring. It fortuned, that about this time (when in the ſpace of a few years ſuch Mutations as had not before of long been ſeen, chanced in divers great Monarchies and States) that the Tartars, or rather Tattars, inhabiting the large, cold, and bare Countries in the North-ſide of Aſia, (of all others a moſt barbarous, fierce, and needy Nation) ſtirred up by their own wants, and the perſwaſion of one Zingis (or as ſome call him, Cangis) holden amongſt them for a great Prophet, and now by them made their Leader, and honoured by the name of Ulu-Chan; that is to ſay, The mighty King, (commonly called The Great Cham) flocking together in number like the Sand of the Sea, and conquering firſt their poor Neighbours, of condition and quality like themſelves, and eaſie enough to be entreated with them to ſeek their better Fortune, like ſwarms of Graſhoppers ſent out to devour the World, paſſed the high Mountain Caucaſus, part of the Mountain Taurus, of all the Mountains in the World the greateſt; which beginning near unto the Archipelago, and ending upon the Oriental Ocean, and running through many great and famous Kingdoms, divideth Aſia into two parts; over which great Mountain, one of the moſt aſſured bounders of nature, that had ſo many Worlds of years ſhut up this rough and ſavage people, they now paſſing without number, and coming down as it were into another World, full of Natures pleaſant delights, ſuch as never were to them before ſeen, bare down all before them as they went, nothing being now able to ſtand in their way. Old Zingis their fortunate Leader dead in this ſo great an Expedition, Hoccata his Son, eldeſt of his twelve Brethren, a man of great Wiſdom and Courage, took upon him his Fathers Place; who ſending part of his great Army for the ſubduing of the Countries Weſtward, turned himſelf with a world of people towards the Eaſt; where having ſubdued the Bactrians and Sogdians, with divers others, he entred into India, and ſubduing that rich Country on both ſides the River Indus, even to the Eaſt Ocean, there in the Country of Cathai built the famous City of Cambalu, in circuit eight and twenty miles about; for pleaſure and plenty of all things neceſſary for the life of man, of all the Cities of Aſia the chief; where the great Cham of Tartary ſtill Reſiant, as in his Imperial City, commandeth over one of the greateſt and ſtrongeſt Empires of the World. In whoſe Kingdom alſo, in the Province Mangy more towards the Eaſt, he hath another moſt famous City called Quinſay, of all the Cities in the World the greateſt, in circuit an hundred miles about, as M. Paulus Venetus writeth, who himſelf dwelt therein about the year, 1260. It is ſituate in a Lake of freſh-water, and hath in it twelve thouſand Bridges; of which ſome are of ſuch an height, that tall Ships with their Sails up may eaſily paſs under them. In this populous City the great Cham hath for the keeping thereof always thirty thouſand men in Garriſon. The Tartar Kingdom thus planted in Cambalu, Hoccata contenting himſelf with the rich pleaſures of India, afterward managed his Wars by his Lieutenants, being for the moſt part his Brethren, or other his nigh Kinſmen; of whom he ſent out with his Armies ſome Northward, ſome Weſtward, and ſome toward the South; by whom he ſubdued the Arachoſians, Margians, and divers other great Nations; and entring into Perſia, ſubdued the Country, with all Parthia, Aſſyria, Meſopotamia, and Media. At this time in the City Balch or Belch in the Country of Choraſan in the fartheſt part of Perſia, reigned over the Turks one Curſumes, of the Greeks called Corſantes; who finding himſelf far too weak to ſtand before the Tartarians, fled with all his people, leaving unto them both the City and the Country which he and the Turks his Predeceſſors had ever ſince the time of Tangrolipix poſſeſſed; which City the Tartars raſed, and took the Country unto themſelves. In this general flight of the Turks, when as every man was glad to make what ſhift he might for himſelf, Curſumes their Sultan died, the laſt of the Kings of the Selzuccian Family that reigned over the Turks in Perſia; whoſe Son Ugnan-Chan taking upon him the leading of ſuch multitudes of Turks as followed his Father, ſeiſed upon the great City of Babylon, now called Bagadat, near unto the ruines of the old Babylon; where having put to the Sword all the Inhabitants thereof, he there and in the Country thereabout ſeated himſelf with the Turks his Followers; but long he had not there reſted, but that the Tartars hearing thereof, purſued him, took him Priſoner, and expulſed thence all his people. There was at the ſame time alſo another Kingdom of the Turks at Nachan a City in Perſia, giving name unto the Country wherein it ſtood, not far from Choraſan; wherein then reigned one Solyman, of the Oguzian Family, as had divers other of his Progenitors before him; who terrified with this dreadful Storm ſo ſuddenly riſen out of the North, and warned by the ſudden fall of the Selzuccian Sultan and his Kingdom, of far greater Fame and Power than himſelf or his, fled alſo with ſuch his Subjects as would follow him, into the leſſer Aſia. But of him and his proceedings more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in the riſing of the Victorious Othoman Family, as deſcended from him. After this, the Tartars together with their good fortune ſtill extending the bounds of their Empire, conquered Armenia the greater, with the Countries of Colchis and Iberia; ſo that now their Empire was become of all others others the greateſt and moſt flouriſhing. This great Conqueror the Tartar, had in his proud conceit purpoſed to have ſubdued all Aſia, and to have made the Sea the only bounder of his Empire; but overcome with the delicacies of India, having divided amongſt his people thoſe great Provinces and fruitful Countries, with the rich Cities and pleaſant Fields, he ſo reſted, embracing the Manners and Superſtition of the people he had overcome. Long it were, and far from our purpoſe, to recount all the famous Victories and Conqueſts of this bare Northern people; ſufficeth it to the Hiſtory we have in hand, that the Turks were by them then driven out of Perſia, with the Countries thereabout; and their Togran Kingdom (as they call it) firſt founded by Tangrolipix, there extinguiſhed, about the year of our Lord, 1202. The Turks thus driven out of Perſia, and their Kingdom overthrown, retired themſelves into the leſſer Aſia, poſſeſſed by the Turks their Country-men, long before brought thither by Cutlu-Muſes and his Sons, (as is before declared) and by them ever ſince in ſome part, though with divers Fortune holden. Where theſe Turks now arrived out of Perſia under the leading of Aladin the Son of Kei Huſren, deſcended alſo of the Selzuccian Family in Perſia, and taking the opportunity offered them by the mortal diſcord of the Latines with the Greeks, and the Greeks among themſelves, ſeiſed upon Cilicia with the Countries thereabouts, and there firſt at Sebaſtia, and afterward at Iconium, erected their new Kingdom; which of this Aladin is by the Turks called the Kingdom of the Aladin Kings, although their names were not all ſo.

The beginning of the Aladinian Kingdom in the leſſer Aſia, at Sebaſtia and Iconium.

Now about this time, and within the courſe of ſome few years after, ſuch great and ſtrange mutations happened in the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, as had not therein at any time before been ſeen; whereby the whole Eſtate of that great Empire, which ſometime commanded over a great part of the World, was almoſt utterly ſubverted, and a fit opportunity given unto the Turks and Infidels for the ſure ſetling of themſelves, and eſtabliſhing of their Kingdoms both in Syria and the leſſer Aſia; which briefly to run through ſhall not be from our purpoſe; their Affairs proſpering by theſe Troubles, and their proud and ſtately Empire that now braveth all the reſt of the World, being raiſed out of the ruines of that Chriſtian Empire; and at this preſent triumphing even in ſome Imperial City wherein theſe ſo great Innovations happened through the working of ambitious heads, to the lamentable ruine and deſtruction of a great part of the Chriſtian Common-weal.

Alexius the young Prince craveth aid of Philip the Emperor and the Latine Princes, againſt his Uncle the Uſurper.

Alexius the Uſurper, but now Emperor, not contented (as is before declared) traiterouſly to have deprived Iſaac his elder Brother of his Empire and ſight together, ſought alſo after the life of the young Prince Alexius his Brothers Son, and Heir apparent of the Empire; who ſeeing the Villany committed in the Perſon of his Father, ſaved himſelf by flight from the fury of his Uncle, and ſo accompanied with certain great Lords of the Greeks, his Fathers Friends, fled to crave Aid of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, whom the Grecians commonly call the Latines. And firſt he took his way to Philip the German Emperor, who had married Irene his Siſter, the Emperor Iſaacs Daughter, by whom he was moſt honourably received and entertained. This great Lady not a little moved with the Miſeries of her Father, and the flight of her Brother, ceaſed not moſt inſtantly to ſolicite the Emperor her Husband, not to leave unrevenged ſo great a Villany, by the example thereof dangerous unto himſelf and others of like Majeſty and State. She declared unto him, what an execrable Indignity it was, to ſee her Father the Emperor unworthily impriſoned, deprived of his Empire and ſight, and of the ſociety of men, by his Brother that had by him received and recovered his Life, his Light, and his Liberty; and to ſee the Heir apparent of the Empire baniſhed by the wickedneſs of his Uncle, to wander up and down here and there like a Beggar; a great part of which diſgrace, as ſhe ſaid, redounded unto her ſelf the Daughter of Iſaac, and Siſter to the young wandring Prince, and to himſelf alſo, the Son in law unto the unfortunate Emperor her Father. Moreover ſhe ſaid, that the Murderer Alexius durſt never have been ſo hardy as to commit ſo great and deteſtable a Villany, if he had not lightly regarded and contemned the Majeſty of the ſaid Philip; whom if he had had in any Reverence or Honour, or at all feared, he durſt not have attempted ſo Villanous an act. This Greek Lady, moved with juſt grief, with theſe and ſuch like Complaints ſo prevailed with her Husband, that he promiſed her to be in ſome part thereof revenged; which he could not for the preſent perform, letted by the Wars he then had with Otho his Competitor of the Empire. At the ſame time it fortuned, that great Preparations were making in France and Italy, and divers other places of Chriſtendom, for an Expedition to be made againſt the Turks into the Holy Land. The chief men wherein were Theobald Count of Champagne, (a man of great fame, and General of the Chriſtian Army) Boniface Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, Baldwin Earl of Flanders and Hainault, and Henry his Brother Earl of St. Paul, Henry Duke of Lovain, Gualter Earl of Breame, with divers other noble Gentlemen, which to name were tedious; unto whom reſorted alſo many valiant and devout Chriſtians out of divers parts of Chriſtendom, ready to have ſpent their lives in that ſo Religious a War; ſo that now the number of them was great, and the Army right populous. But being thus aſſembled together, they thought it not beſt to take their way to Conſtantinople, through Hungary and Thrace, and ſo to paſs over into Bythinia, for that the Greeks had ſtill in all former times ſhewed great diſcourteſie unto the Latines, in paſſing with their Armies that way; and therefore they thought it much better now by the way of Italy to take their Journey by Sea into the Holy Land; and for their Tranſportation, eſpecially to uſe the help of the Venetians, whom they found much the eaſier to be intreated, for that by the means of ſo great an Army, they were in hope to ſcoure the Adriatick (then much infeſted by the Dalmatians) as alſo to recover Jadera, with ſome other Cities upon the Coaſt of Sclavonia, before revolted from their State to the Hungarians, as indeed they afterward did. But by the way as this Army was marching out of France, and come into Piemont, the noble Count of Champagne General thereof, there fell ſick and died, to the exceeding grief and ſorrow of the whole Army; in whoſe ſtead, the Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, a man of great Nobility, and well acquainted with the Wars of the Eaſt, was choſen General. This great Army, tranſported by the Venetians into Sclavonia, took Jadera, with divers other Port Towns along the Sea coaſt, and having there done what the Venetians moſt deſired, was about again to have been imbarkt for Syria, and ſo into the Holy Land. But the young Prince Alexius in the mean time had by himſelf and the noble Grecians (fled with him for fear of the Tyrant) ſo wrought the matter with the Latine Princes of the Weſt, eſpecially with Innocentius tertius the Pope, with Philip the Emperor his Brother in law, and Philip the French King, that they pittying his Eſtate, and induced alſo with ſome other Conſiderations more proper to themſelves, took him as it were into their Protection, commending by Letters and Meſſengers for that purpoſe ſent unto the Army, (which they might command) the defence both of himſelf and his Cauſe; who with the Commendation of three ſo great Princes, coming to the Army yet lying at Jadera (expecting but a fair Wind to have paſſed into Syria) was there of them all moſt honourably received, as the Son of an Emperor, and as became one to them ſo highly commended. And he himſelf alſo, as one knowing his good, was not wanting unto himſelf, but recommended his perſon to their Protection, as a poor exiled Prince in Diſtreſs; yet was he of a lively Spirit, gracious in Speech, beautiful to behold, and very young, and withall fully inſtructed by the noble Grecians that were with him, in all things that might ſerve to further his purpoſe. And foraſmuch as this great Army conſiſted of divers Nations, eſpecially of the French, Italians, and Venetians, not all to be by one mean moved; he fitted every one with ſuch motives as he thought might beſt prevail with them: Unto the French he promiſed to pay the great ſums of money they had borrowed of the Venetians for the furniſhing of themſelves in this War: Unto the Venetians he promiſed Recompence for all the Injuries they had ſuſtained by the late Conſtantinopolitan Emperors, eſpecially by the Emperor Emanuel (who for that they refuſed to Aid him in his Wars againſt William King of Sicily, did in one day confiſcate all the Goods of the Venetian Merchants within his Empire, of a great value; and afterwards contrary to the Law of Nations, ſhamefully entreated their Embaſſadors ſent unto him, amongſt whom was Henry Dandulus, now by fortune General for the Venetians in the Army; who moved as well with the wrong in particular done unto Himſelf, as with the Common, deſired to be revenged both of the one and the other; which although he could not have of Emanuel himſelf, being long before dead, yet was he ſtill deſirous to have it of ſome one of the Greek Emperors, whoſoever he were;) Unto the Pope and the Italians, both he and the Noblemen with him, had before promiſed, that the Greek Church ſhould ever acknowledge the Supremacy of the Church of Rome, and from thenceforth ſubmit it ſelf thereunto, as unto the Soveraign Judge of all the Chriſtian Churches; which cauſed the Pope Innocentius, by Letters, by Legates, by Embaſſadors, and by all other means poſſible, to further the Cauſe of the young Prince Alexius, ſo combined with his own; alledging the diverſity of Opinions in matters of Religion, betwixt the Greeks and the Latines, to have been the chief cauſe that the Mahometans had not been long ago by their United Forces ſubdued, or utterly rooted out. In brief, the young Prince ſpared not to promiſe moſt bountiful Rewards in general, to all that ſhould take his part againſt his Uncle the uſurping Emperor.

By this means, the devout War taken in hand for the Relief of the poor Chriſtians in Syria, was laid aſide, and the ſame Forces that ſhould have been therein imploy'd, now converted againſt the Greek Empire, to the great weakning of that ſide of the Chriſtian Common-weal, and advantage of the Common Enemy; who might then eaſily have been oppreſſed, had he with the United Forces of the Chriſtians been on this ſide charged home, as he was on the farther by the Tartars. The Grecian War thus reſolved upon, it ſeemed beſt unto the great Commanders of the Army, to march directly to Conſtantinople, as to the head of the Grecian State, and place where the Tyrant whom they ſought after was reſiant. In the mean time it was by them given out through all the Greek Cities which the Emperor had ſtrongly manned and fortified for the ſtaying of their paſſage, that their purpoſe was not to make War againſt the Grecians their Friends, but only to reſtore their lawful Emperor unto his former State and Honour: And that foraſmuch as every City and Town in ancient Greece had appointed Rewards, and almoſt divine Honours unto ſuch as had delivered them from Tyrants, they ſhould now more favourably receive and intreat them that came to reſtore unto every City, and to every man in general, their former Liberty and Honour. And ſo upon the Reſolution for Conſtantinople imbarking their Army, and paſſing through the Ionian-Sea into the Ægeum, and ſo without let through the Straits of Heleſpontus into Propontis, and entring the Straits of Boſphorus Thracius, which divide Europe from Aſia, they came to an Anchor even in the face of the City. In this Fleet were two hundred and forty Sail of tall Ships, ſixty Gallies, ſeventy Ships for burden, and one hundred and twenty Sail of Victuallers; which all together made a moſt brave ſhew, covering that Strait in ſuch ſort, as that it ſeemed rather a Wood than a part of the Sea. Thus for a ſpace they lay facing the City, attending if happily upon the coming and ſight of ſo great a Fleet, and the report of ſo puiſſant an Army as the young Prince Alexius had brought with him, any Tumult or Sedition might ariſe in the City. But the wary Tyrant had ſo well provided therefore before hand, that the Citizens, although they in heart favoured the young Prince, and wiſhed him well, yet durſt they not once move or ſtir in his Quarrel. Whilſt the Fleet thus lay, Embaſſadors came from the Iſle of Creet, in two great Gallies, with three banks of Oars, yielding unto the young Prince that goodly Iſland, with all the Towns and Cities therein; which he forthwith gave unto the Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, General of the Army, thereby to encourage the other great Commanders of the Army to do the uttermoſt of their devoir, in hope of Recompence and Rewards anſwerable to their deſerts and valour.

The Latines by force enter the Haven of Conſtantinople.

Before the arrival of this Fleet, Alexius the Emperor had with a great Chain made faſt the entrance of the Haven betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, and appointed twenty great Gallies well manned for the keeping thereof; but a great gale of Wind ariſing, the General ſent out the greateſt and ſtrongeſt Ship in the Fleet (for her greatneſs and ſwiftneſs called the Eagle) which with all her Sails up, carried with a full gale of Wind, by main force brake the Chain, and made a way for the reſt of the Fleet to enter; which the Greeks in the Gallies ſeeing, for fear fled, leaving the Gallies for a ſpoil unto the Venetians, by whom they were all taken, but not a man found in them. The Haven thus gained, Theodorus Laſcaris the Emperors Son in law, was preſently ready upon the ſhore with a ſelect Company of the braveſt Gallants of the City and of the Court, to have hindred the Latines from landing; who running their Ships aground, landed with ſuch chearfulneſs and courage, and with ſuch haſt, that in one moment you might have ſeen them leap out of their Ships, take land, enter into the battel, and lay about them like mad men. This hot skirmiſh endured a great while, while, for that they were only Foot-men that ſuſtained this brunt, for the Horſes could not ſo ſoon be landed, and the Greeks were bravely mounted. All this great fight the Conſtantinopolitans beheld, with doubtful hearts, expecting what ſhould be the event thereof. There were in the City ſix thouſand of the Flower of Greece, which bravely ſallying out, made the battel much more doubtful; yet ſuch was the valour and reſolution of the Latines, that in fine the Greeks diſcomfited, were glad to retire themſelves again into the City, but with what loſs, was not certainly known; eaſie it were to gueſs, that it was right great, for that the old Tyrant Alexius diſcouraged therewith, and doubtful of his own eſtate, with Theodorus Laſcaris his Son in law, and ſome few others of his truſty Friends (hard to be found in ſo dangerous a caſe) the next night following ſecretly fled out of the City, carrying away with him a wonderful maſs of Treaſure (which he againſt all ſuch events had cauſed to be ſecretly hidden by his Daughter Irene, in a Monaſtery of Nuns within the City, whereof ſhe was the Abbeſs) and ſo ſaved himſelf.

A hot skirmiſh betwixt the Greeks and the Latines at their landing.

Iſaac the old Emperor taken out of priſon, and again ſaluted Emperor, together with young Alexius his ſon.

The flight of the Tyrant once bruted, the next morning the Conſtantinopolitans taking the old Emperor Iſaac out of Priſon, ſaluted him again for their Emperor, rejoycing greatly for his deliverance and the ſafeguard of his life; and after that opened the Gates of the City to the Latines, calling and ſaluting them by the names of the Revengers and Saviours of the Liberty of the Greeks, as alſo of the Life and Majeſty of their Emperor; they requeſted them that they might ſee and ſalute Alexius their young Prince, whom they had ſo long deſired; and ſo was the City of Conſtantinople, by the ſubmiſſion of the Citizens, for that time ſaved from ſaccage and ſpoil. The old Emperor thus delivered, and together with his Son Alexius again placed in the Imperial Seat, gave the moſt hearty thanks that poſſibly he could unto the Latine Princes, for that by their Bounty, Charity, and Valour, the Greek Empire had been delivered out of a long and miſerable Servitude; and for his own particular, that he had received of them ſo great good, that albeit his ſight could not be reſtored to him again, nevertheleſs he acknowledged his Life, his Liberty, his Empire, his Country, his Son, to have been unto him by them reſtored, and he likewiſe to them; for which their ſo great Deſerts he could not (as he ſaid) render them condign Thanks, or deviſe Rewards or Honours anſwerable to their Demerits and Valour; and that therefore he did ratifie and confirm whatſoever his Son had before promiſed unto them for his deliverance; and not only that, but further promiſed, That if they were not therewith contented, he would of his own bounty give them better contentment, not meaning they ſhould go diſcontented, that had ſaved his life, and otherwiſe ſo highly pleaſured him. Hereupon this good old Emperor began to conſult with his Friends about the means whereby he might ſatisfie and content the Latines in ſuch things as the young Prince his Son had unto them promiſed. And to the intent that the Citizens of Conſtantinople might the more willingly do that he was to command them, and the more chearfully pay ſuch Impoſitions as he was to lay upon them, he intreated all the Latines to retire themſelves out of the City into their Camp, or about their Ships, which they accordingly did. But the Impoſition being ſet down, and what every man was to pay, ſeemed unto the Greeks (as men of long accuſtomed to receive Tribute of others, and not to pay Tribute to others) a matter moſt heavy and intollerable. In this very inſtant that this Exaction was required, died the old Emperor Iſaac, who having of long been kept in a dark and ſtinking Priſon in continual fear of death, and now delivered and reſtored to his Empire, could not indure ſo ſudden and unexpected a change, both of the Air and of his manner of living, but ſo ſuddenly died.

At this Exaction impoſed for the contentment of the Latines, the light Conſtantinopolitans grievouſly murmured, and exclaimed, ſaying, That it was a villanous thing to ſee the Greek Empire ingaged and bound (by a young Boy) unto a covetous and proud Nation, and ſo to be ſpoiled and made bare of Coin: That the great and rich Iſland of Crete lying in the midſt of the Sea, was by him given as a Gift unto the Latines: That the City of Conſtantinople and the Greek Church, had by him been enforced and conſtrained to yield unto the See of Rome, to receive the Opinions of the Latine Church, to ſubmit it ſelf unto the Obeyſance of old Rome, from whence it had once happily departed ever ſince the time that the Empire was by Conſtantine the Great tranſlated thence to them. Thus every one ſaid for himſelf in particular; thus all men ſaid in general. And thereof the Noblemen in their Aſſemblies, and the vulgar people in their meetings, grievouſly complained; whereupon a Sedition and Tumult was raiſed in the City. Some preſently took up Arms, and the common people all enraged ran furiouſly diſordered unto the Palace, with a purpoſe to have committed ſome great Outrage upon the Perſon of the young Emperor Alexius; who in that ſo ſudden an Inſurrection, as might well have troubled a right conſtant man, without longer delay reſolved upon a moſt wholſome and neceſſary point for the appeaſing of the peoples fury; unto whom (aſſembled in a wonderful multitude) he ſhewed himſelf from above in his Palace, promiſing them to remain in their Power, and not from thenceforth to do any thing without their advice and liking, but wholly to depend upon them; with which good words the people held themſelves well content, and ſo was the tumult for that time appeaſed. But forthwith the young Emperor conſidering the injury done unto him, began to burn with the deſire of Revenge, and to change his purpoſe. He could not together ſatisfie the Citizens and the Latines; for if he would keep his promiſe with the Latines, he muſt of neceſſity offend his own people; neither was there any means to be found to ſatisfie both the one and the other. But thinking himſelf more bound to keep his promiſe with the Latines, whoſe Forces he knew not how to withſtand, he ſent ſecretly to requeſt the Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, General of the Army, to ſend him about mid-night certain Companies of Souldiers unto the City, aſſuring him to receive them in by a Gate near unto the Palace, which ſhould be opened unto them by certain of his truſty Servants there left for that purpoſe. Of this Plot Alexius Ducas (of his bittle brows ſirnamed Murzufle, whom of a baſe Fellow the Emperor Iſaac had promoted unto the greateſt Honours of the Court) was not ignorant, who being a man of an aſpiring mind, and in thoſe troubleſome times having long thirſted after the Empire, took now this occaſion to work upon.

Alexius ſeeketh to bring the Latines again into the City.

The Conſtantinopolitans again in an uproar.

The night following, he by his Agents, men inſtructed for the purpoſe, raiſed a tumult in the City, not inferior unto that which had hapned the day before; and at the ſame inſtant, as if he had had nothing to do in the matter, came ſuddenly to the young Emperor in the dead time of the night (which he might at all time do, by reaſon of the great confidence the Emperor had in him) and with a ſad countenance told him, That the People were up again in an uprore, and eſpecially they of his Guard, and that they were coming toward him to do him ſome violence for the love he bare unto the Latines. With which unexpected news the young Emperor terrified, demanded of him as of his moſt faithful Counſellor, What were beſt in that caſe for him to do? Who preſently embracing him in his Night-gown, led him out by a ſecret door into a Tent he had of his own in the Court, as if he would there have kept him ſafe; but far was that from his traiterous thoughts; who departing from him, as if he had gone to appeaſe the Tumult, had before taken order, that he ſhould preſently after his departure, be caſt into Bonds, and ſo be clapt up into a cloſe ſtinking Priſon: which done, the falſe Traitor openly ſhewing himſelf, made an Oration to the People, wherein he ſhewed himſelf to have great compaſſion of the Greek Empire, and of the Greeks his Country men themſelves, eſpecially in that they were governed by a youth unfit for the government, who ſuffred himſelf to be miſled according to the pleaſure of the Latines. And that it was high time for the City of Conſtantinople, the ſeat of the Greek Empire, to look about it, and to have an Eye unto it ſelf, ſith it was betrayed and ſold by them which ought to preſerve and keep the ſame; that they had now need of a man that loved his Country and Country-men, before that which yet remained of the Græcian name were utterly extinguiſhed by the Latines.

This his Speech, fitted of purpoſe unto the humour of the Seditious, was received with the great outcry and applauſe of the windy headed People. Some cryed out, that he, and none but he, was to be made chief of the Common-weal that was by them to be eſtabliſhed; otherſome cried as loud to have him made General of the Armies and Forces of the State; but the greateſt cry was to have him choſen and created Emperor; whereunto the reſt giving place, he was by the general conſent of the tumultuous People, without longer ſtay, choſen and proclaimed Emperor.

Alexius the Traitor, by no lawful Election or rightful Succeſſion, but only by the fury of the tumultuous People, thus created Emperor; was of nothing more careful than how to break the Forces of the Latines, of whom only he now ſtood in dread. And therefore to begin withal, he firſt attempted by certain Gallies filled with Pitch, Flax, Brimſtone, and ſuch like matter apt to take fire, to have burnt the Venetian Fleet; which Gallies ſo ſet on fire and carried with a fare gale of Wind among the Fleet, had been like enough to have done great harm, had it not by the warineſs of the Venetians been prevented; who being good Sea men, and not unacquainted with ſuch deviſes, eaſily and without danger avoided the ſame, by keeping themſelves aloof one from another in the Sea. This fineneſs ſorting to no purpoſe, he to colour the matter ſent certain Meſſengers to the General, and other Commanders of the Army, to give them to underſtand that that which was done for the firing of the Fleet, had been done without his privity, by the malice of the tumultuous People, and that for his part he would be glad of their Favour and Friendſhip, aſſuring them likewiſe of his, and promiſing them to aid them both with men and mony, and whatſoever elſe they ſhould have need of in their Wars againſt the Infidels. Whereunto an anſwer was given by Dandulus the Venetian General, that he would believe it, when Alexis the Son of the Emperor Iſaac, whom the Latines had placed in the Empire, ſhould aſſure them thereof, and intreat for the People, upon whom the fault of that outrage was laid; which anſwer the more moved the traiterous Tyrant to rid himſelf clean of the fear of the young Prince, by taking him out of the way; to the intent to hinder the People of the hope and great deſire they had to grow to ſome peace with the Latines, by taking him out of Priſon, and receiving him again for their Emperor; For the People (by nature mutable, and not deſirous of the good of themſelves, but according to the occurrents preſent, without any great regard of that they had already done, or ought to have done) begun now to repent themſelves of that they had done againſt the young Emperor Alexis in Favour of the Tyrant, and commonly ſaid, That they muſt find ſome means, whatſoever it were, to remedy their fault together with their troubles. Wherefore Murzufle fearing the ſudden mutation of the People, with his own Hands moſt villanouſly ſtrangled the young Prince Alexis in Priſon, having as yet not raigned much above ſix months, and immediately after cauſed it to be bruited abroad, That the ſaid young Prince deſpairing or his Eſtate, had as a man deſperate, hanged himſelf.

The Tyrant in vain having thus attempted the burning of the Fleet, and ſtill fearing the revenging Sword of the Latines, reſolved now by plain force to meet them in the field, and there to dare them to battel. So having made ready and armed the whole Strength of the Imperial City, he with chearful ſpeech encouraged his Souldiers, requeſting them valiantly to maintain and defend their Country of Greece, the Monuments of their Fathers, the Glory of their Anceſtors, their preſent Honour, and the future Hope of their Poſterity; that having before their Eyes the Walls of their City, within which they were born, nouriſhed, and brought up in hope of great matters, they would have pity and compaſſion of their Temples, their Wives, their Children, and in no caſe to ſuffer them to fall again into ſo miſerable and wretched a Servitude, but rather to die a thouſand deaths. And the more to grace this his enterpriſe taken in hand for the defence of his Country (as he would have the world to believe it) with the colour of a ſuperſtitious Devotion alſo, he cauſed the Prieſts in their Eccleſiaſtical Attire and Ornaments, to march forth in the Army, with an Enſign, having in it diſplayed the Picture of the Virgin Mary. So couragiouſly marching forward, he firſt charged that quarter of the Camp where Baldwin the Count of Flanders lay, where at the firſt was fought a right fierce and doubtful Battel. But afterward the Alarm running throughout all the Camp of the Latines, and new ſupplies coming in on every ſide, the Greeks were put to the worſe, and inforced again to retire into the City, having loſt a great number of men, together with their ſuperſtitious Enſign. It was a wonderful thing to ſee, with what rare agreement the Latines, being of divers Nations, continued this expedition undertaken againſt the Greeks. Seventy two days was this City of Conſtantinople ſtraightly beſieged by the Latines both by Sea and Land, without giving any time of reſt or repoſe day or night to the beſieged, freſh men coming ſtill on to the Aſſault, as the other fell off, and in ſuch ſort troubled the Greeks in the City, that they knew not well what to do, or which way to turn themſelves. The Venetians unto whom was committed the charge to aſſault that ſide of the City which was toward the Haven, upon two great Gallies made faſt together, built a ſtrong Tower of Wood, higher than the Walls and Rampiers of the Town, out of which they both with Shot and Fire-works much troubled the Defendants, wherewith they in the time of the aſſault approaching the Wall, by their fine devices fired that ſide of the City; by the rage whereof, a great number of Houſes were burnt, with many other ſtately Buildings and ancient Monuments of that famous City; and had at that preſent gained a great Tower near unto the Port, deſtitute of defenders, had not the Tyrant himſelf in good time come with new Supplies to the reſcue thereof. In like manner, the French, with the reſt, aſſayled the other ſide of the City by Land, where they were to fight not againſt the Defendants only, but againſt deep Ditches, high and ſtrong Walls, and Bulwarks alſo; nevertheleſs, ſuch was the Valour and Fury of the Latines, with the deſire of Victory; as that they were not with any difficulties to be diſmayed; but preſſing ſtill on, by a thouſand dangers, at length after a moſt ſharp Aſſault, they gained one of the greateſt Baſtilions on that ſide of the City, called the Angels Tower, and ſo by plain force opened a way both for themſelves and the reſt into the City: Whereof Alexius underſtanding, and ſtruck with preſent deſpair both of his State and Life, the night now coming on, fled with Euphroſina the Emperor Alexius his Wife, and Eudocia her Daughter, whom he had married when he had reigned about a month and ſixteen days.

The Tyrant, Author of all this miſchief, and of the calamities enſuing, thus fled, and the Latines furiouſly entring; the Prieſts and Religious Men in their Surplices, and other Eccleſiaſtick Ornaments with their Croſſes and Banners (as in ſolemn proceſſion) met the Latines, and falling down at the Souldiers Feet, with Floods of tears abundantly running down their heavy countenances, beſought them, but eſpecially the Captains and Commanders to remember the condition of wordly things, and contenting themſelves with the Victory, the Glory, the Honour, the Empire, the Immortality of their Name, to abſtain from Slaughter, from burning, from ſpoiling and ranſaking of ſo beautiful a City; and that ſeeing they were themſelves men, they would alſo have pity of men; and being themſelves Captains and Souldiers, they ſhould alſo have compaſſion upon Captains and Souldiers; who although they were not ſo valiant and fortunate as they were, yet nevertheleſs were both Captains and Souldiers; and that they would keep and preſerve their City, whereof (if they ruinated it not) they might have much more pleaſure and commodity, than if they ſhould deſtroy the ſame, which as it had been the principal ſeat of the Greek Empire, ſo might it now be of the Latines; That ſeeing they had thereof a careful regard, as then belonging to another man, they ought now upon better reaſon to have more care thereof, being their own: That the Authors of all theſe troubles and miſchiefs, Alexius the Elder, and Murzufle, had already received a reward anſwerable to their follies, in that they were driven into Exile; That they would have pity and compaſſion of an innocent and unfortunate Multitude of poor People, oppreſſed and grievouſly tormented with the often tyrannies of their murderous Lords and Governours; That in ſo doing, God the Lord of Hoſts, the giver and guider of Battels, the God of mercy, would therefore reward them. To conclude, they humbly beſought them to pardon their Citizens, to put on the hearts of gracious and merciful Lords and Fathers, not of Enemies and rough Maſters; of Forgivers, not of Revengers; and to underſtand by their Tears, their miſerable Eſtate and Woes paſſed. With this ſo humble a Submiſſion and Complaint of the Religious, ſome of the better ſort were happily moved; but with the common Souldiers, breathing nothing but Victory, with their Weapons in their Hands, and the Spoil of an Empire in their Power, what availed Prayers or Tears? Every man fell to the Spoil, and in ſo great choice and liberty of all things, fitted his own diſordred appetite, without reſpect of the wrong or injury done to others; only from the effuſion of innocent blood they abſtained; they whoſe lives they ſought after, being already fled, together with the Tyrant. Other injuries and outrages (ſo great as that greater none could be) were in every place ſo rife, that every Street, every Lane, every Corner of the City was filled with Mourning and Heavineſs. There might a man have ſeen Noble Men earſt of great Honour, and reverend for their hoary Hairs, with other Citizens of great Wealth, thruſt out of all they had, walking up and down the City weeping and wringing their hands, as men forlorn, knowing not where to ſhroud their Heads. Neither ſtayed the greedy rage of the inſolent Souldiers within the Walls of mens private Houſes, but brake out into the ſtately Palaces, Temples and Churches of the Greeks alſo, where all was good prize, and nothing dedicated to the Service of God, left unpolluted and defaced, no place unſought, nor corner unrifled; right lamentable and almoſt incredible it were to report all the miſeries of that time. Some of the Greek Hiſtoriographers, men of great mark and place, and themſelves Eye-witneſſes and Partakers of thoſe evils, have by their Writings complained to all Poſterity, of the inſolency of the Latines at the winning of the City, to their eternal diſhonour; but that diſordered Souldiers in all Ages in the liberty of their inſolent Victory, have done ſuch outrages, as honeſt minds abhor to think upon. Thus Conſtantinople the moſt famous City of the Eaſt, the ſeat and glory of the Greek Empire, by the miſerable ambition and diſſention of the Greeks for Sovereignty, fell into the Hands of the Latines, the twelfth of April, in the year 1204, or after the account of others, 1200.

Conſtantinople thus taken, and the Tyrants put to flight, the Princes and great Commanders of the Army held a Council, to conſider what were beſt to be done concerning the City and the new gained Empire; for after ſo great a Victory, they thought it not good to raſe ſo antient and important a City, ſeated as it were a Watch-Tower upon the Theatre of the World, overlooking both Aſia and Europe from the one to the other, as an eye of the Univerſal, and ſo commodiouſly planted, as was no other City of the World, for the keeping under of the Enemies of the Chriſtian Religion; but that it were much better to place there a Latine Governour, to eſtabliſh there the Latine Laws and Cuſtoms, and to unite the Greek Church as a Member unto the Church of Rome. In which conſultation, ſome were of opinion, not to have any more Emperors in Chriſtendom but one, and therefore to make choice of Philip the German Emperor, Author of this War, whoſe Wife Irene was the only Daughter and Heir of the late Emperor Iſaac Angelus, unto whom by all right the Inheritance of her Fathers Empire belonged. But the greater part, conſidering that the troubled affairs of Greece, in ſo great a change and newneſs of the Empire, had need of the perſonal preſence of a Prince, thought it better to make choice of one among themſelves, who there ſtill reſiant in that place, might at all times give aid unto the Latines in their ſacred Wars, taken in hand againſt the Infidels; which opinion as the better, was approved of them all.

The chief men in this Election of the new Emperor, were Baldwin Count of Flanders and Hainault, Henry his Brother, Lewis Count of Bloys, Simon de Montfort, John de Dammartin, Gualter de Brienne, Hugh Count of St. Paul, John Count of Brenne, Boniface Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, Stephen Count of Perch, and five Gentlemen of Venice; unto whom alſo were joyned two Biſhops of Syria, the one of Bethlem, the other of Ptolemais, who had oftentimes come to the Camp of the Latines, to ſtir them up for the taking in hand the ſacred War in Syria; with two Biſhops of France alſo, namely of Soiſſon and Troy in Champagne; and the Abbot of Lemely. Theſe great Lords and Prelates aſſembled into the Church of the holy Apoſtles, after they had there with great devotion craved of God to inſpire them with his Spirit for the choice of a good and juſt Prince fit for ſo great a charge; with one conſent made choice of Baldwin Count of Flanders and Haynault, for Emperor of Greece; a brave and valiant Prince, about two and thirty years old, who was afterward the ſixteenth day of May, in the year 1204. (or after the computation of others, in the year 1205.) in the great Temple of S. Sophia ſolemnly crowned by Thomas Maurocenus a Venetian, firſt Patriarch of the Latines in Conſtantinople. From which time the Greek Church in Conſtantinople began to receive the Rites and Ceremonies of the Latines, and to acknowledge the Supremacy of the Church of Rome.

The Greek Empire divided amongſt the Latines.

It was not long after that Conſtantinople was thus taken by the Latines, but that they dividing their Forces without any reſiſtance, took in the moſt part of the great Countries and Provinces on Europe ſide, belonging to the Greek Empire in the time of Iſaac Angelus the late Emperor; the fortune of the whole Empire, as it were following the fortune of the Imperial City. Which large Countries ſo gained from the Greeks, the Latines divided amongſt themſelves, as good prize taken from their Enemies. Unto Baldwin the Emperor and his Suceſſors in the Empire, was aſſigned the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, and the Country of Thracia, with a limited Soveraignty over all the reſt of the Provinces by the Latines already or afterwards to be gained. Unto the Venetians in this diviſion of the Empire, was allotted for their ſhare all the rich Iſlands of the Ægeum, and Ionian, with the famous Iſland of Candy alſo; which although it were before by the young Emperor Alexius in the beginning of theſe Wars, given unto the Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, yet in this diviſion of the Empire, it was taken from him (not without his good liking) and given to the Venetians, as for them more fit; inſtead and lieu whereof, the Marqueſs had the City of Theſſalonica with all the Kingdom of Theſſaly, and a great part of Peloponeſus aſſigned unto him, with the Royal Title of a King. Of the aforeſaid Iſlands (in number many and exceeding rich) the Venetians in the name of the State, fortified ſome few of the greateſt with convenient Garriſons, the reſt they left to be poſſeſſed and defended by the better ſort of the Citizens at their private coſt and charges; who according to their ability, took into their poſſeſſion, ſome one Iſland, ſome another, and ſome two or three, as they were able to ſet out their Gallies, one, two, or more, for the keeping of the ſame; over all which, the Seigniory nevertheleſs had a general care, ſtill keeping a Fleet with one of their Admirals at Sea; by whom they not only repreſſed the Genoa Pirates then buſie in thoſe Seas, but alſo took in certain ſtrong Towns in the Main upon the coaſt of Peloponeſus, namely Modon and Corone; all which they of long time after held as a part of their Seigniory. Some other particular places, yet parts of the Empire, were given unto particular men; as the Dukedom of Athens unto one Geffrey of Troy in Champaigne, a Frenchman, a valiant Captain, whom they alſo made Prince of Achaia; another Dukedom was alſo given to the Count of Bloys; as were divers other Countries and Towns alſo unto other more private men; who nevertheleſs were bound to hold the ſame of the Emperor, as of their Lord, and to pay him yearly a fourth part of the Revenue ariſing thereof, towards the maintenance of his State. Yea the Greeks themſelves in this ſhipwrack of their State and Empire, although they diſdained nothing more than the ſtrange Government of the Latines, yet could they not be perſwaded to joyn together in ſo common a calamity, but after their wonted manner ſought every man how to ſhare out ſomething for himſelf, without regard of the common good; one ſeized upon one ſtrong Town or City, and ſo likewiſe another; which for all that they held not long, driven thence for the moſt part by a greater power, either of the Latines, or of their own Countrymen.

The beginning of the Empire of Trapezond by the Comneni.

The man whom the diſcontented Greeks moſt looked after, was Theodorus Laſcaris, the Emperor Alexius Angelus his Son-in-Law; who at the taking of the City, fled to Adrianople, and afterward into Bythinia, where he was of the People, not of that Country only, but of others alſo farther off, joyfully received and honoured as their Emperor. So taking into his hands the Countries of Bythinia, Phrygia, Miſſia, Ionia, and Lydia, even from the windings of the famous River Mæander Southward, unto the Euxine Sea Northward; he with the general good liking of the People, took upon him the Eſtate of an Emperor, and ſo in the renowned City of Nice made the ſeat of his Empire. At the ſame time alſo David, and Alexius Comneni, the Nephews of the Tyrant Andronicus (ſometime Emperor of Conſtantinople) by his Son Manuel, poſſeſſing the more Eaſtern Countries of Pontus, Galatia, and Capadocia, erected unto themſelves another Empire in Trapezond, where their Poſterity of the honourable houſe of the Comneni reigned in great glory many years after, until their Empire, together with the Empire of Conſtantinople, was by the great Emperor of the Turks, Mahomet the Second, ſubverted and brought to nought, as ſhall afterward in due time and place be declared. Thus the Greek Empire expoſed (as it were) to the general Spoil, was no longer one, but many Empires; Baldwin reigning in Conſtantinople, the Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat in Theſſaly, Theodorus Laſcaris at Nice, Alexius Commenus in Trapezond, and the Venetians in the Iſlands, all in Royal Dignity. Beſides whom were many other leſſer Princes, which had here and there according to their ability ſeized upon ſome one or other part of the Empire, and there erected their Toparchies, reigning therein as petty Kings; as did Aldebrandinus in Attalia, Michael Angelus in Epirus, with divers others too long to rehearſe.

Hadrianople beſieged by the Emperor Baldwin.

Baldwin (as is aforeſaid) created Emperor of Conſtantinople, by the help of the Venetian Admiral Dandulus, and other great Commanders of the Army in ſhort time brought under his obeiſance all the Cities of Thracia, excepting the City of Adrianople, whereunto the better ſort of the diſcontented Greeks, together with Theodorus Laſcaris (diſdaining the Government of the Latines) were fled, as unto a moſt ſafe Sanctuary; which Baldwin knowing, and withal deſiring whilſt yet he had his Friends about him, to ſet his new Empire in ſome good ſtay, without farther delay came and laid hard Siege to the ſame. Now the Greeks generally evil entreated by the Latines, and grieved to be governed by them, were ſome of them fled into other their Neighbour Princes Countries, but eſpecially into Bulgaria, otherwiſe called Miſia, a large Kingdom lying betwixt the great Mountain Æmus and Danubius; by whoſe perſwaſion, John King of that Country, aided by the Scythians, (a fierce Northern People, but lately come into thoſe quarters) and by the fugitive Greeks themſelves, took upon him to relieve the beſieged City; and ſo with a great Army approaching the ſame, ſent before certain Troops of the Scythian Archers on horſeback, to fetch in ſuch booty of Horſes or Cattel as they ſhould find near unto the Emperors Camp; and withal commanded them, that being charged by the Imperials, they ſhould forthwith retire, ſo to draw them out of their Trenches, into the place where the King with the greateſt part of his Army lay covertly to intrap them. Which the Scythians (well acquainted with ſuch ſervice) ſo well performed under the leading of one Cozus their General, that having once or twice drawn their Enemies unto ſome light skirmiſhes, and ſo retyring, and ere long again with a greater number returning, they at length cunningly drew the Emperor with all his Army, in hope to do ſome great matter upon them, even as they wiſhed, into the place where the King with his Army lay in wait among the Woods and Mountains for them; where they, wearied and out of breath with the former purſuit, and now on every ſide beſet with freſh Enemies, were overthrown with a great ſlaughter. In which conflict to increaſe the loſs, Baldwin the Emperor himſelf was taken and ſent Priſoner in bonds to Ternoua; where afterwards by the commandment of the barbarous King he was moſt cruelly put to death, having his Hands and Feet cut off, and ſo diſmembred was caſt out into a deep Vally, where he yet lay miſerably breathing three days after, and ſo died; leaving his body as fortunes ſcorn, for a Prey unto the wild Beaſts and Birds of the Air, no Man vouchſafing to bury it. Thus periſhed this worthy Prince, for his Virtues commended even of the Greeks themſelves, being about the age of three and thirty years, and not having reigned yet a full year, in the year of our Lord 1206.

1206. The Victory thus gained, and the City relieved, the barbarous King with his ſavage Souldiers having taſted the wealth of the Latines overthrown in the late Battel, and the pleaſures of Thracia now ſubject to their Luſt; greedily purſued their good fortune, without reſpect of all humanity; the open Country they overran, ſpoyling whatſoever came to hand, the rich and famous Cities they rifled, and afterward raſed them down to the ground; namely Serræ, Philipolis, Apri, Rhedeſtum, Perinthus, Daonium, Arcadiopolis, Meſena, Zurulus, and Athyra; the Citizens and Country People fled into the Cities for refuge, they put all to the Sword, without reſpect of Age, Sex, or Condition, except ſome few, whom they carried away with them Priſoners; ſo that of all the Provinces of that rent and ruinated Empire, the Country of Thrace was moſt miſerable, as firſt ſpoyled by the Latines, and now laid deſolate by the Bulgarians and Scythians. Only ſome few of the ſtrongeſt Cities, as Didymotichum and Adrianople (valiantly defended by the Greeks and Latines) eſcaped this fury of the Barbarians, all the reſt that fell into their hands being laid waſt and deſolate.

Henry ſecond Emperor of the Latines in Conſtantinople.

In this ſo troubled a State of the new erected Empire of the Latines in Conſtantinople, the Latines made choice of Henry the late Emperor Baldwins Brother, as of all others the fitteſt to ſucceed him in the Empire; who aided by the Marqueſs, now King of Theſſaly, and the other Latine Princes, notably repulſed the Barbarians, and left them not until that at length he had recovered from them all ſuch Towns and Cities as they had before taken, and driven them quite out of the Country, and ſo well eſtabliſhed himſelf in his new Empire.

But to leave this diſmembred Empire, now in the hands of many, and to come nearer to our purpoſe; Alexius Angelus the Uſurper, driven out of the Imperial City by the Latines, to ſave himſelf fled into Theſſaly, and from thence unto Leo Scurus (then a man of great Fame among the Greeks) who tyranniſing at Nauplus, as had his Father before him, was in theſe troubleſome times grown greater, by ſurpriſing of the two famous Cities of Argos and Corinth; by whoſe means he cunningly entrapped Alexius Ducas, ſirnamed Murzufle, the Traitor, and for a ſecret grudg not commonly known, put out his Eyes; himſelf an exiled man, being a moſt heavy Enemy unto the other alſo exiled; and himſelf thruſt out of the Empire, a deadly Foe unto the other, oppreſſed with the like calamity. Shortly after which loſs of his Sight he was by chance taken by the Latines, and ſo brought back to Conſtantinople, where he was for murdring the young Emperor Alexius; worthily condemned unto a ſtrange and horrible kind of death; for, caſt off from an high Tower, and tumbling Heels over Head downward, he was with the weight of himſelf, and violence of the Fall, cruſhed all to pieces, and ſo miſerably died; a death too good for ſuch a Traitor. Not long after it fortuned alſo, that Alexius himſelf wandering up and down in Thracia, was by the Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, going againſt Scurus, taken and ſtript of his great Treaſure, and whatſoever elſe he had; and ſo ſent away naked, long time after in beggars Eſtate wandred about in Achaia and Peloponeſus, now far unlike that Alexius which ſometime proudly reigned in Conſtantinople; but ſuch is the aſſurance of evil gotten Honour. He hearing that Theodorus Laſcaris his Son-in-Law reigned in Aſia, and there held the State of an Emperor, rejoyced not thereat as a kind Father-in-Law, but inwardly grieved thereat as an Enemy, ſorry that any other but himſelf ſhould be honoured with the Title of the Greek Emperor; in which malicious humor he ſailing out of Greece into Aſia over the Ægeum, came ſecretly unto the Turks Sultan Jathatines his old acquaintance, then lying at Attalia, (which famous City he had not long before taken from the Chriſtians) unto whom he declared his heavy Eſtate, and how his Empire had been rent from him, as well by the Greeks as the Latines; requeſting, that by his means he might be reſtored again into ſome part thereof, eſpecially that in the leſſer Aſia, which was by Theodorus Laſcaris, together with the honour of the Greek Emperor, unjuſtly (as he ſaid) detained from him. This Jathatines, now Sultan of Iconium; was the younger Son of Sultan Aladin; who not long ſurviving his Brother Cai-Choſroe, left his Kingdom unto his two Sons Azadin and Jaſſadin, of the Greeks called Azatines and Jathatines; where long it was not, but that theſe two Brethren falling out for the Sovereignty, (which admitteth no Equality) Jathatines was by Azatines his Elder Brother driven into Exile, and for the ſafeguard of his life glad to flie unto this Alexius, then reigning at Conſtantinople, by whom he

he was honourably entertained, and as ſome write, converted and baptiſed. But Azatines the Sultan ſhortly after dying, this Jathatines returnning home again, and renouncing the Chriſtian Religion, was by the Turks received for their Sultan; of whom the Emperor Alexius in like extremity now craveth Aid. The Sultan not forgetful of his own Troubles before paſſed, or of the kindneſs he had received, and moved with the pitiful Complaint of his old Friend, together with his large Offers, beſides that he was in hope to ſhare out ſome good part of whatſoever he got, for himſelf; took him into his Protection, and forthwith ſent Embaſſadors to Laſcaris, threatning unto him all extremities, except he did forthwith give place unto Alexius his Father in law, unto whom, as unto the Greek Emperor, thoſe Countries which were by him poſſeſſed, of right (as he ſaid) appertained. With which unexpected Meſſage Theodorus was not a little troubled, as fearing both the Sultans Power, and the inclination of the people to their old Emperor. Nevertheleſs, having propounded the matter in Council, and finding the minds of his Subjects well affected towards him, and a readineſs in them in his quarrel to adventure their lives; he encouraged therewith, accompanied only with two thouſand choice Horſe-men, together with the Sultans Embaſſador, without farther ſtay ſet forward to Philadelphia; the Sultan at the ſame time with Alexius, (whom he carried with him as a bait to deceive the people withall) and twenty thouſand Turks, beſieging the City of Antioch, ſituate upon the winding banks of the River Meander. Which the Emperor Theodorus well underſtanding, and that the Sultan by gaining that ſtrong City (ſtanding upon the paſſage of the great River, the bounder of his Empire) ſhould open a fair way for himſelf into the heart of Romania Aſiatica, to the great hazard of his whole Empire, reſolved with thoſe few he had, to do what he might to relieve his City. And ſo ſetting forward upon the Spur, carrying nothing with him more than a little Victual; and now come near unto the City, ſent before the Sultans Embaſſor, following him at the heels. Who coming to the Sultan, and telling him of the Emperors approach with ſo ſmall a Power, could hardly perſwade him that it was ſo, although he bound it with many Oaths; yet at length perſwaded of the truth of the matter, and that indeed it was ſo, he in all haſt put his Army in the beſt Order he could upon ſuch a ſudden, but not to his beſt advantage, being hindred ſo to do by the ſtraitneſs of the place wherein he lay. Of the two thouſand ſelect Horſe-men in the Emperors Army, were eight hundred Italians, all moſt reſolute men, who giving the firſt charge, brake through the midſt of the Sultans Army, diſordering his whole battel as they went; after whom followed alſo the Greeks, though not with like courage; but thoſe Italian Horſe-men now divided from the reſt, and in number but few, in coming back again, were by the diſordered Turks, ſome on Horſeback, ſome on Foot, ſo beſet on every ſide, as that there was no way left for them to paſs, but there valiantly fighting, were altogether ſlain, having both before and at the time of their death made ſuch a ſlaughter of the Turks, as is hardly to be believed to have been poſſible for ſo few men to have made. The Greeks alſo hardly laid to by the Turks, and diſcouraged by the ſlaughter of the Latines, were even upon the point to have fled; when as the Sultan, now almoſt in poſſeſſion of a certain Victory, deſcrying the Greek Emperor, and truſting to his own great ſtrength, ſingled him out, being as ready as himſelf to meet him; when as at the firſt encounter, the Sultan with his Horſemans Mace gave him ſuch a blow upon his head, as might have killed a Bull, ſo that the Emperor therewith aſtonied, fell down from his Horſe; who yet even in the fall coming ſomething again unto himſelf, and although diſmounted, yet quickly recovering his feet, with his Faulchion hoxed the hinder legs of the Mare whereon the Sultan rid, being a moſt beautiful Beaſt, and of a wonderful height; which now ſuddenly faultring under him, and ſo the Sultan tumbling down as from an high Tower, before he could recover himſelf, had his head cut off by the Emperor; which by and by put upon a Launce, and ſo holden up, with the ſight thereof ſo diſmayed the Turks, that ſtrucken with a ſudden fear, they preſently fled, leaving the Victory unto the Emperor, before more than half overcome; who for all that, conſidering his ſmall number, durſt no further purſue them, but entring the City, gave thanks to God for ſo great a Victory. Unto whom the Turks ſhortly after ſent their Embaſſadors, and ſo upon ſuch reaſonable conditions as it pleaſed him to ſet down, concluded with him a Peace. Alexius himſelf Author of theſe Troubles, taken in this battel and carried to Nice, was by the Emperor his Son in law, notwithſtanding his evil deſerts, well intreated and uſed.

John Brenne by Innocentius the Pope appointed King of Jeruſalem.

Whilſt the Latines thus ſpend thoſe Forces in ſubverting of the Greek Empire, which ſhould have been imployed for the Relief of the Chriſtians in Syria, and that the Greek Emperor Laſcaris was thus troubled with the Turks, the Affairs of the Chriſtians in Syria and the Holy Land grew ſtill worſe and worſe. Whereof the Knights Hoſpitalers and Templars (the chief Champions of the Chriſtian Religion in thoſe Countries) greatly blamed Almericus the King of Cyprus, for that he being ſo near at hand, and having married Iſabella the Heir of that Kingdom, and ſo in her Right taken upon him the Title of the King of Jeruſalem, gave himſelf wholly to pleaſure, doing nothing for the Defence or Relief of the poor diſtreſſed Chriſtians, or repreſſing of the Turks; who although they were yet in League with the Chriſtians there, and at ſome diſcord alſo among themſelves, yet ſpared not as occaſion ſerved, ſtill more and more to encroach upon them, and by building of new Caſtles and Fortreſſes to cut them ſhort. Of all which things, the aforeſaid Knights by their Embaſſadors certified Pope Innocentius, requeſting his fatherly care for the remedy thereof; certifying him withall, that there was yet living one Mary, the Daughter of the Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat, a Lady of rare beauty, whom they as her Tutors had brought up in hope of the Kingdom, and now were ready to beſtow her upon ſome ſuch man as he ſhould think worthy of her, together with the right ſhe had unto the Kingdom. Hereupon Innocentius diſcharging Almericus of the Title of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, gave it to John Count de Brenne of Daulphine in France, a man of great fame and valour, then in Arms with the other Latine Princes againſt the Greeks. Who now returning home, commended his Earldom to his Brother, and with ſuch Power as he was able to make, ſetting forward, came firſt to Venice, where he was royally entertained; and from thence ſailing to Conſtantinople, was with like Honour received by the Emperor Henry, and ſo at length the fifth of September arrived at Ptolemais in Syria, where he was with the great rejoycing and applauſe of the people received as their King: And the laſt of the ſame month marrying the aforeſaid Lady Mary at Tyre, was there together with her with with a great Solemnity Crowned King, in the year, 1209. Which Almericus the old King of Cyprus hearing, ſhortly after died for grief. Neither wanted this noble Gentleman, thus honoured with the Title of a Kingdom, ſome that envied at his Promotion, and therefore commonly called him in deriſion, a King, but ſtill with this addition, Sans Ville, that is to ſay, Without a Town.

Now was the ten years Peace, before taken betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians in Syria, at the coming over of Simon Marqueſs of Mont-Ferrat (as is before declared) almoſt expired; which had not ſo much given to thoſe poor remnants of the Chriſtians ſome time of reſt and breathing, as had the diſcord of the Turks among themſelves; which having for the ſpace of nine years continued betwixt Noradin and Saphadin for the Soveraignty, was now by the death of Saphadin ended. Noradin contenting himſelf with the Government of Aleppo, and Corradin and Meledin the two Sons of Saphadin, dividing their Fathers Kingdom betwixt them, the one taking unto himſelf Damaſco and Syria, and the other the great Kingdom of Egypt, but all Enemies unto the Chriſtians.

About this time alſo, or not long after, Innocentius tertius yet Pope, ſummoned a general Council at Lateran, whereunto, beſides a multitude of great Biſhops, and other reverend Prelates, repaired alſo the honourable Embaſſadors of moſt of the Princes of Chriſtendom; unto whom ſo aſſembled, among other things was propounded the dangerous eſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, and how the ſame was by the help of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt to be relieved. Whereunto all the Fathers and Princes there aſſembled eaſily gave their conſent; and thereupon were ſome appointed in every Country and Province, to publiſh this Decree of the Council, for the Relief of the oppreſſed Chriſtians, and to ſtir up the devout people for the undertaking of ſo religious a War. The chief Furtherers of this ſacred Expedition, to be thus taken in hand againſt the Infidels, were the Biſhops of Germany, eſpecially the three great Biſhops of Mets, Cullen, and Triers, whoſe example moved alſo many others, all which to rehearſe were tedious. Out of France alſo were ſent Henry the Count of Nivers, and one Gualter the Kings great Chamberlain, with a great number of the gallant Youths of France, and ſo out of divers other places; ſo that at length ſuch a number of men were met together at divers Ports of the Adriatick, as made up a Fleet of two hundred Sail; which with a proſperous Wind carried over into Syria, arrived in ſafety at Ptolemais the chief City of the Chriſtians, now that Jeruſalem was loſt. After whom followed alſo Andrew King of Hungary, long before bound both by his Fathers commandment and his own promiſe, for the undertaking of that ſacred Expedition; with whom came alſo Lewis Duke of Bavaria, and Leopold Duke of Auſtria, with their Forces all well appointed; unto whom alſo John King of Jeruſalem joyned himſelf with his Power. Great hope and expectation there was for ſome great matter to have been done, now that ſo great Forces of the Chriſtians were thus met together. Who ſetting forward from Ptolemais, and the firſt day marching into Galilee, by the way met with certain Companies of the Turks, whom they eaſily overthrew and put to flight. The next day they came to the River of Jordan, where they alſo diſtreſſed certain of the Turks Garriſons. There the King of Hungary bathing himſelf in the River, forthwith (as one diſcharged of his Vow and Promiſe) returned with all his Power unto Ptolemais, and ſo from thence back again into his Country, all the reſt of the Army of the Chriſtians crying out to him to the contrary; who after the Kings departure ſtill marching on, came to the Mount Thabor. But ſhortly after, Winter now coming on, and many of their Cattel dying for cold and want of meat, they returned ſome to Ptolemais, ſome to Tyre, and there wintred. King John and the Duke of Auſtria in the mean time took a Caſtle betwixt Cæſarea and Caipha, called The Caſtle of Pilgrims, from whence they much troubled the Barbarians thereabouts all that Winter. Upon the appearance of the Spring, and the Army again met together, it was thought beſt by all the great Commanders, that for ſo much as the Kingdom of Egypt was the chief Maintenance of the Mahometan Superſtition, againſt the Chriſtians in thoſe parts, and that ſo long as it ſtood upright, they ſhould not be able to do any great matter in Syria, to attempt the Conqueſt thereof, as an exploit beſt beſeeming their Valour, and ſo great preparation; for that Kingdom being once ſubdued, the City of Jeruſalem, with all the Land of Paleſtine, would of themſelves without more ado ſtraightway yield unto them. And for as much as the famous City of Damiata, called in ancient time Peluſium, not much inferior unto Alexandria, was the firſt and moſt commodious Port for that purpoſe, as neareſt unto Syria; and that by the taking thereof they ſhould have a fair entrance into the great River Nilus, with the command of a moſt rich and pleaſant Country about it. They reſolved there to begin the War; and thereupon embarking themſelves with all things neceſſary for ſo great an Enterpriſe at Ptolemais, and carried with a fair Wind, they in ſhort time arrived at the deſired Port. Now that rich and ancient City, the Key of that ſide of the Kingdom, ſtood about a mile from the Sea, and ſomewhat diſtant alſo from the great River, environed with a Navigable Ditch or Cut, drawn out of Nile, in manner of an Iſland, as a man cometh from Syria by Land; and compaſſed about with three ſtrong ſtone Walls, the work of the good Emperor Ælius Pertinax, and of him (as ſome affirm) called alſo Æliopolis. At the mouth of this Cut, as you ſhould enter into the City, ſtood a ſtrong Watch-Tower for the defence thereof, and round about it a number of fair Houſes, in manner of a pretty Town entrenched. Beſides that, for the more ſafety thereof, the ſame Cut was barred with a great ſtrong iron Chain, in ſuch ſort, as that it was not poſſible for any Ship, without breaking of the ſame to enter. The Chriſtians with their Fleet entring the mouth of the River, and coming to this Cut, by great ſtrength brake the Chain; but thinking ſo to have made their paſſage unto the City, they found a greater ſtay at the Watch-Tower, which ſtrongly built of ſquare Stone, and well ſtored with War-like Engins of all ſorts, and a good Garriſon of valiant Souldiers, ſtayed their further paſſage, overwhelming them as they approached, with ſhot, fire, ſtones, timber, and ſuch like, before provided for that purpoſe.

The ſituation of Damiata in Egypt.

The Chriſtians (after the manner of the fight of that time) had upon certain flat Veſſels built certain high Towers of Wood for the aſſailing of the Watch-Tower; in the approaching whereof, they were not only troubled with the Enemy, but with the tumult and ſtir of their own people alſo; ſome crying that they ſhould yet draw nearer unto the Tower; otherſome crying out as faſt, to have the Bridges caſt out, thereby to enter; and the Enemy likewiſe with much clamour encouraging one another for the repulſing of the Chriſtians. So the Souldiers hindred the Mariners to do their buſineſs, and the Mariners the Souldiers. In the midſt of this hurly-burly and tumult, one of the wooden Towers ſurmounting the reſt in height, overcharged with the preſs of men, fell, and in falling made ſuch a noiſe, as if Heaven it ſelf had fallen; where in a moment (as it were) was preſently to be ſeen a moſt heavy Spectacle; many overwhelmed with the falling of the Tower, lay there cruſhed to death; ſome grievouſly hurt, and yet not dead, lay oppreſſed with the timber, crying out for help; others bruiſed or hurt, but not overwhelmed, for fear of further harm, leapt ſome into the Nile, ſome aboard the other Ships near by, ſome crying out of his Arm, ſome of his Leg, ſome of his Head or other part of his body, to the great diſcomfiture of the reſt, in ſo much that the Aſſault was for that time given over.

King John (as well for his Valour, as for the Title of the King of Jeruſalem, choſen General of the Army) after he had appeaſed this tumult, and given the charge of them that were maimed or hurt, unto skilful Surgeons, and buried the bodies of ſuch as were found drowned or overwhelmed; with chearful Speech encouraged the reſt of his Souldiers, perſwading them not to be diſcouraged with the accident of the fall of a Tower, which was neither to be imputed to their Cowardiſe, or the Valour of the Enemy, but only to the chance of War.

In the mean time Meledin the Egyptian Sultan, had with a great Army encamped himſelf within the ſight of Damiata, thereby to encourage the beſieged, and to fill them with hope of relief; ſending them oftentimes by the River, News, Meſſages, Victuals, Souldiers, Armor, and whatſoever elſe they wanted. The chief cauſe of his ſtaying there, was to take occaſion for the ſurpriſing of the Chriſtians, if any ſhould be offered, either by chance, or their own negligence. Every day ſome skirmiſh or other paſſed betwixt our men and the Barbarians, ours ſtill carrying away the Victory; yet could theſe Barbarians neither be drawn forth to battel, neither could our men keep them from Victuals, for as much as they had the River of Nile at command, whereby Victuals were out of the upper part of Egypt in great abundance conveyed into the Sultans Camp; whereas on the contrary part, the ſame River dividing it ſelf into many Arms, in ſome places here and there overflowing, in another cut into many Ditches and Channels, and in ſome other pent up by Walls and Cauſies, gave unto our men a thouſand diſpleaſures. And therefore ſeeing that the Sultan would neither give nor accept of battel, they reſolved again to lay ſiege to the Tower. Wherefore having with great cunning, upon two Ships made faſt together, framed a Tower of moſt ſtrong Timber, equal in height unto the Watch-Tower, they brought the ſame near unto the Turks Tower, and the Suburbs adjoyning thereunto, after which followed alſo the reſt of the Fleet well appointed for the Aſſault. At which time all the reſt of the Army at Land ſtood in battel ready ranged, as well to diſcourage them of the Town, as that the Sultan ſhould not be able to help them without the hazarding of battel. There began a fierce and cruel Aſſault; they of the Suburbs right valiantly defending themſelves againſt their Enemies. Within theſe Suburbs, the Tower, and the Trenches, dwelt not only Egyptians, (the natural Inhabitants of the Country) but alſo Arabians, Perſians, Syrians, Indians, Moors, and Æthiopians, who were there reſiant; for that, that City was a publique Mart whereunto all kind of Merchandiſes were brought from far out of the remoteſt parts of the World, and ſo from thence in like manner tranſported alſo; which encouraged them the more to fight for the defence of their Lives and Goods, the two things which men hold moſt dear; and in like ſort animated our men unto the Aſſault, as well in the quarrel of the Chriſtian Religion, as to inrich themſelves with the ſpoil of thoſe rich Nations. The Chriſtians with their Ships drew as near as poſſibly they could unto the Land, to the intent that upon the bank of the River they might come to fight hand to hand, and man to man, and ſo come cloſe unto their Enemies. But the Barbarians on the other ſide fought by ſhot and all other means they could, to keep them further off, and ſo from landing.

A deſperate act of a Chriſtian.

That which moſt feared the Egyptians, was, that as one of our Ships by chance ran aground upon that ſide of the River where the Enemy lay, and being boarded by the Enemy, thronging in as faſt as he could, and there making a cruel ſlaughter, one of the Chriſtian Souldiers going down under the Hatches, made there a great hole, whereby the water abundantly coming in, ſunk the Ship before the Enemy was aware, and ſo drowned a great number of the Egyptians together with the Chriſtians. At which time alſo the high Tower built upon the two Ships, joyning now cloſe unto the Watch-Tower, and mating the ſame, diſmayed the Defendants with the ſtrangeneſs thereof, as with a Miracle, in ſuch ſort, that they ſtrucken with a great fear, as now being to fight with a ſtrange, hardy, and cruel kind of men, without any great reſiſtance forſook the Tower and fled. The Watch-Tower thus taken, and they that ſhould have defended the ſame, ſome ſlain, and ſome fled; they in the Suburbs diſcouraged, and flying away, were many of them wounded from above, out of the Watch-Tower but now gained by the Chriſtians. At which time alſo the other Ships landed the Souldiers, who entring the Suburbs, put all they found there to the Sword, even unto the laſt man. There was found great abundance of Victuals, but far greater ſtore of Riches, in ſo much that it ſeemed to have been the ſpoil of Arabia, Perſia, and the rich Indies.

Damiata in vain aſſaulted.

Now yet remained the ſtrong Town of Damiata, which was forthwith aſſaulted by the Chriſtians, more to prove if in that heat and ſudden fear it would be yielded, than for any hope they had by force to win it. But having done what they could both by ſcaling, and by other Engins, they gained nothing but hard blows and wounds, and ſo retired. Nevertheleſs they lodged themſelves in the Suburbs, and laid a great part of the Army betwixt the Sultan and the beſieged City, to the intent that no ſupply of Victuals ſhould be brought unto it; yet both the Enemy oftentimes attempted to have entred the City, and the beſieged to have ſallied out, but both the one and the other were letted to do what they would have done, and that not without the great loſs of their men; for why, the Town was now on every ſide ſo incloſed by the Chriſtians, as that no man could enter in or out thereof. Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the Siege, it fortuned that the River of Nile ſwelling with a great Eaſtern Wind, riſe above the banks, and ſo overflowed the places wherein the Chriſtians lay, that they could keep nothing dry, and that moſt part of their Victuals were therewith ſpoiled. With which unſeaſonable riſing of the River, the Chriſtians not a little troubled, by commandment of Pelagius the Popes Legate, gave themſelves to faſting and prayer by the ſpace of three days. But the Wind falling the fourth day, and the River again decreaſing, they gave themſelves more earneſtly to prayer than before, thanking the Almighty, that as he had put them in a great fear, ſo he had in mercy again comforted them.

A fair Offer evilly refuſed.

Now with long lying began Victuals to grow ſcant in the Sultans Camp, ſo that he was glad to ſend away half of his Army up again into the Country of Caire. At which time alſo it chanced (as if it had been in an extream and common danger of the Mahometan Superſtition) that Embaſſadors ſent from Corradin Sultan of Damaſco and Jeruſalem, unto the Princes of the Chriſtian Army, came to ſue for Peace, both for Himſelf and his Brother the Egyptian Sultan; promiſing in regard thereof again to reſtore unto them the Holy Croſs, and whatſoever elſe himſelf, his Father, or Sultan Saladin had before taken from them; of which their Offer, moſt part of the Army liked well, ſaying, That they had therefore taken up Arms for the recovery of that which had been before gotten, and gained by the Valour of the worthy Chriſtian Captains, and had of late been taken from them; and to blot out the Ignominy of the loſs thereof, to the end it ſhould not be ſaid, that they could not leave whole and entire unto their Children, what their Fathers had got, when they had the keeping thereof; neither having loſt it, be able again to recover it; that all theſe things being reſtored, there reſted not any further occaſion of War, or let to ſtay them as moſt victorious Conquerors to return home. Nevertheleſs Pelagius, Pope Honorius his Legate (for Innocentius in the preparation of the Wars was before dead at Peluſium) with King John, the Maſters of the Knights Hoſpitalers and Templars, the Duke of Auſtria, and the Germans, were of opinion to the contrary; alledging, That this Sacred War was undertaken generally againſt the Infidels, and for Religions ſake againſt the Mahometan Superſtition, whereof the Kingdom of Egypt was the chief Seat and ſtay; and that therefore they ought eſpecially to impugn that. Which perſwaſion, together with the Authority of the Perſwaders, ſo prevailed, that the Sultans large Offers were rejected, and ſo the Embaſſadors diſpatched without any thing obtained of that they came for. Whereupon Corradin fearing that the Chriſtians would at length come to Jeruſalem, as the place they moſt deſired; and doubting how he ſhould be able to defend the ſame, forthwith raſed the Walls thereof, and the more to deface it, overthrew and pluckt down moſt of the goodly Houſes, and other ſtately Buildings therein, ſparing yet the Tower of David, and the holy Sepulchre; which he is ſaid to have done at the humble Requeſt and Interceſſion of the Chriſtians of divers Countries, which yet dwelt there mixt with the Turks and Saraſins.

Succours ſent unto the beſieged.

Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the Siege of Damiata, the Plague began to rage in the Camp, whereof ſo many died, that it began to repent the great Commanders of the Army that they had ſo much hearkned to the perſwaſion of the Legate (a man making no profeſſion of Arms) rather than to the ſound Advice of others, who by long experience taught the ſudden alteration of matters of War, would willingly have accepted of the Sultans large Offers; ſo began Pelagius the Legate to be generally evil ſpoken of. There were now already ſix months paſt ſince the beginning of the Siege, and the Sultan lying in ſight had not with him ſo great an Army as before, but only the flower and choice of his people, having (as we have before ſaid) for want of Victuals ſent away the reſt up again into the Country; now it fortuned that the Chriſtians, as men weary of the long Siege, ſtood not ſo carefully upon their Guard, with Watch and Ward, as before, but gave themſelves more to eaſe; which the Sultan perceiving, drew nearer to the Town, in hope under the covert of the ſilent night, to ſend new Supplies unto the beſieged; which Companies by him appointed for that Service, couragiouſly ſet forward, in hope to have deceived the Chriſtian Sentinels, and ſo indeed came near unto the Town unſeen or diſcovered; and now the foremoſt of thoſe Companies were already entred the Town; when the Chriſtians perceiving them, and raiſing an Alarm, put themſelves in Arms, and ſo furiouſly aſſailed the hindermoſt of them, and in ſuch ſort, that they which were before within, and thoſe that were but now entred, fearing leſt the Enemy in that hurly burly ſhould pell mell enter in with the reſt, ſhut them out of the Gates, expoſed to the butchery, where all were preſently cut in pieces.

The Chriſtians encouraged with this Victory, the next day leaving a great part of the Army before the Town to continue the Siege, preſented themſelves before the Sultans Camp to give him battel; who for all that well conſidering that the loſs of a battel might endanger the whole State of his Kingdom, would by no means be drawn out of his Trenches, but lay ſtill; wherewith the Chriſtians, eſpecially the French-men (in the firſt charge naturally furious) greatly encouraged, attempted to have forcibly entred their Rampiers, but not with ſucceſs anſwerable to their courage. For the Egyptians perceiving the ſmall number of their Enemies, notably repulſed them, and in fine inforced them to retire, having loſt Gualter, one of their chief Commanders, with divers others; yea King John in aſſailing the Camp, loſt many of his men, and grievouſly burnt in his face, hardly eſcaping himſelf with life. After which diſcomfiture, they reſolved, not to think of any thing elſe but of the Siege, and above all things to provide that no Succours ſhould be brought into the Town. They in the City more ſtraitly beſet and beſieged than before, and now brought unto extream neceſſity and famine, and out of all hope of Relief, aſſembled themſelves to conſult of their Affairs, and what were beſt for them to do in ſo dangerous a ſtate; ſome one or other of them by night or otherwiſe ſecretly flying into the Camp. And that more was, the City had undoubtedly been yielded by the greater part, had not the chief Commanders within mured up the Gates, and commanded that none of the Inhabitants upon pain of death ſhould come upon the Walls or Rampiers, to the intent they ſhould not get out, or caſt themſelves from above the Walls into the Ditches. The chief Commanders and Captains went here and there up and down the City, to ſearch and view all things, eſpecially the ſhops and ſtore-houſes, where finding ſmall ſtore of Wheat, they divided it in ſmall portions among themſelves; the common people enforced with want, eat whatſoever came to hand, were it lawful or unlawful, or forbidden by their Superſtition, wholſome or unwholſome, good or bad, ſalt or freſh, roaſted or raw; and ſo prolonged their lives with ſuch things as they could find. Now the beſieged, not able to indure theſe extremities of the Famine (being the paſſion that moſt grievouſly and often troubleth Mankind) they were alſo attached with the Wrath of God; for the Plague (the fury whereof had before attainted the Camp of the Chriſtians, and afterward quite ceaſed) was now got into the City, where it made a great Slaughter; which mortality day by day in ſuch ſort increaſed, that men were not only now no more to be found, to viſit, comfort, ſuccor, ſerve and help the Sick; but were wanting alſo to bury them, to draw them out of their Beds and Houſes, and to ſeparate the Living from the Dead; the Streets and Houſes full of dead Bodies, gave forth a moſt horrible ſtink, with a moſt grievous and infectious Air; there was not any place clear from the Plague, or any man that could boaſt he had not been attainted therewith, or the fear thereof; and remedy there was none. The rage and fury of theſe two Devourers, the Famine, and Plague, devoured them without number, chooſing rather ſo to die, than to ſubmit themſelves to their Enemies; or to humble themſelves ſo low, as to crave their Favour. That they within were thus pinched with Famine, the Chriſtians knew; but that the Plague ſo raged amongſt them, they knew not. Now the Chriſtians had of purpoſe caſt up certain Trenches and Baricadoes, for the keeping in of ſuch as the Famine ſhould enforce to come out of the Town; thinking that the beſieged, to eaſe their wants, would thruſt the baſer ſort of the people and unprofitable mouths out of the City; unto whom the Chriſtians meant not to give any paſſage; for they having long before ſo ſtraightly environed the City, as that no relief could be brought unto it, lay now ſtill expecting when the beſieged, enforc'd by neceſſity, ſhould yield themſelves; and ſo without loſs of any man, to become Maſters of ſo ſtrong and rich a Town. It was now more than a year that the Chriſtians had thus lien at the Siege of Damiata, when as certain of the Souldiers upon a bravery adventured with a few ſcaling Ladders to mount the Wall; in which doing, finding no reſiſtance, and withall hearing ſo great ſilence, as if there had been no body within the City, they ſtood ſtill a great while hearkening, but ſeeing that dumb ſilence ſtill to continue, they returned unto the Camp, giving the Captains to underſtand how the matter ſtood; who at the firſt thought it to be ſome policy and fineneſs of the deceitful Enemy; yet afterward they thought it good to adventure certain men, to prove their fortune, and to cauſe certain companies well appointed to ſcale one of the Bulwarks of the City, in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould have gon againſt a puiſſant Enemy, that had had the power to reſiſt them. And hereupon were ſcaling Ladders brought forth, and all things made ready, as for a great Aſſault. So the Chriſtians couragiouſly mounting the Ladders, without reſiſtance took the Bulwak. But as they were entring farther into the Town, a ſmall Company of the Turks and Barbarians (all the Souldiers that the Fury of the Plague had left, and they alſo with the Famine and Infection of the Air very weak and feeble) met them, and began to make ſome ſmall reſiſtance, but to no purpoſe, being forthwith all cut in pieces. Which done, the matter wherewith the Gates of the City were mured, was preſently removed, the Gates ſet open, and the Chriſtians with Enſigns diſplaied let in. But even at the very entring in at the Gates, they were attainted with a moſt grievous and horrible ſtink, they ſaw a fair City diſpeopled, and that which was moſt fearful to behold, the Streets covered with bodies of the dead, and ſuch a dreadful deſolation, as might move even the Enemy himſelf to compaſſion. The Chriſtians were entred, as men appointed to have done a great execution, and to have made the Channels run with blood, as men juſtly provoked with the long Siege, and the pains they had endured; they had their Swords and Weapons in their Hands, but found none againſt whom to uſe them; for a man could not enter into any Houſe, or go into any Street, but he muſt paſs over the dead, or others, which being not yet altogether dead, were miſerably drawing toward their end. Of ſeventy thouſand perſons in the City, were not found above three thouſand alive, and thoſe for the moſt part yet young Children; for all the reſt were dead, taken away either with the Sword, Famine or the Plague; the greateſt part whereof lay yet ſtinking above the ground unburied. Theſe three thouſand that were left, were ſo maigre and poor, that pity it was to behold them; unto whom their lives were granted upon condition that they would make clean the City, and bury the dead, which they were three months in doing.

1221.

Thus was Damiata taken by the Chriſtians the fifth day of November, in the year 1221, after it had been more than a year by them beſieged. The Spoil there taken was great, for beſides the rich Merchandize brought thither from far, was found great ſtore of Gold, Silver, and precious Stones. The Chriſtians thus enriched, and the City made clean, ſtaied there more than a year after, as in a Colony wherein they had been willing to dwell, forgetful of their own Country. In the beginning of theſe Wars, the Princes of the Army had with one conſent agreed, That whatſoever City or Territory ſhould by them be taken from the Turks or Infidels, ſhould be given unto the King of Jeruſalem, whom after the departure of the King of Hungary, they had made General of the whole Army. But now that the City was taken, Pelagius the Legate, pretending, That by the vertue of his Legation, it belonged unto him to diſpoſe of all things taken in that ſacred War, (as a man not unmindful of his Maſter) adjudged the City from thenceforth to belong unto the See of Rome. With which indignity and wrong, the King inwardly diſcontented, (and yet for the Authority of the Legate, diſſembling the matter) withdrew himſelf, and ſo retired to Ptolemais.

The year following, Pelagius weary to ſee the Arms of the Chriſtians to corrupt with ruſt, and nothing doing, conſidering the deſire and hope he had utterly to have ruinated the Infidels, together with their Superſtition, commanded, That every man ſhould again take up Arms for the proſecuting of this War againſt the Sultan, and the beſieging of Caire. But for all that, when he had commanded what he would, or could, the Souldiers little regarding his command with one voice cryed out, that they would not be commanded by any, but by the King of Jeruſalem only. So that the Legate, enforced by the Souldiers, was glad to ſend unto the King, to requeſt him again to return to Damiata, and to take upon him the charge for the managing of that War, taken in hand for the defence of the Chriſtian Religion; who for all that excuſed himſelf from ſo doing, one while by his own particular Affairs, another while by his own indiſpoſition; yet in fine, preſſed and overcome with the prayers and requeſts of the other Latine Princes, he returned to Damiata, at the ſelf ſame time, that the Duke of Bavaria arrived there with a goodly company of brave men, brought thither out of his own Country, after he had been now from thence ten months abſent.

Pelagius *the Legate perſwadeth the Princes of the Chriſtian Army to proceed for the conqueſt of E*gypt.

The Legate deſirous of the proſecution of this War, requeſted and urged the King, with the reſt of the Princes and great Commanders, without delay to take the Field, telling them, that the Enterpriſe of the holy War was grown old, and cold, by thoſe long delaies and protracting of the time; and that they which kept Wars ſo far from home, ought to make haſt to force the Enemy, to take all occaſions, to loſe no time, but ever to be doing, and to prove all things for the annoying of the Enemy; and that that was the way, whereby the Worthies of ancient times, both Kings and Emperors, had gained unto themſelves Empires, Glory, Greatneſs, and Wealth; That it was for them that were invaded and aſſailed, upon whoſe lives depended the ſafety of their Country, their Wives, their Children, and Goods, to delay and prolong the time as they might to delude the Enemy, to fruſtrate his deſigns, to defeat his Attempts, and with delaies to dally him off, until that having thereby weakned his Forces, he ſhould together with his courage loſe alſo his hope; Caire (he ſaid) to be indeed a great City, but yet that the grateſt Cities that ever were, had by the Wars become great Deſarts, forced by the power of their puiſſant and ſpeedy Enemies; and that great Empires, as were thoſe of the Sultans,ought not to be invaded or aſſailed by any forreign force, if they were not at the firſt onſet, overthrown, or at leaſt ſo weakned, as that they could not afterwards lift up their Heads or recover themſelves; for otherwiſe, that they which had prepared a deſtruction for others, ſhould fall into the ſame themſelves; That it behooved either not to have attempted or aſſailed Egypt at all; or elſe now, after it had been once aſſailed, not ſo to give it over before it were conquered. The King of Jeruſalem,whether it were that he were pricked with the grief, that being called the King of the Holy Land, he could not have the City of Damiata (under the leading and conduct won by the Chriſtians come to the ſacred War) given unto him by the Legate; or that he had before proved that the higher Country of Egypt was not without great and manifeſt danger to be attempted; ſaid, that he would not in any caſe go; alleadging that honourable and ſacred War to have been taken in hand, only for the recovery of the Holy Land, and not for the winning of Memphis, Babylon, or Thebes in Egypt; which after they were taken, would not for any long time continue in their Fidelity or Allegeance, and could not poſſibly be kept by force; whereas Syria, by Godfrey Duke of Bulloin and the other great Princes his Aſſociates, entred into, conquered and poſſeſſed; and ſince his time, by divers other Chriſtian Kings and Princes holden, was in right their own; and that therefore he greatly commended the forwardneſs, the diligence, the courage, the deſire, and whatſoever thing elſe Pelagius commended; but that he ought to employ the ſame in Syria, and not there where no need was, or from whence no profit was to be drawn or expected. Nevertheleſs the Legate wedded to his own opinion, by the power of his Authority, commanded the King of Jeruſalem, the Duke of Bavaria, with the reſt of the great Commanders and Captains, to take up their Arms, to get them into the Field upon the Expedition by him appointed againſt the Sultan; threatning the pain of the high ſentence of Excommunication againſt him or them, that would ſhew themſelves backward or unwilling to do what he had commanded. So as it were enforced by the Legate, they began with evil Will and worſe Speed, to ſet forward in Auguſt, in the very hotteſt time of the year. At which time the Sultan beholding the great Army of the Chriſtians, in number about ſeventy thouſand, retired as a man afraid, into ſuch places as he thought beſt, farther off; which the Legate ſeeing (as one not acquainted with the feats of War) rejoyced greatly, as if the Victory had been already more than half gained; commending to the Heavens them that he ſaw couragiouſly marching forward,ſaying, That fortune always favoured the Valiant, and that unto Cowards all things fell ſtill out to the worſt. By the way the Chriſtians ſeized upon a Bridge, which the Enemy had made over the Nile, and cut in pieces ſuch Companies as were left for the keeping thereof; ſo marching on they drew neer unto Caire, and there in the ſight of that great and rich City encamped; where running up and down, the more to terrifie them of the City, provoked them to Battel, upbraiding unto them their Lazineſs, their Cowardiſe and Sloth, braving them, (if they were men) to come out; Yet for all that they would not ſo do, but keeping themſelves cloſe and covert within the City, let them alone to brag and boaſt at their own pleaſure. This Siege continued long, of purpoſe protracted ſtill from day to day by them of the City; and the great opinion the Chriſtians had of their own valour, with the ſmall regard they had of their Enemies, made them ſo proud and careleſs, that they remembred no more to take good care of the War, of their Duty, their Watch, or their Sentinels; their confidence was in their own Valour and good Fortune, not conſidering or remembring that they were come into Egypt, and that they had put themſelves within the Trenches, Sallies, Channels and Cuts of a deceitful River, which not only brought Victuals unto their Enemies, but alſo fortified them; who by how much they were the leſs valiant, and leſs underſtood of the Art of War, the more they uſed of Craft and Subtilty for the preſerving of themſelves; ſo the crafty Enemies drew the Chriſtians out at length,abuſing them with many delaies and deceits; making ſemblance of great Fear, to make themſelves the leſs to be feared; and more contemptible in their doings, to the end that they knowing the Paſſages and Straights of the Country, and reſerving themſelves unto the occaſions and advantages both of the time, and of their Enemies, might circumvent them and entrap them at ſuch time as they leaſt feared any ſuch matter. The Chriſtians, at all adventure had encamped themſelves in a low ground, within the Banks and Cauſies of that Fenny Country, under the covert thereof, thinking themſelves ſafe as in their Trenches, againſt all ſudden Sallies or Attempts of their Enemies; but theſe places wherein they lay were ſoft and dirty, for ſo much as the Country People uſed at their pleaſure to water them by Channels and Sluces out of the River of Nile; which now pluckt up and opened, the River began to riſe and overflow all. Then too late they perceived themſelves taken as in a Grin, without power to defend themſelves, or to make any reſiſtance, or by any other means to ſhew their Valour. So the River ſtill ariſing and overflowing gave unto the Turks and Egyptians good hope of their Wars, and of a Victory more deſired than hoped for over a warlike and victorious People. All the ground where the Chriſtians lay encamped, was covered with Water, ſo high that the Victuals were corrupted, and no place left for a man to ſtand or lie dry in.

The Chriſtians entrapped within the Sluces of the River Nile.

Now at the ſame time the Egyptians had taken the high places, with the paſſages upon the Walls and Banks in that drowned Country, to the intent that the Chriſtians ſhould not be able to retire or to ſave themſelves out of the Bogs and Mariſhes covered over with Water. So was their raſh Valour and preſumptuous Confidence in themſelves, expoſed unto the Enemies Shot and Fury; and when they would by force have defended themſelves, their hardineſs was overcome by the crafty Subtility of the weak Enemy. Then began every man to cry out againſt Pelagius the Legat, accuſing, condemning, and rayling at him; the King himſelf they blamed not, for that he had done his duty, in diſſwading of this expedition, and was contrary to his good liking himſelf drawn into this War, the charge whereof he

he had not without great intreaty taken upon him; neither might he with his credit well complain of this misfortune, left in ſo doing, he might ſeem to have had no comfort in himſelf. But as for the Legate, what Counſel could he then give, what Counſel could he then take for himſelf? They of Venice, Piſa, and Genoa, left at Damiata, were indeed ſtrong at Sea, but how could they come to relieve him at Caire? And how, or by what Forces could the Chriſtians break out of the Banks and Sluces of the Cuts and Channels; which winding in and out with a thouſand inextricable turnings incloſed them, beſet alſo on every ſide with the victorious Enemy? After they had been thus coupt up, and environed with the Waters three days, you might have ſeen the poor Souldiers in every place fall down dead for want of Food and Sleep, and ſo periſh in the Water; the like miſerable kind of death, the reſt were alſo in ſhort time after to expect; other help there was none, but to yield unto neceſſity, and to accept of ſuch conditions as it ſhould pleaſe the proud Enemy to propound. Now the Sultan deſired not ſo much their lives, as the Liberty of his Country; and therefore required to have the City Damiata again reſtored unto him, and all things elſe in ſuch ſort as were before the beſieging thereof; and ſo the Chriſtians without more ado to depart his Country. Hard Conditions if a man reſpect the hope whereupon the Chriſtians had undertaken this War, and were ſo come into Egypt, with the toil there by them endured; but unto him that will but enter into conſideration of mens affairs, and eſpecially in Martial matters, it will ſeem but an accident to be yielded unto, the like whereof hath oftentimes happened unto the greateſt men in the World. Theſe Conditions (ſuch as they were) were by the diſtreſſed Chriſtians accepted of. But when they were brought to Damiata, and there propounded to the Chriſtians there left, a great contention began to ariſe among them; ſome ſaid they would not accept of them, or ſurrender the Town, which being kept would be a ſtay for all the affairs of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt, and a moſt commodious place for them to have recourſe unto; but being reſtored and loſt, carried away with it all the hope of the Chriſtians, and that therefore it were better to endure all extremities, than to receive ſuch diſhonourable and hurtful a peace. Others of the contrary opinion ſaid, That they ought not to forſake them that were in danger before Caire, nor to expoſe them to the butchery, but to have a Chriſtian compaſſion of ſo many thouſands of Souls as there lay diſtreſſed, ſeeing they might be ſaved by the ſurrender of that one Town; Towns (they ſaid) conſiſted of the number of men, and not Men of the Incloſures of Walls and Ditches. They that were of this opinion, for the delivering up of the Town, ſeeing the other obſtinately ſet down to the contrary, withdrawing themſelves from the Council, preſently took up Arms, and by force entred the Houſes of them that were of the contrary opinion, and took from them their Weapons, by that means and perforce to conſtrain them to yield to their deſire. As ſoon as they that lay before Caire (almoſt drowned in the Waters) underſtood of this diſſention at Damiata about the delivery of the Town, they ſent them word, that if they would not yield the Town to the Sultan, they would forthwith ſend to Ptolemais, which would not fail to do what ſhould be commanded, to have it inſtead of Damiata ſurrendred to the Egyptians. So was Damiata again yielded to the Infidels, and ſo great labours of the Chriſtians taken at the Siege and winning thereof, all loſt. That which made this indignity more tolerable, was that Sultan Meladin, having without bloodſhed gained ſo great a Victory, did neither by word or deed any thing in deſpight or reproach of the Chriſtians, but uſed them with all courteſie, relieving them alſo with Victual and ſuch other things as they wanted, and by faithful Guids conducting them in ſafety out of the Country.

In like manner alſo, Coradin his Brother, Sultan of Damaſco, made truce with the Latines for eight years. Whereupon the King of Jeruſalem went over into Italy, and there by the perſwaſion of Honorius the Pope, his Wife being now dead, gave his Daughter Yoland (now crowned Queen of Jeruſalem in the right of her Mother) in marriage to Frederick King of Sicilia, and Emperor of the Latines, the rather thereby to ſtir him up for the taking in hand of the ſacred War. Ever ſince which time, he and the Kings of Sicilia his Succeſſors have been called Kings of Jeruſalem, albeit that they have evil proſecuted that their pretended Right and Title, as ſtill buſied in more prophane Wars againſt other Chriſtian Princes. King John afterwards departing from Rome for France, was by the way honourably entertained at Piſa; but arriving at the French Court, he found Philip the French King deſperately ſick, who by his laſt Will and Teſtament gave unto the Knights Hoſpitalers and Templars, ſixty thouſand Crowns for the maintenance of their Wars againſt the Infidels; which Mony was to their uſe afterward paid unto King John. Who ſhortly to diſcharge himſelf of a Vow he had made, to viſit the Pilgrimage at Compoſtella, going into Spain, by the way married Berengaria, the King of Caſtile his Daughter; and there ſtaying a great while, returned again into France, where he lay long expecting the ſetting forward of the Emperor Fredericks Son-in-Law for the recovery of his Wives Right to the Kingdom of Jeruſalem; which although he ſolemnly vowed at ſuch time as he with all Princely Magnificence married the ſaid Lady at Rome, yet otherwiſe letted with troubles nearer home, performed not the ſame, untill almoſt ſeven years after; all which time the Chriſtians in Syria enjoying the fruit of the late concluded Peace for eight years, lived in great reſt and quietneſs; where ſo leaving them, until the ariſing of new troubles, let us in the mean time return again unto the troubled affairs of the Turks, Greeks, and Latines, at Conſtantinople, and in the leſſer Aſia.

The death of Henry Emperor of Conſtantinople Peter Emperor.

Henry the Second Emperor of the Latines at Conſtantinople, after he had (as is aforeſaid) with much ado repreſſed the Fury of the Bulgarians and Scythes, his barbarous Enemies, and ſo given peace to the miſerable Country of Thracia, died, having reigned a moſt troubleſome Reign, about the ſpace of eleven years. After whom ſucceeded Peter, Count of Auſſerre, his Son-in-Law, third Emperor of the Latines in Conſtantinople; who in the beginning of his Empire, willing to gratifie the Venetians, and to revenge himſelf of Theodorus Angelus, a great Prince of Epirus, Competitor of his Empire, beſieged him in Dirrachium; which ſtrong City, the ſaid Theodorus had but a little before ſurpriſed, belonging unto the Venetian Seigniory. At which Siege, Peter the Emperor lying, was ſo cunningly by the wilie Greek uſed, that a Peace was upon moſt honourable conditions betwixt them concluded, and a familiar kind of Friendſhip joyned. Inſomuch that the Emperor at his requeſt, not well adviſed, came unto him as his Gueſt; who now of his Enemy became his Hoſt, entertaining him with all the formalities that feigned Friendſhip could deviſe. But having him now in his power, and fearing no harm, regarding neither the Laws of Fidelity or Hoſpitality, he moſt traiterouſly ſlew him, as he was yet in the midſt of his Banquet. Of whoſe end, ſome others yet otherwiſe report, as that he ſhould by the ſame Theodorus have been intercepted about the pleaſant Woods of Tempe in Theſſalia, as he was travelling from Rome to Conſtantinople, and ſo afterwards to have been by him cruelly put to death. Of whoſe misfortune, Tepulus Governour of Conſtantinople underſtanding, for the more ſafety of the State in that vacancy of the Greek Empire, made peace with Theodorus for five years, and the Turks for two.

Robert Emperor of Conſtantinople.

Shortly after came Robert (the Son of the aforeſaid unfortunate Emperor Peter) with his Mother to Conſtantinople, and there in his Fathers ſtead was ſolemnly ſaluted Emperor; but not with much better luck than was his Father before him; for ſhortly after his coming he took to Wife a fair young Lady, the Daughter of a great rich and noble Matron of the City, but before betrothed unto a gallant Gentleman, a Burgundian born; with whom the old Lady broke her promiſe, and more careful of her Daughters preferment, than fidelity, gave her in marriage unto the new Emperor. The joy of which ſo great an Honour was in ſhort time converted not into a deadly heavineſs, but even into death it ſelf; for the young Burgundian, more enraged with the wrong done him than diſcouraged with the greatneſs and power of the Emperor, conſorted himſelf with a company of luſty tall Souldiers, acquainted with his purpoſe, and awating his time when the Emperor was abſent, by night entred the Court with his deſperate Followers, and firſt meeting with the beautiful young Empreſs, cut off her Noſe and her Ears, and afterward threw her old Mother into the Sea, and ſo fled out of the City into the Woods and Mountains, with thoſe deſperate cut-throats the miniſters of his barbarous cruelty.

An horrible outrage committed upon the perſon of an Empreſs.

The Emperor pierced to the heart with this ſo great a diſgrace, ſhortly after went to Rome, to what purpoſe was not certainly known; but in returning back again through Achaia, he there died, leaving behind him his young Son Baldwin, yet but a Child, begotten by his firſt Wife, to ſucceed him in the Empire; who by the name of Baldwin the Second, was crowned the fifth and laſt Emperor of the Latines in Conſtantinople.

Baldwin the laſt Emperor of the Latines in Conſtantinople.

And for becauſe he was as yet but young and unfit for the Government, he was by the conſent of the Nobility affianced, and afterward married unto Martha the younger Daughter of John Brenne King of Jeruſalem, a worthy old Captain, (but as then Governour of Ravenna, which City, he being certain years before ſent for out of France for that purpoſe, by Honorius the Pope, he notably defended againſt the Emperor Frederick his Son-in-Law, but that affinity was before broken off by the death of the ſaid Emperors Wife) who now ſent for out of Italy unto Conſtantinople, had committed to his charge and protection, both the Perſon and Empire of the young Emperor Baldwin, now his Son-in-Law. Which great and heavy charge he for certain years after worthily and faithfully diſcharged, until ſuch time as that Baldwin was himſelf grown able to take upon him the government. Now although the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, with the Countries of Thracia, Theſſalia, Macedonia, Achaia, Peloponeſus, and the reſt of the Provinces of Greece, were all or for the moſt part under the Government of Baldwin the Emperor, the Venetians, or other the inferior Latine Princes; yet were the oppreſſed Greeks, the natural Inhabitants thereof, in heart not theirs, as abhorring nothing more than that their forreign government; but wholly devoted to their own natural Princes, Theodorus Laſcaris and Alexius Comnenus, the one reigning at Nice in Bithynia, the other at Trapezond in Pontus, both called by the Greeks, Emperors, and ſo of them generally reputed. Laſcaris of the two the better beloved, and by far of greateſt power, had during the time of his Government fought many an hard Battel, (as is in part before declared) and ſtrongly fortified his chief Cities againſt the invaſion of his Enemies, as well the Turks as the Latines; and ſo having as it were erected a new Empire in Aſia, and there reigned eighteen years, died, leaving behind him one John Ducas Batazes, that had married the fair Lady Irene his Daughter and Heir, to ſucced him in the Greek Empire in Aſia.

John Batazes made Emperor of the Greeks in Aſia.

This John was a man of a great Wit and Spirit, and of more gravity for his years, than was Theodorus his Father-in-Law, never undertaking any thing before he had thereof well conſidered; and once reſolved, not omitting, or neglecting any thing for the performance thereof. So that it was not unfitly ſaid of the Greeks, The planting of this new Empire to have required the celerity of Laſcaris, but the ſtay thereof to have been the gravity of Ducas. He in the beginning of his Reign in very ſhort time having ſet all things in good order, greatly augmented his Legions, and ſhooting at a fairer mark than the Empire he held, even the Imperial City it ſelf, and the recovery of all Thracia and Grecia out of the hands of the Latines, which could not be done without a Fleet at Sea, built a great number of Gallies in the Ports of the leſſer Aſia. And ſo having rigged up and manned a ſtrong Fleet, and ſcouring the Seas, in one Summer took in moſt of the Iſlands of the Ægeum, namely Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Icaria, Coos, with the famous Iſland of the Rhodes, and many others alſo. And not ſo contented, to have increaſed his Empire, the next Spring croſſing the Helleſpont, and landing his Forces, firſt invaded Cherſoneſus; and afterward to terrifie the Latines, forrageing the Country far and near, even to the Gates of Conſtantinople, no man daring to oppoſe himſelf againſt him. At which time alſo he took many Cities and ſtrong Towns alongſt the Sea-coaſt, as Calliopolis, Seſtus, and Cardia, with divers others thereabout, ſome by force, ſome by compoſition, the Greeks almoſt in every place yielding themſelves, where they were not ſo oppreſſed by the Latines, as that they could not help him. Now by theſe proceedings of the Greek Emperor in Europe, was plainly to be ſeen again the ruine of the Latine Empire in the Eaſt, all things proſpering in his hand according to his hearts deſire. Aſſan the Bulgarian King (no ſmall terror both unto the Latines and the Greeks) moved with the fame hereof, by his Embaſſadors ſent of purpoſe unto John the Greek Emperor, offered his Daughter Helena in marriage with young Theodore his Son; of which offer the Emperor gladly accepted. For being buſied in his great Affairs, he was loath to have ſo great a King as was Aſſan, his Enemy, able at his pleaſure to call in the Scythes; who with their multitude, as a great flood breaking over the Banks, had oftentimes carried away whole Countries before them. Wherfore the match agreed upon, the two great Princes by appointment met together about Cherſoneſus, where Helena King Aſſans Daughter, being then about ten years old, was with great Joy and Triumph ſolemnly married unto young Theodor the Emperors Son, much of the ſame age. Not long after, Embaſſadors were alſo ſent unto the Emperor from the Sultan of Iconium, to confirm and prolong the League betwixt them; for the Tartars not contented to have driven the Turks out of Perſia and the far Eaſtern-Countries, began now alſo to cut them ſhort in their Provinces in the leſſer Aſia. Wherefore the Sultan of Iconium, fearing leſt whiles he had his hands full of thoſe his moſt dreadful Enemies; of themſelves too ſtrong for him, he ſhould behind be ſet upon by the Greek Emperor, and ſo thruſt out of all; ſent theſe his Embaſſadors unto him for Peace; which he for many cauſes eaſily granted. Firſt, for that he foreſaw what an hard matter it would be for him to maintain War at once both in Aſia againſt the Turks, and in Europe againſt the Latines; then by this War-like Nation, as by a moſt ſure Bulwark, to keep his own Countries ſafe from the Invaſion of the barbarous Tartars, unto whoſe fury he ſhould himſelf lie open, if the Turks were once taken out of their way. Both ſufficient Reaſons for the Emperor to yield unto the Sultan, which he did; ſo was the Peace concluded, and the Embaſſadors diſpatched. This Peace exceedingly comforted, and afterwards inriched the Emperors Countries; for now the people generally delivered of the fear and miſery of continual War, began on all hands to fall to their fruitful Labours of Peace. Yea the Emperor himſelf, to the ſtirring up of others to the like good Husbandry, cauſed ſo much Land to be ploughed up for Corn, and ſo many Vineyards to be planted, as might plentifully ſuffice his own houſe, and ſuch poor as he daily relieved; with a great overplus, which he cauſed to be carefully laid up in ſtore; he kept alſo great Herds of Cattel, Flocks of Sheep, and Fowls of all ſorts without number. The like he cauſed his Kinſmen and other of the Nobility to do, to the intent that every great Man having ſufficient for his own ſpending at home, ſhould not take any thing from the poor Country men, that ſo every man contenting himſelf with his own, might live in peace without the grievance of others. By which means in a few years every Barn and Granary was full of Corn, every Cellar full of Wines, every Stable full of Cattel, every Store-houſe full of Victuals; the Fields were covered with Corn and Cattel, and in every mans Yard were to be ſeen all kinds of tame Fowls, without number. About which time alſo there fortuned a great Famine among the Turks, inſomuch as that they were enforced to fetch their greateſt Relief from out of the Chriſtian Countries. Then might you have ſeen every way full of Turks, Men, Women, and Children, travelling to and fro into the Emperors Countries for Victuals; their Gold, their Silver, their other rich Commodities, they gave unto the Chriſtians for Food; a little Corn was worth a good Commodity, every Bird, Sheep, and Kid, was ſold at a great rate; by which means the Country-mens houſes were full of the Turks wealth, and the Emperors Coffers ſtored with their Treaſure. The greatneſs of the profit ariſing of this plenty of the Chriſtians, and penury of the Turks, may hereby eaſily be gathered, for that of Eggs daily ſold, ſo much Money was in ſhort time gathered, as made the Empreſs an Imperial Crown of Gold, richly ſet with moſt orient Pearl and precious Stones of great price; which the Emperor called Ovata, for that it was bought with Egg-money. Thus flouriſhed the Greek Empire in the leſſer Aſia, under the good Emperor John Ducas; the Turks at the ſame time declining as faſt, daily pilled in one corner or another by the Tartars, and conſumed with Famine at home.

Plenty enſuing of peace.

Frederick the German Emperor had of long time vowed to take upon him an Expedition into the Holy Land; for performance whereof he was hardly called upon, firſt by Honorius quartus the Pope, and afterward for his long delay excommunicated by Gregory the Ninth; not ſo much for the Zeal they had unto the Sacred War, as to buſie the Emperor afar off in Wars abroad, whilſt they in the mean time, to increaſe their own power, drew from him ſome one part or other of his Empire; which he not without cauſe fearing, from day to day, and year to year, delayed the performance of his Vow, ſo much urged by the Pope; by his Preſence and Power ſtill diſappointing all the ſly deſigns of the Popes, conceived or put in practiſe againſt him. But now at length moved, or more truly to ſay, inforced with the Thundering and Lightning of Pope Gregory, he reſolved to ſet forward, in the year, 1227. About which time, Jolenta, or Toland his Wife, the King of Jeruſalem his Daughter, died in Child-bed, being before delivered of a fair Son. Now were met together at Brunduſium an exceeding great number of couragious and devout Souldiers out of all parts of Chriſtendom, eſpecially out of Germany, under the Leading of Lodwick Lantgrave of Thuring, and Sigefride Biſhop of Auguſta; all ſtirred up with the fame of ſo notable an Expedition. But whilſt they there ſtayed ſomewhat long, the Plague aroſe among the Germans, whereof in ſhort time after, both the Lantgrave and the Biſhop died, with many of the other beſt Souldiers. The Emperor himſelf was upon his way as far Maleu, upon the further ſide of Peleponneſus, where falling deſperately ſick of a Burning-Fever, and put back with contrary Winds, he returned again to Brunduſium, and there ſtayed a great while after. Then began the Pope again to fret and fume, and to caſt out his Excommunications againſt the Emperor, as if it had been Thunder and Lightning, accuſing him of Perjury, Infidelity, and many other grievous Crimes; of all which the Emperor was ready to have cleared himſelf in an open Aſſembly of the Princes of Germany to have been holden at Ravenna, had it not been by the Pope and the Troubles of Lombardy diſturbed. Nevertheleſs, he by open Proteſtations and Writings, fully anſwered all the Popes unjuſt Accuſations, wherewith he had been ſo hardly charged; and yet deſirous to perform the Expedition by him taken in hand, having ſet all things in good Order, and put himſelf again in a readineſs, he ſet forward from Brunduſium in Auguſt, in the year, 1228. leaving the Charge of his Territories in Italy under the care of Reynold Duke of Spaleto. The Pope diſpleaſed, for that the Emperor at his departure had neither reconciled himſelf, nor taken his leave of him, and deeming therein his Excommunications and Fulminations to be contemned and ſet at naught, fell into ſuch a rage and choler, that he forbad all the Chriſtian Forces that were in Syria, to follow him, or to yield to him their Obedience; and writ Letters alſo unto the Sultan, not to come to any agreement with the Emperor, or to yield unto him any part of the Holy Land, which Letters the Sultan afterwards ſent unto the Emperor. Neither yet ſo contented, immediately after his departure, ran upon his Kingdom of Naples, and ſo filled all Italy with Troubles. Nevertheleſs the Emperor happily arriving at Ptolemais, was there honourably received of the Chriſtian Forces, notwithſtanding the Popes Threats and Curſings. Of whoſe arrival Sultan Meledin having Intelligence, and loth to draw ſo mighty an Enemy as was the Emperor upon him, by his Embaſſadors offered him him moſt honourable Conditions of Peace; which before he would accept of, he by convenient Meſſengers ſent unto the Pope, to have his conſent and approbation. But ſuch was his rage, as that he would not ſuffer the Meſſengers to come into his preſence, or vouchſafe to read the Emperors Letters, being brought unto him, but like a mad man preſently rent them in pieces. All which Indignities the Emperor nevertheleſs took in good part, and concluded a Peace with the Turks for ten years, upon theſe conditions: Firſt, That he ſhould be anointed and accounted King of Jeruſalem; then, That the holy City, with all the Land of Paleſtine ſhould be delivered unto him; thirdly, That he might at his pleaſure fortifie the Cities of Nazareth and Joppa; fourthly, That all ſuch places as were ſometime in the Power of Baldwin the fourth King of Jeruſalem, and taken from him by Sultan Saladin, ſhould be reſtored; and laſt of all, That all Priſoners on both ſides ſhould be ſet at liberty without Ranſome. So the Peace concluded, the Emperor with his Army came to the deſolate City of Jeruſalem, and there upon Eaſter-day with great Solemnity was Crowned King thereof, in the year, 1229. And ſo having repaired the Walls of the City, with certain Churches, fortified Nazareth and Joppa, and furniſhed them with ſtrong Garriſons, and appointed Raynold Duke of Bavaria, his Lieutenant in Syria, he with two Gallies only returned into Italy. Ever ſince which time the Kings of Sicilia have been alſo called Kings of Jeruſalem, and have oftentimes born the Arms of both Kingdoms.

Frederick the Emperor Crowned King of Jeruſalem.

The unfortunate Expedition of the King of Navar into the Holy Land.

The next year Pope Gregory, in deſpight of the Emperor Frederick, more than for any Zeal to the Chriſtian Religion, did by the Dominicans and Franciſcans (two Orders of Friers but then lately erected) as by his Trumpeters, ſtir up a wonderful number of zealous and devout Chriſtians, almoſt in every part of Chriſtendom, to take upon them the Croſs (as they termed it) the cogniſance of ſuch as had by Vow bound themſelves to take up Arms againſt the Turks and Saraſins, for the Recovery or Defence of the Holy Land. Theſe devout men met together in great number, under the leading of Theobald King of Navar, Almericus, Count of Montfort, Henry Count of Champaigne, and others too long to rehearſe, (of purpoſe ſtirred up to trouble the ten years Peace before concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Turks in Syria) ſet forward, and after long travel paſſing the Strait of Boſphorus, not far from Conſtantinople into Bithynia, came to the River Sangarius, and there ſtayed a while to refreſh themſelves. Afterwards paſſing through Galatia, and ſo from Country to Country through the leſſer Aſia, they came at length unto the Straits of the Mountain Amanus (a part of the Mountain Taurus) which they found before taken by the Turks, and the Sultan of Iconium Himſelf not far off incamped with a ſtrong Army. Nevertheleſs the valiant Count of Montfort, which had the leading of the Vantguard, couragiouſly marching forward, by plain force opened the paſſage of the Mountain, having ſlain or put to flight the Turks appointed for the keeping thereof; the King of Navar in the mean time (though in vain) aſſailing the Sultan in his Camp; who fearing the great Power of the Chriſtians, kept himſelf within his own ſtrength, and would not ſtir. Wherefore the King ſeeing it to no purpoſe there longer to ſtay, dividing his his Army into three parts, left the Sultan, and followed after the Count, placing his Baggage in the midſt, and the beſt of his Souldiers in the rereward. But whilſt they thus march up the great Mountain, the Turks better acquainted with thoſe paſſages, were ſtill at hand, aſſailing them ſometime behind, ſometime on the one ſide, ſometime on the other, as they ſaw occaſion; and at length taking them at an advantage in a great Plain, ſet upon them, now before almoſt ſpent with hunger and travel, and there ſlew of them an exceeding great number. But by the coming on of the night the battel was broken off, and the Chriſtians repairing unto their Enſigns, paſſed the Straits, and ſo at length arrived at Antioch, having loſt by the way the greateſt part of the Army, with all their Wealth, their Victuals, and moſt part of their Horſes; the remnant yet left, having a little refreſhed themſelves, were by Sea tranſported to Ptolemais; from whence they were afterward by the Templars conducted to Gaza, where they lay, and of the ſpoil of the Country greatly enriched themſelves. As for any other great matters they were not able of themſelves to take in hand; and help of ſuch Forces as the Emperor had before left at Jeruſalem, and other places, they could have none; having expreſs charge from the Emperor himſelf, not to do any thing againſt the Enemy, tending to the breach of the ten years League; which the Turks well perceiving, and that they had to do but with theſe new come Gueſts, and ſome few others their partakers; having gathered together their Forces, lay in ambuſh for them in every corner, to cut them off. Neither was it long, but that theſe of Gaza going far into the Country, and returning laded with ſpoil, were ſet upon by the Turks; whom they (caſting away the ſpoil they had before taken) notably repulſed and put to flight, the day now drawing to an end. But early the next morning appeared a far greater number of Turks than before; which now putting on, charged the Chriſtians, who all that night had ſtood watching in their Armor, and ſo joyned with them a moſt cruel battel; wherein the Chriſtians ſhewed ſo much valour as was poſſible for men to do; but wearied with the long fight, and oppreſſed with the multitudes of their Enemies, they were overcome and ſlain almoſt every Mothers Son. Amongſt the reſt, the two Counts, Almericus and Henry fell; the King of Navar Himſelf hardly eſcaped by the exceeding ſwiftneſs of his Horſe, and by uncertain ways wandring up and down the Country, not knowing well which way to take, after two days came by good fortune to Joppa; ſome few others eſcaped by flight to Ptolemais, the heavy Meſſengers of the misfortune of their Fellows. The King afterwards viſiting the holy places at Jeruſalem, returned home into his Country, with ſome few of his Followers, having performed nothing of that the World expected.

The Chriſtians by perſwaſion of the Templars, break their league with the Turks.

About four years after, Raynold Duke of Bavaria, whom Frederick the Emperor had left his Lieutenant in Jeruſalem, died; having by the ſpace of five years peaceably governed that bruiſed Kingdom. After whoſe death, the Templars (who, he yet living, would oftentimes have broken the League, but that they were by his wiſdom reſtrained) now took occaſion to ſtir up the people to take Arms againſt the Turks, without reſpect unto the League yet in force, or of the dangers like thereof to enſue. Whereof the Egyptian Sultan hearing, raiſed a great Army, ſending alſo for the Choraſmes, a War-like Nation then lying near unto Babylon, to come unto his Aid. Thus become very ſtrong, he firſt laid ſiege to Gaza, but a little before repaired and fortified by the King of Navar and the Templars, which he at length took by force, and put to Sword all that were therein, as well the Citizens, as the Garriſon Souldiers; in like manner he dealt alſo with them of Aſcalon and other places as he went. To repreſs this his fury, the Templars and Hoſpitallers had aſſembled the whole ſtrength of that weak Kingdom, and near unto Tyberias came to have given him battel. Who upon their approach haſtily retired, as if he had for fear ſhunned battel. But whiles the Chriſtians as Victors the night following lay negligently incamped along the River ſide, he returning back again with his Army, came upon them before they were well aware, half-ſleeping, half-waking, but altogether unarmed, with a moſt horrible Out-cry. The Chriſtians now altogether awaked, and not a little troubled with the ſuddenneſs of the matter, haſtily and diſorderly (as muſt needs in ſo great a confuſion) took up their Weapons, ſuch as came firſt to hand, and ſo couragiouſly oppoſed themſelves againſt their Enemies. There was fought a moſt terrible and doubtful battel, and that alſo for a long ſpace, the Chriſtians ſtill encouraging one another to do their laſt devoir; but the Turks ſtill keeping their Order againſt the diſordered Chriſtians, and far more alſo than they in number, prevailed, and there overthrew them with a great ſlaughter, but not without the loſs of many thouſands alſo of their own men, which there lay dead upon the ground. Moſt part of the beſt Commanders, both of the Templars and Hoſpitalers were there ſlain, ſuch as eſcaped fled to Tyre.

1234. Jeruſalem taken and raſed by the Turks.

The Sultan incouraged with ſo great a Victory, marched forthwith to Jeruſalem, which he took without reſiſtance, and there put to Sword all that he found therein, Men, Women, and Children, without reſpect of Sex or Age; and afterwards having rifled the ſame, raſed it down to the ground, burning the Buildings, and overthrowing the Walls, not long before repaired by the Emperor Frederick, and much beautified by his Lieutenant Raynold. And carried with an infernal fury, defaced and moſt ſhamefully polluted the Sepulchre of our bleſſed Saviour, never before then violated or defiled, but of all Nations untouched and reverenced; which for all that may ſeem to have been done not ſo much for the hatred unto the Chriſtian Religion, as for that it was the place of all others moſt deſired of the Chriſtians; and for the gaining whereof they had undertaken ſo many hard Adventures, and ſo much troubled the Saraſins and Turks.

Thus by the unfaithful breaking of the League, the moſt ancient and famous City of Jeruſalem, ſometime the terreſtrial Seat of the moſt High, and glory of the World, fell again into the Power of the Turks and Infidels, in the year, 1234. in whoſe hands it hath ever ſince remained even until this day; now a poor ruinous City, governed by one of the Turks Sanzacks, and for nothing now more famous, than for the Sepulchre of our bleſſed Saviour, again repaired and much viſited by the devout Chriſtians, and not unreverenced by the Turks themſelves.

The loſs of this ſo famous a City, together with the dangerous State of the Chriſtians in Syria, much grieved the other Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, eſpecially Frederick the Emperor, by whom it had been but a few years before gained. Howbeit he could not now remedy the matter according to his deſire, being himſelf grievouſly entangled with the endleſs Troubles which Pope Gregory had as it were by tradition left unto the other Popes his Succeſſors, for the troubling of his State, until at length they had deprived him of his Empire, and not long after of his life alſo. Among other the great Princes, careful for the poor Chriſtians in Syria, was Lewis the Ninth, the French King, a Prince of great Power, but of all others of that time moſt famous for his Zeal unto the Chriſtian Religion, and for his devout manner of life; who abounding in wealth, and all things elſe of a great Prince to be deſired, and withall oftentimes conſidering the notable Expeditions many Chriſtian Princes had (to their Immortal Glory) made, ſome into Syria, ſome into Egypt, againſt the Enemies of Chriſt, and for the Relief of the oppreſſed Chriſtians, was many times about to have taken upon himſelf the like. But in theſe his devout motions, before he could reſolve upon ſo great an Enterpriſe, he fell dangerouſly ſick, inſomuch that for certain days he lay ſpeechleſs, devoid of ſenſe and motion, without any ſign of life, but that he did a little faintly breath; when coming a little unto himſelf, (whither moved by devotion, or troubled with his former conceits then running in his weak brain, is uncertain) the firſt thing he asked for was the Croſs (the Cognizance of ſuch as vowed themſelves unto the Sacred War) which he ſolemnly received at the hands of the Biſhop of Paris. At which time alſo his three Brethren, Alphonſus Count of Poitiers, Charles Count of Anjou, and Robert Count of Arthois, with Hugh Duke of Burgundy, William Earl of Flanders, Hugh Count of Saint Paul, and afterwards moſt of the Nobility of France, to accompany the King, took upon them the ſame charge. Nevertheleſs it was not by and by taken in hand, but ſome few years let paſs in the conſultation and preparation for ſo great an Enterpriſe; many in the mean time diſcharging their Vow, by dying before at home in peace in their own Countries. At length the devout King ſtill reſolute in his former determination, having taken order with Blanch his Mother for his affairs at home, and put all things in readineſs for his Journey, came to Lions to take his leave of Pope Innocentius the Fourth, (who for fear of the Emperor Frederick, then lay there for his more ſafety) and from thence to Marſeilles; where imbarking himſelf with his Army the five and twentieth day of Auguſt, in the year, 1248. he the twentieth day of September following arrived in ſafety in the Iſland of Cyprus, and was there royally entertained by Guy Luſignan then King of that Country.

King Lewis ſetteth forward toward the Holy Land. 1248.

Now was the French King deſirous to have gone directly for Egyt, without longer ſtay in Cyprus, had he not been otherwiſe perſwaded, both for that his whole Fleet was not yet come, and the time of the year began to grow unſeaſonable, and the Weather tempeſtuous. But whilſt he there ſtayed, paſſing the Winter, the Plague (one of the ready Attendants of great Armies) began to ariſe in the Camp, which daily increaſing, had in ſhort time taken away a great number of men, and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort. Amongſt whom were Robert Biſhop of Beauvais, John Count of Montfort, the Counts of Vendoſme and Dreux, Archambaut Lord of Burbon, with divers other Knights and Gentlemen, to the number of 240. ſo that by force of the infectious Contagion, the King was conſtrained to divide his Army into divers places of the Iſland, attending until the Infection ſhould ceaſe. In the mean time the Templars having in ſuſpect both the French and the Turks, (the Turks, for fear they ſhould overrun all; the French, leſt having gotten the Victory, they ſhould take all into their own hands, and ſo diminiſh their Power and Authority wherewith they tyrannized over the other poor Chriſtians) ſent Embaſſadors ſecretly unto Meledin Sultan of Egypt, to perſwade him betimes to come to ſome good agreement for peace, ſo to avert the Power of the French King from doing him further harm, or proceeding further in that War. Of which motion the Sultan well liking, ſent one of his Noblemen to intreat with the Maſter of the Templars concerning a Peace, ſo that it might be by conſent of the French. The Templars glad of ſo honourable a Meſſage, writ unto the French King out of Syria, how the matter ſtood; perſwading him to accept of the Peace offered, ſetting out in great words, the Sultans great Preparations and Power. And ſo indeed had abuſed the King, had not the King of Cyprus acquainted with his doings, perſwaded him that it was but a fineneſs of the great Maſter, and that he had firſt ſent unto the Sultan, and procured that Nobleman to be ſent; which the King upon conſideration perceiving to be true, fed the Turks Embaſſador with hope of peace, but writ unto the Maſter of the Templars, upon the price of his Head, from thenceforth not to receive any Embaſſy from the Enemy, or have any further Intelligence with him.

Winter now paſt, and the Plague well ceaſed, divers noble Gentlemen and great Commanders which following the King, and ſetting forth ſomewhat late, or for fear of the Plague had ſtayed by the way, and wintred ſome in one place ſome in another, began to repair unto Cyprus; as Robert Duke of Burgundy, who having wintred in Achaia, came now in the beginning of the Spring unto the King, with a number of good Horſemen; and with him, William Prince of Achaia, with a great Fleet out of Peloponneſus, which Country, with moſt part of Grecia, was then under the Command of the Latines; amongſt others came alſo William firnamed Longeſpy, Earl of Salisbury, with a Band of luſty tall Souldiers. So the Army being met together, and all things again in readineſs, King Lewis departing from Cyprus, and toſſed at Sea with contrary Winds, about five days after fell on the coaſt of Egypt, and there with all his Fleet came before the ſtrong Town of Damiata, being (as we have ſaid) the Key of that Kingdom. The Sultan long before underſtanding of the French Kings purpoſe for the Invaſion of his Country, had ſtrongly fortified his frontier Towns, and put into them ſtrong Garriſons, beſide the great Power he kept with himſelf in readineſs at all aſſays, as occaſion ſhould require. Upon the approach of the Chriſtians, the Governor of Damiata was ready upon the ſhore, with a number of brave Souldiers to keep them from landing; who nevertheleſs reſolutely before ſet down for the performing of that they came for, manning forth their long Boats with their Archers and Croſsbows to beat the Enemy from the ſhore, ran aground with their other ſmall Boats, made of purpoſe for the landing of men; and ſo without longer ſtay came to handy-blows; where for a while was fought a moſt ſharp and cruel battel, the Chriſtians ſtriving to land, and the Turks to keep them off, many falling on both ſides. But what ſhould an handful do againſt ſo many? The Turks oppreſſed with the multitude ſtill landing more and more, and having done what was poſſible for them to do, fled into the Town, leaving behind them their Governor, with five hundred of their beſt Souldiers dead on the ſhore.

1249. This City of Damiata was exceeding rich and populous, and had in the former Wars not been taken but by more than a years Siege, (as is before declared) and that not ſo much by the valour of the Chriſtians, as by the extremity of the Plague and Famine; ſince which time it had been ſtrongly fortified by the Turks, with deep Ditches, High Walls, and ſtrong Bulwarks, and was at that time well ſtored with Victuals alſo, and all things elſe for the induring of a long Siege. Nevertheleſs, the Souldiers that were left, and the Citizens (diſcouraged with the loſs of their Governor, and remembrance of the miſeries before indured in the former Siege, and ſeeing the Chriſtians now ready again to beſiege the ſame) the night following, a little before the break of day, ſet fire every man upon his own houſe, and ſo by a Bridge which they had made of Boats fled over the great River, breaking the Bridge when they were over, for fear their Enemies ſhould thereby have followed after them. The Chriſtians perceiving their flight, without reſiſtance entred the City, and being ſtrangers, did what they could to quench the fire, and to ſave that which the Inhabitants themſelves would fain have with fire deſtroyed; and ſo afterwards found great abundance of Riches, with plentiful ſtore of all manner of Victuals, wherewith the Souldiers both inriched and refreſhed themſelves. This ſo happy and unexpected a Victory happened unto the Chriſtians about the beginning of October, in the year, 1249. Sultan Meledin himſelf, diſcouraged with the loſs of ſo ſtrong a City, offered unto the French King for the redeeming thereof, and to have peace at his hands, more Territory in Syria and the Land of Paleſtine, than the Chriſtians had of long time before; which large Offer was by the French, eſpecially by the Earl of Arthois the Kings Brother, proudly rejected, and Alexandria the moſt famous Port and Metropolitical City of Egypt, further demanded, to the great diſcontentment of the Turks and Saraſins. In theſe troubles died Meledin the old Sultan, a man not much beloved of his people; in whoſe ſtead Melech-ſala (or Melexala, as ſome call him) a valiant and couragious Prince, well beloved of his Subjects, and but even then returned out of Syria and Arabia, where he had been to crave Aid of the other Mahometan Princes, was choſen Sultan. Which Princes, eſpecially the Sultan of Damaſco, although they had not of long been at any good accord amongſt themſelves, or with the Egyptians; yet in this common danger of their Superſtition, which by the loſs of Egypt was like to be greatly weakned, they joyned hands together, and ſo ſent him great Aid.

The Citizens of Damiata ſet fire upon the City, and ran away by the light.

The new Sultan thus ſtrengthened, drew nearer unto the Chriſtians, which then lay encamped not far from Damiata, and had with them a hot skirmiſh, wherein he was put to the worſe, and ſo with ſome loſs glad to retire. But the Chriſtians the next day, in hope of like ſucceſs, ſallying out again were overthrown, with ten times more loſs than was he the day before, and ſo fain to fly unto the Camp. By which Victory the Sultan encouraged, began now to conceive better hope of the ſucceſs of his Wars; and by ſtopping the paſſages both by Water and Land, to provide, that no Victuals could without great peril be brought either unto the City or the Camp, inſomuch that at length Victuals began to grow ſcarce in both; whereof the Sultan was not ignorant, as being thereof throughly informed by ſuch Fugitives; as for want or other cauſes, oftentimes fled out of the French Camp into his.

Winter thus paſſing, and want ſtill increaſing, it fortuned that the Governor of the great City of Caire (upon the fortune whereof depended the State of the whole Kingdom) a man not evil affected unto the Chriſtian Religion, and in his heart highly offended with the Sultan, for the death of his Brother by him wrongfully executed; by ſecret Meſſengers perſwaded the French King to come on with his Army to the City, the Regal ſeat of the Sultan, promiſing him to deliver it into his power, with full inſtructions what he had in all points to do for the gaining thereof. Whereupon the King, who had before of himſelf purpoſed the ſame exploit; but now filled with a greater hope, aſſembled together the greateſt Forces he was able to make. At which time alſo he ſent for the Earl of Salisbury, with the reſt of the Engliſhmen, who for many proud indignities offered them by the French (eſpecially by the Earl of Artois the Kings Brother) whereof they could have no redreſs, were gone to Ptolemais, without purpoſe to have any more ſerved in thoſe Wars; but now being ſent for by the King, with promiſe of better uſage and honourable recompence for the wrongs paſt, returned again into Egypt, there to do their laſt endeavour. With whoſe coming the King ſtrengthned, but more by the new ſupplies brought unto him by his Brother Alphonſus out of France, leaving the Duke of Burgundy with a convenient Garriſon, with the Queen his Wife, Odo the Popes Legate, and divers other great Ladies in Damiata, he himſelf ſet forward with his Army towards Caire. Of whoſe coming the Sultan hearing, and loath upon the Fortune of one Battel to adventure his whole Eſtate, offered by his Embaſſadors to reſtore unto him all the Land of Paleſtine, with a great ſumm of Mony for the defraying of the charges of thoſe Wars, and all the Priſoners he had taken, ſo that he would redeliver unto him the City of Damiata, and joyn with him in League and Amity. Which fair offer for all that, the French King, by the perſwaſion of the Legate and others, refuſed. So the King marchihg ſtill on, was to paſs an Arm of the great River Nilus (the Sultan on the other ſide ſtill ready with his Army to ſtay his paſſage) which he had thought to have made by a Bridge of Boats, prepared for the ſame purpoſe; but better conducted by a Fugitive Saraſin unto a Foord, before to him unknown, ſent his Brother Robert Earl of Artois, with the third part of the Army before him, accompanied with the Maſter of the Templars and the Earl of Salisbury, with their Followers. Who paſſing the River at the aforeſaid Foord, ſuddenly aſſailed the Turks in their Tents (the Sultan being then abſent in ſolemniſing one of their prophane Feaſts) and put them to flight. With which Victory the French Earl above meaſure encouraged, would needs on forwards, as if he would himſelf alone have carried away the glory of the whole Conqueſt. Whom for all that certain of the ancient Templars, better acquainted with the manners of that deceitful Nation than he, and better conſidering alſo of their own Ability and Strength, perſwaded him to content himſelf with the Honour he had already got, and not to proceed any further in proſecuting of the Enemy, until the coming of the reſt of the Army, eſpecially in that deſperate eſtate of the Enemy, wherein he was to win or loſe all. Unto whom the proud Earl in great deſpight replyed, that he would proſecute his Victory, and follow his good fortune; calling them Daſtards and Cowards, opprobriouſly objecting unto them the common Fame, whereby it was commonly reported, That the Holy Land might long ſince have been again united unto the body of the Chriſtian Common-wealth, but for the foul colluſion of the falſe Templars and Hoſpitalers with the Turks and Infidels. With which reproachful Speech the Maſter of the Templars not without cauſe moved, anſwered for himſelf and his Fellows, That he ſhould, when he would and where he durſt, diſplay his Enſigns, and he ſhould find them as ready to follow as he was to go before them. The Earl of Salisbury alſo willing to ſtint this ſtrife, perſwaded Earl Robert not to be ſo wedded to his own opinion, but to liſten to the grave and wholſome Counſel of the Templars, being men of great experience; and ſo turning unto the Maſter of the Templars began likewiſe with gentle words to pacifie him alſo. But whilſt he was yet ſpeaking, the Earl interrupting him with many opprobrious words, called him Daſtard and Coward, and wiſhed that the Army were rid of him, and the fearful Cowards his Country-men; Whereunto the Earl of Salisbury anſwered, Well General, on in Gods name, and whereſoever you dare ſet your Foot, mine ſhall be as far as yours; and I believe we go this day, where you ſhall not dare to come nigh my Horſes Tail; as afterwards indeed it proved. Howbeit the Earl ſo ſaid, for that Earl Robert and the Frenchmen had many times in reproach and diſdain, after their manner, called him and his Followers Engliſh Tails.

A fair Offer fondly refuſed.

The proud Earl conſtant in his former purpoſe, and not to be otherwiſe perſwaded, ſet forward; and firſt aſſaulted a little Town or Caſtle, not far off, called Manſor, whereunto he inconſiderately approaching, was notably repulſed; and having loſt a number of his men, was as a man diſcouraged, about to have retired. When ſuddenly the Sultan, neerer at hand than the Earl had thought, ſtirred up with the noiſe of the Alarm, came on with his whole power; and finding the Army of the Chriſtians now divided (as he had long wiſhed) with the multitude of his People encloſed them round, and had with them a great and mortal Fight; wherein though the Chriſtians right worthily behaved themſelves, for the ſmall number they were, yet oppreſſed with the multitude, and on every ſide beſet, they were ſlain down right. Then, but all too late, it repented the Earl of his fooliſh raſhneſs, and that he had not hearkned unto better Counſel, and ſeeing the Earl of Salisbury valiantly fighting, cried out unto him to flie, ſeeing God as he ſaid fought againſt them. Whereunto the Noble Earl anſwered no more, but God forbid that my Fathers Son ſhould run away from the face of a Saraſin. The French Earl thinking by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe to have ſaved his life, flying out of the Battle, and taking the River of Thaſnes, overladed with his Armour, was there drowned. The Earl of Salisbury courageouſly enduring the Enemies charge, with his own Hand manfully ſlew many a Turk and Saraſin that day, until that at length having his Horſe ſlain under him, and himſelf ſo wounded in the Legs, as that he was not able longer to ſtand, yet upon his Knees laying about him like a deſperate man, and ſelling his life as dear as he could, was there ſlain, but not vanquiſhed. With him periſhed the whole Army, ſo encloſed by the Sultan, that ſcarce any one eſcaped alive, more than two Templars, one Hoſpitaler, and one Common Souldier, the Meſſengers of this heavy news.

The Earl of Salisbury valiantly fighting ſlain.

About the ſame time alſo ſickneſs daily increaſing in the French Camp, the King purpoſing to march forward to Caire, ſent a great number of Sick and Weak People down the River of Nilus to Damiata; of whoſe going the Sultan underſtanding, cauſed a great number of ſmall Boats to be carried in Carts by Land unto the River ſide, which well manned, and meeting them by the way, ſet upon them, and burnt or drowned them every Mothers Son, ſaving only one Engliſhman, called Alexander Giffard, who wounded in five places of his body, eſcaped yet into the French Camp, reporting there what had happened unto the reſt.

The Governour of Caire apprehended.

Now had the Sultan alſo got intelligence of the compact betwixt the Governour of Caire and the King, for the betraying of the City; and thereupon had cauſed him to be ſuddenly apprehended and put in ſafe keeping, until he were at better leiſure to underſtand farther of the matter: which no leſs troubled the French King, than did the former misfortune; all his hope for the yielding up of the City, being thereby cut off. Thus his hopes together with his ſtrength dayly decreaſing, he would have gladly accepted of the Conditions which he before refuſed, which the Sultan, now grown very ſtrong, would by no means hear of, but in ſtead thereof, by way of deriſion, ſent to know of him, what was become of all his Mattocks, Forks, Rakes, Sythes, Plows, and Harrows, which he had brought over with him? and why he ſet them not to work, but ſuffered them like an evil husband to rot and ruſt beſide him? All which, with much more, the good King was glad to put up; for now his Forces greatly diminiſhed, as well by ſickneſs, as by the former loſſes, finding himſelf far too weak, he would fain have retired back again to Damiata; which the Sultan foreſeeing, got ſo betwixt him and home, that now there was no remedy, but either to fight it out, or yield. The King himſelf had been often before intreated by his Nobility, whilſt the River was yet unpoſſeſſed by the Enemy, to have conveyed himſelf by Water to Damiata, for that in the ſafety of his Perſon conſiſted (as they ſaid) the ſafety of his Kingdom, whatſoever became of them; whereunto he could never be perſwaded, ſaying, that he would never forſake his People, becauſe he would not be forſaken of them, but was reſolved to indure with them whatſoever it ſhould pleaſe God to lay upon him; ſo paſſing the River by the ſame Foord whereby his Brother had not long before unfortunately paſſed, and coming to the place where the Battel was fought, he might ſee the dead bodies of the Chriſtians pitifully mangled, with their Heads and Hands cut off; for the Sultan, the more to encourage his Souldiers, had before the Battle proclaimed, that whoſoever ſhould bring him the Head or Hand of a Chriſtian, ſhould have a great reward for his labour; in hope whereof, they had ſo diſmembred them. But long he had not there ſtaied, but that the Sultan began ſuddenly to appear, with a moſt huge great Army, as if he would even with the ſight thereof have diſcouraged the Chriſtians; againſt whom for all that, the Frenchmen in good order oppoſed themſelves, and for the ſpace of three hours made great reſiſtance; but what could one do againſt ten, and he alſo fainting for ſickneſs and food? the hard plight wherein the greateſt part of the French army then was. In concluſion, oppreſſed with the multitude of their Enemies, and no way left to flie, they were all overthrown and ſlain, except ſome few, ſaved in hope of great ranſome. The King himſelf, with his two Brethren, Alphonſus and Charles, and ſome few others, were taken priſoners, and brought unto the Sultan; who demanding of him, what had moved him ſo to make War againſt him? was anſwered by the King, that it was for Religion, and the defence of the name of his God. In this unfortunate Battel, fought the fifth of April, in the year 1250, beſides the Common Souldiers, were ſlain moſt of the Nobility of France, and all their Tents taken.

The Sultan preſently upon this overthrow, ſent of his own Souldiers the like number that the French were of, with French Enſigns, and diſguiſed in the Attire of the ſlain Frenchmen, to Damiata, where the Duke of Burgundy, the French Queen, and the Popes Legate lay; in hope to have been ſo let in for Frenchmen; but they were not ſo well masked, but that they were by them of the City diſcovered for Enemies, and ſo kept out and deceived of their purpoſe.

The Chriſtians thus overthrown, and the French King taken Priſoner, Melech-ſala the Sultan taking compaſſion upon him, and yet minding of his life to make his own gain; cheering him up with comfortable ſpeeches, began to talk with him of his deliverance, and of a good attonement to be made betwixt them. The Conditions whereof propounded by the Sultan were, That the King ſhould forthwith deliver again unto him the City of Damiata, and moreover pay unto him for the ranſom of himſelf and his, and for the charges of the War, eight thouſand pound of Gold; That all Priſoners ſhould on both ſides be frankly ſet at liberty, and ſo a Peace to be taken for ten years. For the more aſſurance whereof, the Sultan offered to ſwear, That if he failed in the performance thereof, to renounce his Mahomet; requiring alſo of the King to ſwear, If he failed in any thing that he had promiſed, to deny his Chriſt to be God; which prophane Oath the King deteſted, wiſhing rather to die than to give the ſame; the Sultan wondring at his conſtancy, took his word without any Oath at all, and ſo publiſhed the League. But whilſt they were coming together to Damiata, Melech-ſala now in the pride of this Victory, fearing nothing leſs than the ſudden change of Fortune, or the miſchief hanging over his head, was in the preſence of a number of his Noblemen ſuddenly ſlain by two deſperate Mamalukes; and one Turquiminus a ſturdy Slave of their own order and vocation (by whoſe procurement it was ſuppoſed to have been done) by the conſent of the whole Army created Sultan in his ſtead; who revoking the League before concluded by Melech-ſala, made another in his one name with the King, much upon the ſame Conditions that the other was; which after he had received Damiata, he cauſed openly to be proclaimed. Nevertheleſs after that King Lewis had paid his ranſom, and was with the remnant of his Army by the Genowaies tranſported from Damiata to Ptolemais, the falſe miſcreant performed not the half of that he had promiſed, of twelve thouſand Chriſtian Captives that ſhould have been ſet free, ſcarce enlarging four thouſand; and killing all the ſick Souldiers whom by his promiſe he ought to have relieved, neither ſuffering any Chriſtian to carry any of his goods with him out of Egypt, which by the League he ought to have done alſo.

The French King coming to Ptolemais, and purpoſing to have returned home, was intreated by the Maſter of the Templars and Hoſpitalers, and other the Nobility of the Chriſtians, to ſtay, which he did almoſt by the ſpace of four years; in which time he repaired the Cities of Ceſarea and Joppa, and fortified many ſtrong places for the Defence of the Chriſtians againſt the Infidels; and ſo commending the protection thereof unto the Knights of the ſacred War, and ſending his Brethren away before him, followed after himſelf, greatly lamented for by all the Chriſtians in Syria, and ſo arrived in France the ſixth year from the time of his departing thence. This was the end of this long and unfortunate expedition of Lewis the French King, wherein as ſome write, were eighty thouſand Chriſtians loſt: Howbeit the French Chronicles extenuating their loſs, report, of two and thirty thouſand French, ſix thouſand to have returned again into France. The City of Damiata in the ſpace of a few years twice won, and twice loſt by the Chriſtians, was ſhortly after the delivering up thereof, by the Sultan raſed down to the ground, becauſe it ſhould no more ſerve the Chriſtians for an entrance into his Kingdom.

The beginning of the Mamalukes and their Kingdom.

The late Egyptian Sultans thus oftentimes invaded by the Chriſtian Princes, and repoſing no great aſſurance in the Proweſs of the effeminate Egyptians, a People fitter for Merchandize and other baſe occupations than for Chivalry and War, had for the ſtrengthning of their Kingdom, bought an infinite number of Slaves, eſpecially of the poor and hardy Circaſſians, called in antient time Getæ and Zinchi, near unto Colchis and the Euxine Sea, brought unto Alexandria and other Ports of Egypt out of thoſe bare cold Countries, by Merchants, and from thence tranſported to Caire and other Cities of Egypt; of which poor Slaves, the late Egyptian Sultans taking their choice, and culling out from the reſt ſuch as were like to be of the greateſt Spirit and Ability of Body, delivered them unto moſt ſkiful and expert Teachers; by whom they were carefully taught to run, to leap, to vault, to ſhoot, to ride, with all other feats of activity, and withal cunningly to handle all manner of Weapons, as well on horſeback as on foot, and ſo inſtructed, and become cunning, were taken out of their Schools into pay, and inrolled together as the Sultans choice Horſemen, were commonly by the name of Mamalukes. In whoſe good ſervice the late Sultans finding great uſe, ſpared for no coſt, both for their maintenance and increaſing of their number; dayly erecting new Nurſeries ſtored with the young Fry, which growing up and ready, was ſtill joyned to the other. It is wonderful to tell, unto what a Strength and Glory this order of the Mamalukes was in ſhort time grown, by the care of the Egyptian Kings; by them they managed their greateſt affairs, eſpecially in time of Wars; and by their Valour, not only defended their Country, but gained many a fair Victory againſt their Enemies, as they did now againſt the French; but as too much power in ſuch mens hands, ſeldome or never wanteth danger, ſo fell it out now betwixt the late Sultan Melech-ſala, and thoſe Maſterful Mamaluke Slaves; who proud of their Preferment, and forgetful of their Duty, and ſeeing the greateſt Strength of the Kingdom in their Hands, traiterouſly ſlew Melech-ſala their chief Founder, ſetting up in his place (as aforeſaid) one Turquiminus, a baſe Slave, one of their own order and ſervile vocation, but indeed otherwiſe a man of a great Spirit and Valour. This Melech-ſala murthered by the Mamalukes, was the laſt of the freeborn Kings of Egypt; in whom the Turks Kingdom in Egypt, erected by Saracon and the great Sultan Saladin (as is before ſaid) and in his Stock and Family ever ſince continued, took end, as did alſo all the power of the Turks in that great and rich Kingdom. For the proud Mamalukes having now got the Sovereignty into their Hands, and exalted a Sultan out of themſelves, imperiouſly commanded as great Lords over the reſt of the People, not ſuffering them to have the uſe either of Horſe or Armor, or to bear any ſway in the Common-Weal; but keeping them under with moſt heavy impoſitions, and ſtill preferring their own Slaves (wherewith the Country of Egypt now ſwarmed) made the natural Country People, of all others moſt miſerable, not daring to meddle with any thing more than Merchandize, their Husbandry, or other their baſe Mechanical Occupations; whereof the greateſt profit ſtill came unto the Mamalukes, who as Lords of all, with great inſolency, at their pleaſure took it from them as their own. As for the great Sultan, they ſtill choſe him from among themſelves, not ſuffering any the Sultans Children to ſucceed their Fathers in the Kingdom; for fear leſt they in proceſs of time, proud of their Anceſtors and Parentage, ſhould reckon of them as of their Slaves (as indeed they were) and ſo at length bring in another more free kind of Government.

The ruine of the Turks Kingdom in Egypt.

Againſt which they provided alſo, not only by this reſtraint of their Sultans Children, but of their own alſo; taking order and eſtabliſhing it as an immutable Law, That though the Sons of the Mamalukes might enjoy their Fathers Lands and Wealth after their death, yet that it ſhould not be lawful for them in any caſe to take upon them the name or honour of a Mamaluke; ſo debarring them from all government in the Common-Wealth, to the intent it might ſtill reſt with the Mamalukes. Neither was it lawful for any born of Mahometan Parents (which could not be Slaves) or of the race of the Jews, to be admitted into that order; but only ſuch as being born Chriſtians and become Slaves, had from the time of their Captivity been inſtructed in the Mahometan Superſtition; or elſe being men grown, and coming thither, had abjured the Chriſtian Religion (as many Reprobates did in hope of preferment.) Right ſtrange it is to conſider, unto what Honour and Glory this ſlaviſh Empire in ſhort time grew; many of theſe poor Slaves by rare Fortune or ſecret divine Power, exalted out of the duſt unto the higheſt degree of Honour, proving moſt excellent and renowned Princes, of ſuch ſtrength and power, as was dreadful even unto the greateſt Princes of the World. In which great glory, this ſervile Empire (to the Worlds wonder) flouriſhed from this time amongſt the greateſt by the ſpace of 267 years; until that having run the appointed race, it was with a great deſtruction by Selymus the victorious Emperor of the Turks, overthrown in the year 1517, and the Kingdom of Egypt, with all Syria and the Land of Paleſtine, brought into the form of Provinces, united unto the Turks Empire, as they are at this day, and as in the courſe of this Hiſtory ſhall in due time and place (God willing) at large appear.

But leaving the Kingdom of the Turks thus overthrown in Egypt, and the Mamalukes there triumphing, the French King returned into France, and the Chriſtians in peace into Syria; let us again return into the leſſer Aſia, and to the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, whither the affairs both of the Turks and of the Chriſtians now call us. All this while the Greek Empire (for ſo the Greeks will have it called) flouriſhed both in peace and plenty in the leſſer Aſia, under their Emperor John Batazes; the power of the Latines in the mean time declining as faſt at Conſtantinople, under the Government of the Latine Emperor Baldwin the Second. As for the Turks whom we left grievouſly troubled both with Famine and the often incurſions of the Tartars, they had all this while, and yet alſo, enough and more than enough to do to withſtand the ſame Enemy. At length it fortuned that John Ducas the Greek Emperor died, being at the time of his death about threeſcore years old, whereof he had happily reigned three and thirty; by whoſe good and diſcreet Government, the Greek Empire before brought low and almoſt to nought by the Latines, began again to gather ſtrength and to flouriſh both in Aſia and ſome little part of Europe alſo. Of him are reported many notable matters, which as impertinent to our purpoſe I could willingly paſs over, were I not by the worthy remembrance of one of them ſtaied a while by the way.

This noble and famous Emperor having long lamented the death of the fair Empreſs Irene his firſt Wife, at laſt married another young Lady, the Siſter of Manfred King of Sicily, called Anne, with whom amongſt other honourable and beautiful Dames, ſent by the King her Brother for the accompanying of her to Conſtantinople, was one Marceſina, a rare Paragon, of ſuch a Feature as if Nature had in her meant to beſtow her greateſt skill: From whoſe Mouth always flowed a fountain of moſt ſugred Words, and out of her Eyes iſſued (as it were) Nets to intangle the Amarous in. Upon this ſo fair an object, the Emperor not fearing farther harm, took pleaſure oftentimes to feed his Eyes, until that at length caught with her Looks, he had loſt his liberty, and was of a great Emperor become her thrall, in ſuch ſort, as that in compariſon of her he ſeemed little or nothing to regard the young Empreſs his Wife; but ſo far doated upon her, that he ſuffered her to be attired and honoured with the ſame Attire and Honour that the Empreſs was her ſelf; whom ſhe now ſo far exceeded both in Grace and Favour with the Emperor, and Honour of the People, as that ſhe almoſt alone enjoyed the ſame without regard of her unto whom it was of more right due. Whilſt ſhe thus alone triumpheth, at length it fortuned that ſhe in all her glory, attended upon with moſt of the Gallants of the Court, and ſome of the Emperors Guard, would needs go (whether for her Devotion or for her Recreation, I know not) to viſit the Monaſtery and fair Church, which Blemmydes (a Noble Man of great Renown, both for his Integrity of Life, and Learning) had of his own coſts and charges but lately built in the Country, where he together with his Monks, as men weary of the World, lived a devout and ſolitary contemplative life, after the manner of that time, with the great good opinion of the People in general. This Blemmydes was afterward for his upright life and profound Learning, choſen Patriarch of Conſtantinople; which great honour, next unto the Emperor himſelf, he refuſed, contenting himſelf with his Cell. Marceſina coming thither in great Pomp, and thinking to have entred the Church, had the doors ſhut againſt her by the Monks, before commanded ſo to do by Blemmydes their Founder; and ſo was to her great diſgrace kept out. For that devout man deemed it a great Impiety, to ſuffer that ſo wicked and ſhameleſs a Woman, againſt whom he had moſt ſharply both ſpoken and written, with her prophane and wicked feet ſhould tread upon the ſacred pavement of his Church. She enraged with this indignity, hardly by ſo proud a Woman to be with patience digeſted, and prickt forward by her flattering Followers alſo, returning to the Court, grievouſly complained thereof unto the Emperor, ſtirring him up by all means ſhe could to revenge the ſame, perſwading him to have been therein himſelf diſgraced. Whereunto were joined alſo the hard ſpeeches of her pickthank Favourites, who to curry Favour, ſpared not as it were to put oyl unto the fire, for the ſtirring up of the Emperor to Revenge. Who with ſo great a complaint nothing moved unto Wrath, but ſtruck as it were to the heart with a remorſe of Conſcience, and oppreſſed with heavineſs, with tears running down his Cheeks, and fetching a deep ſigh, ſaid, Why provoke you me to puniſh ſo juſt a man? Whereas if I would my ſelf have lived without reproach and infamy, I ſhould have kept my Imperial Majeſty unpolluted or ſtained. But now ſith I my ſelf have been the cauſe both of mine own diſgrace and of the Empires; I may thank mine own deſerts, if of ſuch evil ſeed as I have ſown, I now reap alſo an evil harveſt.

After the death of this good Emperor, Theodorus his Son, born the firſt year of his Fathers Reign, being then about three and thirty years old, was by the general conſent of the People ſaluted Emperor in his ſtead; who in the beginning of his Empire renewed the League which his Father had made with Jathatines the Turkiſh Sultan. And ſo having provided for the ſecurity of his affairs in Aſia, he with a puiſſant Army paſſed over the Straight of Helleſpontus into Europe, to appeaſe the troubles there raiſed in Macedonia and Thracia, by the King of Bulgaria his Brother-in-Law, and Michael Angelus the Deſpot of Theſſalia; who upon the death of the old Emperor began to ſpoil thoſe Countries, not without hope at length to have joyned them unto their own; by whoſe coming they were for all that diſappointed of their purpoſe, and glad to ſue to him for peace. But whilſt he was there buſied, he was advertiſed by Letters from Nice, that Michael Paleologus, whom he had left there Governour in his abſence, was ſecretly fled unto the Turks; with which news he was not a little troubled. The cauſe of whoſe flight, as Paleologus himſelf gave it out, was, for that he perceived himſelf divers ways by many of his Enemies brought into diſgrace, and the Emperors Ears ſo filled with their odious complaints, ſo cunningly framed againſt him, as that they were not eaſily or in ſhort time to be refelled; and therefore fearing in the Emperors heavy diſpleaſure to be ſuddenly taken away, to have willingly gone into exile, if ſo happily he might ſave his life from the malice of them that ſought after it.

Theodorus Laſcaris choſen Emperor.

At his coming to Iconium, he found Jathatines the Sultan making great preparation againſt the Tartars; who having driven the Turks out of Perſia and other the far Eaſtern Countries, (as is before declared) and running ſtill on, did with their continual incurſions ſpoyl a great part of their Territories in the leſſer Aſia alſo; and now lay at Axara, a Town not far off from Iconium; againſt whom the Sultan now making the greateſt preparation he could, gladly welcomed Paleologus, whom he knew to be a right valiant and worthy Captain, commending to his charge the leading of certain Bands of Greeks, whom he had retained to ſerve him in thoſe Wars, as he had others of the Latines, under the conduct of Boniface Moline a Nobleman of Venice; and ſo having put all things in readineſs, and ſtrengthened with theſe forreign Supplies of the Greeks and Latines, ſet forward againſt his Enemies the Tartars; who at the firſt ſight of the ſtrange Enſigns and Souldiers were much diſmaied, fearing ſome greater force had been come to the aid of the Turks; nevertheleſs, joyning with them in Battel, had with them, at the firſt a moſt terrible and bloody conflict, wherein that part of the Army that ſtood againſt Paleologus and his Greeks, was put to the worſe, to the great diſcomfiture of the Tartars, being even upon the point to have fled, had not one of the greateſt Commanders in the Turks Army, and a nigh Kinſman of the Sultans, for an old grudge that he bare unto the Sultan, with all his Regiment, in the heat of the Battel revolted unto the Tartars; whereby the fortune of the Battel was in a moment as it were quite altered, they which but now were about to have fled, fighting like Lions; and they that were Victors now glad to turn their Backs and flie; in which Flight a great number of Turks fell, the fierce Tartars moſt eagerly purſuing them. Paleologus, with the General of the Turks, hardly chaſed by the Tartars, and glad every hour to make a ſtand, and to fight for their lives, with much ado, after many days flight recovered a Caſtle of the Generals, neer unto Caſtamona, and ſo ſaved themſelves. The Tartars after this ſo great a Victory (wherein they had broken the whole Strength of the Turks, and brought in hazard the whole State of their Kingdom) without reſiſtance forraged all the Countries and Provinces ſubject unto the Turkiſh Sultan, making Spoil of whatſoever they light upon; inſomuch that the Sultan diſcouraged, and having now no Strength left to oppoſe againſt them, fled unto the Greek Emperor Theodorus for aid; who moſt honourably entertained him, with all his Train, and comforted him with ſuch ſmall aid as he thought good then to ſpare him; which for his more ſafety he ſent home with him, under the leading of Iſaacius Ducas, ſirnamed Murtzuſle, a man in great credit with him. In recompence of which kindneſs, the Sultan gave unto the Emperor the City of Laodicea, whereinto he preſently put a ſtrong Garriſon; Nevertheleſs, it was not long before it fell again into the Hands of the Turks, being a place not to be holden by the Greeks. Yet for all this, the Sultan finding himſelf ſtill to weak to withſtand the continual invaſions of the Tartars, and weary of the harms he dayly ſuſtained, by the advice of his chief Councellors made a League with them, yielding to pay them a certain yearly Tribute, thereby to redeem his peace. From which time the Tartars accounted of the Turks as of their Tributaries and Vaſſals.

Not long after this, Michael Paleologus was by the Emperors kind and gracious Letters called home, with his faithful promiſe alſo before given for his ſecurity; who before his return bound himſelf alſo by ſolemn Oath, to be unto the Emperor and his Son always loyal, and from thenceforth never to ſeek after the Empire, or give cauſe of new ſuſpect for ſuch matters as he had been before charged with; but for ever to yield unto the Emperor, his Son, or other his Succeſſors in the Empire, his dutiful Obedience and Fidelity. Upon which conditions he was again made great Conſtable, and ſo received into the Emperors Favour, and lived the reſt of his Reign in great honour and credit with him.

The death of Theodorus the Greek Emperor.

Envy in Court.

Now Theodorus the Emperor having reigned three years, fell ſick and died, leaving behind him his Son John, then but a Child of ſix years old, to ſucceed him in the Empire; whom he upon his death bed, together with the Empire, commended to Arſenius the Patriarch, and one George Muzalo his faithful Councellor, as to his truſty Tutors, to ſee him ſafely brought up, and the Empire well and peaceably governed. This Muzalo was a man of mean Parentage, but for his familiar Acquaintance and civil Behaviour, of a Child brought up in the Court with the Emperor as his play fellow; with whom he growing up, ſo framed himſelf to his manners and diſpoſition, that he alone was unto him inſtead of all, ſtill at hand, ready to ſay or do whatſoever might be unto the Emperor gracious or pleaſing. And the elder they grew, ſo increaſed this their mutual affection and love alſo; in ſuch ſort, that with him now Emperor, he was of all others in greateſt Favour and Authority; a wary obſerver of his delights, a ready miniſter of his Affairs, and faithful partaker of his Secrets; for which he was in ſhort time promoted unto the greateſt honours of the Court, and honourably married unto one of the Emperors nigh Kinſwomen; and now at his death, by his laſt Will, with the reverend Patriarch appointed Tutor to the young Emperor and his two young Siſters. And for the more aſſurance thereof, a ſolemn Oath of Obedience to the young Prince, as Emperor, and unto them as his Tutors, was exacted of all ſorts of men, both high and low, of what vocation ſoever; and that not once, but firſt a little before the Emperors death, and again after he was now dead; for many of the Nobility honourably deſcended, ſeeing the ſudden change of Muzalo's fortune, among themſelves murmured thereat, as grieving at his preferment, ſeeing there were many among them, unto whom both the tuition of the young Emperor, and adminiſtration of the Empire, of better right appertained; inſomuch as they were both neerer of kin unto the Emperor, and fitter (as they thought) for ſo great a charge than was Muzalo; whom (as they ſaid) they had many cauſes both to contemn and hate: For, beſide that he was not honourably born, and had ſerved the late Emperor Theodore, as the miniſter of his wrath againſt ſome of the Nobility, cauſes ſufficient of the Peoples hatred; if he ſhould now alſo in ſo great Authority affect the Empire, it was by his malicious Enemies vainly doubted, that he would not ſpare to commit any manner of Villany for the effecting of his inordinate deſire. Of all which Muzalo was not ignorant, a man at all other times of a moſt quick apprehenſion for ſuch matters, but as then eſpecially, his Wits being awaked with theſe ſo great motives and dangers. Wherefore ſpeedily calling together all the Nobility into the Court, he welcomed them one by one, and curteouſly diſcourſing with them, offered to diſcharge himſelf both of the adminiſtration of the Empire, and tuition of the young Emperor, and willingly to yield the ſame to any one of them, whom the reſt ſhould think fitteſt for ſo great a charge; which though they all with one conſent as it were refuſed, ſaying, That he was of all others to be preferred, unto whom the Emperor, Lord both of the Empire and the Child, had commited the ſame; yet Muzalo earneſtly requeſted them to the contrary, and ſtifly withſtood their deſire, wiſhing indeed rather to have led a quiet private life in ſecurity, than to have been ſo overcharged; not ſo much for doubt of the Envy then ariſing, as for fear of ſome great danger thereof to enſue. But would he, would he not, remedy there was none, but that as the late Emperor had appointed, ſo muſt he take the charge upon him. And now was every one, as well of the Nobility, as of the inferior ſort, again with greater ſolemnity than before, the third time ſworn, to the utmoſt of their power to defend the young Emperor in his Empire, and Muzalo in the tuition of him, and adminiſtration of the affairs of the State, and faithfully to yield unto them both all due honour and obedience; which if they ſhould fail religiouſly to perform, they wiſhed to themſelves every man, and to all theirs, a ſhameful end and deſtruction. Yet notwithſtanding all this ſolemn ſwearing, mixt moſt times with much forſwearing, there was not fully nine days paſt, but that certain of the chief Nobility, forgetful, or elſe careleſs of their Oath, and full of Envy, ſeldom ſatisfied but with blood, conſpired the unworthy death of Muzalo the Protector both of the Emperor and the Empire. The ninth day appointed for the funeral of the Emperor, was now come; at which time were met together at Soſandra (an Abbey by himſelf built in the honour of the Virgin Mary at Magneſia) many great Ladies and grave Matrons, to mourn as the manner was; all the great Princes of the Nobility, and among them the Conſpirators alſo; thither repaired alſo a number of Souldiers prepared for the the ſlaughter,with an infinite number of the Common People, as at ſuch Solemnities is uſual. But what needs many words? while the Hymns were yet in ſinging, and the Obſequies performing, the Souldiers as they were before inſtructed, ſuddenly breaking into the Church with their drawn Swords in their Hands, ſlew Muzalo (then fled to the Altar for refuge) with his two Brethren Andronicus and Theodorus, both men of great account, and divers others appointed to the Maſſacre. So the Matrons and the reſt of the multitude breaking off their Mourning, and for fear thronging on one anothers Neck, fled as faſt as they could, ſome one way, ſome another, as they thought for their beſt ſafety; but the Prieſts and Monks thinking to have done the like, were by the imperious Souldiers, whether they would or not, again inforced into the Church; where tumbling one over another, as thronging in with great force and violence, and ſcarce able to ſtand by reaſon of the ſlipperyneſs of the blood there ſhed upon the pavement, they in great fear made an end of thoſe bloody Obſequies. This outrage appeaſed, Arſenius the Patriarch, and only Tutor of the young Emperor now left, was therewith yet much troubled, as with a thing dangerous both to the perſon of the young Prince, and quietneſs of the State; but what good courſe to take therein he could not tell; for as he was a man for his Learning and Integrity of Life not inferior to the beſt, ſo in matters of State he was as far to ſeek; as it commonly hapneth, the contemplative man buried in his meditations, to be unfit for temporal Government; whereas he that ſhould perform both, muſt to his rare vertues and great learning joyn a civil converſation, with great experience in worldly affairs,not to be learned but by great and long practiſe. This reverend Father (of no great reach, yet wiſhing all well) calling together the Nobility, conſulted with them what were beſt to be done for the Government both of the young Emperor and the Empire, now that Muzalo was dead; not conſidering in the mean time,who they were with whom he conſulted, or, that Counſel grounded upon no wiſe foreſight, or approved experience, was more dangerous unto him whom he would have provided for, than all the Enemies murthering Swords, as ſhortly after appeared.

Amongſt others of the Nobility called to Counſel, was Michael Paleologus (of whom we have before ſpoken) much ſuperior to the reſt, as deſcended of the Imperial Houſe of the Comneni, a man of a chearful countenance,gratious and curteous, and withall exceeding bountiful and liberal, whereby he eaſily won the Hearts of all men in general, but eſpecially of the Colonels, Captains, and other Martial Men, Commanders in the Army; of whoſe aſpiring to the Empire, many preſages and common rumors (not always vain) had in former time paſſed alſo, to the moving of many; yea the Patriarch himſelf not conſidering his haughty and aſpiring nature, made no leſs account of him than did the reſt, but upon an eſpecial favour, committed to his only truſt the keys of the common Treaſure, at ſuch time as Mony was to be delivered out for the payment of the Armies, or other like great occaſions of the State; the moſt effectual means for the furtherance of his ſecret practiſes, and the readieſt way for the effecting of that he had ſo long before plotted; for having in his fingring ſuch a maſs of Treaſure, as he might well have wiſhed, but never reaſonably hoped for, he poured it out as it were by buſhels, amongſt the Nobility and Martial Men, and ſuch others as he thought were able to do moſt with the People; amongſt whom were many of the Clergy alſo; of which his Favourites were made many meetings, and by them was the Patriarch continually ſollicited, but yet in general terms, without delay (according to the neceſſity of the time) to take order for the good Government of the State, which now as a great Ship in the midſt of the Sea without a Maſter, was (as they ſaid) in danger to periſh, and being once loſt, was not to be again recovered. At which time alſo the name of Paleologus was in every mans mouth, as the only man for his Wiſdom and experience fit to take upon him the charge and government of the Empire, until the young Emperor were come to age. Unto which common good liking, the Patriarch alſo (ſeeing no more, or peradventure not ſo much as the reſt) gave his conſent; and ſo without longer ſtay, to the great contentment both of the Nobility and People in general, made him Governor of the Empire, and Tutor to the young Emperor, wanting now nothing of an Emperor himſelf, more than the Title and Imperial Ornaments. This was the firſt ſtep whereby the aſpiring man (twice before in diſgrace with the two late Emperors, John Ducas, and his Son Theodorus) mounted at laſt unto the Empire.

It was not many days after, but that his Favourites held another Counſel, wherein it was alledged, That it was not ſeemly for him that was Tutor unto the Emperor, Governour of the State and Empire, and to give audience unto the Embaſſadors of forreign Nations, to want the honour next unto the Emperor, as well for the magnificence of the State, as for the credit of his place; whereupon he was both by the Patriarch and the young Emperor honoured with the title of the Deſpot, another ſtep unto the Empire. But what contentment find the ambitious even in the greateſt honours, ſo long as there is one above them? Little ſure, or none at all more than that it ſerveth them to ſtep at next up to the higheſt; as did this new made Deſpot, who ſhortly after, was by certain of the Nobility his great Favourites, near unto Magneſia, with the great applauſe of the People, hoyſed up and ſaluted Emperor. Whereof Arſenius the Patriarch hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the young Child, the right Heir of the Empire. And firſt he was about to have excommunicated as well him that was made Emperor, as them that had ſo made him; but afterward changing his purpoſe, for fear of greater troubles, he thought it better by ſolemn Oath to bind both him and the reſt, that they ſhould not ſeek after the life of the Child, or by any force or colour go about to deprive him of the Empire; which was ſo done. Yet it was not full a month after, but that even he that had ſo great a care of the young Child,and ſo provided for his ſafety, (perſwaded by them of the Nobility and Clergy) with his own Hands, and all the accuſtomed Ceremonies, ſet the Imperial Crown upon this Uſurpers Head; yet not as upon him that ſhould ſtill enjoy the Empire, but as upon a man according to the preſent neceſſity of the time and State, thought fitteſt for ſo great a charge, until the young Child came to age; unto whom then he was to give place, and to reſign to him the Empire. All which being by more ſolemn Oath than before, confirmed, good news (as the certain ſigns of his fortunate Government) were brought unto him of a great Victory obtained by his Captains, againſt Michael Angelus Deſpot of Ætolia and Epirus; who having married the late Emperors Daughter, and hearing of his death, with the troubles in Aſia, aided by the King of Sicilia, and the Princes of Peloponeſus and Achaia, his his Sons in Law,had thought in that hurle and perturbation of the State,to have taken to himſelf the greateſt part of the Emperors Territories in Macedonia and Thracia; and for the ſame purpoſe was with a great Army entred into them, burning and ſpoiling the Country before him; whereof Michael Paleologus (then but newly made Deſpot) having intelligence, ſent his Brother John, and ſome other his beſt Captains, with a great Army againſt him, by whom he with his complices were put to the worſe, and not without great loſs enforced to retire; the joyful news whereof he received even as he was crowned. Which was ſhortly after confirmed by the coming of the great Commanders themſelves, bringing with them the Prince of Peloponeſus and Achaia, by them taken Priſoner; who for his Ranſome was afterward glad to give unto the Emperor Paleologus, Monembaſia, Maine and Sparta, three of the beſt Cities of Peloponeſus; whereinto he put ſtrong Garriſons under the command of Conſtantinus his Brother by the Mothers ſide, a right valiant Captain. By whoſe good ſervice and the commodious ſituation of the places, he gained divers other Towns and Cities, and at length the greateſt part of Peloponeſus, out of the hands of the Latines; for the utter rooting out of whom, he ſhortly after with a great Army paſſed over into Thracia, with purpoſe (as was thought) to have beſieged Conſtantinople; but finding it to be a matter of more difficulty than was before ſuppoſed, he left that, and laid ſiege to the Caſtle of Pera over againſt it on the other ſide of the Haven, in hope by winning of that Caſtle, to have become Maſter alſo of the Town; where he was notably repulſed, and enforced with loſs to retire. So riſing with his Army, he fortified divers Caſtles and ſtrong Holds in the Country about Conſtantinople, and putting into them ſtrong Garriſons, charging them with continual incurſions to trouble the Conſtantinopolitans, and to cut them ſo ſhort, if it were poſſible, as that they ſhould not dare to look out at the Gates of their City. Which they ſo well performed, that in ſhort time the Latines in the City were driven to ſuch extremity, that for want of Wood they were fain to burn many of the faireſt Houſes in the City, in ſtead of Fewel. Which done, he returned again to Nice, the chief ſeat of the Greek Emperors, ever ſince that Conſtantinople was taken by the Latines.

Now reigned in Conſtantinople the Latine Emperor Baldwin the Second (as is before declared) a man of ſmall courage, and leſs power, and therefore not much regarded either of the Greeks or Latines; who for the maintenance of his State, was glad to ſell away the publick Ornaments of the City, and to pawn his Son unto the Bruges Merchants for mony; by whom he was left at Venice to be brought up; which gave occaſion for ſome Writers to report, That he was pawned unto the Venetians.

About this time Mango, the great Cham of Tartary, ſtirred by Aitonius the Armenian King, by whoſe perſwaſion he had alſo received the Chriſtian Religion, ſent his Brother Haalon with an exceeding great Army againſt the Turks and Saraſins in Syria and the Land of Paleſtine. This Haalon (converted alſo unto the Chriſtian Faith by his Wife) ſetting forward with a world of People following him, in the ſpace of ſix months overran all Perſia, with the Countries adjoyning, excepting one ſtrong place in the Mountains, (which ſome ſay was Samarchand, afterward the Royal Seat of the great terror of the world, the mighty Tamerlane) which beſieged by ten thouſand Horſemen, by him appointed for that purpoſe, and ſo continued by the ſpace of ſeven and twenty years after, was then at length (as Aiton himſelf writeth) yielded by the Defendants, only for want of Cloaths to cover their nakedneſs. Haalon (in whoſe Army thoſe ten thouſand left behind were not miſſed) marching on, and as a violent Tempeſt bearing all down before him, entred at length into Aſſyria, and there laid Siege unto the great City of Babylon, then the Seat of the great Caliph; whom all the Mahometan Princes honoured above all others, as the true Succeſſor of their great Prophet Mahomet, and received from his mouth the interpretation of their Law as moſt divine Oracles. Which great City Haalon won, and putting to the ſword all he found therein, Men, Women, and Children, with the Spoil thereof, and the rich Treaſures of the Caliph, inriched his Souldiers. The Caliph himſelf (reſerved for that purpoſe) he commanded to be ſet in the midſt of the infinite Treaſure which he and his Predeceſſors had moſt covetouſly heaped up together, and that he ſhould of that Gold, Silver, and precious Stones take what it pleaſed him to eat, ſaying (by way of deriſion) That ſo gainful a Gueſt ſhould by good reaſon be fed with nothing but things of greateſt price, whereof he willed him to make no ſpare; in which order the covetous Wretch kept for certain days, miſerably died with hunger, in the midſt of thoſe things whereof he thought he ſhould never have had enough; which though they were in value great, and with great care laid together, yet ſerved they him not now to ſuffice Nature, beſt contented with a little. Babylon thus ſacked, and almoſt raſed, the Tartar marching on through Meſopotamia, by the way took the City Rhoais, where Aiton the Armenian King, and Author of this the Tartars expedition, came to him with twelve thouſand Horſemen, and forty thouſand Foot, as reporteth Aiton the Armenian Kings Nephew, then there preſent. So entring into Syria, in a few days took Aleppo, which he ſacked and raſed in the year of our Lord 1260. with divers other ſtrong Towns ſometime belongimg unto the Kingdom of Antioch. Then was one Malacneſar Sultan of Damaſco, commanding over all Syria and the Land of Paleſtine; who terrified with the loſs of his Cities, and the fear of farther danger, with his Wife and Children came and humbled himſelf before the Tartar Prince, in hope ſo to have ſaved unto himſelf ſome good part of his Kingdom. Wherein he was much deceived, being (as ſome ſay) carried away afar off into exile, becauſe he ſhould not hinder the Tartars proceedings; or as others report, (and haply with more probability) being by him detained as his Priſoner, and afterwards to the terror of his Son, cut in pieces in his ſight under the Walls of Damaſco, afterthat it had in vain been twice aſſaulted by the Tartars; which ſtrong City for all that he afterwards took by ſtrong hand, and ſacked it, and by the perſwaſion of his Wife overthrew all the Mahometan Temples, as he had before in every place where he came. But purpoſing to have gone on forward to Jeruſalem, and to have conquered the whole Land of Paleſtine, news was brought him of the death of his Brother Mango, the great Cham; whereupon he ſtaid his journey, and returned back again, in hope of that great Empire; having in this expedition ſpent almoſt ſix years.

Damaſco won.

Thus by the Tartars was the Kingdom of the Turks at Damaſco overthrown. At which time, the broken affairs of the Chriſtians in Syria and the Land of Paleſtine, might eaſily have been repaired and thoſe two goodly Kingdoms again reſtored to the Chriſtian Common-Weal, had the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt then in time put to their helping hand on the one ſide, as did the Tartars on the other; but they then at fatal diſcord among themſelves, and buſied with their Wars at home, let ſlip that ſo fair an opportunity, the like whereof they ſeldom or never had ſince. Haalon the Tartar Prince, in token of his good Will toward the Chriſtians and their Affairs, at his departure from Damaſco left his Son Abaga, there with twenty thouſand Horſemen to aid them in their Wars, if they ſhould come (as was expected) for the recovery of the Holy Land; who having there ſtaied ſome while, and hearing of his Fathers troubles at home, followed himſelf after him; but yet left behind him Guirboca a valiant Captain, with ten thouſand of his Horſemen, to like purpoſe that his Father had him; who by the inſolency of certain Chriſtian Souldiers in Garriſon about Sidon, was of a Friend, together with his Tartars made a Foe. Theſe Garriſon Souldiers having by chance ſet in ſome booty out of the Tartars Territory, not only refuſed to reſtore the ſame again, but alſo fouly entreated ſuch as the Tartar had ſent for the demanding thereof. Whereupon further quarrels ariſing, it fortuned a Nephew of Guirboca's, a valiant young Gentleman, to be ſlain; in revenge whereof he beſieged Sidon, and having taken it, ſacked it, and burnt it down to the ground. After which time, he and his Tartars became utter Enemies unto the Chriſtians, doing them all the harm they could deviſe.

The Egyptian Sultan invaded Syria.

This diſcord betwixt the Tartars and the Chriſtians, gave occaſion unto Melech the Egyptian Sultan, now jealous of the Tartars nearneſs, with a great Army of his Mamalukes and others to enter into Syria, and to ſpoil the Country of Damaſco; againſt whom Guirboca with his Tartars, although both in Strength and Number far inferiour, went out. But joyning Battel with him at too much odds, and the Victory inclining unto that ſide where moſt Strength was, he there valiantly fighting was ſlain, with moſt part of his Tartars; ſuch as eſcaped fled into Armenia unto the friendly King. By this Victory, all Syria, with the Land of Paleſtine, excepting ſome few places holden by the Chriſtians, fell again into the hands of the Egyptian Sultans; as did ſome of them ſhortly after alſo; for Bandocader ſucceeding Melech in the Mamaluke Kingdom, coming into Syria with a great Army, took Antioch from the Chriſtians, and with it moſt of the places before by them defended. The City he burnt, and raſed the Caſtle down to the ground, and afterward entring into Armenia, did there great harm alſo.

Antioch taken from the Chriſtians.

Whilſt the Turks Kingdom thus goeth to wrack in Syria, ruinated by the Tartars, but poſſeſſed by the Mamalukes; their affairs in the leſſer Aſia, now the whole hope of that Nation, went not at that time much better; for Jathatines the Turks Sultan, there alſo invaded by the Tartars, and having loſt Iconium his Regal City, fled with his Brother Melech to the Greek Emperor Michael Paleologus, in hope to be of him relieved, for the kindneſs he had not long before ſhewed him in like caſe, when as he fled from the late Emperor Theodore; whereof now putting him in remembrance, he requeſted him either with ſome convenient force to aid him, or elſe to aſſign him ſome corner in his large Empire, where he might in ſafety reſt with his Wife and Children, and other Followers, whom with much Wealth he had brought with him in great number. The Emperor on every ſide himſelf incumbred with Wars, thought it not good in ſo great newneſs of his Empire, to diminiſh his own Forces; and to aſſign unto him any place to inhabit, ſeemed no leſs dangerous; for that he having been a great Prince, and commanding over many great Countries, and brought up in all Princely Royalty, was not like to content himſelf with a little; beſide that, his Nobility, then diſperſed by the Tartars, were like enough in great numbers to reſort unto him, as unto their Head, ſo ſoon as they ſhould once hear that he were ſeated in any place; and unkindly to caſt him off, that had ſo nobly uſed him in like extremity, the Emperor was loath. And therefore feeding him up with fair Words, and foording him on from time to time with delaies, he held him a great while as a man in ſuſpence, betwixt hope and deſpair. At length in the abſence of the Emperor (though happily not without his Privity) he was commanded with all his Train, in number about twelve hundred, to get him to Ænus a City of Thracia, ſtanding upon the Sea-coaſt; where he much diſcontented, lived like an honourable Priſoner at large; but with the watchful Eyes of ſo many upon him, as that he could by no means (as he deſired) eſcape. In which caſe we will for a while leave him, to feed upon his own melancholy thoughts.

Now had Michael Paleologus the Emperor reigned at Nice two years, when new troubles began again to ariſe in the Weſt part of his Empire in Europe ſide, by the treachery of Michael Angelus Deſpot of Epirus. For the ſpeedy repreſſing whereof, he ſent one Alexius Strategopulus, a worthy Captain, and a man of great Nobility (whom for his good ſervice againſt the ſaid Deſpot, he had in the beginning of his Reign made Cæſar) with little above eight hundred Bythinian Souldiers; and Commiſſion for the taking up of ſo many more as he ſhould for that ſervice need, in Macedonia and Thracia; commanding him when he had paſſed the Streight, with thoſe Souldiers to take his ways through the Suburbs of Conſtantinople, to terrifie the Latines, whom he was loath to ſuffer too long to live in reſt and quiet, or to ſtir too far out of the Gates, but to keep them as Priſoners coupt up within the Walls of the City. This warlike Captain with this handful of men, paſſing over Propontis, encamped at Regium, not far from Conſtantinople; where by chance lighting upon certain poor labouring men, Greeks born in the City, and there dwelling, he diligently inquired of them the ſtate thereof, and of what Strength the Latines were, with many other things ſuch as he was deſirous to know; who not only told him that the Strength of the Latines was but ſmall, but alſo that the greateſt part thereof was gone to the Siege of Daphnuſia, a Town not far off, upon the ſide of the Euxine Sea; and withall (as Greeks evil affected to the Government of the Latines, and deſirous of the liberty of their Country) offered of themſelves to ſhew him a means how to give him entrance into the City. Theſe poor men dwelt within the City, cloſe by one of the Gates, near whereunto by an old ruinous Mine almoſt ſwarved up, was a ſecret unſuſpected way into the City, not known to any but to themſelves; by this blind hole they promiſed him by night to receive in fifty of his beſt Souldiers; which ſuddenly ſetting upon the Watch faſt by, and diſpatching them out of the way, might preſently break open the Gate, and ſo let in the reſt of the Army; whereunto they promiſed themſelves with their Friends to put to their helping hands, aſſuring him of the good ſucceſs thereof. This Plot for the betraying of the City thus laid and agreed upon, Alexius and Cæſar well rewarding the men, and filling them with greater promiſes ſent them away; who as if they had been about their Country work, were after their wonted manner received into the City, without ſuſpition at all. And within a few days after according to their promiſe, at an appointed hour received in by night the aforeſaid fifty Souldiers; who aided by them, preſently ſlew the Watch, and brake open the Gate, whereby Alexius entring a little before day, in convenient place put his men in order of Battel, and afterward to the greater terror of the Latines, cauſed the City to be ſet on fire in four places, which increaſing with the Wind, burnt in moſt terrible manner, and was in ſhort time come almoſt unto the Emperors Palace. Who ſcarce well awaked, and ſeeing the City all on a fire about his Ears, and the Enemy coming on, was about at the firſt with thoſe few Latines that he had (for Greeks he had none) to have made head againſt them. But better adviſed, and perceiving it to be now to no purpoſe, he (the laſt of the Latine Emperors that ever reigned in Conſtantinople) with Juſtinian the Latine Patriarch, and ſome other of his Friends, fled by Sea into Eubœa, and ſo from thence afterwards to Venice, and afterwards to Lewis the French King, in hope to have been by him and the Venetians relieved. After whom fled alſo all the reſt of the Latines. Thus the Imperial City of Conſtantinople by great fortune fell again into the hands of the Greeks, in the year 1261. after that it had been in poſſeſſion of the Latines about 58 years.

Paleologus the Greek Emperor taketh poſſeſſion of the City of Conſtantinople.

The joyful news of the recovery of the Imperial City, was in ſhort time carried unto Michael Paleologus the Greek Emperor at Nice; who at the firſt believed it not, as thinking it ſcarce poſſible, ſo ſtrong a City to have been by ſo weak a power ſurpriſed, whereas he himſelf not long before was not able with a right puiſſant Army, and much other like proviſion, to win the Caſtle of Galata over againſt it. But afterwards aſſured of the truth thereof, with his Hands and Eyes caſt up towards Heaven, gave moſt hearty thanks to God therefore, cauſing Hymns and Pſalms of Thankſgiving to be ſolemnly ſung in every Church, with all the other ſigns of Joy and Triumph that could be deviſed. So ſetting all other things apart, he wholly buſied himſelf in making preparation for his going unto Conſtantinople, now once again the ſeat of the Greek Empire; wherein, and in travelling having ſpent many days, he at length with the Empreſs his Wife and Andronicus his Son, then but two years old, as if it had been in ſolemn Proceſſion, on foot entred into the City, by the Gate called the Golden Gate; and ſo after Prayers and Thanks given, went to the Palace prepared for him near unto the Tilt-yard; for the other Imperial Palaces of greater beauty (ſometime the ſtately dwellings of the greateſt Emperors of the Greeks) had now of long, during the Reign of the Latines, lien ruinous, or altogether defaced. And ſhortly after, becauſe vertue and true deſert ſhould not want their due honour, he cauſed Alexius Cæſar (by whoſe means the City was recovered) in ſolemn Triumph in his Robes of Honour, with a Crown upon his Head, not much inferior unto the Imperial Crown, with great Pomp to be carried through all the City; and farther commanded, that his name for one year next following, in all ſolemn Prayers and Hymns of Thankſgiving, ſhould be joyned with the name of the Emperor himſelf. And yet not thinking to have done him honour enough, cauſed his lively Image afterward to be moſt curiouſly made, and as a Trophie to be ſet upon a fair marble Pillar, before the great Church of the Holy Apoſtles, in perpetual remembrance of him, and what he had done for the delivery of his Country; which ſhortly after overthrown by an Earthquake, was by his Son again reſtored. Now was this great and famous City, ſometime the Beauty of the World, by theſe ſtrange and fatal mutations, wonderfully defaced, and brought to great deſolation; in every place was to be ſeen great Heaps, or rather (to ſay the truth) great Hills of Rubbidge, the eternal Witneſſes of the ruin thereof; the Houſes ſtood ſome quite fallen down, ſome ready to follow after, and ſome other great and ſtately buildings, now the ſmall reliques of great Fires; for the great beauty thereof was before, at ſuch time as the Latines took it, moſt defaced by Fire; who all the time that they had it, ceaſed not night and day to deſtroy ſome part or other of it, as if they had known they ſhould not long keep it; neither did this laſt Fire raiſed by the Greeks themſelves to terrifie the Latines, a little deform it; for which cauſe the Emperors chief care now was to cleanſe the City, and in the beſt ſort he could to reform ſo great a confuſion of things not to be all at once amended; firſt beginning with the Churches, which ruinous or ready to fall, he repaired; and next to that filled the empty houſes with new Inhabitants. And albeit that the chief of the Latines were together with the Emperor fled and gone, yet was moſt part of the Artificers and Tradeſmen of the City, Venetians, and of them of Piſa, mingled together; unto whom alſo to joyn the Genowaies, and ſo to fill the City with Latines, he thought it not altogether ſafe, although that by them he reaped great profit; wherefore he aſſigned unto them the City of Galatia now called Pera, on the other ſide of the Haven, for them to inhabit; granting them great Privileges, and every of thoſe Companies to be governed by a Conſul or Poteſtate of their own. As for the Imperial City it ſelf, he ſtored it, (as near as he could) with Natural Greeks born.

Paleologus jealous of his State.

Now although all things went as Paleologus the Emperor could himſelf have wiſhed; yet could he not reſt ſo contented, for fear leſt thoſe which now did eat their own Hearts, and with great grief ſmouldred their anger, ſhould at length as the rightful Heirs of the Empire by him uſurped, break out into open force, and ſo breed him great troubles, yea and perhaps work his confuſion. For ſuch is the tormenting ſtate of uſurping Tyrants, never to think themſelves ſafe ſo long as any one liveth, whom they may ſuſpect. Wherefore at once to rid himſelf of this fear, he thought it beſt ſo to diſpoſe of the Children of the late Emperor Theodorus Laſcarus, as that he ſhould not need of them to ſtand in doubt; to take them out of the way, beſides that it was a thing odious, he ſaw it like to be unto him dangerous; Mary and Theodora (two of the Eldeſt Daughters) being before by their Father married unto two great Princes, (one the Deſpot of Epirus, and the other Prince of Bulgaria) with whom he had much before to do, and of them yet ſtood in ſome doubt; but theſe were ſafe enough out of his reach. Other two young Siſters there were in his cuſtody, Theodora and Irene, with their Brother John, the only Heir of the Empire; Theodora he married unto one Belicurt a Gentleman of Peloponeſus; and Irene to one Vigintimilio of Genoa; both Latines, men of no great Birth or Power, ſuch as he needed not to ſtand in doubt of. Theſe two Ladies, the Daughters of ſo great an Emperor as was Theodorus, thus baſely beſtowed; remained only their Brother John, the only Heir of the Empire, then but ten years old, whom Peleologus long before even in the beginning of his Reign, had ſent unto Magneſia, there to be ſafely kept far off from the Court, for fear leſt in his right and quarrel ſome diſcontented perſons deſirous of innovation, ſhould now begin ſome new ſtirs dangerous unto his Eſtate. Which indignity done unto the young Prince, Arſenius the Patriarch (put in truſt by his Father for the bringing of him up) took in ſo evil part, that he forſook the Court with all his Eccleſiaſtical dignity, and as a man weary of the World, retired himſelf unto a little Monaſtery of Paſcaſins in the Country, there to ſpend the reſt of his days. From whence for all that he was after the taking of Conſtantinople from the Latines, almoſt againſt his Will drawn thither by Paleologus the Emperor, and made Patriarch thereof, there together with ſo great an honour to find his greater diſcontent. For Paleologus the Uſurper, altogether unmindful of his Faith ſo ſolemnly before given, for the ſafety of the young Prince, and the reſtoring unto him of his Empire; and now fully reſolved to eſtabliſh unto him and his Poſterity the Soveraignty of ſo great an Empire, howſoever it was got, cauſed the young Princes Eyes to be moſt cruelly put out; the uſual practiſe of the Tyrants of the Eaſt, upon ſuch as they are loath or fear to kill, and yet would make them unfit for Government. Of which barbarous cruelty, his Siſter Theodora (married to Conſtantinus Prince of Bulgaria) hearing, ceaſed not with tears and prayers and all other womanly perſwaſions, to ſtir up her Huſband in revenge thereof; whereunto alſo Jathatines the Turks Sultan, gave no ſmall furtherance; who weary of Exile, and to be ſo in a corner confined as into a Priſon from whence he might not ſtart, by ſecret Meſſengers intreated the Bulgarian Prince to make War upon the uſurping Emperor; promiſing him a great ſumm of Mony, if by his help he might recover his former Liberty. Wherewith he the rather moved, with a great power of his own, and above twenty thouſand Tartars which then lay by the River Iſther, ſuddenly brake into the Emperors Territories, and in ſhorter time than was to have been thought, overran all the Country of Thracia, even unto the Sea ſide, leaving neither man nor beaſt in all that Country as he went; in good hope alſo to have by the way ſurpriſed the Emperor himſelf, even then returning from his Wars againſt the Deſpot in Theſſaly; who hearing of his ſpeedy coming, being got unto the Sea ſide, and (having no way left to have eſcaped by Land) ſhipped himſelf into a Gally of the Latines, which with another, her conſort bound for Conſtantinople, by good hap put in there for to water, and ſo in two days arrived ſafe at the Imperial City. Thus diſappointed of the Emperor, all his care was for the delivery of the Turks Sultan. Wherefore marching in haſt to Ænum, he ſo terrified the Citizens with his coming, that they without farther delay delivered him into his hands, ſo to redeem their own Peace. In his return you might have ſeen the Souldiers, eſpecially the Tartars, driving before them infinite numbers both of Men and Cattel, in ſuch ſort, as that in the open Country of Thracia for a ſpace, was hardly to be ſeen either Countryman or Beaſt, it was ſo clean ſwept both of Inhabitants, and likewiſe of Cattel.

Paleologus cauſeth the young Emperors Eyes to be put out.

Jathatines the Sultan by the Tartars carried over Iſter, and ſo by them ſet at liberty, ſhortly after died. In whoſe Kingdom ſucceeded not his Son Melicke (as ſome write) but two others (as the Turks themſelves report) the one called Meſoot, the Son of Kei-Cubades, and the other Kei-Cubades, the Son of Feramcine, born alſo of the Selzuccian Family, as were all the other Turks Sultans, but how near of blood unto the late Sultan Jathatines, they ſay not. Betwixt which two, as his Vaſſals, Gaza the great Tartar Cham (by whom they were ſo preferred) for the payment of a yearly Tribute, divided the Turks Kingdom; apportioning unto Meſoot the Cities of Amida (in antient time called Amiſus,) and Aminſus in Galatia, Melatia otherwiſe called Meletine in the leſſer Armenia, Sivaſte, in antient time Sebaſtia, and Harbarie, before Satabrea, both in Cappadocia, with all the Country about them. And unto Kei-Cubades, Iconium, the antient ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultans, with all Rumilia, Aſiatica, or the Countries of the leſſer Aſia alongſt the Sea-coaſt; which theſe two Princes held as the Tartars Tributaries, as had the late Sultan Jathatines before them, until ſuch time as he was by the ſame Tartars again expulſed. So that the Turks Kingdom, which had of long time flouriſhed in the Selzuccian Family in Perſia, in Syria, Paleſtine, and Egypt, there quite overthrown by the Mamalukes and Tartars (as is before declared) and now brought underfoot in the leſſer Aſia alſo, where only reſted all the hope of that Nation, was now at a low Ebb, divided betwixt two weak Princes, reigning but at the devotion of the Tartar. In which confuſion of the Turkiſh Empire, ſo rent, not only divers men of greater Power and Authority amongſt them, ſhared unto themſelves, ſome one corner of the declining Kingdom, and ſome another; but many of the obſcure and baſeſt People alſo, bearing with them nothing but their Bows and Arrows, took the ſtraight paſſages of the Mountains, and from thence with their dayly Incurſions, did much harm in the Countries of the Chriſtians joyning upon them: which was no great matter for them to do, the Garriſons which were wont to defend the ſame, being for want of pay quite disbanded, and the Caſtles upon the Frontiers by them abandoned; which at the firſt, as a thing of ſmall importance neglected, was at length unto the Greeks a great cauſe of the ruin and decay of the greateſt part of their eſtate in Aſia. Theſe miſchiefs unregarded, grew dayly more and more, the Turks ſtill gaining upon the Greeks what they loſt unto the Tartars. Whoſe invaſions (the Glory of their Kingdom only excepted) was not ſo hurtful unto them, as the cauſe of their much greater felicity afterwards. At length it fortuned, that a great power of theſe adventurous Turks meeting together in Paphlagonia, were about to have invaded the Territories of the Chriſtians; againſt whom Michael Paleologus the Emperor ſent out a ſtrong and puiſſant Army to ſtay their further coming on, leſt breaking in that way, they ſhould without reſiſtance at their pleaſure forrage the Country before them. Which Army conducted by unskilful Captains, encountring with the Turks, was by them in a great Battel overthrown and utterly defeated, few or none of all that great multitude eſcaping; for whilſt the Greeks unadviſedly purſued the Turks, retiring of purpoſe before them, they were by them drawn into the danger of a greater Power lying in ambuſh for them, and ſo entraped, were ſlain with an exceeding great Slaughter. After which ſo great a Victory (the beginning of the miſery of the Chriſtians in the leſſer Aſia) the Turks without let or ſtay overran all the Country, unto the River Sangarius; upon the Banks whereof the Greek Emperor was glad to fortifie divers Towns and Forts to keep them out of Bithynia. Nevertheleſs, they in ſhort time after after ſubdued all the Countries, from Pontus and Galatia, unto the Lycian and Carian Sea, and the River Eurymedon, which they divided amongſt them into divers Toparchies; little or nothing acknowledging the Soveraignty either of Meſoot, or Kei-Cubades.

Carthage won.

Whilſt the Turks in the leſſer Aſia thus win from the Chriſtians on the one ſide, and loſe to the Tartars on the other, many an hard conflict in the mean time paſſed betwixt the Egyptian Sultans with their Mamalukes, and the Tartars, for the Soveraignty of Syria. The poor remainder of the Chriſtians all that while there, in doubt both of the one and of the other; from whom and from the Armenians (then alſo much infeſted with the Mamalukes) divers Embaſſadors were ſent unto the Pope and the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to crave their aid and help in that their hard Eſtate; whoſe prayers little prevailing with the reſt, yet ſo moved Lewis the French King, and Henry the Third, then reigning in England, that they both promiſed them aid. Whereupon Lewis a man of a great devotion, and always forward in that ſervice againſt the Infidels, took upon him the Croſs, the cogniſance of the ſacred War; cauſing his three Sons, Philip that ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, ſirnamed the Fair, Peter Count of Alangon, and John Count of Nevers (ſirnamed Triſtan, for that his Mother was in her greateſt heavineſs for the taking of her Husband, delivered of him in Egypt) and moſt of the Nobility of France to do the like; unto whom alſo Theobald King of Navar his Son-in-Law, Alphonſus his Brother, and Guydo Earl of Flanders, joyned themſelves. And ſo having put all things in readineſs, took his way to Marſelleis, and from thence embarking himſelf with his Army in the Genoway Ships, hired for that purpoſe, ſet forward the firſt of March, in the year 1270. But being at Sea, he was by force of Weather conſtrained to land in Sardinia, and there to ſtay a while; departing thence, he at length arrived at Carthage, the place by him deſired; where in the entrance of the Haven he ſurpriſed certain of the Enemies Ships; but landing his men, and aſſaulting the Town, he was there notably repulſed. This is not that antient, great, and famous City, which ſometime mightily ſtrove with the proud Miſtreſs of the World for Soveraignty, but another built long after in the ruins, or at leaſt not far from the ruins of the ſame. In the beſieging whereof, the Frenchmen found ſuch reſiſtance, as well put them in remembrance of the antient glory of the Carthaginians. One day it fortuned as the King thus lay at the Siege, that the Defendants made a great and fierce Sally out upon the Frenchmen, who before commanded ſo to do, by little and little retired, to draw their Enemies further on; betwixt whom and the City, the Conſtable with a great power coming in and charging them behind, and they which before retired, now ſtanding cloſe unto them, they were on both ſides hardly beſet; who for all that, as became valiant men, worthily defended themſelves, and made there a great fight, though not without extreme peril; which they in the City beholding, gave out a moſt hideous and piteous cry, a certain ſign of their hard eſtate within; aſtonying with the ſuddenneſs thereof, both their Friends and Enemies. But whilſt they of the Town betwixt hope and deſpair ſtood thus beholding the fight at Land, the Frenchmen by Sea approaching a Bulwark on that ſide of the Town, took it without reſiſtance; which ſo diſmaied them without, that they began forthwith to flie, of whom the greateſt part caſting away their Weapons, were by the Kings commandment taken to mercy; and they likewiſe of the Town upon promiſe of their lives, yielded the ſame unto the King. Carthage thus won, the King laid Siege to Tunes, the chief City of that Kingdom, being not far off; where by the way he was encountred by the King of the Countrey, who having there loſt ten thouſand of his Moors, betook himſelf to flight with the reſt. Who thus overthrown, reſolved no more to tempt Fortune, but to keep himſelf ſafe within the Walls of the City, if happily ſo he might (as it oftentimes falleth out) more weaken his Enemies by lying ſtill and protracting the time, than by open Force and Valour. Which their purpoſe King Lewis perceiving, reſolved not to ſtir from thence until that he were become Maſter of the City; which as it ſeemed, could not hold out for want of Victuals, conſidering the multitude of People that were got into it. Nevertheleſs thus beſieged both by Sea and Land, and ſo ſtraightly hemmed in on every ſide, as that no relief could poſſibly be brought unto it; yet held it out by the ſpace of ſix Months. After which time Wants daily more and more increaſing amongſt the beſieged, Embaſſadors were ſent out to the King, to intreat with him of peace. But whilſt theſe Embaſſadors go to and fro, and reaſon upon the capitulations of the deſired peace, behold a great and furious Plague aroſe in the French Camp, which began to cut them down by heaps; there dyed John Triſtan Count of Nevers, the Kings youngeſt Son, born in the firſt expedition that the ſaid King his Father made into the Holy Land, even at ſuch time as he was taken Priſoner; which Triſtan died the five and twentieth day of Auguſt in the year of our Lord 1270. The good King having yet ſcarcely performed the Obſequies of his Son, fell ſick of the bloody Flix, whereof he there ſhortly after died alſo. About which time arrived there Charles King of Sicily, the French Kings Brother, with a great number of freſh Souldiers; whoſe coming lightned ſomewhat the Frenchmens hearts (heavy for the death of their King) and daunted the Moors, before brag of the ſame. Shortly after whom arrived there alſo Prince Edward, King Henry the Third his Eldeſt Son, who travelling through France, and taking ſhipping at Aqueſmort, not far from Marſeilles, was now in ten days with a brave Company of Engliſhmen come to Tunes; and thereof the other Chriſtian Princes, namely of Philip the French King (his Father Lewis being now dead) of Charles King of Sicily, and of the two Kings of Navar and Aragon, joyfully received. But theſe Princes had a little before his arrival concluded a Peace with the Moors King, and the Infidels, upon condition that he ſhould pay a yearly Tribute of forty thouſand Crowns unto the King of Sicilia; and to ſuffer the Chriſtian Religion to be freely preached in his Dominions, by ſuch devout perſons as ſhould be there left for that purpoſe; and that unto ſuch as ſhould by their preaching be converted unto the Faith in Chriſt Jeſus, it ſhould be lawful for them to be baptized, and to profeſs the Chriſtian Religion. Of which Peace, Prince Edward underſtanding, did what he might to have diſſwaded them from the ſame; ſaying, that the War was by them all taken in hand againſt the Infidels, as Enemies to the Croſs of Chriſt, with whom they were not to have Peace; and for the recovery of the Holy City. But ſay what he would, and do what he could, the Peace (to his great diſcontentment) was now concluded, which they might not (as they ſaid) again break; and thereupon with the firſt fair Wind hoiſed ſail, and returned towards Sicilia, with purpoſe the next Spring to have gone into Syria; which their determination was ſhortly after by the hand of God diſappointed. For being come upon the Coaſt of the Iſland not far from Drepanum, moſt of the great Princes and other Nobility, in their long Boats went on Land, the reſt of the Fleet lying at Anker about a League off; for that being for the moſt part Ships of great burthen they were not able to put into the Harbor: But as they ſo lay, by force of a ſudden and violent Tempeſt then ariſing, ſome were eaten up with the rough Sea; ſome falling foul one on another, there periſhed together: others driven upon the Main, were there beaten in pieces: ſo that of that great Fleet before the Storm ceaſed, periſhed about an hundred and twenty Sail, with all the People, as well Mariners as Souldiers left in them, and great ſtore both of Armor and Munition: In ſuch ſort that moſt of the common Souldiers and Mariners which had eſcaped the Plague at Tunes, there upon the Coaſt of Sicilia periſhed by Shipwrack.

The Chriſtian Princes returning from Tunes ſuffer ſhipwrack upon the coaſt of Sicilia.

Only Prince Edwards Fleet, being in number but thirteen Ships, eſcaped free without loſs either of Ship or Man. Neither were they that were got to Land at Drepanum in much better caſe, the Plague ſtill following them; whereof died Theobald King of Navar, and Iſabel his Wife, King Lewis his Daughter, Elizabeth the French Queen, with a wonderful number of noble Gentlemen, and other common Souldiers; in ſuch ſort that Philip the French King diſcouraged with the greatneſs of the mortality, and the miſerable loſs at Sea, reſolved there to make an end of the intended War, and ſo returned into France, as did the reſt that were left, every Man into his own Country.

1271. Prince Edward arrived at Ptolemais.

Only Prince Edward having paſſed that Winter in Sicilia, with the firſt of the next Spring ſet forward again on his Voyage, and in 15 days after arrived with his Fleet at Ptolemais: where after he had by the ſpace of a Month reſted Himſelf and his Souldiers after their long travel, and fully inquired of the State of the Country, he with ſix or ſeven thouſand Souldiers marching from Ptolemais about twenty Miles into the Land, took Nazareth, and put to Sword all them he found therein, and ſo again returned. After whom the Enemies following, in hope to have taken him at ſome advantage, he underſtanding thereof, turned back upon them, and killing a great number of them, put the reſt to flight. And after that about Midſummer, underſtanding that the Saraſins were again making Head at a place called Cakbow, about forty Miles off, he ſet forwards towards them; and coming upon them early in the Morning before they were aware, ſlew about a Thouſand of them, and diſperſed the reſt. Aided alſo by the Nobility of Cyprus, he with like ſucceſs as before, made a third Expedition againſt the Turks and Infidels: inſomuch that his Fame began to grow great amongſt them, and they to ſtand of him in no little dread. But whilſt he thus prevailed, he was by foul Treachery almoſt taken out of the way. The Admiral of Joppa feigning himſelf deſirous to become a Chriſtian, and willing to further the Princes proceedings, had by a ſecret Meſſenger and Letters ſundry times Intelligence with him, as well concerning his own good Entertainment, as the effecting of that which he had promiſed. This Meſſenger by the Admiral thus employed, was (though to the Prince unknown) one of the Aſſaſines, a company of moſt deſperate and dangerous Men among the Mahometans, who ſtrongly deluded with the blind zeal of their Superſtition, and accounting it meritorious, by any means to kill any great Enemy of their Religion; for the performance thereof, as Men prodigal of their Lives, deſperatly adventure themſelves unto all kind of dangers. So now this Meſſenger, being reſolved to die, coming the fifth time unto the Prince, and being ſearched for having any Weapon about him, as the manner was, had acceſs unto him, then lying in his Chamber upon his Bed, in his Jerkin, bare Headed, becauſe of the heat of the Weather, where after due reverence done, he pulled out certain Letters from his Lord unto the Prince, which he read with great delight, as penned of purpoſe for to pleaſe. But as he was further queſtioning with him of many matters, and all the company voided, the deſperate Meſſenger making as though he would have pulled out ſome other ſecret Letters, ſuddenly pluckt out an envenomed Knife, which he had ſecretly hidden about him, thinking to have ſtruck him into the belly as he lay; for the avoiding of which ſtroke, the Prince lifting up his Arm, was therein grievouſly wounded.

But as the Villain was about to have doubled the ſtroak the Prince with his Foot gave him ſuch a blow, that he felled him to the ground, and with that ſtarting up, caught him by the hand, where in ſtrugling with him for the knife, and wreſting it out of his hand, he hurt himſelf therewith in the Forehead; but getting it from him, preſently thruſt it into the Murtherers Belly and ſo ſlew him. The Princes Servants being not far off, and hearing the buſtling, came running in; where finding the Meſſenger dead on the floor, one of them with a ſtool beat out his brains; whereat the Prince took ſome diſpleaſure, for ſo ſtriking a dead man. This danger of the Princes much troubled and grieved all the Chriſtians in Syria; and the more, for that the wound in his Arm, after it had been certain days well dreſſed by the skilful Surgeons and Phyſitians, began to mortifie and grow black, inſomuch, that they and others about him began to mutter among themſelves, and to look heavily upon the matter, as not without danger. Which he perceiving, ſaid unto them, Why whiſper you thus amongſt your ſelves? What ſee you in me? Can I not be healed? Tell me the truth and fear not. Whereunto one of them anſwered; And like your Highneſs, we doubt not of your healing, but that it will be painful for you to ſuffer. If ſuffering (ſaid he) may again reſtore my health, I commit my ſelf unto you, work on me your skill, and ſpare not. So the next day they cut out all the dead and poyſoned fleſh out of his Arm, and in fifteen days after perfectly cured his wound, to the great rejoycing of all his People. The great Sultan to clear himſelf of this ſo diſhonourable a treachery, ſent three of his Noblemen unto the Prince, calling to witneſs his falſe Prophet, That the ſame was done neither by him nor his conſent. Which Embaſſadors the Prince honourably uſed, but ſuffered them not to come nigh him. So having tarried eighteen Months at Ptolemais, and no ayd coming from the other Chriſtian Princes, as was expected, he took ſhipping, and returning homeward, landed firſt in Sicilia, and from thence croſſing over unto Apulia, and ſo travelling to Rome, was there honourably entertained by Gregory the Tenth, then Pope; and from thence by the way of France arrived in England, where he was ſhortly after crowned King, in the year 1272. his Father, the old King, Henry the Third, being a little before his return dead.

1273. Rodulph the Emperor taketh upon him the Croſs.

The year following, Gregory the Tenth, not ignorant of the hard eſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, (as having there been of late himſelf with Prince Edward, at which time he was in his abſence elected Pope) and now deſirous to procure them ſome relief, ratified the election of Rodulphus of Hapſpurge unto the Empire, upon condition, That he ſhould promiſe to take upon himſelf the Croſs, and to give them relief; for the performance whereof he offered unto the Emperor two hundred thouſand Crowns, with the Tenths both of the Clergy and Temporalty for ſix years; and many goodly bleſſings were in his name alſo, by the Preachers of that time, promiſed unto all ſuch as ſhould with him take upon them that ſacred War. Whereupon the Emperor, with all his Family took upon them the Croſs, the ſign of the ſacred expedition intended; as did alſo the Duke of Lorain ſhortly after, with ſome others. Nevertheleſs the Emperor, otherwiſe buſied in Wars againſt the Bohemians and Bavarians, and delaying ſtill the time, as not greatly willing to take upon him ſo long and dangerous a journey, and the Pope ſtill threatning his high ſentence of Excomunication, the time paſſed, the Pope died, and nothing was as yet done. Until that at length the Emperor having happily finiſhed his Wars in Bohemia, and finding himſelf at ſome good leiſure in ſome part to diſcharge his Vow, and to ſatisfie the expectation the World had long conceived of him, ſent Henry Prince of Megapolis, or as the Germans call it, Meckelbourg, with a ſtrong Power into Syria, to perform what himſelf had promiſed. Who coming to Ptolemais, made many notable incurſions into the Country about Damaſco, with Fire and Sword deſtroying all before him as he went, and carrying thence many great and rich booties; until that at length he was by the Mamalukes circumvented and taken Priſoner, and ſo carried unto the Sultan at Caire, where he remained in ſtrait priſon ſix and twenty years after; until that by chance one of the Mamalukes (a renegate German) being choſen Sultan, cauſed him to be brought before him, and at his coming demanded of him, If it would not do him good to celebrate the remembrance of the Nativity of his Chriſt with his Friends in Germany? (for now that time of the year was at hand) And I know (ſaid the Sultan) that thou art ſo addicted unto thy Superſtition, that thou reſpecteſt the ſame more than thy Liberty. Truth (ſaid Henry) mighty Prince; for Liberty would avail me nothing, if Chriſt by his moſt mild Incarnation had not taken away our Captivity; and therefore how much all men owe unto the reverend remembrance thereof, I would to God thou, O King, didſt alſo underſtand; which as I moſt heartily wiſh, ſo I would I could thereof perſwade thee. God forbid (ſaid the Sultan) for I remember that when as I was chief Engineer unto thy Father at Kneſe-Fenicke in Livonia, and there did him good ſervice, I was altogether of the Chriſtian perſwaſion; but now having left that common Error, have therewith alſo changed my private Fortune. But as for thy Religion I have nothing to ſay, my talk is only concerning thy Liberty; wouldſt thou therefore gladly be free, and ſo return home to thy Friends? That, Nature craveth (ſaid Henry) although my fortune gainſayeth, which yet dependeth on your pleaſure: I deſire indeed to return home, which if you ſhould deny me, I muſt as I have done take it in good part; aſſuring my ſelf, that my Wife Anaſtaſia, with my beloved Sons, Henry, Leo and John, having long ſince celebrated my Funerals, and ended their mourning. Thou art deceived, (ſaid the Sultan) for I am ſure that they know thou yet liveſt, and pray moſt heartily for thy return. Truly I owe much unto the remembrance of thy Father, and therefore this day give thee thy Liberty. And having ſo ſaid, furniſhed him with all things neceſſary, and gave him leave to depart with one Martin his Servant, who taken with him, had born him company all the long time of his Captivity. So taking his leave of the Sultan, he came to Ptolemais; but ſhipping himſelf for Cyprus, he was by the way by certain Pyrates taken at Sea, and as a Fugitive Captive brought back again unto the Sultan; who pitying his hard fortune, ſet him again at liberty, and by a ſhip ſet out for that purpoſe, tranſported him into Cyprus; where he was by the Queen of that Iſland his Aunt (as ſome ſay) honourably entertained, and ſo furniſhed of all things fit for his Eſtate. Departing thence he came to Marſeilles, where after he had ſome few days refreſhed himſelf, he from thence travelled by Land home into his own Country; where at the firſt he was not known of his own Children and Friends, as being grown old in priſon, and by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at laſt found again, and by them known, he was of his Children joyfully received as their Father, and of his Subjects as their Prince. Howbeit he ſhortly after died, and was honourably buried in the Monaſtery of Dobran.

Thus in the whole courſe of this Hiſtory it appears, by that which is already written, what notable expeditions even the greateſt Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to their immortal glory, from time to time undertook againſt the Enemies of Chriſt, and his moſt ſacred Word, and for the relief of the poor diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria and in the Land of Paleſtine; whereof as divers of them had right glorious ſucceſs, unto the great profit of the Chriſtian Common-weal; ſo ſome of them anſwered not with like Event, as undertaken with too ſmall ſtrength, or otherwiſe overthrown by the diſcord or malice of the Chriſtians themſelves, rather than by the Enemies Force. Which nevertheleſs how unfortunately ſoever they fell out in the hands of ſuch worthy men as undertook them, yet have they this glory, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honour of the Son of God, Chriſt Jeſus, and the defence of his Verity, againſt the falſe Prophet Mahomet, and his moſt blaſphemous Doctrin; ſo honourable and juſt a quarrel as might well beſeem the greatneſs of the greateſt Prince, yea of all the Princes of Chriſtendom. Yet could not the worthineſs thereof, even in thoſe more zealous times, or the dangerous Eſtate of that part of the Chriſtian Common-Weal, even then like to periſh, (as ſome others be now) or the lamentable complaints of the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians, crying out unto their Chriſtian Brethren for aid, any whit move the Chriſtian Princes of that time, with their combined Forces to reach unto them their helping hands, or to yield unto them any ſuccor or relief; for they little feeling thoſe harms ſo far off, and more regarding their own hereditary quarrels, employed thoſe Forces one againſt another, unto the effuſion of ſo much Chriſtian blood, as might have ſufficed not for relief of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria only, but alſo to have regained whatſoever had been before from them taken by the Turks or Saraſins. The German Princes were ſtill at a jar about the choice of their Emperors; the French agreed not with the Engliſh, or them of the Low-Countries; neither the Engliſh with the Scots; the Arragonians were at odds with the French; and in Italy were almoſt as many deadly Factions as Provinces. Of which diſcord of the Chriſtians (the greateſt occaſion of their ruin and decay) Melechſares the Egyptian Sultan underſtanding by his Eſpials, raiſed a great Army of the Mamalukes and others, with a full purpoſe to have utterly rooted out all the remainders of the Chriſtians in Syria and the Land of Paleſtine, and ſo to have entirely joyned thoſe two great Countries unto his own Kingdom. But what he had ſo miſchievouſly deviſed, he lived not to bring to paſs, being in the midſt of thoſe his great deſigns taken away by ſudden death. After whom Alphix (or as ſome call him, Elpis) ſucceeding him in the Kingdom, and with a puiſſant Army entring into Syria, laid Siege to Tripolis, which he at length took by undermining of it, and put to the Sword all the Chriſtians therein (except ſuch as by ſpeedy flight had in time got themſelves out of the danger) and raſed the City down to the ground; which calamity betided unto the Chriſtians the ninth of April, in the year 1289. Preſently after, he had the ſtrong Caſtle of Neleſine yielded unto him, whereinto he put a ſtrong Garriſon, to hinder the Chriſtians from building again the late deſtroyed City. In like manner alſo he took the Cities of Sidon and Berythus, which he ſacked, and laid them flat with the ground. And after that, he removed to Tyre, which after three months ſtraight Siege, was by the Citizens (now out of all hope of relief) yielded unto him, upon condition, That they might with bag and baggage in ſafety depart. With like good Fortune he in good time, and as it were without reſiſtance, took all the reſt of the ſtrong Towns and Caſtles which the Chriſtians yet held in Syria and the Land of Paleſtine, excepting only the City of Ptolemais; whereunto all the poor Chriſtians fled as unto a Sanctuary, to be there defended by the honourable Knights Templars and Hoſpitalers. Nothing now left unto them more than that ſtrong City, the Sultan of his own accord made a Peace with them for the ſpace of five years, fearing (as was ſuppoſed) to have drawn upon him all the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, if he ſhould at once have then utterly rooted out all the Chriſtians in thoſe Countries together.

Tyre yielded.

The Chriſtians affairs thus brought to the laſt caſt in Syria, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the late obtained Peace; Peter Beluiſe Maſter of the Templars, with the grand Maſter of the Knights Hoſpitalers, ſuddenly paſſed over (as Embaſſadors from the reſt) into Europe, unto Nicholaus quartus then Pope, craving his fatherly aid. Who moved with ſo great miſeries of the poor afflicted Chriſtians, ſolicited the other Chriſtian Princes to have ſent them relief; eſpecially Rodolph the German Emperor, who then buſied with the affairs of the Empire, and his Troubles nearer home, (as were the other Chriſtian Princes alſo) gave good words, but no help at all. Yet ſome of them under the colour thereof, got from their Subjects great ſums of Mony, which they imployed to other worſe uſes; only the Pope ſent fifteen hundred men at Arms, whom with devout perſwaſion, and much earneſt Preaching, he had induced to take upon them that ſacred Expedition, and entertained them of his own charge; unto whom alſo many others out of divers Countries, upon a Religious Zeal, joyned themſelves as voluntary men; who meeting together at Brunduſium, and there embarked with the two grand Maſters of the Templars and Hoſpitalers, in ſafety at length arrived at Ptolemais. There was then in the City a great number of People of all ſorts; of able men there was about fifty thouſand, and about forty thouſand of the weaker ſort; amongſt whom, divers Murders, Felonies, Rapes, and ſuch other ſhameful Outrages, (all haſtning the dreadful judgments of God) were dayly committed, and let paſs unregarded, more than of them that were injured. For all the chief Commanders were then at variance among themſelves, every one of them laying claim (not worth a ruſh) unto the vain Title of the Kingdom of Jeruſalem. Henry King of Cyprus coming thither with a great Fleet, charged the Templars to deliver him the Crown of that Kingdom, which they had (as he ſaid) wrongfully taken from Almericus and Guy his Anceſtors. And Charles King of Sicilia by his Embaſſadors laid claim unto the Title of that Kingdom, as due unto the Kings of that Iſland; and underſtanding it to be given unto Henry King of Cyprus, cauſed all the Revenues of the Templars within his Dominion, to be brought into his Treaſuries, and their Lands and Houſes to be ſpoyled. Hugh alſo, Prince of Antioch, laboured with tooth and nail, to defend the overworn Right that his Father and Grandfather had unto that loſt Kingdom. And the Count of Tripolis laid in for himſelf, That he was deſcended from Raymund of Tholous; and that beſide himſelf, remained no Prince of the antient Nobility, which had won that Kingdom out of the hands of the Saraſins, and that therefore that regal Dignity did not of better right appertain unto any other than unto himſelf. Neither did theſe four Princes more ſtrive for the Title of the loſt Kingdom, than for the preſent Government of the City, ſtraightway about to periſh. The Popes Legate pretending thereunto a right alſo; for that King John Brenne had before ſubjected it unto the See of Rome. As for the claim unto the City of Ptolemais, the Patriarch of Jeruſalem challenged unto himſelf the Preheminence, for that the Metropolitical City of Tyre (under which the City of Ptolemais was the third Epiſcopal Seat) was under his juriſdiction, even by the Decree of the Weſt Church. The Templars alſo, and the Knights Hoſpitalers, whoſe power in the City was at that time far the greateſt, pretended the Government thereof of beſt right to belong unto them, as the juſt reward of their blood, already and afterward to be ſpent in the defence thereof; promiſing great matters if it might be wholly referred unto them. Neither ſpared the French King, or the King of England, by their Meſſengers to claim the Soveraignty of the City, by their Predeceſſors ſometimes won. And they of Piſa having ſtill a Conſul therein, and by often Marriages with the natural Inhabitants, grown into great affinity with them, did what they might to get the Government into their Hands. The Venetians alſo by their Authority and great Wealth, laboured to gain the good Will of the People, ſparing therein no Coſt. And they of Genoa, no leſs cunning than the reſt, ſupplanted the ſtrongeſt Factions, by giving aid both apertly and covertly unto the weaker; that ſo having weakned the Faction they moſt doubted and hated, they might by the joynt favour of the weaker, aſpire unto the Government of the ſtronger, and ſo conſequently of the City it ſelf. The Florentines alſo by their continual Traffique thither, were not out of hope, by one fineneſs or other, amongſt ſo many Competitors, to find a mean to ſtep up above the reſt. But the greateſt part of the People for all that were moſt inclined unto the Armenians and Tartars, as both for their nearneſs and power moſt like of all other to ſtand them in ſtead. All theſe aimed at one mark, which was the Government and Command of the City; and moſt of them had in the ſame their own proper Laws and Courts, to decide their Cauſes and Controverſies in. Whereby it came to paſs, that every man might without check or controlement almoſt do what he liſt, the offenders from one Court to another, removing their ſuits as beſt ſerved their turns. Thus were murders (as is before ſaid) dayly committed in the Streets, men abuſed, houſes robbed, ſhops broken up, and many other outrages done, to the haſtning of the wrath of God, and grief of all good men.

1291. Diviſion and diſſention (the ruin of all Common-Weals) thus reigning in the City, the Souldiers of late ſent thither, or in zeal come of themſelves, for the defence thereof, gave occaſion for the more ſpeedy deſtruction of the ſame; Such is the power of the Almighty, in his wrath and judgments for ſin, even by thoſe things wherein we moſt truſt and joy, to work our utter ruine and deſtruction. Theſe Souldiers, for want of ſuch pay as was promiſed them, were enforced to ſeek abroad; and therefore contrary to the League before made with the Egyptian Sultan, oftentimes went out in great parties into the Frontiers of his Territories, taking the ſpoil of ſuch things as they light upon. Whereof the Sultan underſtanding, demanded by his Embaſſadors, That reſtitution might be made, and the offendors delivered unto him to be puniſhed, according unto the League. But in that ſo ſick a ſtate of a dying Common-Weal, neither was reſtitution made as reaſon would, or yet the Embaſſadors courteouſly heard. With which Inſolency the Sultan provoked, ſent Emilech Araphus a notable Captain, (and as ſome ſay, his Son) with an hundred and fifty thouſand men, to beſiege the City; who coming thither, and having made his approaches, had by a Mine in ſhort time overthrown a piece of the Wall; but in ſeeking to have entred by the breach, he found ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, that he was glad with loſs to retire. Whilſt Araphus thus lay at the Siege of Ptolemais, Alphir the Sultan died at Damaſco; in whoſe ſtead the Mamalukes made choice of this Araphus for their Sultan; who more deſirous of nothing, than of the glory of the utter rooting up of the Chriſtians in Syria, was ſo far from raiſing of his Siege, (either for the death of the Sultan, or the news of his Kingdom) that he more ſtraightly beſet the City than he had in the three months ſpace that he had there lien before. Now had they in the City choſen Peter the Maſter of the Templars, their Governor; a man of great experience and valour; unto whom, and the reſt of the Nobility, the Sultan offered great rewards, and unto the Souldiers their pay, with free liberty to depart, ſo that they would without more ado yield unto him the City, which they could not long hold. Which his offer the Maſter rejected, and flatly told him, That he had not learned of his Anceſtors, to ſell for Mony unto the Infidels a City bought with ſo much Chriſtian blood; either did ſo much regard his vain threats, as therefore to forget his ſervice due unto his Saviour Chriſt and the Chriſtian Common-Weal. With which anſwer the Tyrant inraged, the next day with all his Forces aſſaulted the City, and that in ſuch deſperate and furious manner, as if he would even then have carried it; having before filled the ditches, and promiſed the Spoil unto his Souldiers, the more to encourage them. Yet having done what he could, and loſt a number of his men, ſlain both in the aſſault, and in a Sally which the Chriſtians made out at the ſame time, he was enforced to retire back again into his Trenches. In this ſo terrible an aſſault, not repulſed without ſome loſs alſo of the Chriſtians, the grand Maſter and Governour of the City was wounded with a poyſoned Dart, whereof he in three days after died: with whom the courage of the Defendants fainted alſo, no man being left like unto him to undertake ſo great a charge, although many there were, that overweening themſelves deſired the ſame. In the beginning of this Siege the Chriſtians had ſent away all their aged and weak People, unfit for ſervice, into Cyprus, where they in ſafety arrived. But now many of the better ſort, both Captains and others, diſcouraged, one after another conveighed themſelves away out of the City; of whom a great number in paſſing thence to Cyprus, were upon the coaſt of the Iſland, together with the Patriarch drowned. In the City remained only twelve thouſand, which were thought ſufficient for the defence thereof; who afterwards (as ſome report) fled alſo by Sea after their Fellows; and ſo left the City empty unto the barbarous Enemy; ſome others reporting of them more honourably, as that they ſhould right valiantly defend the City againſt the Aſſault of their Enemies, until ſuch time as that moſt of them being ſlain or wounded, and the reſt by force driven from the Walls into the Market place, and there for a while notably defending themſelves, in flying thence unto the Ships, were by the way all cut in ſunder, or elſe drowned. But howſoever it was, the Sultan entring the City (by the Chriſtians abandoned, or by force taken) gave the ſpoil thereof unto his Souldiers; who after they had rifled every Corner thereof, by his Commandment ſet it on fire and burnt it down to the ground; and digging up the very foundations of the Walls, Churches, and other publick or private buildings, which the fire had not burnt, left there no ſign of any City at all; but purging the place even of the very heaps of the ſtones and rubbidge left of the raſed City, made it a fit place for Husbandmen to plow and ſow Corn in; which he did both there, at Sidon, Beritus, and other Towns alongſt the Sea-coaſt, becauſe they ſhould never more ſerve for a refuge unto the Chriſtians, or give them footing again into thoſe Countries. Thus together with Ptolemais was the name of the Chriſtians utterly rooted out of Syria, and the Land of Paleſtine, in the year 1291, about 192 years after the winning of Jeruſalem by Godfrey of Bulloin and the other Chriſtian Princes his Confederates.

Caſſanes the Emperor invadeth Syria

This loſs, as tending to the great diſgrace of the Chriſtians in general, moved not a little even the greateſt of the Chriſtian Princes; wronged all or moſt part of them in the perſons of the Templars or Knights Hoſpitalers, their Subjects, ſo ſhamefully now quite caſt out of Syria and the Land of Promiſe; howbeit, troubled with their own turbulent Affairs at home or with their neighbour Princes not far off, none of them once ſtirred for the redreſs or revenge thereof. Only Caſſanes the great Tartar Prince, having of late ſubdued the Perſians, and married the Daughter of the Armenian King (a Lady of great perfection, and of a Mahometan become a Chriſtian) at the requeſt of his Wife and his Father-in-Law, took the matter in hand. And for that purpoſe having raiſed a moſt puiſſant Army of two hundred thouſand fighting men, and aided by the Armenians and Georgians, paſſing over the Mountain Amanus into Syria, not far from the City Hama met with Melecnaſar, the Egyptian Sultans Lieutenant, with a mighty Army, whom he overthrew in a great and mortal Battel, wherein forty thouſand of the Egyptians are reported to have been ſlain, and ſo drave him quite out of Syria; ſending Molais, one of his Captains, with part of his Army to purſue him, who never left him until he had chaſed him over the deſart Sands into Egypt. The victorious Tartar after this Battel took the City of Hama, where lighting upon the great Treaſures of the Sultan, he bountifully divided it, together with the Spoil, amongſt his Souldiers, reſerving nothing thereof unto himſelf, more than a Sword and a Casket full of ſecret Letters. The Egyptians thus put to flight; he without reſiſtance took in moſt of the Cities of Syria, with the City of Jeruſalem alſo; which in many places by the Turks and Egyptians defaced, he again repaired; and together with the Temple of our Saviour gave it to the Armenians, Georgians, and other Chriſtians, repairing thither out of Cyprus, Crete, and other places, to inhabit. And having himſelf honoured the holy places with great gifts, returned with his Army to Damaſco, which was forthwith delivered unto him. But lying there, with purpoſe in Autumn following to have gon into Egypt, and to have utterly deſtroyed that Kingdom, he was certified of new troubles ariſing in Perſia, and ſome other parts of his Empire; for repreſſing whereof, he with the greateſt part of his Army returned himſelf into Perſia, leaving one Capcapus Governour of Damaſco; who after the overthrow of the Sultans Army had revolted unto him; and Molais (of whom we have before ſpoken) Governour of Jeruſalem; commanding them at his departure to re-edifie the City of Tyre, and to ſend Embaſſadors unto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to joyn in League with them, for the more ſure holding of thoſe new gained Countries. And ſo Tyre was indeed repaired as he had commanded, and delivered to the Chriſtians, with a convenient Garriſon for the keeping thereof; but the Embaſſadors coming to the proud Biſhop Boniface the Eighth, then Pope, whom of all others it beſeemed to have furthered their buiſineſs, they could of him obtain nothing, but returned as they came. For he at the ſame time fallen out with Philip the French King, thundering out his Excommunications, diſcharging his Subjects of their Loyalty, and ſo much as in him was, depriving him of his Kingdom, had given the ſame unto Albertus Duke of Auſtria, whom he had declared Emperor; whereof aroſe great troubles. Beſides that, he being of the Guelphes Faction was not in any thing more careful, than of the utter extinguiſhing of the contrary Faction of the Gibellines, eſpecially of the moſt honourable Family of the Columnij, of whom ſome he had ſlain, ſome he had deprived of their honours, ſome he had impriſoned, and driven other ſome into Exile; ſo that thus wickedly buſied for the maintenance of his own proud Eſtate, he had no leiſure to further the good of the Chriſtian Common-Weal; which his intollerable pride, and forgetfulneſs of duty long eſcaped not the revenging hand of God; being when he thought leaſt, ſuddenly taken priſoner at his Fathers houſe in the City of Anagnia (where he was born) by Sara Columnius his mortal Enemy; whom but lately before redeemed out of a Pirats Gally, the French King had ſent for that purpoſe, with one Longaret (or as ſome call him, Nogaret) a French Knight; by whom the proud Prelat brought to Rome, in the Caſtle of S. Angelo within five and thirty days after moſt miſerably died in his madneſs (as ſome report) renting himſelf with his Teeth, and devouring his own Fingers. This worthy Tartar Prince Caſſanes (by whom the Chriſtian Common-Weal might have again riſen in Syria and the Land of Paleſtine, had not the pride of the great Biſhop, and the diſſention of the Chriſtian Princes hindred the ſame) was (as Aitonus writeth, who was preſent in this War, following his Uncle the Armenian King) a man of a very ſhort Stature, and exceeding hard Favour; but with Valour, Bounty, and other Vertues of the Mind, plentifully recompencing what wanted in the Feature of his Body. After whoſe departure into Perſia, Capcapus Governour of Damaſco, conſidering that the power of the Tartars there left was not great, and that no aid was to be expected from the other Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt; to recompence his former Treaſon of revolting from the Sultan, with a new revolt from the Tartar, roſe up into open Rebellion, drawing after him not only the City of Damaſco, but the greateſt part of Syria alſo. Whereof Molais Governour of Jeruſalem underſtanding, was about to have gone againſt him with his Tartars; but advertiſed by his Eſpials, that Capcapus in this his Conſpiracy had compacted with the Egyptian Sultan, alſo perceiving himſelf too weak to withſtand ſo great a power, retired with his Tartars into Meſopotamia, there expecting new Supplies both from Caſſanes and the King of Armenia. Of whoſe departure out of Syria the Egyptian Sultan underſtanding, came directly with his Army to Jeruſalem, which he took (being forſaken of the Inhabitants) and prophaned the Temple, ſparing only the Sepulchre of our Saviour, at the humble ſuit of the Religious, making there a greater ſhew of Devotion, than of Cruelty. After that, he won all the other leſſer Towns, which the Tartars had either kept for themſelves, or given to the other Chriſtians, and utterly raſed all the Forts of the Hoſpitalers and Templars, which valiant men, without other help, for the ſpace of almoſt a year, held out againſt the Tyrant, in which time moſt of them were honourably ſlain; the reſt that were left alive being taken by the Enemy, had nevertheleſs leave given with bag and baggage in ſafety to depart, having before by ſolemn Oath for ever abjured the Country of Syria; and ſo theſe worthy men, the great ornaments of the Chriſtian Common-Weal, the Hoſpitalers and Templars, which to the utmoſt of their power had by the ſpace of three hundred years right worthily defended both the Chriſtians and the Chriſtian Religion, againſt the Infidels in Syria, and the Holy Land, were now for ever driven out thence about the year of our Lord 1300, to the great diſhonour of all Chriſtendom.

Wherefore with them now taking our leave of Syria, and the Holy Land, leaving the ſame in the poſſeſſion of the Egyptian Sultan and the Mamalukes, although it were ſhortly after like enough to have been again recovered from them by the Tartars, had not the death of the great Tartar Prince Caſſanes, and their domeſtical troubles letted; we will again return to the troubled Affairs of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, whither the courſe of the time had ſomewhat before called us, with the occurents thereof, more proper to our purpoſe and the argument we have in hand, but that all cannot be at once told; and for the better underſtanding of the deſirous Reader, I thought it not good abruptly to break off the courſe of the aforeſaid Hiſtory, drawing ſo near to an end, but to make him partaker of the heavineſs thereof.

The death of Meſoot and Cei-cubades.

Now had the Turks no Kingdom left in the leſſer Aſia, and that alſo at the pleaſure of Gazan the great Tartar Cham divided betwixt Meſoot and Cei-Cubades, as his Vaſſals, bound unto him by a yearly Tribute, as is aforeſaid; who both kept in awe by the greatneſs of the Tartar, did nothing worth the remembrance; but as they lived, ſo alſo died, almoſt buried in obſcurity. Of theſe two, Meſoot died without iſſue; but Cei-Cubades departing left behind him his Son Aladin, who by the name of Aladin the Second ſucceeding in the Kingdom, united again the ſame before divided, yet paying ſtill Tribute unto the Tartar his Sovereign, as had his Father with the other late Sultans of the Turks before him. Much it was not that this Aladin did, albeit that the power of the Tartars in his time began to decline, and not to lie ſo heavy upon the Turks as before. He was a man of a quiet Spirit, and therefore much delighted in Peace; a great Friend to Othoman the firſt founder of the glorious and mighty Othoman Empire, as in his life ſhall appear. But this Aladin, the laſt of the Turks Sultans of the Selzuccian Family, dying without iſſue; one Sahib his Viſier-Azemes or chief Counſellor, and then a man of greateſt Authority, aſpired unto the Kingdom, which he had for the moſt part himſelf ſwayed all the Reign of the late Sultan his Maſter; which uſurped Sovereignty, no way unto him due, he could neither himſelf long hold, or deliver unto his Poſterity; for that many others of the Nobility, men of great Power, and born of greater Families than he, envying at his honour, and diſdaining to be governed by him, or any other no greater than themſelves, laid hold, ſome upon one Country or Province, ſome upon another, where they were able to do moſt, erecting unto themſelves greater or leſſer Satrapies, according to the meaſure of their own Strength and Power, without reſpect of any Superiority one ſhould have over another, but every one of them abſolutely commanding over ſo much as he was able by ſtrong hand to hold. So that as it had oftentimes before chanced, that the great Monarchies deſtitute of their lawful Heirs, had in part, or all, become rich Preys unto ſuch as could firſt lay ſtrong hand upon them; even ſo fell it now out in the great Kingdom of the Turks, every one of their great Princes, meaſuring the greatneſs of his Territory, not by the meaſure of his right, but by the ſtrength of his own power. Wherein they ſhared ſo well for themſelves, that Sahib at firſt in poſſeſſion of all, was in ſhort time thruſt quite out of all; and ſo the great Kingdom of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, brought unto a meer Anarchie; no King now left among them, the whole Kingdom being divided into divers Satrapies, or other leſſer Toparchies. The greateſt of thoſe Princes that thus ſhared the Turks Kingdom amongſt them, was one Caraman Aluſirius; who as ſtrongeſt, took unto him the City of Iconium, the Regal ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultans, with all the great Country of Cilicia, and ſome part of the Frontiers of the Countries of Lycaonia, Pamphilia, Caria, and the greater Phrygia, as far as Philadelphia, and the City of Antioch upon the River Meander; All which large Territory, was of him afterward called Caramania, and by the ſame name is commonly at this day known, and by our late Geographers deſcribed. Of this Caraman alſo deſcended the Caramanian Kings, who of long time after unfortunately ſtrove with the Othoman Sultans for the Sovereignty of their Empires; until that at length they with their Kingdom, and all the reſt of theſe Turkiſh Satrapies, were in the fatal greatneſs of the Othoman Empire, ſwallowed up and devoured, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall (if God ſo will) in due time and place be declared. Next Neighbour unto him was Saruchan, of the Greeks called Sarchan, of whom the Country of Ionia-Maritima was and yet is called Saru-Chan-Ili, and Saruchania, that is to ſay, Saruchans Country. The greateſt part of Lydia, with ſome part alſo of the greater Miſia, Troas, and Phrygia, fell to Calamus and his Son Caraſius, of whom it is called Caraſia, or Caraſi-Ili, (or as we might ſay) Caraſius his Country. The greateſt part of the antient Miſia, with ſome part of Lydia, was poſſeſſed by Aidin, and was of him called Aidinia, or Aidin-Ili, as his Country. Some part of the great Country of Pontus, with the Cities of Heraclea-Pontica, Caſtamona, Synope, and others neer unto the Euxine, and the Country of Paphlagonia, fell into the hands of the Sons of Omer, or as the Greeks call him, Amur; of whom that Country took not its name, as did the others, of ſuch Princes as poſſeſſed them, but is commonly called Bolli, of a City in that Country by the Turks ſo named. As was alſo Mendeſia, or as ſome call it Menteſia, a Country in the leſſer Aſia, ſo by the Turks called of Mendos or Myndus, a City in Caria. There were beſide theſe, divers other places and Toparchies in the leſſer Aſia, which in the renting of this great Kingdom, from the Turks received names, before unto the world unknown; all which to proſecute were tedious. Let it ſuffice us, for the manifeſting of the Turks Anarchie, and the ruin of their Kingdom in the leſſer Aſia, as in part alſo for the more evidence of the heavy Hiſtory following, to have remembred theſe as the chiefeſt; eſpecially ſuch as took their names of ſuch great Princes or Captains as in that ſo great a confuſion of the Turks Kingdom, by ſtrong hand firſt ſeized upon them, and ſo left them to their poſterity, of whom much is to be ſaid hereafter. Theſe Princes one and all that thus ſhared the late Aladinian Kingdom, were deſcended of the better ſort of the Turks, which with the Selzuccian and Aladinian Sultans driven out of Perſia by the Tartars, had under them ſeated themſelves in the leſſer Aſia, as is before at large declared. Now amongſt theſe great men that thus divided the Turks Kingdom, moſt of them that write of the Turks Affairs, both Greeks and Latines, reckon up Othoman (the raiſer of his Houſe and Family) for one, who indeed in the later time of the late Sultan Aladin began to flouriſh, and was of him for his Valour extraordinarily favoured (as in this Hiſtory ſhall appear,) but of his Kingdom held no more than one poor Lordſhip, called Suguta in Bithynia, not far from the Mountain Olympus, (long before given unto his Father Erthogrul, for his good ſervice) with ſuch other ſmall holds thereabout, as he had himſelf gained from the weak Chriſtians his Neighbours. For although he were a Turk born, yet was he not of the Selzuccian Family, as were the reſt, but of another Houſe and Tribe, and therefore not of them favoured or thought to have ſo good right to any of the late Sultans Provinces or Territories, as they had, who being of his Houſe, and holpen with the preſcription of time, envied at the ſudden riſing of the Oguzian Turk, being to them as it were a meer ſtranger; whoſe fortune for all that (I know not by what ſecret foreknowledg) they ſeemed to fear, as in time to grow dangerous unto them and their Poſterity; wherein they were no whit deceived. But of him and his proceedings much more is to be ſaid hereafter; leave we him now therefore with the reſt unto their fortunes in this the Turks Anarchie, and ſo conclude this part of our General Hiſtory: Glad when I look back to have waded thus far, yet fearing to be drowned before I get over; ſuch a Sea of Matter and World of Troubles yet remaining, not without much labour and toil, and that in long time to be paſſed through.

OTHOMANVS PRIMVS TVRCARVM REX FLORVIT ANNO 1300

Multiplici laſsatæ Asiæ res clade premuntur, Hinc Sarracenus, Tartarus inde ruit.
Mutua Christicolæ gladios in vulnera stringunt:
Græcia funesta Seditione perit.
Impiger interea nova concipit Ottomanus
Concilia, et valida surgit in arma manu,
Et vasta tricis regno fundamina turbæ
Ponit, et in multo sanguine Sceptra lavat.

Whilest weltring in it's gore proud Asia lay,
To Saracens, and Tartars made a Prey.
While Christian Swords wounded each others breast,
And Greece with mad Sedition was distrest.
Bold Ottoman the dire Advantage takes,
And a new road for Desolation makes.
A barbarous Empire his Ambition founds,
His cruel scepter staind with bloud, and wounds.

Great and Mighty Empire
OF THE TURKS
OTHOMAN,
Firſt FOUNDER thereof;
WITH HIS LIFE & DOINGS.

All worldly things ſubject to change

The greateſt Kingdoms have in time taken end, and ſo come to nought.

WHAT ſmall aſſurance there is in mens Affairs, and how ſubject unto change even thoſe things are wherein we for the moſt part repoſe our greateſt felicity and bliſs, (beſide that the whole courſe of mans frail life, by many notable Examples well declareth) nothing doth more plainly manifeſt the ſame, than the heavy Events and woful Deſtructions of the greateſt Kingdoms and Empires; which founded upon great Fortunes, increaſed with perpetual Succeſs, exalted by exceeding Power, eſtabliſhed with moſt puiſſant Armies, wholeſom Laws, and deep Counſels; have yet grown old, and in time come to nought: So that even as men, all things elſe belonging unto man, are ſubject unto the inevitable courſe of Deſtiny, or more truly to ſay, unto the fatal doom of the moſt High, prefixing unto every thing that in time begun, a time alſo wherein to take end, being himſelf without time the great Commander thereof, and of all things elſe done therein. The Fame of the firſt Aſſyrian Monarchy, is very ancient, and was no doubt both great and long, yet hath it nevertheleſs found an end; and the more to put us in remembrance of our infirmity, was never with ſo much glory and valour by Ninus erected, as it was with ſhame and cowardiſe by Sardanapulus ſubverted. With like neceſſity fell the great Empire of the Medes and Perſians, the time thereof being come: And after them the Macedonians alſo. Neither hath the great Roman Empire, or the proud City of Rome it ſelf (ſometime the Miſtreſs of the World) herein found any exemption, but run the ſame courſe with the reſt; which grown great with continual Triumphs, and ſo ſtrong as that it was not with forreign Power to be ſhaken; converted the Forces of it ſelf upon it ſelf, to the overthrow of the antient liberty thereof, together with the utter ſubverſion of the State. After which time that mighty Monarchy (of all that ever yet were, the greateſt) under the Roman Emperors felt many an hard and perilous ſtorm, and by little and little ſtill declining (though ſometime like a ſick aged body, by the valour or vertue of ſome one or other her worthy Emperors, a little relieved, and by and by again caſt down by the folly or negligence of ſome others ſucceeding) it became at length a Prey unto a fooliſh rude and barbarous Nation, which it had before oftentimes overcome, and over which many the Roman Captains had triumphed, and thereof taken their glorious Sirnames; which now again without compaſſion, burning and ſacking it, cauſed it to ſtoop, and to yield unto the ſervile yoke which it had in former time proudly impoſed upon the Necks of others; wherein if any thing be to be blamed, it is not the fortune or folly of this or that man, then ſitting at the Helm (although that may alſo much help the matter as a mean) but the inſtability of worldly things, never permanent, but always changeable, and the ſooner for their height; and that ſo forcibly, as that no man knoweth how to remedy the ſame; or if he did, were able to perform it; the greateſt means that men could poſſibly deviſe for the ſtay thereof, being oftentimes by a greater Power from above, converted unto the more ſpeedy effecting of that, againſt the which they were by mans wiſdom provided. The like might be ſaid of the Athenians, the Lacedemonians, the Thebanes, and of whom not? What marvel then, if the ancient Kingdoms of the Turks likewiſe in Perſia, and the leſſer Aſia, in Syria, Paleſtina, and Egypt, having run their appointed times, mightily impugned by the Chriſtians, oppreſſed on the one ſide by the Tartars, and on the other by the Mamalukes, and at length by themſelves rent in ſunder (their Deſtiny ſo requiring) loſt at laſt their wonted Majeſty, and ſo fell into a meer Anarchie, as in the former part of this Hiſtory is at large declared? Yet in this far more than any other People fortunate, That after the ruin of their former Kingdoms, ſtraight way out of themſelves ariſe another, namely this Othoman Monarchy, the chief object of this Hiſtory; which at the firſt ſcarce of the World perceived, or of themſelves regarded, in ſhort time ſo proſpered, as that the Power and Glory thereof obſcured not their former Kingdoms only (nothing, in compariſon of this) but even the greateſt Monarchies of the World; over a great part of which, it now ſo proudly triumpheth, as if it ſhould never have end; at the Beauty whereof the World wondreth, and at the Power thereof quaketh; within the greatneſs whereof are contained no ſmall portions of Aſia, Europe and Africk, but even the moſt famous and fruitful Kingdoms thereof; no part of the World left untouched but America only; not more fortunate with her rich Mines, than in that ſhe is ſo far from ſo great and dangerous an Enemy. The foundation of this ſo great a Kingdom (and now ſo mighty an Empire, as holdeth the World in awe) was firſt laid by the valiant Othoman, or as the Turks call him, Oſman; not deſcended of the Selzuccian Family, as were all the former Turks Sultans, but of the Oguzian Tribe and Kindred; in whoſe line this glorious Empire hath ever ſince, to the aſtoniſhment of the World, wonderfully flouriſhed. But foraſmuch as both his greatneſs, and the greatneſs of the reſt of the Othoman Kings and Emperors his Progenitors, took their beginning from this worthy and warlike Othoman, with whoſe Life and Doings we purpoſe to begin this part of our Hiſtory, it ſhall not be amiſs both for the continuation of that we have in hand, with that we have already written, and for the more manifeſting of that which hereafter followeth, a little farther to fetch his Race and Deſcent alſo; not meaning with a long and feigned Pedegree to fet him out of Noah his Ark, (which continual Succeſſion of Princes, no Nation of the World, be it never ſo ancient, the Jews only excepted, and they alſo by Writings and Hiſtories as much as was poſſible eternized, could truly and juſtly challenge) but only ſo far as it ſhall be pertinent unto our purpoſe, and by the authority of good Hiſtories to be averred.

At ſuch time as the Turks Kingdom founded by Tangrolipix in Perſia, flouriſhed in the Selzuccian Princes his Succeſſors, there was alſo another Kingdom of theirs at the City of Machan, as is before declared, but nothing comparable to the other, either in Glory or Power. In this City, and over this ſmall Kingdom, reigned one Solyman, by his Subjects honoured alſo with the name of a Sultan or King; at the ſame time that the Tartars under the leading of old Zingis their great Captain, leaving their own Country, and bearing down the World before them, having conquered the fartheſt parts of the Eaſt, and there ſeated their Kingdom, turned their Forces into Perſia, and there overthrew the Turks Kingdom at Balch in Coraſan, and drave the Turks with Curſumes their laſt King, out of the Country; after that they had there from the time of Tangrolipix reigned about an hundred and ſeventy two years.

This Solyman of whom we ſpeak, then reigning at Machan, was not of the Selzuccian Family (as were all the other Turks Sultans, the Succeſſors of Tangrolipix, but of the Oguzian Tribe, a Family famous alſo amongſt the Turks; who ſeeing the Selzuccian Sultan Curſumes (or as ſome call him, Cuſſumes) his Countryman, beaten out of his Kingdom by the Tartar, and his Country over-run, and the great Caliph of Babylon alſo overthrown; thought it not good longer to ſtay in that Country which he could not hold, but by ſpeedy flight betimes to provide for the ſafety of himſelf and of ſuch his Subjects as would follow him; and hearing that Aladin the Son Kei-Huſreu, or as the Greeks call him, Cai-Coſroe (a great man of the Selzuccian Family, and neer of kin unto the late Sultan Curſumes) who for fear of the Tartars but lately come into Romania-Aſiatica, had there by force of Arms moſt honourably ſeated himſelf and the Turks his followers, amongſt the Chriſtians; in hope of like good fortune, and for the zeal towards his Superſtition (accounting all well gotten that was gained from the Chriſtians) took his way after him, with ſuch of his Kinſmen and Subjects as would accompany him in his new adventures. And coming to Artezerum, a City in the borders of Armenia and Cappadocia, thereabout in the Country according to the ſeaſon of the year ſeated himſelf with his followers, being in number many; who with their Wives and Children, after the manner of the Tartar Nomades their Anceſtors, in poor Tents and Carts covered with a courſe kind of Cloth, had followed him; being indeed nothing elſe but a very rude and rough kind of ſturdy Herdſmen, not wedded to any place, but ſtill removing with their Tents and Carts up and down, as beſt ſerved for their purpoſe and the feeding of their Cattle, as do the Turcoman Nation, the true deſcent of the Turks, in many places of Aſia at this day; and were thereof not only called Nomades, that is to ſay, Herdſmen, (by which name the proud Janizaries will oftentimes in contempt call even the greateſt of the natural Turks) but Hamaxophoreti, and Hamaxobij, that is to ſay, people carried or living in Carts. Solyman having ſtaid a while about Erzerum, removing thence came to Amaſia; and there ſpoyling the Country, then inhabited by the Chriſtians, did them much harm, oftentimes encountring them in the plain field, and ſometimes ſeiſing upon their Towns and Cities, until he had ſubdued unto himſelf a right large Territory; yea at length having in ſo many Battles by him fought and Cities by him beſieged, loſt a great number of his People, and ſo wearied the reſt as that they were not willing farther to follow him; and fearing alſo with ſuch ſmall power as he had left, to be able to defend and keep the Country by him already gotten, in the midſt of ſo many Enemies, thought it beſt to depart thence, and to ſeek his better fortune elſewhere. At the ſame time it was riſely reported, that the affairs of Perſia, after ſo long trouble (for all this was not a while in doing) began to grow again to ſome good quiet, the fury of the Tartars being now well abated, and that ſtorm overblown; wherefore Solyman reſolved now to return home again, and to viſit his Native Country, of him and his people above all others deſired. So paſſing thorow Syria, (for that was now his way) near Aleppo he ſeiſed upon a Caſtle called Ziaber-Cala, and there ſtaid a ſpace for the refreſhing of his People. Afterward ſetting forward again, he came at length to the great and famous River Euphrates, over which he muſt needs paſs; but finding there neither Bridge nor Foord, or other means to get over, he ſtood ſtill as a man diſmaid, not knowing what to do. Stay there he would not, and go further he could not; his deſire bid him go, but the great River ſaid not ſo. In this perplexity Solyman himſelf with his Horſe oftentimes taking the River, in hope to have found ſome paſſage; but finding none, adventuring too far, was with the force of the ſtream carried away, and ſo together with his Horſe drowned. His body after long ſeeking being at length found, was with the great lamentation of his People buried near unto the Caſtle Ziaber, not long before by him taken; whereof they ſay the place is now in their Tongue called Meſari-Zuruc, (viz.) the Turks Grave. Some of theſe Oguzian Turks, after the death of their Sultan, weary of their long travel, ſeated themſelves in the Country thereabouts, unto whom the Turks that now do hold that Caſtle do refer their beginning. The reſt of that great Tribe and Family diverſly divided, went unto divers places as their fortunes led them; ſome of them into the waſt ground and deſarts of Arabia and Syria, and are at this day called the Damaſcene Turcomans; other ſome returned back again into Romania, the ſame way that they came; of whom are deſcended the Turcomans of Iconium, and Anatolia; who yet with their Wives and Children, as Herdſmen in great companies wander up and down the Country, after the manner of their Anceſtors.

Solyman thus loſt, left four Sons, Sencur-Teken, Jundogdis, Ertogrul, of ſome called Orthobules (the Father of this Othoman Founder of the Turks Empire that now is) and Dunder. With theſe four Brethren, moſt part of theſe Oguzian Turks that were left, returning into Romania (as is aforeſaid) after they had there reſted themſelves a while, marching up along the River Euphrates, came to a place called Paſin-Ovaſi, about ten miles above Arterum, where Ertogrul and his Brother Dunder, with four hundred Families, not willing to go any farther, ſtayed with their Tents and Carts, their beſt Dwellings. Sencur and Jungdogdis their other two Brethren, in the mean time paſſing the River, returned with the reſt into Perſia; whom we there leave unto their unknown fortunes. In this place Ertogrul with his Brother and his three Sons ſtaid a while, and had divers conflicts with the Country People thereabout, until that at length he thought it beſt to return again into Romania. So ſetting forward he came to Ancyra, and from thence unto the black Mountains, and ſo to a plain called of the Turks Sultan Ungi, about 75 miles Eaſtward from the City of Nice in Bithynia, where he had many skirmiſhes with the Chriſtians.

Now a great while before this, Aladin the Elder (of whom we have before ſpoken in the former part of this Hiſtory) fled out of Perſia, had ſubdued divers great Provinces and Countries in Romania Aſiatica, or the leſſer Aſia, for ſo it is more truly called; ſo that he was of all the People thereabouts accounted for a great Prince, and of the Turks themſelves honoured with the name of their Ulu Padiſchach, that is to ſay, their great King or Emperor. Having placed his Regal Seat firſt at Sebaſtia, and afterward at Iconium; which two Cities before ruinous, he repaired, and therein reigned, as did ſome few of his Poſterity after him, as is before declared. Neither was Ertogrul ignorant of the Honour, Glory and Power of this great Sultan; but having three Sons, namely, Jundus, Serugatin, and Othoman, ſent Serugatin his ſecond Son (a bold well ſpoken man) unto him, to requeſt him in that his ſo large a Kingdom, as yet not well peopled by the Turks, to grant unto them his poor exiled Countrymen, of long time oppreſſed with divers fortunes, ſome ſmall corner for them, with their Families and Cattle to reſt in. Which his requeſt, the Sultan not forgetful of his own diſtreſs ſometime in like caſe, graciouſly heard, and with great curteſie uſed the Meſſenger. Now for the furtherance of his ſuit it fortuned, that this Sultan before driven out of Perſia by the Tartars, and by them alſo much troubled in theſe his new gotten Countries in the leſſer Aſia, had with them divers hot skirmiſhes and ſharp conflicts; in one of which it fortuned the Sultan himſelf, with all the power he then had, to be hardly beſet by his Enemies, and in danger to have loſt the day; when as Ertogrul, but newly come into the Country, and willing to do the Sultan ſervice, and awaiting all opportunities for the commending of himſelf and his followers; upon the ſudden unlooked for, with four hundred men came upon the backs of the Tartars, then almoſt in poſſeſſion of a great Victory, and ſo forcibly charged them, that unable to endure the charge, and to maintain the fight againſt the Sultan (whoſe men encouraged by this unexpected aid, as by ſuccor ſent from Heaven, began now to fight with greater courage) being both before and behind hardly beſet, they as men in deſpair of the Victory they had before aſſured themſelves of, turned their backs and fled. After which good ſervice, the Sultan honourably welcomed this new come Turk, giving him his Hand to kiſs, as the manner of the Nation is; and highly commending his Valour, commanded a rich Cloak to be caſt upon him (amongſt thoſe Eaſtern Nations a great honour) and all his Souldiers to be bountifully rewarded; and preſently after gave unto Ertogrul and his Turks a Country Village called Suguta, betwixt the Caſtle Bilezuga and the Mountain Tmolus in the greater Phrygia; in which Village they might live in Winter, and upon the aforeſaid Mountain, and the Mountain Ormenius, betwixt the Rivers Sangarius and Licus, feed their Cattel in Summer. And yet not ſo contented thus to have honoured him, in whom he ſaw ſuch approved Valour, committed to his protection that ſide of the Country wherein he dwelt, being in the very frontiers of his Kingdom; which his charge he ſo well looked unto, that all the Country thereabout, before much infeſted with the often incurſions of the Enemy, was by his vigilant care and proweſs well ſecured.

Thus is Ertogrul the Oguzian Turk, with his homely Herdſmen, become a petty Lord of a Country Village, and in good favour with the Sultan; whoſe followers, as ſturdy Herdſmen with their Families, lived in Winter with him in Suguta; but in Summer in Tents, with their Cattle upon the Mountains. Having thus lived certain years, and brought great Peace unto his Neighbours, as well the Chriſtians as the Turks, before much troubled with the invaſion of the Tartars, it fortuned that the Chriſtians of Cara-Chiſar (a Caſtle thereby, called by the ancient Greeks, Melanopyrgon, and of later time, Maurocaſtron, that is to ſay, the black Tower or Caſtle) weary of their own eaſe, and of the Peace they had by his care enjoyed, fell out with him, and evil entreated both him and his People. Which their ingratitude he taking in evil part, thereof, and of the wrongs by them done unto the Turks, ſo grievouſly complained unto the Sultan, that he therewith moved, raiſed a great Army, and ſo himſelf in perſon came and beſieged the Caſtle. But lying there at the Siege, news was brought him, him, that the Tartars with a great Army under the leading of one Baintzar, were entred into Caria, and there ſpoiling the Country, had taken Heraclea. For the repreſſing of whom, the Sultan was glad to riſe with his Army; yet leaving a ſufficient ſtrength behind him for the continuing of the Siege, under the charge of Ertogrul Beg, for ſo the Turks now called him. The Sultan afterwards encountring with the Tartars at Baga, overthrew them in a great Battel. Whilſt Ertogrul in the mean ſpace hardly beſieged Cara-Chiſar, wherein fortune ſo much favoured him, that at length he took the Caſtle, the Spoil whereof he gave unto the Souldiers, reſerving only the fifth part thereof, as due unto the Sultan; which he ſent him for a Preſent, together with the Captain of the Caſtle, who he had taken alive; which Captain the Sultan afterward inlarged, and reſtored again to him his Caſtle, for the payment of a yearly Tribute, which he truly paid during the life of the Sultan; but he dying about two years after, he refuſed any more to pay it, and ſo revolted from the Turks.

Small things in time of trouble yield unto the wiſe great content.

Sultan Aladin, Founder of the Aladinian Kingdom (for ſo the Turks call it) being dead at Iconium, after him ſucceeded Azatines his Eldeſt Son, and after him Jathatines his younger Brother; who ſlain by Theodorus Laſcaris the Greek Emperor, (as is before declared) after him ſucceeded in that Kingdom another Jathatines, the Son of Azatines, who was by the Tartars expulſed, and his Kingdom ſubdued, as in the former part of this Hiſtory it appeareth. After which time the Selzuccian Family there alſo by the Tartars in the leſſer Aſia depreſſed, retained ſcarce the name and ſhadow of their former Majeſty and Glory. In which troubleſom times, and confuſion of the State, Ertogrul well beaten and wearied in the World, kept himſelf cloſe in his houſe at Suguta, as well contented therewith as with a Kingdom; ſeeking by all means to keep Peace on every ſide with his Neighbours, as well Chriſtians as others. In which quiet kind of life he ſweetly paſſed over the troubleſome times of Meſoot the Son of Kei-Cubades, and of Kei-Cubades the Son of Feramuzin, both Sultans, but the great Tartars Tributaries, and reigning but at their pleaſure, until the time of the Second Aladin, the ſole and laſt Heir of the Iconian Kingdom, before by the Tartars divided, which was no few years. All which time Ertogrul lived quiet at Suguta, as one amongſt many other of the Iconian Sultans Subjects, wiſely conſidering the fall of the Selzuccian Sultans, both in Perſia and at Iconium; as alſo the ruin of his own Houſe and Family, both from Royal State brought almoſt unto nothing; and therefore with patience taking the World as it came, and making a vertue of neceſſity, contenting himſelf with a little, bare himſelf kindly towards all men. In which contented kind of life he grew to great years, with his three Sons, greatly beloved and honoured of their Neighbours, as well Chriſtians as Turks; and no leſs favoured by the ſecond Aladin then Sultan, than he had been of all the Sultans before him; whom the young men his Sons after the manner of their Nation (forbidding them with empty hands to ſalute their Princes) oftentimes viſited with one Preſent or other. In all which his Sons were many good parts to be ſeen, yet ſo, as that in Othoman was eaſily to be ſeen a greater Courage and Spirit than in the other two his Brethren; which was the cauſe that he was the more by them of his Tribe regarded, but eſpecially of the youthful and warlike ſort, which commonly reſorted unto him when he went to hawk or hunt, or to other delights of the Field (the counterfeits of War) and was of them commonly called Oſman Gazi, that is to ſay, Oſman the Warlike.

Othoman amorous of Malhatun a Country Maid.

A folly common unto Lovers.

No friendſhip in love.

In this frontier Country near unto Suguta, the dwelling place of old Ertogrul, had Sultan Aladin divers Lieutenants and Captains, Governours of his Caſtles and ſtrong Holds upon thoſe frontiers, with whom Othoman was well acquainted, and unto whom he for Friendſhip ſake oftentimes reſorted; but eſpecially unto the Captain of In-Ungi, for that he knew himſelf to be of him well beloved, and therefore unto him very welcome. So it fortuned upon a time, that as Othoman, being yet but young, was going to make merry with the Governour of Eski-Chiſar (a Caſtle about four and twenty miles off, called of the Greeks, Palæocaſtron) by the way as he went, at a place called Itburne (a Town in Phrygia) chanced there to ſee, and afterwards to fall in liking of a fair maiden called Malhatun; unto whom his affection dayly increaſing, he without his Fathers knowledge ſent a ſecret Friend of his to intreat with her of Marriage. Which after long diſcourſe to her made concerning Othomans affection and requeſt, gave him anſwer, that betwixt Othoman and her was great inequality, a thing eſpecially to be regarded and eſchewed of ſuch as wiſhed to live a happy life in wedlock bands; ſhe was (as ſhe ſaid) but meanly born, and therefore was not to expect ſo great a match; whereas he could not want choice of other Maids of more worth, and in all reſpects more anſwerable unto himſelf. But among other cauſes why ſhe gave him this anſwer, one was, for that ſome that wiſhed her well, and put into her head, that Othoman meant not indeed to marry her, but under that colour to obtain of her ſome few days pleaſure, had ſo having diſhonoured her, afterward again to caſt her off; which was indeed far from his thoughts; for he the more inflamed with her modeſt denial, the more deſired her for his Wife. In the mean time Othoman going again unto the Governour of Eski-Chiſar, and courteouſly by him entertained, chanced (as it oftentimes doth among familiar Friends in their merriments) to fall in ſpeech of his Love, with greater affection than diſcretion, commending her Beauty, her Feature, and gracious Perfections, not diſſembling alſo, to her greater praiſe, the repulſe by him received at her hands. Which the Governour hearing, ſeemed greatly to like of his choice, ſaying, that ſhe was by the Divine providence (for ſo the Turks religiouſly uſe to ſpeak) appointed only for him to have. But in the mean time ſecretly inflamed with the immoderate commendation of Othoman, without reſpect of Friendſhip, he began to grow amorous of her himſelf, whom he had never ſeen; ſo light is that fooliſh affection; and that ſo far, as that being otherwiſe a man of good diſcretion, he was not able to conceal or cover theſe new conceived flames, but that Othoman by certain conjectures and tokens perceived the ſame. And yet diſſembling the matter as if he had ſuſpected nothing, being riſen from the Banquet, calling unto him one of his truſty Servants, ſecretly ſent him away unto certain of the Maids Friends, willing them in his name, as they tendred her honour, preſently to ſend her away unto ſome ſafe place further off, for fear ſhe were not ere long taken from them by a great man more amorous of her perſon, than reſpective of her honour. And by and by after taking leave of his unfaithful Friend and bidding him farewel, took his way to the Captain of In-Ungi, whom he knew to be his dear Friend. But whilſt he there ſtayed certain days, paſſing the time in hawking, hunting, and other youthful diſports, with the Captain his Friend; the Governour of Eski-Chiſar, who commanded all the Country thereabout called Sultan-Ungi, ſent one of his truſty Servants to Iburne, to ſee fair Malhatun, and how all things went there. Who coming thither, and underſtanding of her ſecret departure, and that by the advertiſement from Othoman ſhe was conveyed to certain of her Friends afar off, at his return from point to point certified his Maſter thereof; who exceedingly grieved with the report, and fretting above meaſure to ſee himſelf ſo deluded by Othoman, preſently ſent unto the Captain of In-Ungi, (being within his juriſdiction) to command him without delay to deliver Othoman unto him. But he loving of him well, as a faithful man unto his Friend, could with no threats or intreaty be perſwaded ſo to do. Wherefore the Governour in a great rage preſently raiſing the greateſt Power he was able to make, came to the Caſtle of In-Ungi, requiring to have Othoman forthwith delivered unto him. Where among the Souldiers there in Garriſon with the Captain, began to ariſe divers opinions; ſome wiſhing, for the averting of the preſent danger for which they were now unprovided, to have him delivered; and other ſome abhorring ſo treacherous a fact, willing rather to endure all extremities. In the end after much conſultation honeſty prevailed, and it was generally reſolved, that he ſhould be defended, who could not without their great infamy be delivered. But Othoman terrified with that diverſity of opinions, which had even at firſt ſhewed it ſelf; and thinking it not for his ſafety, to commit himſelf unto the truſt of ſuch wavering men, entred into a deep conceit of a matter of great adventure, which was, by a ſudden ſally to make himſelf way through the midſt of his Enemies. Wherewith having made his Brother Jundus and thoſe few his followers there preſent acquainted, and thereupon reſolved; he fiercely ſallied out, and by plain force brake through the midſt of them, and ſo took his way towards Suguta, ſtill notably repulſing them that were ſent to purſue him. But being come into the Frontiers of his Fathers Territory, and the report of his dangers known, and that being but weakly accompanied, he was by a great number of his Enemies purſued; preſently all the luſty youths and ſuch as loved him well, took horſe to come to his reſcue; who meeting with the Governours Souldiers, that had Othoman in chace, in a ſharp conflict ſlew divers of them, and put the reſt to flight. Of whom ſome were alſo taken Priſoners, and amongſt the reſt one Michael Coſſe a Chriſtian, Captain of a little Caſtle in that Country, called Hirmen-Caia, or the Rock of Ormeni; Of whom Othoman taking compaſſion, freely pardoned him that offence. With which unexpected curteſie he was ſo moved, that ever after he took part with him, and did him great ſervice in his Wars; whoſe Poſterity hath ever ſince even until this our age continued, next unto the Othoman Family, moſt honourable and famous amongſt the Turks, by the name of Michael Oglies, that is to ſay, the Sons or Poſterity of Michael.

oman ged, in ger for Love.

Ertogrul now ſpent with age, ſhortly after died, in the year of our Lord 1289. having lived 93 years, and thereof governed the Oguzian Family after the death of his Father Solyman, 52. His death was of all his Tribe and Kindred generally lamented, and his body after the Turkiſh manner honourably buried at Suguta, where he had of long time lived.

After whoſe death, theſe plain Oguzian Turks, in a general Aſſembly conſulting whom they might chuſe for their Lord and Governour in ſtead of old Ertogrul; caſting their eyes eſpecially upon two, ſtood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although moſt men were of opinion, that Othoman for the rare gifts and vertues as well of body as of mind, was to be preferred before the reſt of his Brethren the Sons of Ertogrul; yet were there ſome, and they alſo men of great gravity and experience, who had in ſuſpect the young mans age, as of it ſelf ſlippery, and for the moſt part prone to vice, eſpecially in the liberty of great power; and therefore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Ertogruls Brother and Othomans Uncle) a man of far greater gravity, judgment, and experience. But Dunder himſelf being indeed a wiſe man, and far from all ambition, perſwaded them in that choice not to have any regard at all unto his honour or preferment, but to conſider what were beſt for their State and Welfare in general. For he providently foreſaw in what danger the Oguzian State ſtood, expoſed on the one ſide to the mortal hatred and treacheries of the Greeks, grieved to ſee themſelves ſpoyled by the Turks, and naturally hating them for the Mahometan Religion; and on the other ſide not ſurely backt by the Sultans of Iconium, brought in thraldom to the Tartars, and dayly grown weaker and weaker. Unto which inconveniences and dangers (he ſaid) an old, weak and overgrown body (as his was) could give no help or remedy at all, but required the help of a wiſe, politick, vigilant, ſtirring and valiant man, ſuch as they all well knew was Othoman his Brothers Son. Thus before he came unto the election, he in privat declared his mind unto the chief of the Oguzian Family; and afterward at their requeſt coming to the general Aſſembly, all mens minds and eyes now fixed upon Othoman, he firſt of all (by his example to encourage the reſt) for the good of the Oguzian Tribe, his ancient Houſe and Family, ſaluted him their great Lord and Governor, promiſing unto him all Loyalty, with the utmoſt of his ſervice; whereunto by and by enſued the great applauſe of the reſt of the People, as unto a Governour ſent unto them by God; unto whom they joyfully wiſhed all happy ſucceſs, with long life and a proſperous Government. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great Governor of the Oguzian Turks, and ſo become among them a great Commander, and honoured with the Title of OEſman-Beg, or the Lord Oſman. Yet was this his honour included in a ſmall circuit, plain and homely, without any great Pomp or Shew, as commanding amongſt rough and rude Heardſmen and Shepheards, not acquainted with the curteſie of other more civil Nations; for as yet they were the ſame homely Scythian Nomades that they were before, and could not as yet be perſwaded to forſake their wonted rude and uncivil manners, by long tradition received from their Anceſtors, and ſo beſt agreeing with their Nature and Calling. Amongſt which rude Heardſmen, this new Governor himſelf, not too far exceeding the reſt in civility, commanded much like unto another Romulus; of whom alſo the Turks report many ſuch things as do the Romans of their Founder, which for brevity I thought good to paſs over.

The Oguzian Turks in doubt of whom to make choice for their Governor.

Now it fortuned that Othoman, even in the beginning of his Government fell firſt at odds with one Hagionicholaus, or S. Nicholas (Captain of Einegiol, a Caſtle there by) for that he had oftentimes of purpoſe troubled and moleſted theſe Oguzian Heardſmen, in paſſing to and fro with their Cattel by his Caſtle. For which cauſe Othoman

him, that the Tartars with a great Army under the leading of one Baintzar, were entred into Caria, and there ſpoiling the Country, had taken Heraclea. For the repreſſing of whom, the Sultan was glad to riſe with his Army; yet leaving a ſufficient ſtrength behind him for the continuing of the Siege, under the charge of Ertogrul Beg, for ſo the Turks now called him. But Othoman terrified with that diverſity of opinions, which had even at firſt ſhewed it ſelf; and thinking it not for his ſafety, to commit himſelf unto the truſt of ſuch wavering men, entred into a deep conceit of a matter of great adventure, which was, by a ſudden ſally to make himſelf way through the midſt of his Enemies. Wherewith having made his Brother Jundus and thoſe few his followers there preſent acquainted, and thereupon reſolved; he fiercely ſallied out, and by plain force brake through the midſt of them, and ſo took his way towards Suguta, ſtill notably repulſing them that were ſent to purſue him. But being come into the Frontiers of his Fathers Territory, and the report of his dangers known, and that being but weakly accompanied, he was by a great number of his Enemies purſued; preſently all the luſty youths and ſuch as loved him well, took horſe to come to his reſcue; who meeting with the Governours Souldiers, that had Othoman in chace, in a ſharp conflict ſlew divers of them, and put the reſt to flight. Of whom ſome were alſo taken Priſoners, and amongſt the reſt one Michael Coſſe a Chriſtian, Captain of a little Caſtle in that Country, called Hirmen-Caia, or the Rock of Ormeni; Of whom Othoman taking compaſſion, freely pardoned him that offence. With which unexpected curteſie he was ſo moved, that ever after he took part with him, and did him great ſervice in his Wars; whoſe Poſterity hath ever ſince even until this our age continued, next unto the Othoman Family, moſt honourable and famous amongſt the Turks, by the name of Michael Oglies, that is to ſay, the Sons or Poſterity of Michael.

Othoman beſieged,

Ertogrul now ſpent with age, ſhortly after died, in the year of our Lord 1289. having lived 93 years, and thereof governed the Oguzian Family after the death of his Father Solyman, 52. His death was of all his Tribe and Kindred generally lamented, and his body after the Turkiſh manner honourably buried at Suguta, where he had of long time lived.

After whoſe death, theſe plain Oguzian Turks, in a general Aſſembly conſulting whom they might chuſe for their Lord and Governour in ſtead of old Ertogrul; caſting their eyes eſpecially upon two, ſtood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although moſt men were of opinion, that Othoman for the rare gifts and vertues as well of body as of mind, was to be preferred before the reſt of his Brethren the Sons of Ertogrul; yet were there ſome, and they alſo men of great gravity and experience, who had in ſuſpect the young mans age, as of it ſelf ſlippery, and for the moſt part prone to vice, eſpecially in the liberty of great power; and therefore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Ertogruls Brother and Othomans Uncle) a man of far greater gravity, judgment, and experience. But Dunder himſelf being indeed a wiſe man, and far from all ambition, perſwaded them in that choice not to have any regard at all unto his honour or preferment, but to conſider what were beſt for their State and Welfare in general. For he providently foreſaw in what danger the Oguzian State ſtood, expoſed on the one ſide to the mortal hatred and treacheries of the Greeks, grieved to ſee themſelves ſpoyled by the Turks, and naturally hating them for the Mahometan Religion; and on the other ſide not ſurely backt by the Sultans of Iconium, brought in thraldom to the Tartars, and dayly grown weaker and weaker. Unto which inconveniences and dangers (he ſaid) an old, weak and overgrown body (as his was) could give no help or remedy at all, but required the help of a wiſe, politick, vigilant, ſtirring and valiant man, ſuch as they all well knew was Othoman his Brothers Son. Thus before he came unto the election, he in privat declared his mind unto the chief of the Oguzian Family; and afterward at their requeſt coming to the general Aſſembly, all mens minds and eyes now fixed upon Othoman, he firſt of all (by his example to encourage the reſt) for the good of the Oguzian Tribe, his ancient Houſe and Family, ſaluted him their great Lord and Governor, promiſing unto him all Loyalty, with the utmoſt of his ſervice; whereunto by and by enſued the great applauſe of the reſt of the People, as unto a Governour ſent unto them by God; unto whom they joyfully wiſhed all happy ſucceſs, with long life and a proſperous Government. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great Governor of the Oguzian Turks, and ſo become among them a great Commander, and honoured with the Title of OEſman-Beg, or the Lord Oſman. Yet was this his honour included in a ſmall circuit, plain and homely, without any great Pomp or Shew, as commanding amongſt rough and rude Heardſmen and Shepheards, not acquainted with the curteſie of other more civil Nations; for as yet they were the ſame homely Scythian Nomades that they were before, and could not as yet be perſwaded to forſake their wonted rude and uncivil manners, by long tradition received from their Anceſtors, and ſo beſt agreeing with their Nature and Calling. Amongſt which rude Heardſmen, this new Governor himſelf, not too far exceeding the reſt in civility, commanded much like unto another Romulus; of whom alſo the Turks report many ſuch things as do the Romans of their Founder, which for brevity I thought good to paſs over.

The Oguzian Turks in doubt of whom to make choice for their Governor.

Now it fortuned that Othoman, even in the beginning of his Government fell firſt at odds with one Hagionicholaus, or S. Nicholas (Captain of Einegiol, a Caſtle there by) for that he had oftentimes of purpoſe troubled and moleſted theſe Oguzian Heardſmen, in paſſing to and fro with their Cattel by his Caſtle. For which cauſe Othoman was inforced to requeſt the Captain of Bilezuga (another Caſtle there by, alſo his Neighbour and Friend) that his people in paſſing that way to the Mountains, might with their Goods and Cattle, as occaſion ſhould require, take the refuge of his Caſtle; which the courteous Captain (well acquainted with old Ertogrul, Othomans Father) eaſily granted; yet with this proviſo, that none ſhould with ſuch Goods or Cattle have acceſs into his Caſtle, but the Turks Women only; which his courteſie Othoman refuſed not. So was the Caſtle of Bilezuga from that time forward a refuge unto the Turks Women, who paſſing that way, and there ſhrouded with their Goods and Cattle, uſually preſented the Captain with ſome one homely Country Preſent or other, which afterwards was the loſs of the Caſtle.

Yet was not Othoman unmindful of the wrong done unto his people, by his evil Neighbour the Captain of Einegiol; but purpoſing to be thereof revenged, made choice of Seventy of his beſt and moſt able men, whom he appointed ſecretly to paſs the Mountain Ormenius, and ſo if it were poſſible, to ſurpriſe or ſet on fire his Enemies Caſtle. Of which his deſignment the wary Captain having intelligence by one of his Eſpials, in place convenient upon the Mountain laid a ſtrong ambuſh for the cutting off of ſuch as were by Othoman ſent to have ſurpriſed his Caſtle; whereof Othoman (no leſs wary than he) before warned by his Scouts, and augmenting the number of his men, marched directly to the place where the Enemy lay. Where betwixt them (for ſo ſmall a number) was fought a right bloody and cruel Battel, and many ſlain on both ſides; amongſt whom Hozza, Othomans Nephew was one. The Victory nevertheleſs fell unto Othoman; after which time his People in much more ſafety fed their Cattle in the Summer time on the Mountains, as the manner was, and ſo in quiet paſſed to and fro.

The Caſtle of Chalce ſurpriſed by Othoman.

Shortly after, Othoman by night ſurpriſed the little Caſtle Chalce, not far from Einegiol; and there without mercy he put to the Sword all the Chriſtians he found therein, and ſo afterwards burnt the Caſtle. Which outrage was the beginning, and occaſion of great troubles thereof enſuing; for the Chriſtians of the Countries adjoyning, much grieved therewith, and aſſembling themſelves together, complained unto the Captain of Cara-Chiſar the greateſt Commander thereabout, That theſe Turks, which not many years before were of meer pity received as poor Herdſmen into that Country, began now in warlike manner to lay violent hands upon the ancient Lands and Poſſeſſions of the Chriſtians; which inſolency (as they ſaid) if it were longer winked at and ſuffered by him, and other ſuch men of account and authority as were to reform the ſame; they would no doubt in ſhort time drive both them and all the reſt of the Chriſtians out of their native Countries; wherefore it were now high time, and more than neceſſary for him, and all the reſt, to awake (as it were) out of the dead ſleep wherein they had long time drowſily ſlept; and joyning their Forces together, to expulſe thoſe unthankful, incroaching, and mercileſs ſtrangers out of their Countries; the miſchief (they ſaid) being now ſpred far, therefore needed ſpeedy remedy; and that repentance would come too late when it was paſt cure. The Captain moved with the indignity of the late fact, and juſt complaint of the poor Country People, ſent with all ſpeed a ſtrong company of Souldiers, under the leading of Calanus his Brother; with commandment that they ſhould march unto the Caſtle of Einegiol, and there to joyn with the reſt of the Chriſtian Forces.

The Chriſtians complain of the wrong done unto them by the Turks.

Othoman underſtanding of this preparation made againſt him, gathering his Souldiers together, marched to a place called Opſicium, near unto Mount Tmolus in Phrygia; where between him and the Chriſtians was fought a ſharp Battle, wherein he loſt his Brother Sarugatin (whom the Turks account for a Saint or Martyr at this day) with many other of his Souldiers. In this Battle was alſo Calanus ſlain, whoſe Belly Othoman cauſed to be ripped, and his Entrals to be pulled out, naming the place where he was buried, Meſari-Repec, that is to ſay, The Dog-Grave, by which name the place is at this day known. The Body of his Brother Sarugatin he carried to Suguta, and there honourably buried it near to the Body of his Father Ertogrul. Aladin Sultan of Iconium underſtanding of this conflict, was very ſorry for the loſs hapened unto Othoman, being a Mahometan of his own Religion; wherefore in token of his good Will and Favour, he gave unto him the City of Paleapolis, with all the Territory thereunto belonging, giving unto him alſo leave to beſiege, take or ſpoil the Seigniory and Caſtle of Cara-Chiſar; for accompliſhment whereof he ſent unto him both Souldiers and Munition. Othoman incouraged with this great bounty of the Sultans, ſtraightly beſieged the Caſtle of Cara-Chiſar, which at laſt he won, and ſlew all the Chriſtians therein; the Captain he took alive, whom he cruelly executed; the Spoil of the Caſtle he gave unto his Souldiers, reſerving only the fifth part thereof, which he ſent for a Preſent to the Sultan. All this happened in the year of our Lord 1290. This Caſtle of Cara-Chiſar, with the reſt of Einegiol, Bilezuga, Chalce, and others before and hereafter in the life of Othoman to be mentioned, were all ſituate in the borders of the greater Phrygia, or elſe near thereunto in the Confines of Bithynia and Myſia; In which pleaſant Countries (but lately part of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire) the Chriſtians the ancient inhabitants thereof, as yet dwelt, intermingled with the Turks at the riſing of the Othoman Empire; with whom they lived at continual jars, until that at length they were by them altogether utterly oppreſſed and extinguiſhed.

Othoman conſulteth with his Brother Jundus what courſe to take for the oppreſſing of the Chriſtians his Neighbours.

Othoman encouraged with this good ſucceſs, and ſupported by the great Sultan of Iconium, began now after his ambitious nature to conceit greater matters, for the further increaſe of his Honour and Territory; yet not truſting altogether to his own device, he entred into conſultation with his Brother Jundus, which way was beſt to take to diſtreſs and bring in ſubjection his Neighbours the Chriſtians. In which caſe, Jundus a man of greater courage than diſcretion, adviſed him with all celerity to urge his good fortune, and preſently to invade the Chriſtians already diſcouraged with the loſs of Cara-Chiſar. But this counſel altogether pleaſed not Othoman; for (ſaid he) the Caſtles and Forts by us gained, muſt be kept with ſtrong Garriſons, otherwiſe they will again be recovered by the Enemy; which Garriſons cannot be maintained and kept, if we ſpoyl or diſpeople the Countries adjoyning upon us; for in ſo doing we ſhall (as it were) with our own hands cut our own Throats; wherefore I think it better, that we enter into a League of Amity and Friendſhip with the Chriſtians round about us; which League we will keep with ſome and break with others, as ſhall ſerve beſt for our purpoſe. And according to this reſolution, he made Peace indeed with all the Chriſtians, but eſpecially with Michael Coſſi, Captain of Hirmen-Caia Caſtle, of whom we have before ſpoken, who afterward ſerved him to great uſe in the managing of his Wars, and became alſo a Renegat of the Mahometan Religion. All this Othoman did the rather, becauſe he was then at great variance with one Germean-Ogli (a great man among the Turks, but one of the Selzuccian Family) who envying at the riſing of Othoman, ſought by all means poſſible to hinder his greatneſs, as did alſo the others, his quietneſs; which diſcord the Chriſtians liked well, as a mean for them to live in more reſt by.

In the mean time, Othoman deviſed with all carefulneſs to beautifie and ſtrengthen his new Common-weal; and for the greater concourſe of People, built a fair Temple in Cara-Chiſar for the exerciſe of the Mahometan Religion; appointed Markets to be kept in all peaceable manner, in his great Towns, granting great priviledges to ſuch as reſorted thither, as well Chriſtians as Turks; uſing therein ſuch Juſtice, that, all ſorts of People without fear, in hope of gain reſorting thither, furniſhed his Country and Towns with all things neceſſary; yet this care of civil policy and government, could not ſo withdraw him, but that according to his aſpiring mind, he had always a greater deſire and care to inlarge his Poſſeſſions and Territory. Wherefore intending to make a rode into Bithynia, he requeſted Michael Coſſi, the Chriſtian Captain before mentioned, to deliver his opinion what was beſt to be done; who ſo politickly directed him in that exploit, that he returned victorious, enriched with great Spoil and more Honour. This road ſo terrified moſt of the Chriſtians thereabouts, that they were loath to give Othoman any cauſe of offence, for fear leſt they ſhould by him be ſpoiled.

It fortuned about this time, that the Captains of Bilezuga and Cupri-Chiſar falling at odds, he of Cupri-Chiſar firſt taking up Arms fiercely invaded the Captain of Bilezuga; who thereupon ſent unto Othoman, to pray his aid, which he eaſily granted, and ſo without further delay preſently came unto him with certain Companies of luſty tall Souldiers. By whoſe coming, the Captain of Bilezuga not a little encouraged and ſtrengthned, ſet upon his Enemy; where betwixt them was made a ſharp conflict, and divers on both ſides ſlain; but the Victory by the help of Othoman the Turk, at length inclining to the Bilezugian, the other vanquiſhed Captain in all haſt fled unto his own Caſtle. After whom Othoman following, laid ſiege unto the Caſtle, which at length he took together with the Captain, whom he cauſed to be preſently ſlain. It is ſtrange to tell, how proud the Lord of Bilezuga was, to have ſo revenged himſelf of his Enemy, and to have gained the Victory; although it were indeed gotten, not ſo much by his own Valour as by theProweſs of the Turk; for whom and his followers in token of his thankfulneſs, he cauſed a great Feaſt to be provided in the Country there, whereby he honourably entertained them; and in the end of the Feaſt, cauſed Garments of great price (according to the manner of the Eaſtern Nations) to be given to Othoman, in token of his favour, and his Souldiers to be alſo bountifully rewarded; but this was done with ſuch a preſumptuous ſtate and grace, as if he had been ſome great Prince, offering unto the common Souldiers of the Turks, in paſſing by them, his hand to kiſs, as a great favour. With which exceeding inſolency, Othoman was ſo much offended, that he had much ado to hold his hands from him; yet repreſſing his anger, he in ſecret imparted his diſcontentment unto his Couſin Dunder, his Uncle Dunders Son, grievouſly complaining of the intollerable pride of the Chriſtian Captain, and of the diſgrace by him done unto the Turks, in offering them his hand to kiſs; requiring his opinion how he were for the ſame to be corrected; who but a little before, being by the ſaid Captain made Lieutenant, frankly told his Kinſman, That as then nothing was to be attempted againſt him; firſt, for that on the one ſide they had Germean-Ogli (a great man amongſt the Selzuccian Turks) their Enemy, and round about them beſides they were environed with the Chriſtians, whom he ſhould have all in his neck at once if he ſhould offer the Bilezugian Captain any wrong. By which anſwer, Othoman perceiving his Coſins great affection towards the Chriſtian Captain, and doubting to have the miſchief he had imagined againſt him, by him revealed, or at leaſtwiſe hindred; without more ado ſuddenly taking up his Bow in his hand, with an Arrow ſhot him quite through, and ſo ſlew him.

Michael Coſſi inviteth Othoman to the marriage of his Daughter.

Not long after, Michael Coſſi the Captain of Hirmen-Caia, Othomans great Friend, having concluded a marriage between a Gentleman of that Country and his Daughter, invited all the Chriſtian Captains of the Caſtles thereabouts, requeſting them to come to the marriage; and the rather, that ſo they might grow into acquaintance with Othoman, whoſe power began now to grow dreadful unto them; hoping that ſuch means might be found at that merry meeting, that all being made Friends, every man might in more ſecurity poſſeſs his own without fear of being ſpoiled by him. Unto this marriage came all theſe bidden Gueſts, bringing with them ſuch Preſents as they thought good to beſtow upon the new married Folks, according to the manner of the Country; but Othomans Gifts far exceeded all the reſt, who beſides many other rich things, gave unto them whole Flocks and Droves of Sheep and Cattel; which thing drew all the Chriſtian Captains into no little admiration of his bounty; inſomuch that they began to ſay among themſelves, that Othomans Wealth and good Fortune did portend ſome greater matter, to their utter ruin and fall; which to prevent, they thought it beſt by ſecret means to compaſs his death. The execution of which device they referred to the Captain of Bilezuga, as unto one with him beſt acquainted. This Captain was of great Wealth, Credit, and Authority amongſt the Chriſtian Rulers thereabouts, but very full of Craft and Diſſimulation; which his evil diſpoſition, Othoman of long time well perceived; yet having occaſion to uſe him, in ſubtil manner gave him (in outward ſhew) all the honour he could, magnifying him in words, and debaſing himſelf as plain and poor in compariſon of him. But to give a beginning to this treacherous device; the Captain meeting with Othoman, in a friendly manner told him, how that he intended ſhortly to marry the Daughter of the Captain of Jar-Chiſer, earneſtly requeſting him to honour that his marriage with his preſence, of the time whereof, he ſaid he would give him farther knowledge afterwards; and all was but a colour, to bring Othoman within his danger, not fearing any ſuch Treaſon. Othoman underſtanding that the time of the marriage drew nigh, ſent thither a Preſent of certain fat Oxen and Sheep, in the name of his Brother Jundus, for the Captains proviſion againſt the marriage; certifying him, that Othoman himſelf, with his ſimple Retinue, would be preſent at the marriage, and then preſent him, not with ſuch Preſents as were agreeable with his Honour, yet ſuch as his poor ability could afford. This meſſage with the Preſents, were wonderful welcome to the Captain, hoping aſſuredly that his deviſed Treachery would take ſuch effect as he wiſhed; and therefore calling unto him Michael Coſſi, in whom he had repoſed an eſpecial truſt, declared to him his whole device (whereof he was not before altogether ignorant) requeſting him to take the pains to go unto Othoman to bring him to the marriage, the time being now certainly appointed and at hand; which he knew Coſſi might eaſily do, being of his familiar acquaintance; and in token of great Friendſhip, he ſent unto Othoman by the ſame Meſſenger, a Preſent of gilt Plate. Coſſi took upon him this Meſſage, which when he had delivered to Othoman, he found him very willing to go, as a man not doubting any harm. But Coſſi inwardly grieving to ſee ſo brave a man, and his kind Friend, by ſuch treacherous manner to be brought to his end, moved with compaſſion, diſcovered unto him the whole Conſpiracy of the Captain againſt him, and of the Plot laid for his deſtruction, willing him to take heed unto himſelf; for which vertue, Othoman gave Coſſi great thanks as to his Friend, for ſaving his life; and withall richly rewarded him, promiſing him greater matters if he would continue that his faithful Friendſhip. Now concerning the Captain of Bilezuga (ſaith he) at your return recommend me unto him, and tell him, That I think my ſelf much bound unto him for many curteſies, but eſpecially for that he hath heretofore divers times in moſt friendly manner protected my Goods and Cattel, within the ſafeguard of his Caſtle; which his Friendſhip I moſt humbly requeſt him to continue for one year more, enforced thereunto by reaſon of the dangerous Wars betwixt me and the Prince Germean-Ogli, as he well knoweth; wherefore if it might ſo ſtand with his good pleaſure, I would preſently ſend unto his Caſtle ſuch things as I make moſt reckoning of, requeſting him once more to be the faithful keeper thereof, as he hath been before; and tell him further, that my Mother-in-Law, with her Daughter my Wife, deſire nothing more than to find opportunity to be acquainted with the honorable Lady his Mother; for which cauſe (if it pleaſe him) I will bring them both with me to the marriage. This Othomans requeſt, when the Captain of Bilezuga underſtood by Michael Coſſi, he ſent the ſame Coſſi back again to haſten his coming, willing him to bring with him what gueſts he pleaſed; appointing certain time and place when and where the marriage ſhould be ſolemnized. And becauſe the Caſtle of Bilezuga was thought to be too little conveniently to receive the multitude of People which were expected at the marriage, there was another open place of greater receipt appointed in the Country for that purpoſe, about three miles diſtant from the Caſtle. The marriage day drew nigh, whereunto Othoman muſt repair for his promiſe ſake; and therefore prepared with all diligence to ſet forward, and to put in execution what he had deviſed for the ſafety of himſelf, and deſtruction of his Enemy. Othoman had of long accuſtomed in dangerous times, to ſend by carriage the beſt of his things, made up in packs, to be kept in ſafety in the Caſtle of Bilezuga; under the colour whereof he now made great packs in form as he was wont; but inſtead of his rich Houſhold ſtuff, and ſuch other things of price, he thruſt in armed men, covering thoſe packs with homley coverings, ſending them by Carriages to the Caſtle of Bilezuga, giving charge that they ſhould not come thither before twilight. After that, he apparelled certain of his beſt Souldiers in Womens apparel, as if it had been his Wife and Mother-in-Law, with their Women; ſo caſting his journey, that he with theſe diſguiſed Souldiers, and the other ſent in packs, might at one inſtant meet at the Caſtle aforeſaid. The Captain being now in the Country, and underſtanding that Othoman was coming in the Evening with a great train of Gentlewomen; thought the cauſe of his late coming to be, for that the Turkiſh Women uſe to ſhun the ſight of Chriſtian men by all means they can. Othoman being now come to the place in the Country where the marriage was next day to be ſolemnized, having done his humble reverence to the Captain, requeſted him to do him the honour, that his Gentlewomen which were nigh at hand, might by his appointment be ſent to his Caſtle, there to have ſome convenient lodging where they might alight and beſtow themſelves apart from others, according to the homely faſhion of their Nation; leſt peradventure the preſence of ſo honorable a company of Noblemen and Gallants, might put them out of countenance: which the Captain granted, and having ſaluted them a far off after the Turkiſh manner, commanded them to be conveyed to his Caſtle, making reckoning of them all as of a rich prey. At the ſame time that theſe diſguiſed Souldiers arrived at the Caſtle, came thither alſo the other Souldiers covered in packs in the carriages: which ſo ſoon as they came into the Caſtle, ſuddenly leapt out of the packs, and drawing their ſhort Swords, with the help of their diſguiſed Fellows ſlew the Warders of the Caſtle, and without more ado poſſeſſed the ſame; the greateſt part of the Captains people being before gone out of the Caſtle to the place of the marriage. Othoman having tarried ſo long with the Captain, as he ſuppoſed the Caſtle at that time by his men ſurpriſed; ſo ſoon as the Captain had taken his Chamber, ſuddenly took horſe, with all his Followers, accompanied alſo with Coſſi, taking his way directly to the Caſtle of Bilezuga; of whoſe ſudden departure the Captain underſtanding, preſently took horſe and purſued him with all his Train, which were for the moſt part drunk, and overtaking him before he came to the Caſtle ſet upon him; in which conflict, he was by Othoman ſlain, and the reſt put to flight.

The Captain of Bilezuga treacherouſly ſeeking the death of Othoman, is by him, himſelf ſlain.

The ſame night Othoman uſing great celerity, early in the Morning ſurpriſed the Caſtle of Jarchiſar, alſo where he took Priſoners the Captain thereof, with his fair Daughter Lulufer, (which ſhould have been married to the Captain of Bilezuga the next day) with all her Friends, as they were ready to have gon unto the marriage, which fair Lady he ſhortly after married unto his eldeſt Son Orchanes; who had by her Amurath, third King of the Turks, and Solyman Baſſa.

Othoman omitting no opportunity, preſently ſent one of his Captains called Durgut-Alpes, a man of great eſteem and valour, to beſiege the Caſtle of Einegiol; wherein he uſed ſuch celerity, that preventing the fame of that was done at Bilezuga, he ſuddenly environed the Caſtle, in ſuch ſort that none could paſs in or out; until ſuch time, as that Othoman having brought his Priſoners and Prey to the Caſtle of Bilezuga, and there having ſet all things in good order, came with the reſt of his men of War to Einegiol; which he preſently by force took, promiſing the Spoil thereof unto his Souldiers. The Captain called Hagio Nicholaus his ancient Enemy, he cauſed to be cut in ſmall pieces, and all the men to be ſlain; which cruelty he uſed, becauſe they a little before had uſed the like tyranny againſt his Turks.

When Othoman had thus got into his ſubjection a great great part of the ſtrong Caſtles and Forces of the greater Phrygia, with the Territory to them belonging, he began with all carefulneſs to make good Laws, and to execute juſtice to all his Subjects, as well Chriſtians as Turks; with great indifferency ſtudying by all means to keep his Country in peace and quietneſs, and to protect his Subjects from the Spoil of others, as well Chriſtians as Turks; whereby it came to paſs, that the old Inhabitants which had for the moſt part forſaken the Country, by reaſon of the great troubles therein, repaired now again to their ancient dwellings; and not only they, but many other Strangers alſo, ſupplying the places of them whom the late Wars had conſumed. So that by his good Government, that waſted Country in ſhort time grew to be again very populous.

The City of Nice beſieged by Othoman.

The civil Government of his Country well eſtabliſhed, he beſieged the City of Iſnica, in ancient time called Nice, a City of Bithynia, famous for the general Council there holden againſt Arius in the time of Conſtantine the Great. This City he brought into great diſtreſs, by placing his men of War in Forts new built upon every paſſage and way leading unto the ſame, ſo that nothing could be brought out of the Country for the relief of the poor Citizens. They in this extremity, by a ſecret Meſſenger certified the Emperor of Conſtantinople (under whoſe obedience they were) in what diſtreſs the City ſtood; and that except he ſent them preſent relief, they muſt of neceſſity either periſh with Famine, or yield themſelves into the hands of their Enemies the Turks. The Emperor moved with the pitiful complaint of this Meſſenger, with all expedition embarked certain companies of Souldiers from Conſtantinople to relieve his beſieged City. But Othoman underſtanding by his Eſpials, where theſe Souldiers were appointed to land, in ſecret manner withdrawing moſt of his Forces from the Siege, lay in ambuſh near to the ſame place where the Emperors Souldiers (caſting no peril) landed; who before they could put themſelves in order of Battel were by Othoman and his Turks in ſuch ſort charged, that moſt part of them were there ſlain, and the reſt driven into the Sea, where they miſerably periſhed. Othoman having thus politickly overthrown the Conſtantinopolitan Souldiers, returning to the Siege, continued the ſame in ſtraighter manner than before. The beſieged Citizens driven into great penury, and now deſpairing of all help, yielded themſelves with the great and rich City of Nice into the hands of Othoman, with the Spoil whereof he greatly enriched his men of War.

Aladin the great Sultan of Iconium, glad to hear of this good ſucceſs of Othoman againſt the Chriſtians, in token of his Favour and Love, ſent unto him a fair Enſign, with certain Drums, and Trumpets, a Sword and Princely Robe, with large Charters, That whatſoever he took from the Chriſtians ſhould be all his own; and alſo that publick Prayers ſhould be ſaid in all the Turks Temples, in the name of Othoman, for his health and proſperous eſtate; which two things properly belonged to the dignity of the Sultan. Theſe extraordinary favours gave occaſion for many to think, that Sultan Aladin (having no Children) intended to make Othoman his adoptive Son and Succeſſor in his Kingdom.

The Preſents and Charters ſent him, Othoman humbly accepted, ſending unto Aladin the fifth part of the Spoil of Nice, taken from the Chriſtians; but the Princely Honours due to the Sultan only, he uſed not during the life of Aladin, intending not long after to have gone himſelf in perſon to viſit the Sultan, and ſo to have grown into his further Favour. But having prepared all things for ſo honourable a journey, at what time as he was about to ſet forward, he was certainly informed of the death of Aladin; and that Sahib (one of his great Counſellors) had taken upon him the dignity of the Sultan (as is before declared;) which news much diſcontented the aſpiring mind of this Oguzian Turk, in good hope to have ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, or at leaſtwiſe to have ſhared the greateſt part thereof unto himſelf, whereof he was now altogether diſappointed. Yet immediately after the death of Aladin, he thought it now fit time to take upon him the Princely Honours before granted unto him by the Sultan in his life time, which he for modeſty ſake had forborn, Aladin yet living; wherefore he made one Druſu ſirnamed Fakitche (that is to ſay, a man learned in the Turkiſh Law) Biſhop and Judge of Cara-Chiſar, commanding the publick Prayers which were wont to be made for the health and proſperous Reign of the great Sultan, to be now made in his own name; which was firſt openly done by the ſaid Biſhop in the Pulpit of Cara-Chiſar. At the ſame time alſo he began to coin Mony in his own name, and to take upon him all other Honours belonging unto a Sultan or King; which was about ten years after the death of his Father Ertogrol, and in the year of our Lord 1300. unto which time the beginning of the great Empire of the Turks is under the fortune of this Othoman, to be of right referred, as then by him thus begun.

Neapolis the firſt Regal City of the Othoman Kings.

When Othoman had thus taken upon him the Majeſty of a King, he made his Son Orchanes Prince and Governor of Cara-Chiſar; promoting his principal Followers, to be Governors of other ſtrong Caſtles and Forts, divers of which places retain the name of thoſe Captains at this day. He himſelf made choice of the City Neapolis, about twenty miles from Nice, to ſeat his Regal Palace in, where alſo divers of his Nobility built them Houſes, and changed the name of the City, calling it Deſpotopolis, as who ſhould ſay, the City of the Lord or Prince. For all this, Othoman ceaſed not to deviſe by all means he could, to augment his Kingdom; and for that cauſe being accompanied with his Son Orchanes, made many rodes into the Countries adjoyning upon him, ſurprizing ſuch places as might beſt ſerve his purpoſe, for the enlargement of his Kingdom, all which in particular to rehearſe were tedious.

Pruſa beſieged by Othoman.

The Chriſtian Princes, rulers of the Countries bordering upon this new Kingdom, fearing leſt the greatneſs of Othoman might in ſhort time be their utter confuſion, agreed to joyn all their Forces together, and ſo to commit to the Fortune of one great Battel their own Eſtates with his; according to which reſolution, the Chriſtian confederate Princes, which were for the moſt part of Myſia, and Bithynia, levying the greateſt Forces they were able to make, with Fire and Sword invaded Othomans Kingdom. Who having knowledge beforehand of this great preparation made againſt him, had in readineſs all his Captains and Men of War; and hearing that his Enemies had entred his Dominion, in warlike manner marched directly towards them; and meeting with them in the Confines of Phrygia and Bithynia, fought with them a great and mortal Battel, wherein many were ſlain on both ſides, as well Turks as Chriſtians; and after a long Fight, obtained of them a right bloody Victory. In this Battel Caſteleanus, one of the greateſt Chriſtian Captains was ſlain; another called Tekenſis of the Country which he governed in Phrygia, chaſed by Othoman unto the Caſtle of Ulubad, not far diſtant from the place where the Battel was fought, was for fear delivered unto him by the Captain of the ſame Caſtle, and was afterward by Othomans commandment moſt cruelly cut in pieces, within the view of his chief Caſtle; which Othoman afterwards ſubdued, with all the Country thereabouts. The other Chriſtian Princes and Captains ſaved themſelves by flying into ſtrong Holds farther off. The Prince of Bithynia the chief Author of this War, fled into the ſtrong City of Pruſa, which the Turks now call Buruſa, whither Othoman not long after led his Army, in hope to have won the ſame; but finding it not poſſible to be taken by force, began preſently at one time to build two great and ſtrong Caſtles upon the chief paſſages leading to the City, which Caſtles he with great induſtry finiſhed in one year; and in the one, placed as Captain Actemeur his Nephew; in the other one Balabanzuck, both men of great courage and ſkilful in feats of War; and in this ſort having blocked up the City of Pruſa, ſo that little or nothing could without great danger be brought into it, he ſubdued the moſt part of Bithynia; and ſo returned home, leaving the two Caſtles well manned with ſtrong Garriſons, under the charge of the Captains before named.

Othoman returning home to Neapolis, honourably rewarded his Souldiers, according to their deſerts, eſtabliſhing ſuch a quiet and pleaſing Government in his Kingdom, that People in great number reſorted from far into his Dominions, there to ſeat themſelves; whereby his Kingdom became in few years exceeding populous, and he for his politick Government moſt famous. And ſo living in great quietneſs certain years, being now become aged and much troubled with the Gout; his old Souldiers accuſtomed to live by the Wars, abhorring Peace, came to him, requeſting him as it were with one voice, to take ſome honourable War in hand for the inlargement of his Kingdom, with great chearfulneſs offering to ſpend their lives in his ſervice rather than to grow old in idleneſs; which forwardneſs of his men of War greatly pleaſed him, and ſo giving them thanks, for that time diſmiſt them, promiſing that he would not be long unmindful of their requeſt. But yet thinking it good to make all things ſafe at home before he took any great Wars in hand abroad, thought it expedient to call unto him Michael Coſſi, the only Chriſtian Captain whom for his great deſerts he had at all times ſuffered to live in quiet with his Poſſeſſions, as it were in the heart of his Kingdom; and by fair means (if it might be) to perſwade him to forſake the Chriſtian Religion, and become a follower of Mahomet, and ſo to take away all occaſion of miſtruſt; which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then forgetting all former Friendſhip, to make War upon him as his utter Enemy. Whereupon Coſſi was ſent for, being perſwaded by the Meſſenger, that Othoman had ſent for him, becauſe he had occaſion to uſe his wonted faithful Counſel and Service in a great exploit which he had intended, as he had oftentimes before. Coſſi thinking of nothing leſs than of that which enſued, came accompanied with ſuch Souldiers as he thought to uſe in that ſervice; But coming unto Othoman, and underſtanding the very cauſe why he was ſent for, and ſeeing danger eminent on every ſide, kiſſing Othomans Hand, after the manner of the Turks, requeſted him in courteous manner to enter him in the Principles of the Mahometan Religion, which he promiſed ever after to embrace; And ſo ſaying certain words after Othoman, he turned Turk, to the great diſpleaſure of God, and the contentment of Othoman and his Nobility. For which his revolting, Othoman preſently gave him an Enſign and a rich Robe, tokens whereby the Mahometan Sultans aſſure their Vaſſals of their Favour and the undoubted poſſeſſion of ſuch Land and Living as they then hold.

Michael Coſſi turneth Turk.

Oftentimes after this, Othoman for the contenting of his Souldiers, invaded the Countries bordering upon him, took many ſtrong Caſtles and Forts, ſubdued the moſt part of Phrygia, Miſia, and Bithynia, and other great Regions, unto the Euxine Sea; and being now very aged and diſeaſed as is aforeſaid with the Gout, and thereby unable to go into the field in perſon himſelf, oftentimes ſent his Son Orchanes againſt his Enemies; who to the imitation of his Father atchieved many great enterpriſes, Othoman his Father yet living.

Now happily might the conſiderate Reader (and not without juſt cauſe) marvel, what dead ſleep had overwhelmed the Greek Emperors of thoſe times; firſt Michael Paleologus, and afterwards his Son Andronicus, both men of great Valour, and ſtill reſiant at Conſtantinople, thus to ſuffer the Turks (not Othoman, for he as yet bare no ſway; but others the ſharers of Sultan Aladins Kingdom) to take their Cities, ſpoil their Countries, kill their Subjects, and dayly to incroach upon them in the leſſer Aſia, and eſpecially in Bithynia, ſo near unto them, and as it were even under their Noſes: But let him with me, here as in a moſt convenient place but breath a little, and conſider the troubled State of that declining Empire, now haſting to an end; and he ſhall plainly ſee the cauſes of the decay thereof, and how like an old diſeaſed body quite overthrown and ſick to death, it became at length a Prey unto the aſpiring Turks. Michael Paleologus having by great treachery obtained the Greek Empire, and by rare fortune recovered alſo the City of Conſtantinople from Baldwin the Emperor (as is in the former part of this Hiſtory declared) fearing the power of the Princes of the Weſt, but eſpecially of Charles King of Sicilia, then a Prince of great Fame and Power, whom he knew Baldwin (the late Emperor) ceaſed not to ſolicite for the reſtitution of him again into his Empire, and to have alſo joyned with him a near bond of Affinity, by marrying his Daughter unto Charles his Son; to avert this danger, and to intangle Charles with troubles near home, by his Embaſſadors offred unto Gregory the Tenth, then Biſhop of Rome, to unite and conform the Greek Church unto the Latine, and to acknowledg the Biſhops Supremacy in ſuch ſort as that it ſhould be lawful for any man to appeal unto the Court of Rome, as unto the higher and moſt excellent Court; of which his offer the Pope gladly accepted, promiſing to perform what he had before requeſted, for the keeping of Charles otherwiſe buſied. But when it came to the point, that this reformation and alteration of Religion in the Greek Church ſhould be made, Joſeph the Patriarch, to begin withall, gave up his place, and ſhortly after forſaking the City, retired himſelf into a Monaſtery near unto the Straight of Boſphorus, where he at quiet devoutly ſpent the reſt of his life. The reſt of the Clergy alſo diſcontented with this innovation, in their Sermons openly inveighed againſt it, perſwading the People not to receive it; crying out, That now was come the time of their trial, the time of their Martyrdom, and the time wherein they were to receive the glorious Crown of their painful ſufferings; ſufferings; inſomuch, that great tumults were thereupon raiſed, and all the City and the Country in an uprore; for it was not the Clergy only, and the vulgar People by them moved, which diſliked and abhorred theſe the Emperors proceedings, and made theſe ſtirs, but many of the better ſort, yea, of the chief Magiſtrates themſelves alſo. So that Michael Paleologus the Emperor leaving all other forreign buſineſs, was enforced to convert all his Power and Study unto the appeaſing of theſe domeſtick Troubles, as deeming them of greater danger than thoſe abroad. And firſt to perſwade his diſcontented Subjects, he told them, That this alteration was made not for any good liking he had thereunto, but in reſpect of the dangerouſneſs of the time; and that it was a point of wiſdom, to foreſee dangers hanging over our heads, and not to delay, if any thing were to be altered, for the averting thereof; for if the Enemies (as he ſaid) ſhould come, the City yet in many places rent, or but lately repaired, and as it were but newly raiſed from death to life, the preſent miſchiefs would be far greater than thoſe forepaſſed, and that then their Enemies would become Lords, not of their Religion and Ceremonies only, but of all at once, their Wives, their Children, and whatſoever elſe they had, where their Liberty changed into Bondage, they ſhould be conſtrained to conform themſelves not with their bodily ſervice only, but even with their minds alſo, unto the Wills of the Latines their Enemies. And that ſo it would come to paſs, that no man ſhould be able to keep the old Cuſtoms and Manners of their Anceſtors, but ſhould ſee even their moſt ſacred Rites and Ceremonies changed and quite overthrown. Which he carefully foreſeeing, had not (as he ſaid) refuſed to yield unto neceſſity, and as Wiſdom would, neglected a little harm in reſpect of a greater benefit; and in the leſs to have yielded unto his Enemies, to enjoy the benefit of the greater. With which the Emperors perſwaſion ſome were moved, and ſo held themſelves contented; and ſome others not; againſt whom he was inforced to uſe other more ſevere remedies, as againſt his rebellious Subjects; of whom ſome he impriſoned, ſome he baniſhed, ſome he tormented, ſome he diſmembred, ſome he bereft of their Sight, or confiſcated their Goods, uſing (in brief) all the means whereby the Minds of the Reſolute or the Weak were to be moved. All which things, they whoſe zeal was grounded upon knowledge (in number feweſt) with patience indured; but the greater part void of judgment, and the refuſe of the People in ſimple Attire, ran roving abroad, ſome into Peloponeſus, ſome into Thracia, ſome into Achaia, and ſome as far as Colchos, as men perſecuted for their conſcience, not regarding greatly whether, ſo it were out of the Emperors juriſdiction, and ſomething fitting their own Humors; neither conforming themſelves unto the Religion then commonly by the Emperor eſtabliſht, neither yet agreeing among themſelves, but taking unto them divers names, ſome as the Diſciples of Arſenius, ſome of Joſeph, and ſome of others; ſome of them, themſelves deceived, and deceiving others alſo. Thus for the avoiding of forreign danger out of the Weſt, was the Empire at home no little indangered, and the State thereof ſhaken. Wherewith the Emperor was ſo encumbred, as that he had no leiſure to provide for the tempeſt ariſing by the Turks out of the Eaſt, but was inforced wholly to imploy himſelf and all his endeavours to the keeping of his People and Subjects in their due obedience at home. All whoſe deep devices, firſt in aſpiring to the Empire, no way unto him due, and great travels afterwards for the aſſuring of the ſame to himſelf and his Poſterity, againſt all right even with the alteration of the Religion of his Fathers, yielded him in the winding up of all, not ſo much as credit of an honourable Sepulture; but dying in theſe troubles not far from Liſymachia, as he was making preparation againſt the Prince of Theſſaly, was there by his Son Andronicus his commandment (for whoſe advancement he had ſtrained both his Faith and Honour) obſcurely buried in the Field, a good way from his Camp, as unworthy of a better Sepulture, for revolting from the ancient Religion of his Anceſtors, although his Obſequies were for faſhion ſake afterward with ſome ſolemnity celebrated. This was the end of the great Emperor Michael Paleologus, in whoſe time the Turks, the Succeſſors of Aladin, greatly incroached upon him in the leſſer Aſia, as is in part before declared; a man greatly adorned with the good gifts both of body and mind, had he not for the advancement of himſelf and his Poſterity, ſtained the ſame with foul Treachery and Apoſtacy; for which (as ſome ſay) he ever after lived in conſcience troubled, and dying, was even by his own Son not thought worthy of an honourable funeral. A notable example unto all ſuch as with greedineſs ſeek after vain glory, and fooliſhly expoſe themſelves unto ſuch adventures, as oftentimes overwhelm their deepeſt devices, having in themſelves no certainty, preferring their inordinate deſires (either for themſelves or their Poſterity) before that which is good and vertuous. Twice wretched in ſo doing; firſt in their folly, and then in their indeavours; who beſide that they find God himſelf againſt their deſigns and purpoſes, they by and by alſo evidently meet with other things than what they had forecaſted, contrary unto them; and ſo themſelves oftentimes, contrary to their expectation, caſt headlong into extreme miſery; for lo, even he of whom we now ſpeak, otherwiſe a man of great Wiſdom, and happy in his doings, overcome with his affection towards his Children, in deſiring to leave unto them the Empire, when as he ought to have caſt all the care, both of himſelf and of them, eſpecially upon the Providence of God; he like a blind man following his own deep conceits, not grounded upon the fear of God, but upon Mans Wiſdom only, caſt himſelf before he was aware into miſerable troubles, and became odious even unto his Subjects, and them alſo for whom he had ſo forgot himſelf. For whereas God had even from his Childhood allotted unto him the Empire (as was by many evident ſigns and tokens to have been gathered) if he could have moderated his untimely deſires, kept his tongue from Perjury, and his hands from blood, and not turned out of the way after ſtrange Doctrine; he had by many degrees excelled even the beſt Emperors his Predeceſſors; whereas now he lieth obſcurely buried, ſhrouded in the ſheet of Defame, the report of his foul and faithleſs dealings far exceeding all his other worthy vertues.

Perſecution in the Greek Church for matters of Religion.

Andronicus Paleologus ſucceeding his Father in the Empire, and thinking by reſtoring again the government of the Church, together with the Rites and Cuſtoms of the Greeks, to have appeaſed all ſuch troubles as were before by his Father raiſed, by bringing in thoſe of the Latines; found himſelf therein much deceived, and his troubles no leſs than his Fathers; they which had before received the Latine Cuſtoms, and well liking of them, with great obſtinacy defending the ſame; and the other of the contrary Faction now countenanced by the Emperor, without modeſty or meaſure inſulting upon them; whereof aroſe exceeding great ſtirs and troubles, eſpecially in the beginning of his Reign; to the great benefit benefit of the incroaching Turks, who in the mean time ceaſed not by all means to increaſe their Territories in Aſia; and not only there, but in the Iſlands of the Miditerranean Sea alſo. For Andronicus by the death of Charles King of Sicily, delivered of the greateſt fear for which both he and his Father before him had to their great coſt and charge both built and maintained a ſtrong Fleet of Gallies; now perſwaded by ſome, whoſe actions and ſpeeches were after the manner of the Court, all framed unto the Princes Appetite, (as the readieſt way to thrive, without reſpect of the common good) to ſpare that needleſs charge (as they termed it) which yearly coſt him more than any thing elſe; had diſcharged all his Mariners and Sea-men, and commanded all the Gallies to be laid up, ſome in one Creek, ſome in another; where neglected and not looked unto, they in time for the moſt part rotted and periſhed. As for the Mariners, they went ſome one way, ſome another, as their Fortunes led them, to ſeek for their Livings in forreign Countries, even with the Emperors Enemies; and ſome gave themſelves to Husbandry, thinking it better by doing ſomething to live, than by ſitting ſtill to periſh. Which good Husbandry at the firſt ſeemed to be very profitable unto the Emperor, but eſpecially unto ſuch as being near unto him, and courteouſly given, made ſmall reckoning of all other the moſt neceſſary defences of the Empire, in compariſon of hoording up of mony, until that it was afterward too late by experience found hereof to have ſprung many great miſchiefs, unto the great weakning of the Greek Empire. For beſides that the Turks without let did great harm on the Sea; the Pirats now out of fear of the Emperors Gallies, at their pleaſure took the Spoyl of the rich Iſlands in the Mediterranean, and robbed the Towns all along the Sea-coaſt, to the unſpeakable grief of the poor Country People; and yet not ſo contented, came with their Gallies, ſometime two, ſometime three, ſometime more, as it were in contempt, even cloſe unto the imperial City. Yea the Venetians were ſo bold, as upon a right ſmall diſpleaſure to rifle and afterward to ſet fire upon the Suburbs thereof, which they would hardly have adventured, had the Emperors Fleet been preſerved and maintained in the wonted Strength.

At the ſame time alſo Andronicus the Emperor (to the great hindrance of the Affairs of the Empire, and advantage of the forreign Enemy) was not a little troubled with a jealous Suſpition of his Brother Conſtantine (commonly called Porphyrogenitus) as if he had ſought to have aſpired unto the Empire; ſeeking by all means to win unto himſelf the love and favour of all men, but eſpecially of the Nobility both at home and abroad, and ſo by that means to mount unto the height of his deſires; All which (as moſt men thought) were but meer Slanders, maliciouſly deviſed by ſuch as envying at his Honour, and taking occaſion by the Emperors Suſpition, ceaſed not to increaſe the ſame, until they had wrought his unworthy deſtruction. The firſt ground of this falſe Suſpition in the Emperors head, was, for that this Conſtantine even from his Childhood, was for many cauſes, better beloved of the old Emperor his Father, than Andronicus, as better furniſhed with thoſe gifts of Nature which beautifie a Prince, and of a more courteous Behaviour than was his Brother; inſomuch that had he not been the younger Brother, his Father could willingly have left him his Succeſſor in the Empire. This was one and the chiefeſt cauſe of the Emperors grudge, and the ground of his Suſpition. Yet was there another alſo, and that not much leſs than this; for that his Father in his life time had of long thought to have ſeparated from the Empire a great part of Theſſalia and Macedonia, and to have made him abſolute Prince thereof; and had haply ſo done, had he not been by death prevented; which thing alſo much grieved Andronicus, and the more incenſed him againſt his Brother. Which his ſecret hatred he for all that according to his Wiſdom, cunningly diſſembled, not only during the time that his Father lived, but three years after his death alſo, making ſhew of the great love and kindneſs towards him that was poſſible. Conſtantine in the mean time, of ſuch greateſt revenues as were by his Father aſſigned unto him, reaping great profit, moſt bountifully beſtowed the ſame upon his Followers and Favourites, and others that made ſute unto him, as well the meaner ſort as the greater, and with his ſweet Behaviour won unto him the Hearts of all men; for Affability and Courteſie in high degree eaſily allureth mens minds, as do fair flowers in the Spring the Paſſengers Eyes. This was that precept of the wiſe Indians, That the higher a Prince was in Dignity, and the more courteous he ſhewed himſelf unto his Inferiors, the better he ſhould be of them beloved. He therefore that ſhould for the two firſt cauſes blame Conſtantine, ſhould do him wrong; as both proceeding not of himſelf, but of his Fathers too much love; but in the third he was not altogether blameleſs; for if for want of experience he prodigally gave ſuch gifts, as for the moſt part might have beſeemed the Emperor himſelf, he ignorantly erred, yet did he not little offend; but if he knew, that for his profuſe bounty he could not be unſuſpected of his Brother, and yet without regard held on that courſe, he was greatly to be blamed therein. For if nothing elſe might have moved him, yet he ſhould have conſidered, to what end the like doings of others in former times had ſorted, and how many it had brought to untimely end. So although perhaps that Conſtantine meant no harm unto his Brother, or any way to ſupplant him, yet did theſe things not a little increaſe and aggravate the former Suſpitions, and open the Ears of the Emperor his Brother unto ſuch calumniation as commonly attendeth upon immoderate bounty. But to return to our purpoſe, this honourable Conſtantine then lived in Lydia, but lately married, and in good hope long to live, being not paſt thirty years old; but pleaſantly ſpending the time with his Wife at Nymphea in Lydia, at ſuch time as he was thus ſecretly accuſed unto his Brother, the Emperor thought it good, as upon other occaſions of buſineſs, to paſs over into Aſia himſelf, but indeed with a ſecret reſolution, upon the ſudden to oppreſs his Brother unawars, as by proof it fell out. For at his coming over, Conſtantine fearing nothing leſs, was forthwith apprehended, with all his greateſt Favourites, of whom one Michael Strategopulus (ſometime a man in great Authority with the Emperor his Father, and of all other, for wealth, honour, and noble acts moſt famous) was chief; who together with Conſtantine were faſt clapt into priſon, where we will leave them every hour looking to die, their Lands and Goods being before confiſcated. But theſe worthy men, eſpecially Canſtantine and Strategopulus, thus laid faſt; who many times in great Battels diſcomfited the Turks, and notably defended the frontiers of the Empire along the Eaſt ſide of the River Meander; they now finding none to withſtand them, forraged not only all the rich Country beyond the River, but with an infinite multitude paſſing the ſame, did there great harm alſo; ſo that there was no remedy, but that the Emperor muſt of neceſſity make choice of ſome other worthy Captain for the defence of thoſe his Cities and Countries, by the Incurſion of the Turks then in danger in that part of Aſia.

There was then in the Emperors Court one Alexius Philanthropenus, a right valiant and renowed Captain, and then in the flower of his youth; of him the Emperor thought good to make choice for defence of thoſe Frontiers of his Empire in the leſſer Aſia (againſt the Turks) which were before, the charge of his Brother Conſtantine and Strategopulus; joyning to him one Libadarius, an old famous Captain, and a man of great experience alſo; appointing unto him the Government of the Cities of Ionia; and unto the other the Frontiers along the winding banks of Meander. Where Alexius having now gotten a Charge worthy his valour, and in many great Conflicts with the Turks ſtill carrying away the Victory, became in ſhort time of great fame; beſides that, he was exceeding bountiful and courteous unto all men; a coſtly, but a ready way unto dangerous Credit and Renown. Thus at the firſt all things proſpered in his hand according to his hearts deſire; yea the Turks themſelves, bordering upon him, hardly beſet on the one ſide by the Tartars, and on the other by himſelf; and yet not ſo much feared with their Enemies behind them, as moved with his courteſie, came over to him with their Wives and Children, and ſerved themſelves (many of them) in his Camp: But as they ſay, That in Jupiters Court no man might drink of the Tun of Bliſs, but that he muſt taſte alſo of the Tun of Woe; ſo fell it out with this great Captain, who having but taſted of the better Tun, had the worſe all poured full upon his head. For Libadarius ſeeing all to proſper with him, and ſomewhat envying thereat, began to fear and ſuſpect, leſt he proud of his good Fortune, and now grown very ſtrong, caſting off his allegiance ſhould aſpire unto the Empire, and ſo firſt begin with him, as the neareſt unto him; which thing many of the Nobility ſecretly ſurmiſed alſo, but how truly many doubt. But this envious Plot was not yet ripe, but lay as fire raked up in the aſhes. Now there was with Alexius Philanthropenus, certain Companies of Cretenſians, whom for their good Service and Fidelity he both honoured and truſted above others, uſing them all for the Guard of his own Perſon. Theſe men proud of their Credit, hearing of the ſurmiſed aſpiring of their General, and in hope by his advancement to raiſe their own Fortunes alſo, ceaſed not continually to ſuggeſt unto him high conceits of himſelf, and to perſwade, with all ſpeed to take the matter upon him; the very conceit whereof (as they ſaid) would be unto him no leſs danger, than if he ſhould enter into the Action it ſelf, as he might well ſee by the woful Examples of the noble Conſtantine and Stratigopulus, both in extream peril but for the jealous conceit ſurmiſed againſt them. Which quick Suggeſtions wrought in his great mind divers, and thoſe moſt contrary motions, ſo that he ſcarce knew himſelf what he would or would not. For they which are unto themſelves in conſcience guilty of any grievous Crime, if any miſchief hang over their heads therefore, it happeneth unto them as foreknowing and expecting the ſame even from the time that they offended; unto whom, if nothing elſe, yet that ſame very foreknowledge eaſeth not a little the grief and miſery; whereas contrariwiſe, they which are with ſudden miſchiefs, and unlooked for, overwhelmed, not knowing any juſt cauſe why, muſt needs ſtand as men diſmaid, and almoſt beſide themſelves. But at length after divers great Conflicts with himſelf, the evil Perſwaders of Rebellion prevailed with him. Yet did he at the firſt forbid any mention to be made of him in the Army as Emperor; which cauſed the Cretenſians, the chief Authors of his Rebellion, almoſt to force him forthwith to take upon him the Imperial Ornaments, thereby to confirm the minds of his Followers and Favorites; for that ſuch Reſolutions were (as they ſaid) forthwith to be put into execution; neither that any thing required ſo joynt celerity and dexterity both of the mind and the hand; and for that longer delay would but fill his Souldiers heads with doubts, and diſcourage them with the fear of the uncertainty of the event; all which for all that moved him not ſo to do; but whether for fear of the greatneſs of the danger, or for that he ſecretly thought how firſt to circumvent Libadarius, of whom he ſtood moſt in doubt, is uncertain. The report of all which his doings and deſigns were in ſhort time carried firſt unto Libadarius, as the neareſt, and ſo in Poſt unto the Emperor; who were therewith not a little both diſquieted. And had Alexius (as ſome perſwaded him) at the firſt ſet upon Libadarius, then unprovided, no doubt but he had done much; but God, by whom all Princes Reign, and whoſe Power confoundeth the devices of the proud, turned him from Libadarius, by whom he was to be oppreſſed, to follow after Theodorus the Emperors Brother, of whom he was to have feared no harm. This Theodorus, the firſt man that Alexius ſhot at, warned by his Brother Conſtantines harms, lived a pleaſant private life in Lydia, far from the ambition of the Court, and therefore ſo much the more beloved of the Emperor; but Alexius fearing leſt in that hurle many ſhould reſort unto him, as unto the Emperors Brother, and ſo hinder his proceedings, thought beſt firſt to make him ſure, and afterward to oppreſs Libadarius, not aware that in ſtead of the body, he followed but after the ſhadow. But Libadarius, as a man of great experience, taking the benefit of this his overſight, and knowing money to be the ſinews of War, gathered together all the Coin he poſſibly could, both of his own and his friends, ſending alſo for the Emperors Treaſures of Philadelphia, and with all ſpeed raiſed the greateſt Power that poſſibly he could out of Ionia, which he furniſhed with all things neceſſary, promiſing unto his Souldiers great matters, and filling them with greater hopes, and that within ten days he would with a great Army meet the Rebel in the heart of Lydia, and there dare him battel. But withall conſidering that the Cretenſians, men but of a mercenary Faith, had always the Guard of Alexius his Perſon, he thought good to make proof if they might with Gold be won to betray him; and ſo well wrought the matter by great ſums of money preſently given, and promiſes of greater Preferments with the Emperor, that they (ſomewhat before diſcontented with Alexius his ſlackneſs, and now doubting alſo his ſucceſs) yielded unto his deſire, promiſing in the beginning of the battel to deliver him into his hands; which they ſhortly after in the very joyning of the battel accordingly performed, delivering him faſt bound unto Libadarius his Enemy. Who not a little proud thereof, uſed him with great Inſolency, and within three days after put out his eyes, for fear the Emperor according to his courteous nature ſhould have given him his Pardon; and ſo kept him in priſon until the Emperors pleaſure pleaſure were further known. Thus through falſe ſuſpition and ambition were the greateſt Champions of the Greek Empire brought to confuſion.

Andronicus the Greek Emperor repoſing more truſt in foreign aid, than in his own Subjects, greatly hurteth his State.

Now after this Rebellion of Philanthropenus, Andronicus became ſo jealous of his own people, as that he wiſt not whom to truſt, repoſing greater confidence in ſtrangers, than in his own Subjects, to the great hurt of his Eſtate. At the ſame time it fortuned, that the Maſſagets (commonly called Alani) which then dwelt beyond Iſter, being Chriſtians, but oppreſſed by the European Tartars, weary of their ſlavery, ſent ſecretly unto the Greek Emperor Andronicus, offering that if he would aſſign unto them a convenient place for them to dwell in, they would come over unto him with ten thouſand of their Families, and faithfully ſerve him in his Wars againſt the Turks (who then grievouſly waſted his Countries in Aſia, deſtitute of good Captains and Commanders;) which their offer he gladly accepted, as ſtanding then in need of Aid, and not greatly truſting his own people. But when theſe Maſſagets, in number above 10000, coming over with their Wives and Children, were to be furniſhed with all things, and eſpecially the Men with Horſes, Armor, and Pay, (all which the Emperor could not of himſelf do) the Subjects were therewith hardly charged, and Commiſſion ſent out into every Country and Province, for the taking up of Horſes and Armor; every City, every Country-Town and Village, every Gentlemans Houſe and poor mans Cottage, was ſearched and ranſacked, and all things taken from them, that were there found fit for Service, to their great diſcontentment, every man murmuring and grudging to have his Arms taken from him, and given to ſtrangers; but when they were alſo to be Contributers unto their pay, they then openly curſed and banned them even unto their faces. Yet at length (though with much ado) theſe ſtrangers well furniſhed with all things neceſſary, were with ſome other Forces alſo, ſhipped over into Aſia, under the leading of Michael Paleologus the Emperors eldeſt Son, and then his Companion in the Empire. Who marching alongſt the Country, came and incamped about Magneſia. Where the Turks at the firſt, after their wonted manner retired themſelves into the high Mountains and thick Woods, that from thence they might more ſafely learn what ſtrength their new come Enemies were of, and what diſcipline of War they kept; for they knew, that upon the coming of great Armies many falſe Reports did run, and that things were made far greater than indeed they were, as they did of theſe alſo, as of a people invincible; and therefore they thought it beſt ſo to protract the time, until they might ſee in what ſort beſt to deal with them. But thus hovering over their heads, and perceiving them oftentimes without order to roam abroad into the Country ſeeking after prey, (for why, they after the manner of mercenary men ſpoiled their Friends no leſs than if they had been their Enemies) they came down in good order from the Mountains, from whence at the firſt they adventured but a little; but afterwards they came on further, and with greater confidence, in ſuch ſort, as that it ſeemed they would ere long aſſault the young Emperor in his Camp. Wherewith he with the reſt diſcouraged, without any ſtroke given retired; the Turks ſtill following him at the heels. For neither he, neither the reſt, any thing conſidered the ſmall number of their Enemies; but as drunken men, whoſe heads filled with groſs vapors, are deceived in the greatneſs of the object that they ſee, and oftentimes think one thing to be two; ſo were they alſo in like manner with their own fear blinded. Beſide that, moſt commonly it falleth out, that the Army which Inſolency and Injury forerunneth, is appointed to deſtruction, and by the fearfulneſs of it ſelf overthrown before the Enemy ſet upon it, they themſelves becoming Enemies to themſelves, and Gods juſt Vengeance appointing unto them ſuch an end as their deeds have deſerved; neither was it like that they ſhould do any great good, that at their firſt ſetting forth, in ſtead of proviſion, carried out with them the bitter Curſes and Execrations of their Friends. Michael the Emperor ſeeing the Maſſagets fly, and not daring with thoſe few he had left, to oppoſe himſelf againſt his Enemies, retired himſelf into the ſtrong Caſtle of Magneſia, there to expect what would become of theſe miſchiefs. But the Maſſagets ſpoiling the Country of the poor Chriſtians as they went, marched directly unto the ſtrait of Helleſpontus, and there again paſſed over into Europe, as if they had been therefore only ſent for over the River Iſter, to ſhew the Turks the ſooner the way unto the Sea in Aſia. For it was not many days after, but that Michael the Emperor being returned to Conſtantinople, the Turks coming down, with a great Power, ſubdued all the Countries, even unto the Coaſt of Lesbos, to the great ruine and weakning of the Greek Empire.

Ronzerius what he was.

It was not long after theſe great ſtirs made by the Maſſagets, but that one Ronzerius (ſometime a notable Pirate, but as then a moſt famous Captain) hearing of the great entertainment that the Greek Emperor gave unto ſtrangers, by Meſſengers ſent for that purpoſe offered unto him his Service in his Wars againſt the Turks, as had before the Maſſagets. This Ronzerius of whom we ſpeak, had out of Catalonia a Province of Spain, and out of that part of France which is called Narbonenſis, and ſome other places alſo, gathered together a great number of baſe needy naked men, yet luſty able bodies, and fit for Service either by Sea or Land; with whom he manned four tall Gallies, and ſo as a notable Pirate long time robbed, not only the Merchants trading to and fro in the Mediterranean, but landing his men oftentimes in the rich Iſlands, carried away thence much rich Spoil alſo; until at length by the miſchief he did being become famous, and great Wars then ariſing betwixt Charles King of Naples, and Theodorus King of Sicilia, he was by Theodorus ſent for and requeſted for aid; which he (living of the ſpoil) eaſily granted, and ſo came unto him with a thouſand Horſe and as many Foot, all old expert Souldiers, whoſe good Service ſtood the King in thoſe Wars in great ſtead. But as the end of War is Peace, ſo at length upon the evil ſucceſs of Charles, a Peace being concluded betwixt the two Kings, and confirmed by a Marriage betwixt their Children; Ronzerius living altogether by his Fortunes, was to ſeek for new Entertainment, both for himſelf and his men, as having neither houſe nor certain dwelling place to repair to; but being as needy men met together, ſome out of one place, ſome out of another, in hope of booty as their Fortune led them. In which caſe Ronzerius their General thought it beſt to offer his Service to the Greek Emperor in his Wars againſt the Turks; whereof he gladly accepted, and ſo ſent for him; unto whom he ſhortly after came with two thouſand good Souldiers, called (after the proud Spaniſh manner) by the name of Catalonians, for that they were for the moſt part Spaniards of the Country of Catalonia. Of whoſe coming the Emperor rejoycing more than he had cauſe (as afterward by proof it fell out) in token of his great favour, honoured him with the name of the Great Captain, and afterwards gave him his Neece Mary in marriage. But within a while after, when as one Tenza another Catalonian Captain ſent for by Ronzerius, was come thither alſo with more aid, the Emperor to gratifie them both, gave unto Ronzerius the name of Cæſar, and unto the other the name of the Great Captain. But when theſe new Captains with their Followers were to be tranſported into Aſia, it is not to be ſpoken what harm they did by the way unto the Country people, and in the Villages alongſt the Sea-coaſt; abuſing the men and women as their Slaves, and ſpending their ſubſtance at their pleaſure, for which they had many a bitter curſe; and this was their firſt years entertainment. The next Spring they ſet forward to relieve the great City of Philadephia, being as then long beſieged by the Turks, and hardly beſtead without with the Enemy; and within, with extream Penury and Famine; which good Service they moſt valiantly performed, and raiſed the Siege. For the Turks beholding the good order of theſe Latine Souldiers, their bright Armor, and couragious coming on, roſe preſently and departed, not only from the City, but quite out of the Emperors Territory. Beſides that, in this Army were joyned unto theſe Catalonians great numbers of the beſt Souldiers of the Greeks, and all the Power of the Maſſagets; ſo that had not the Emperor expreſly before commanded, not to purſue them too far, it was by many thought, all thoſe Cities and Countries might then again have been in ſhort time recovered from the Turks, which they had before taken from him. But in Kingdoms appointed unto ruine, fair occaſions help not for the ſtay thereof; yea the greateſt helps provided by the worldly wiſe, by a ſecret commanding Power above, being oftentimes converted to the deſtruction of that they were provided for the ſafeguard of; as it now fell out with the Emperor and theſe Spaniſh Souldiers; for this Service done, the Greeks returned home, as did the Maſſagets alſo. But theſe Catalonians with Ronzerius their General, roaming up and down the Emperors Territories in Aſia, did there great harm, turning their Forces (as Enemies) upon them whom they were ſent for to relieve; alledging that they had not their pay according to the Emperors promiſe; and that therefore they muſt live upon them that had ſent for them and deceived them. So were the poor people in every place ſpoiled, their Wives and Daughters raviſhed, their Prieſts and aged Fathers tortured to confeſs ſuch ſecret ſtore as they had; all was ſubject unto theſe diſſolute Souldiers rage and luſt; yea many of them that had nothing to redeem themſelves, upon the greedy Souldiers imagination, having their hands or feet, or ſome other part of their bodies cut off, lay by the high-ways ſide begging an halfpeny or a piece of bread, having nothing left to comfort themſelves with, more than their miſerable voice and fountains of Tears; with which their Wrongs and Miſeries, worſe than thoſe they had ſuſtained by the Turks, the Emperor much grieved, and well the more, for that they were done by him whom he had entertained to relieve them; but what remedy, his Coffers were ſo bare as that he was not able to do any thing for the redreſs thereof. Ronzerius having thus ſpoiled the Emperors Country in Aſia, and left nothing that pleaſed either him or his, with all his Power paſſed over into Europe; and leaving all the reſt of his Army at Calipolis, with two hundred of his men went unto the young Emperor Michael (then lying with a ſmall Power at Oreſtias in Thracia) to demand of him his pay, or if need were to extort it from him with threats; with whoſe Inſolency at his coming, the Emperor more offended than before, his Souldiers there preſent perceiving the ſame, with their drawn Swords compaſſing him in, faſt by the Court, ſlew him, with certain of his Followers; the reſt fled in all haſt to Calipolis to certifie their Fellows what had happened.

Ronzerius for want of pay ſpoileth the Emperors Subjects.

Thus by the death of Ronzerius, the young Emperor had thought to have diſcouraged the Catalonians, and abated their pride, as like enough it was to have done; yet in proof it fell not out ſo, but was the cauſe of far greater evils. So when God proſpers not mens actions, the beſt falleth out unto the worſt, and their wiſeſt devices turn to meer follies; for the Catalonians at Calipolis hearing of the death of Ronzerius their General, firſt ſlew all the Citizens in the City, and notably fortified the ſame, took that as their Refuge. Then dividing their Souldiers into two parts, with one part of them manned out eight Gallies, which under the leading of the great Captain Tenza, robbed and ſpoiled all the Merchants Ships, paſſing the ſtraits of Helleſpontus, to or from Conſtantinople; the other part left in the City, in the mean time foraging the Country all about them. But Tenza ſhortly after encountring with a Fleet of the Genowayes, well provided for him, was by them overthrown, and moſt of his Gallies ſunk, and himſelf taken; but yet afterwards redeemed by his Fellows, and ſo again inlarged. Now the Catalonians at Calipolis ſomewhat diſcouraged with the loſs of their Fleet and ſo many of their men, for certain days kept themſelves quiet within their Walls, not knowing well what courſe to take, for they feared both the Maſſagets and Thracians; them, for that they had upon light cauſes abuſed them, and ſlain divers of them in the late Aſian War; and theſe, for that they had but even the other day burnt their Houſes and ſpoiled their Labors in the Country there by; for which and other their Outrages, they utterly deſpaired of the Emperors Favor, whom they had ſo highly offended. But that which moſt of all terrified them, was, for that they looked for every day, when Michael the young Emperor, who as then lay not far off, ſhould with a great Power come to aſſault them; for fear of whom they caſt a deep Ditch about the City, with a ſtrong Counterſcarp; ſo preparing themſelves, as if they ſhould have been even preſently beſieged. But the time ſo paſſing, and the Emperor delaying his coming, they began to think of other matters; for being brought to that ſtrait, that they could not well tell which way to turn them, but that they were on every ſide beſet with danger, they upon a malicious Reſolution, and unto the Greeks moſt fatal, by Meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, craved Aid of the Turks that dwelt on the other ſide of the ſtrait over againſt them, in Aſia; who preſently ſent them five hundred good Souldiers, after whom followed alſo many other Fugitives and looſe Companions, in hope of ſpoil; with whom the Catalonians for the preſent ſtrengthned, and being themſelves three thouſand ſtrong, iſſued out of the City, and foraged the Country thereabouts, bringing in with them great Herds and Flocks of Sheep and other Cattel, together with their Keepers; wherewith both the Emperors and their Subjects incenſed, prepared themſelves for Revenge. This was the firſt calling in of the Turks into Europe (that I read of) and the beginning of thoſe endleſs miſeries

The Turks firſt called into Europe by the Catalonians.

wherewith the Chriſtian Commonweal hath been ever ſince moſt grievouſly afflicted, and a great part thereof overwhelmed; few or none grieving thereat, but ſuch as themſelves feel the heavineſs thereof, whom God in his mercy comfort.

The Turcopuli.

The Catalonians and Turks now lying about Cypſella and Apri in Thrace, Michael the Emperor with his Macedonian and Thracian Souldiers, the Magaſſets and the Turcopuli, encamped at Apri. Theſe Turcopuli were Turks alſo, in number a thouſand (who as is in the former part of this Hiſtory declared) being fled with their Sultan Jathatines unto the Greek Emperor, and left behind him at ſuch time as he was by the European Tartars delivered, had forſaken their Mahometan Superſtition, and ſo being become Chriſtians, were inrolled amongſt the Greek Souldiers. Shortly after the Emperor (advertiſed by his Scouts of the approach of his Enemies) commanded every man to be in a readineſs, and his Captains to put his Army in order of battel; who ſeeing the Enemies battel divided into three parts, put theirs alſo in like order, placing the Turcopuli and Maſſagets in the left Wing, the Macedonian and Thracian choice Horſemen in the right Wing, and the reſt with the Footmen in the main battel. At which time the Emperor himſelf riding from place to place, with comfortable Speeches encouraged his men to fight valiantly againſt their Enemies. The Sun riſing, the Enemies battel began to come on, in number much inferiour unto the Emperors, yet in like order; the Turks being placed in both Wings, and the Catalonians well armed in the midſt. But the ſignal of battel being given on both ſides, the Maſſagets, whether it were by agreement ſo before made with the Enemy, or upon a ſudden conceived Treaſon, preſently withdrew themſelves aloof off, and ſo ſtood as idle beholders, giving Aid neither to the one nor to the other, as did alſo the Turcopuli their Companions; which greatly diſmayed the Grecians, and encouraged their Enemies; for the Greeks diſmayed with that ſudden defection of their Fellows, were even in the joyning of the battel diſcouraged. Which the Emperor perceiving, with great inſtancy intreated the Captains and Commanders of his Army, calling them oftentimes by name, not to be ſo ſuddenly diſcouraged; but they in ſo great a danger little regarding his words, and ſtill ſhrinking from him, when as the greateſt part of his Footmen were troden under foot and ſlain, turning himſelf unto them that were left, which were but few, he ſaid, Now worthy men is the time wherein death is better than life, and life more bitter than death. And having ſo ſaid, valiantly charged the Enemy; in which Charge his Horſe was ſlain under him, and he in danger to have been taken, had not one of his faithful Followers remounted him upon his own Horſe, and ſo ſaved his life with the loſs of his own. The Emperor flying to Dydimotichum, where Andronicus his Father then lay, was of him joyfully received, but ſharply reproved for adventuring his perſon ſo far. The Enemies purſuing the Chace, ſlew ſome, took others, until that by the coming on of the night, and weary with the long fight, they retired; and the next day dividing the ſpoil, afterwards at their pleaſures forraged the Country. The Renegat Turks, called Turcopuli, within a few days after revolting to the Catalonians, were of them joyfully entertained, and inrolled into the Regiment of Chalel, the Turks General.

The unfortunate battel of Michael the Emperor againſt the Catalonians and Turks.

Shortly after this Victory, the Catalonians began to mutiny among themſelves, the great Captain Tenza, and Pharenza his Companion, diſdained to be commanded by Recafort their General; in which tumult, the matter coming to blows, Tenza was ſlain, and Pharenza for ſafeguard of his life glad to fly unto the Emperor Andronicus; of whom he was, contrary to his expectation, right honourably entertained. About this time alſo the Maſſagets having done the Greeks more harm, than the Turks againſt whom they were entertained, and enriched themſelves with the ſpoil of their Friends both in Aſia and Europe, were about with their Wives and Children, and Wealth, to return again unto their old dwellings beyond Iſter. Which the Turcopuli, with the Catalonians underſtanding, and bearing unto them a ſecret grudge, for that they (as the weaker) had by them oftentimes bin wronged in the diviſion of the ſpoil of the Greeks, lay now ſecretly in wait for them, as they ſhould paſs the ſtraits of the great Mountain Hemus, which bounded the Greek Empire from the Bulgarians; where ſetting upon them, fearing no ſuch danger, they ſlew them almoſt all; and with the ſpoil of them recompenced themſelves for all the wrongs they had from them before received.

Caſſandria.

The Catalonians proud of their Victory at Apri, and well ſtrengthened by the revolt of the Turcopuli with continual Rodes ſpoiled not only all alongſt the Sea-coaſt of Thracia, but all the in-land Country alſo, as far as Maronea, Rhodope, and Bizia, laying all waſt before them. And having forraged moſt part of Thracia, brake into Macedonia, and there wintred about Caſſandria, ſometime a famous City, but as then all deſolate and ruinous. But the Spring being come, they removed thence, with purpoſe to have ſpoiled the Cities of Macedonia, and eſpecially the rich City of Theſſalonica, where the Empreſs Irene then lay; wherein they were by the Emperors good care and foreſight prevented; who doubting ſuch a matter, had fortified his Cities in that Country, and furniſhed them with ſtrong Garriſons, and all other things needful for their defence; which they quickly perceiving, and finding the Country all deſolate, and forſaken by the Inhabitants, were about to have again returned into Thracia; but as they were thereupon reſolving, they were informed by one that was with them Captive, how that the Emperor by a mighty ſtrong Wall built at a place called Chriſtopolis, from the Sea-ſide even unto the top of the Mountains, had ſo ſhut up the paſſage, as that it was not poſſible for them that way to enter. With which unexpected news they were at the firſt exceedingly troubled, as foreſeeing, That if they ſhould there long ſtay in that ſpoiled Country, they ſhould in ſhort time be driven to exceeding wants (for they were now in number above 8000 fighting men) and afraid alſo by a general Conſpiracy of the people about them, to be oppreſſed. Thus beſet, and not well knowing what to do, or which way to turn themſelves, they deſperately reſolved, no longer there to ſtay, but forthwith to ſet forward, and to break into Theſſaly, with the plentifulneſs thereof to relieve their wants, or into ſome other Country further off, towards Peloponneſus, and there to ſeat themſelves, and to end their long travels; or at leaſtwiſe, if they could not ſo do, to enter into League with ſome that dwelt upon the Sea-coaſt, and ſo return again into their own Country. Wherefore leaving Theſſalonica, and delivering the Emperor of a great fear, they in three days came to the Theſſalian Mountains, Olympus, Oſſa, and Pelius; where they at the foot of them found ſuch plenty of all things neceſſary for for their relief, that they there wintred. But Winter paſt, and the Spring being come, they paſſed over thoſe high Mountains and the pleaſant Vallies called Tempe, and ſo at laſt came down into the fruitful Plains of Theſſaly, where they ſpent that year at their pleaſure, without reſiſtance, devouring the Labours of the poor Country people, and making havock of whatſoever thing came in their way; for as then the ſtate of that Country was but weak, the Prince thereof being but young, and withall very ſick and like to die, and the Succeſſion ſo ending in him, as that it was feared, who after his death ſhould lay hand thereon; and every man therefore more careful of his own private than of the common good. Yet to avert theſe foreign Enemies, who like a conſuming fire devoured the Country before them, the Nobility thought it good, with great Gifts to overcome their Captains and Commanders, and then to offer them Guides to conduct them into Achaia and Boetia, Countries more pleaſant and fruitful than was theirs, and more commodious for them to dwell in; promiſing alſo to give them Aid for the ſeating of them there, if they ſhould ſo need. Of which their Offers the Catalonians accepted, as thinking it better with their hands full of Gold ſo eaſily gotten, to ſeek their better Fortunes, with their Power yet whole and ſtrong, and help alſo if need were, than to hazard all upon the ſucceſs of a doubtful Victory, and ſo fooliſhly to prefer an uncertain hope before a moſt certain benefit. So making Peace with the Theſſalians, and the Spring being come, receiving of them their promiſed Rewards, and Guides to conduct them, paſſing over the Mountains beyond Theſſaly, and the Straits of Thermopile, they encamped near unto Locris and the River Cephiſus; which riſing out of the Mountain Parnaſſus, and running towards the Eaſt, hath on the North-ſide of them Locris and Opus; and on the South the inland Country of Achaia and Boetia; and being a great River until it come to Lebadia and Haliartes, is there divided into two Rivers; the one called Æſopus, and the other Iſmenus; whereof the former runneth through the Country of Attica, until it come into the Sea; and the other near unto Aulis (where the noble Grecians, as they ſay, being about to go unto Troy, met, and there ſtayed) falleth into the Eubœan Sea. But the Duke of Thebes and Athens, and of all that Country, hearing of their coming, and (as he thought well) provided alſo for them (as having all the Winter and Spring time before put his Forces in readineſs) with great pride and contempt denied them paſſage through his Country, at ſuch time as they asked the ſame; making no more reckoning of them, than as of a ſort of looſe wandring Rogues that could find no place to reſt or thrive in; wherewith they inraged, reſolved among themſelves, either there to ſeat themſelves in his Country, or to die therefore. And ſo paſſing the River into Boetia, not far from the ſame encamped themſelves, being in number about 3500 Horſe, and 4000 Foot. But ſo lying and expecting the coming of their Enemies, they cauſed all the plain ground about where they lay and meant to fight, to be plowed up, which they with certain ſmall cuts out of the River ſo watered, as that it differed but a little from a deep Mariſh or Bog. Hither about the middle of the Spring, cometh the Prince of the Country, with a gallant Army raiſed out of Athens, Thebes, Platea, Locris, Phocis, and Megara, in number about 6400 Horſe, and 4000 Foot, an Army too ſtrong he thought for ſo contemptible an Enemy. But the weakeſt Enemy not feared, doth oftentimes the greateſt harm, as here by proof was to be ſeen; for the Prince coming unto the aforeſaid Plain, now grown green with graſs, and caſting no peril, encouraging his men, came bravely on with all his Horſemen to have charged his Enemies; who ſtood faſt upon the firm ground, a little without their Trenches, as ready to encounter him. But before he was come to the middle of the Plain, his Horſes ſinking deep into the rotten and new ploughed ground, and there intangled as in a Mariſh, lay for the moſt part tumbling in the mire, together with their Riders; or elſe plunging in the Deep, and having caſt them, ran up and down the Plain, as Fortune led them; otherſome ſticking faſt, ſtood with their Riders upon their backs, as if they had been very Images, not able for to move. Which the Catalonians beholding, and therewith encouraged, overwhelmed them with all manner of ſhot, and ſlew them at their pleaſure, until they had almoſt made an end of them; and with their Horſemen ſo ſpeedily purſued the reſt in chaſe, even unto the Cities of Thebes and Athens, that they without more ado even at that inſtant ſurpriſed them both, with all that was in them. So the Catalonians having as it were at a caſt at Dice won a moſt goodly Country, garniſhed with fair Towns and Cities, which they never built; and ſtored with all manner of wealth, which they never ſweat for, there ended their long travels, and ſeated themſelves; not ceaſing (as ſaith Nicephorus Gregorias, the reporter of this Hiſtory, ſpeaking of the time wherein theſe things were done, and wherein he himſelf lived in Conſtantinople) unto this preſent day, by little and little to extend the bounds of their Territory. Where leaving them, with whom we happily have too long ſtrayed from our purpoſe, let us again return unto the Turks and Turcopuli their Companions.

A notable ſtratagem of the Catalonians.

In the Army of the Catalonians, at ſuch time as they were about to have beſieged Theſſalonica, were three thouſand Turks, of whom eleven hundred were of them (as we ſaid) which remained with Melech at Ænum, after the flight of Jathatines their Sultan unto the Tartars, and renouncing their Superſtition, became Chriſtians; and ſo being baptized, and having Wives and Children, were enrolled among the Emperors Souldiers; but at the battel of Apri revolted unto the Catalonians, and were commonly known by the name of Turcopuli; the other being the greater part, were ſuch Turks, as with Chalel their Captain came out of Aſia, being ſent for by the Catalonians. Now all theſe Turks, as well the one as the other, at ſuch time as the Catalonians were about to invade Theſſalia, and to ſeek their new Fortunes in the Countries more Weſtward, and ſo farther off from Aſia; partly diſtruſting the ſociety of them, as dangerous unto them; and loath alſo further to follow their uncertain Fortunes into Countries further off, amongſt people to them unknown, began to riſe in mutiny, and to refuſe to go. Whereupon their Captains Melech and Chalel requeſted of the General of the Catalonians to give them leave with quietneſs to return; which their requeſt he eaſily granted, (as now not greatly needing their help, after that he was departing out of the Emperors Dominion) and ſo they gladly departed; proportionally dividing all the Captives and Spoils they had taken in that long War, according to the number of both parts.

The Turks divided into two Factions.

Theſe Turks after their departure from the Catalonians, divided themſelves into two parts, the Turcopuli or renegate Turks following Melech, and the reſt Chalel their General. But Melech being before become a Chriſtian, as were his Followers alſo; and after that having received moſt honourable Entertainment at the Emperors hands, and yet again moſt ſhamefully breaking his Faith before given, and violating his Religion, had revolted to his Enemies; deſpairing of the Emperors further friendſhip, which he had ſo evilly deſerved, made choice rather to go unto Charles Prince of Servia, by whom he was ſent for, than to come again into the ſight of Andronicus the Greek Emperor. And ſo going unto him with a thouſand Horſe, and five hundred Foot, was there of him well entertained himſelf; but his Souldiers all commanded to deliver unto the Prince both their Horſes and Armor, and to fall to other Trades, and not to bear Arms but at ſuch time, and ſo many of them as ſhould ſeem good unto the Prince, that had received them into his Country.

. But Chalel with the Turks his Followers,in number about thirteen hundred Horſe and eight hundred Foot, ſtaying at Macedonia, offered unto the Greek Emperor quietly to depart his Country, ſo that he would give him paſſage by the Straits of Chriſtopolis, by him fortified; and in ſafety tranſport him and his Souldiers with all their ſubſtance, over the Strait of Helleſpontus into Aſia; unto which his requeſt, the Emperor conſidering the great harm done in his Provinces, and deſirous alſo to be diſcharged of ſo great a burthen,eaſily granted; and ſo ſent Sennacherib, one of his moſt valiant Captains, to conduct them out of Macedonia into Thracia, unto the Straits of Helleſpontus. Where the Greek Captains and Souldiers ſeeing the great multitude of Horſes, and abundance of Money and other Spoils, which they having taken from the Greeks, were now about to carry away with them into Aſia, they thought it a great indignity to ſuffer them ſo to do; and allured alſo with the hope of ſo rich a Prey, as had been of long in gathering, they entred into a device far different from that which was unto the Turks before promiſed; neither providing them of ſhipping, neither careful of their ſafety, but purpoſing upon the ſudden by night to deſtroy them. Whereof the Turks having got underſtanding, ſuddenly riſing, ſurpriſed a Caſtle in the Country there by, which they notably fortified for the defence of themſelves, to the great aſtoniſhment of them that had purpoſed their deſtruction; who now not able to force them, were glad to get them farther off, and to certifie the Emperor what had happened; who (after I wot not what received Cuſtom of the Greek Emperors his Predeceſſors) ſlowly diſpatching things requiring greateſt haſt, careleſly delaied the time, to the great trouble of his State, and advantage of his Enemies. For they wiſely conſidering the danger and diſtreſs they were in, by ſpeedy Meſſengers ſent over the Strait, craved Aid of the Turks their Country-men in Aſia, which they preſently ſent them; wherewith they not a little both encouraged and ſtrengthned, with their often and ſudden Incurſions grievouſly waſted the Country round about them, to the great diſcontentment of the Greek Captains, not able without greater help to remedy the ſame. Who thereof certified the young Emperor Michael Paleologus, requeſting him with all the Power he could make, to come and beſiege the Caſtle, and to ſuppreſs theſe ſo dangerous Enemies. For the performance whereof, not only the Captains with their Souldiers, but the Country people in general with their Spades and Mattocks came flocking unto the Emperor; not as if they would have beſieged the Caſtle, but have digged it down and overthrown it together with the Turks their Enemies.

The unfortunate battel of the Emperor Michael Paleologus with the Turks in Cherſoneius.

Now the Emperor with his Captains and Souldiers, and a multitude of thoſe Country people, being come thither, who all gladly followed him, moſt part of them fooliſh, thinking of nothing, but of the ſpoil of their Enemies, not conſidering with what danger the ſame was to be gained; ſo that the more the Enemies provided for the neceſſary defence of themſelves, as in number but few, and ſhut up in their Enemies Country, the more careleſly and negligently, and without all order, the Greeks proceeded in their Siege, for that they were in number far more, and better provided of all things than their Enemies; reputing with themſelves, nothing in this World to be firm and ſure; and all worldly things (as ſaith the divine Philoſopher) to be but the mockery of God, and to be haſtily turned up-ſide-down, and with moſt uncertain courſe this and that way to wander. But their Enemies, who before feared even the very fame of their coming,accounting themſelves rather among the dead than the living, ſeeing their confuſed and diſordered raſhneſs; therewith much more than before encouraged, beſtowed all their Wealth, their Women, and other things unneceſſary for battel,in good ſafety within their trenches; but themſelves, with eight hundred choſen Horſemen only, and they very well armed, ſallied out, even to the place where the Imperial Enſign ſtood; being neither of any great ſafety, neither guarded with any ſuch ſtrength or carefulneſs as beſeemed; with which ſudden and deſperate eruption of the Enemies, the Grecians terrified, eſpecially that ruſtical and uplandiſh Company, began to fly; after whom by little and little others followed, until at length all the reſt without further reſiſtance fled alſo; which the Emperor ſeeing, did what he might to have ſtaid their flight; but in ſo general a confuſion and fear, when every man was to ſhift for one, who regarded him? wherefore wearied and ſeeing no other remedy, he was glad to take the ſame courſe, and to fly with the reſt; yet many of the more expert Captains, aſhamed of ſo foul a flight, made divers ſtands; and ſo ſtaied the barbarous Enemy from further purſuit of the Emperor and the other flying Greeks. In which doing, many of them incloſed by the Turks, were of them taken Priſoners; unto whom all the Emperors Treaſure became a Prey alſo, and whatſoever honourable Enſigns of the Empire elſe that were found in the Emperors Tent; yea the Imperial Crown it ſelf, richly ſet with Pearl and precious ſtones, was there taken alſo, which (they ſay) Chalel putting upon his head, pleaſantly ſcoffed at the Greek Emperor that but late before wore it.

Thracia ſpoiled by the Turks.

After this Victory, the Turks with great pride ſpoiled almoſt all Thracia, in ſuch ſort as that the people for two years together durſt ſcarcely go out of their ſtrong walled-Towns to plough and ſow their Land; which exceedingly grieved both the Emperors, the Father and the Son; for in their own Power they had no great confidence. God having (as it were) taken from their people, both their hearts and courage, ſo that all their hope was to entertain foreign Aid (the miſerable ſhift of the great diſtreſſed Ones) wherein alſo they found many difficulties and lets, whilſt they conſidered the greatneſs of their Charge, their Coffers being then, if ever, empty

by reaſon their Territories were ſo long and grievouſly by their Enemies waſted; yet need admitting no Law, Andronicus the old Emperor was glad to ſend to Crales Prince of Servia, his Son-in-Law, to pray his aid. But in the mean time he making no haſt (as men in relieving others commonly do) and the miſery more and more increaſing, it pleaſed God to ſtir up the heart of one Philes Paleologus the Emperors near Kinſman, to undertake the protection and deliverance of his Prince and Country; and was afterward for his great valour by the Emperor worthily made Lord great Martial of the Empire. This Philes of whom we now ſpeak, had all his life time been brought up in the Court, and was for his upright dealing and integrity of life beloved of all men, but ſpecially of the old Emperor his Kinſman, whom he with like affection honoured; but was a man altogether unskilful of the Wars, as being by nature of a weak conſtitution of body, and ſo very ſickly; and withall more given to devotion and the ſervice of God than the Affairs of the World, oftentimes ſpending moſt part of the day at his Prayers in the Church. He now grieved to ſee the perplexed Emperor; and the miſery of his Country, requeſted of him that he might with ſome ſmall power, and ſom few Captains of his own choice, go out againſt theſe proud Turks; hoping (as he ſaid) by Gods grace to revenge the wrong by them done, and to return to him again with Victory. Unto which his requeſt, the Emperor eaſily yielded; ſaying, that God was juſt, which delighted not in many legs, neither in the greatneſs of any mans ſtrength, but in a contrite heart and humble mind; not ſo giving his help unto Michael the Emperor, his Son, for the offences of his Parents; as happily he might unto this ſo upright and devout a man, regarding more his integrity of life, than his skill in Arms; for turning me about, I have ſeen in this World (ſaid he) I have ſeen, the ſwift not to gain the prize, neither the valiant the victory; wiſe men to want bread, and men of underſtanding, wealth; the ſimple to gain favour, and the ſubtil to fall into diſgrace; ſuch alteration worldly things in time find. So the Emperor (as is aforeſaid) yielding to his requeſt, furniſhed him with Mony, Horſes, and Armour, and ſuch a convenient Power, as he himſelf deſired. Which he having received, firſt of all incouraged his Captains and Souldiers with all manner of courteſie and kindneſs, giving unto them Mony, Horſes, Armor, Jewels; yea ſometime he gave unto one his Purſe, unto another his Cloke, his Rapier, or ſome other ſuch thing, as he had about him, to encourage them in their forwardneſs; after that, he perſwaded them to an honeſt and temperate courſe of life, and valiantly to play the men, promiſing according to their deſerts to reward every one of them, the War once happily ended; and before his ſetting forth, underſtanding by his Eſpials, that Chalel with a thouſand Foot and two hundred Horſe was forraging the Country about Bizia, he haſted his departure, that ſo he might by the way encounter them, laded with the Spoil of the Country; and ſo ſetting forward, came the third day to a little River, which the Inhabitants call Xerogipſum, and there in a great Plain near unto the ſame, encamped. Where after he had ſet all things in order fit for Battel, he with chearful Speeches as a great Commander, encouraged his Captains and Souldiers; leaving nothing unſaid or undone, that might ſerve for the animating of them to fight. But he had not ſo lien two days, but that his Scouts about midnight coming in, brought him tidings, that the Enemy laden with Spoil, was even faſt by at hand; who by the riſing of the Sun were come within ſight, and had themſelves a far off alſo diſcovered the Chriſtian Army, all gliſtering in bright Armor. Wherefore ſtaying a while to prepare themſelves for Battel; and firſt of all, compaſſing themſelves round with their Waggons and other carriages, they beſtowed in them all their Captives faſt bound together, with the Booty they had taken; and afterwards as the manner was, caſting duſt upon their Heads, and their Hands up towards Heaven, they came on. And now the Chriſtian Army came on forward alſo, Philes ſtill encouraging both the Horſemen and Footmen, and right well conducting them, as the time and place required. So it fortuned, that he that had the leading of the right Wing of the Army, gave the firſt charge upon a Squadron of the Enemies, and at the firſt onſet unhorſed one of the Enemies, and by and by after him another; But having his Horſe ſore wounded under him, he haſtily retired out of the Battel; which ſomewhat troubled the Chriſtians, and encouraged the Turks, who now with a barbarous outcry began moſt fiercely to preſs upon the retyring Chriſtians. Philes in the mean time with many cheerful words and comfortable perſwaſions ſtill encouraging them to play the men; and with his Eyes oftentimes caſt up to Heaven, with tears running down his face, moſt heartily beſought God, the giver of all Victory, no longer to ſuffer thoſe his Enemies, and the Miniſters of his Wrath, to triumph over his People; as did alſo the poor Captives that lay bound, doubtfully betwixt fear and hope expecting the event of the Battel. The Chriſtian Footmen at the ſame time encountring hand to hand with the Barbarians, aſſailed them, and were aſſailed, ſlew of them, and were themſelves of them ſlain; ſo that there was a cruel Fight made on both ſides. But Philes with the multitude of his men having almoſt incompaſſed the Barbarian Horſemen, with a Company of his moſt valiant Souldiers broke in upon the ſide of the Enemies Battel, and ſo made way through the midſt of it; and ſo troubled the Turks, as that they well knew not how to ſtay, or what to do. So being on every ſide circumvented and hardly charged, moſt of them there fell, excepting ſome few Horſemen, whom the Greek Horſemen purſued unto the entrance of Cherſoneſus, with purpoſe there to ſhut them up. Philes coming thither alſo, there upon thoſe Straits encamped; at which time the Emperor preſently ſent out five Gallies to keep the Straits of Helleſpont, ſo that no aid might be brought unto thoſe Turks out of Aſia. Whilſt theſe things thus went, two thouſand choice Horſemen came to the aid of Philes out of Servia, and the Poteſtate of Pera came by Sea alſo with eight Gallies more into Helleſpontus, to the aid of the Chriſtians; wherefore when the Grecians and the Servians had thus on the one ſide ſhut them up by Land, and they that were in the Gallies on the other by Sea, Philes with all his Power came and incamped about the Town and the Trenches wherein the Turks lay, planting his battery againſt the Caſtle, wherewith he greatly ſhook the ſame, and made great Slaughter of the Turks and of their Horſes, and that not only by day but by night alſo. But the Turks ſeeing death now preſent before their Eyes, and no way left for them to eſcape, for that they were ſo on every ſide both by Sea and Land incloſed, thought good thus to adventure their lives, reſolving by night to ſet upon the Grecians rather than upon the Servians, whom they had hitherto accuſtomed to overcome, and whom they had with often

The Turks overthrown.

Slaughters terrified; that ſo the reſt by them alſo happily diſcouraged, they might ſo delay the aſſault; but in attempting the ſame they perceived themſelves much deceived, finding them even at their firſt ſallying out ready in Arms to receive them; wherefore having in vain given the attempt (as againſt a ſtrong Fortreſs) they were ſhamefully enforced to retire. Yet were they not therewith ſo diſcouraged, but that the ſtraight Siege ſtill continuing, they gave the like attempt upon the Servians; but being alſo by them in a like manner with loſs repulſed, they began now utterly to deſpair. Wherefore the next day about midnight caſting away their Arms, they with their boſoms and pockets full of Coyn ran down unto the Sea-ſide, towards the Gallies, with purpoſe to yield themſelves unto the Genowaies that were therein; as fearing of them leſs harm, as of men whom they had never hurt. But the night being dark and miſty, and the Moon giving no light, many of them unawares came unto the Greek Gallies, and there flying the ſmoke, fell into the fire; for being lightned of their Mony, they were by them forthwith without any pity ſlain alſo. But the Genowaies ſlew not all their Priſoners, but only ſuch as had brought with them the moſt Coyn; leſt afterwards bewraying the ſame, it ſhould have been ſought after by the Greeks; the reſt they caſt into bonds, of whom ſome they ſent unto the Emperor, otherſome they kept to themſelves as their own Priſoners. Thus by the valour and good conduct of this worthy devout Captain, the Turks were for that time again chaſed out of Europe, and the Country of Thracia delivered of a great fear.

The cauſes of the decay of the Greek Empire.

Now by that we have already written, is eaſily to be ſeen the chief cauſes of the decay and ruin of the Greek Empire, to have been, Firſt, the Innovation and change of their ancient Religion and Ceremonies, by Michael Palæologus, whereof enſued a world of Wo: then, by Covetouſnes, covered with the name of good Huſbandry, the utter deſtruction of the chief Strength of the Empire; next unto that, by Envy, the ruin of the Great; falſe Suſpition, the loſer of Friends; Ambition, Honors overthrow; Diſtruſt, the great minds torment; and foreign Aid, the Empires faithleſs Porter, opening the gate even unto the Enemy himſelf; whereunto foul Diſcord joyned (as ſhall be forthwith declared) what wanted that the barbarous Enemy could deſire, for the helping of them in the ſupplanting of ſo great an Empire? But again to our purpoſe, Michael Companion with his Father Andronicus in the Empire, had by his Wife Mary two Sons, Andronicus who was afterward Emperor, and Manuel ſirnamed the Deſpot; and two Daughters, Ann married unto Thomas Prince of Epirus, and Theodora married to the Prince of Bulgaria; of all theſe, the old Emperor Andronicus their Grandfather ſo entirely loved Andronicus his Nephew, as that in compariſon of him he ſeemed little to regard either his own Children, or the reſt of his Nephews, wiſhing them all rather to periſh than him; which many ſuppoſed him to do, as purpoſing by him the better to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion of the Empire in his Houſe; as alſo for his excellency of Wit, and comlineſs of Perſon; the likeneſs of name alſo happily furthering his kind affection. For which reaſons, he cauſed him to be honorably brought up in his Court, as not willing to ſpare him out of his ſight either day or night. But when he was out of his Childhood, and grown to be a luſty Youth (at which time mens hot deſires are commonly moſt vehement) he began to contemn all chaſtiſement and government; eſpecially in ſo high a calling, and in the prime of his youth. Beſides that, his Companions became unto him the Miniſters and Perſwaders of all thoſe vain Delights which unſtaid youth moſt deſireth; and at the firſt began to lead him forth to walk the Streets, to hawk, to hunt, and to haunt Plays, and afterwards to night-walks alſo, not well beſeeming his State; which riotous courſe of life, when as it required great expence, and his aged Grandfather gave him but a certain ſpare allowance for his convenient maintenance; he acquainted himſelf with the rich Merchants of Genoway which dwelt at Pera. Hereof aroſe hard taking up of Mony, great Debts, fine devices how to come by Coyn, with ſecret conſultations and purpoſes of Flight. For when he ſaw his Grandfather old Andronicus long to live, and his Father Michael like to ſucceed him, he had no hope of aſpiring unto the Empire; whereupon his ambitious thoughts and impotent deſires long time tormenting his haughty Heart, ſuggeſted unto himſelf ſuch purpoſes. For when as he would not obey his Grandfather as his Tutor, nor follow other mens Councils, as a Child, he ſought after the Imperial Liberty, and abundance of Wealth, that he might have that was ſufficient for himſelf, and wherewith to reward others, as the Followers of an Emperor. Which ſeeing he could not do, his Grandfather yet living, and his Father reigning; he ſought after the Soveraignty of other Principalities and Countries; one while after Armenia, as belonging unto him in the right of his Mother the King of Armenia's Daughter; another while after Peloponeſus, and ſometime he dreamed of Lesbos and Lemnus, and other the fruitful Iſlands of the Ægean Sea; which when it was ſecretly told, ſometime to his Father, and ſometime to his Grandfather, he was now croſſed and reproved of the one, and afterwards of the other. And to paſs over many other his youthful pranks, he uſed in his night-walks ſecretly to repair unto a certain Gentlewomans Houſe, more honourably born, than honeſtly qualified; which Woman, a certain Gallant (and another Adonis) no leſs affected than himſelf; wherewith he highly offended, as with his Rival, appointed certain Ruffians and Fencers to watch her Houſe. But upon a certain time about Midnight, Manuel the Deſpot (his younger Brother) ſeeking after him, chanced to paſs that way where theſe Watchmen lay; who ſeeing him haſten by, and not knowing him in the dark, and ſuppoſing him to have been the man they looked for, (the Gentlewomans beſt Beloved) ſet upon him, and ſo wounded him, that he fell down for dead from his Horſe; but being by and by after known by others coming in, he was taken up, and half dead carried unto the Court. Which outrage in the Morning being known unto the Emperor, caſt him into a great heavineſs, as beholding not the time preſent only, but wiſely conſidering what was like to enſue in the time to come alſo. But Manuel the Deſpot being dead of the wounds there received, and the report thereof brought unto Michael the young Emperor his Father, then lying at Theſſalonica, ſtruck him to the heart with ſo great a grief, that falling ſick with the conceit thereof, he ſhortly after died.

Andronicus the unſtaied Youth nevertheleſs holding on his wonted courſe, with a ſecret purpoſe to have fled, became thereby ſtill more and more ſuſpicious to his aged Grandfather, not a little careful unto what end thoſe his violent paſſions would at length tend. And therefore fore appointed one Syrgiannes (a man of great Credit and Authority in the Court, in whom, as in a reconciled Enemy, he had moſt unadviſedly repoſed too much truſt) to inſinuate himſelf into the youthful Princes acquaintance and favour; that ſo ſounding him and his ſecret Deſigns, he ſhould not poſſibly be able without his knowledge to ſtep aſide; which of all things the old Emperor feared moſt, as the beginning of greater troubles. This Syrgiannes being a man of great Place, and of a ſubtil Wit, was ſometime himſelf ſuſpected of aſpiring, and therefore as upon the Miſpriſion of Treaſon, was by the old Emperor impriſoned; but afterwards by him again inlarged and received into favour, was now put in truſt warily to obſerve the doings of the young Prince. But he not unmindful of the wrong before done unto him, and in hope by troubling the State, either to aſpire unto the Empire himſelf, or at leaſtwiſe to ſome good part thereof; thought now a fit occaſion to be miniſtred unto him for him to work upon, both for the one and the other, by ſetting the old Emperor and his ambitious Nephew together by the ears; which opportunity he not minding to let ſlip, taking the young Prince one day aſide, diſcovered unto him all his Grandfathers device, in brief, as followeth:

Syrgiannes his crafty Seditious Speech unto young Andronicus.

Your Grandfather, noble Prince (ſaid he) hath ſet me as a Watch over your actions, or more truly to ſay, as a Blood-hound, to ſeek after not your doings only, but if it were poſſible, even after your moſt ſecret thoughts alſo; and ſo whilſt he malitiouſly prepareth for you Snares and Fetters, you not aware thereof, fooliſhly follow your ſhallow and childiſh Conceits. For what ſhall it avail you ſecretly to fly away? whereas, if the beſt chance, yet muſt you (as the common ſaying is) put your feet under another man Table, and live of his Charge; if it fall not out worſe, that you be ſlain or made away by them you fly unto for relief, or elſe fall into the Snares by your Grandfather laid for you. But if ſo be that caſting behind you theſe your fond Devices, you will hearken unto my Counſel, I will ſhew you a ready way, how you ſhall in ſhort time, and without any danger, aſpire unto the Imperial Seat and Dignity; the only way whereunto is this, if you leaving the City of Conſtantinople, ſhall fly out into the Cities and Provinces of Thracia. For ſeeing men are moſt commonly by nature deſirous of change, and the miſerable Thracians are with often exactions grievouſly vexed; if you ſhall but once proclaim a Redreſs of their Grievances, with Immunity for ever, they will all with one accord follow you whetherſoever you will, your Grandfathers long and heavy Yoke being caſt off, as if it were Siſiphus his heavy ſtone, which they had long rolled, and never the near. If you like of this advice, I will be unto you both the Author and the Leader of this Exploit, and will eaſily bring to good effect the whole matter; ſo that you again on the other ſide promiſe unto me upon your Faith, to reward this my travel according to my deſert therein. But what Rewards ſhall theſe be? Honourable Preferments, large Poſſeſſions, great Revenews, the firſt place in your favour, and that no great matter be done or concluded without my conſent and knowledge. For you ſee how willingly I make my ſelf partaker of your Calamity, and Companion of your dangers, no neceſſity enforcing me thereunto; forgetting even my very Faith, in compariſion of the love and zeal I bear towards you; wherein if any miſhap ſhall by the mutability of Fortune betide me, I have ſet down my ſelf with patience to endure it. All which conſidered, you need not to grudge to yield unto my Requeſts, if you tender your own ſafety. And foraſmuch as the ſhortneſs of the time will ſuffer no long Conſultations, and that delay bringeth extream danger, let us without longer ſtay impart the matter unto ſuch others, as for the hatred of the Emperor are like to keep our Counſel, and may yet much further our Deſigns.

The young Prince moved with this Speech as if it had been with a Charm, eaſily granted to his deſire, confirming the ſame by his Oath conceived in writing; at which time were preſent ſuch as were eſpecially to be acquainted with the Plot of the Conſpiracy, namely John Catacuzenus, and Theodorus Synadenus (both men of great Honour, and the old Emperors ancient ſuppoſed Friends, and of him beloved, much of like age unto himſelf) and Alexius Apocaucus the third (not of like honour with the other, yet a man of great Place, and of a moſt ſubtil and deep wit;) who all underſtanding the matter, ſhewed themſelves not as Miniſters, but as Ringleaders and Captains of the intended Rebellion. This Conſpiracy with moſt ſolemn Oaths and Promiſes on every part confirmed, they began right cunningly to attempt the matter; and to begin withall, Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus, by corrupting divers of the great and moſt gracious Courtiers, procured to themſelves the Government of ſuch Cities and Provinces in Thracia, as they thought fitteſt for them to begin their Rebellion in. Syrgiannes having the Government of the Sea-coaſt, and the in-land Country, even from the Sea-ſide to the top of Mount Rhodope; and Catacuzenus the Government of the Country about Oreſtias. In all which places they muſtred Souldiers, provided Armor, entertaining alſo ſtrangers, and other vagrant and maſterleſs men, as for ſome great War; beſides that, in the Cities for the Government thereof, they placed their truſtieſt friends, removing ſuch others as they had in ſuſpition: All which they coloured by rumors falſly raiſed, one while of the coming of the European Tartars from Danubius, and another while by the coming of the Turks out of Aſia; againſt whoſe Invaſions theſe preparations were given out to be made, for avoiding of ſuſpition; and the Traitors for their provident care highly commended even by the Emperor himſelf, againſt whom they were intended. All which things Syrgiannes notably diſſembled, oftentimes withall certifying the young Prince what he had done, and what was likewiſe of him to be performed.

But the old Emperor ſeeing his youthful Nephew not to hearken to his grave advice, but ſtill to proceed in his diſſolute kind of life, was about ſolemnly to have reproved him before the Patriarch and ſome others of the chief Nobility; if happily ſuch open reproof might have wrought in him ſome change of Manners; if not, then to have committed him to priſon; and like enough he was to have ſo done, had he not been otherwiſe perſwaded by Theodorus Mitochita, (who of all others was able to do moſt with him) by reaſon of the liberty of the time; for then it was almoſt Shrovetide, when as the people diſtempred with exceſs of meat and drink, were of all other times moſt fit, upon any light occaſion to be drawn into a tumult or uproar; for fear whereof, he was contented for that time to let him alone. But Shrovetide paſt, and a good part of Lent alſo, the old Emperor ſeeing no amendment in his Nephew, calling unto him Geraſimus the Patriarch, and the reſt of the reverend Biſhops then preſent in the City, ſent for his Nephew, openly before them all to chide him, and to ſchool him for his diſordered life; but eſpecially for his purpoſed flight; that aſhamed of ſuch open reproof before ſuch reverend Fathers, he might either amend his life, or at leaſtwiſe of all men be thought juſtly puniſht for the ſame, if he ſhould ſtill proceed therein. So the young Prince being ſent for, came, accompanied with many of his Favorites and Followers, moſt of them being ſecretly armed, and he himſelf not altogether unprovided; for it was agreed amongſt them, that if the Emperor ſhould uſe gentle and fatherly admonition towards him, that then they ſhould be quiet, without any ſhew of inſolency or diſcontentment; but if he ſhould in anger reprove him, or threaten to puniſh him, then upon a ſign given, forcibly with their Swords drawn to break in upon him, and to kill him in the Imperial Seat, and without more ado to place young Andronicus his Nephew in his ſtead. But coming in, and (as his manner was) taking his place next unto his aged Grandfather, his deſperate Followers attending without, he was indeed of him grievouſly blamed and reproved for all his former follies and evil courſe of life; yet with ſuch moderation and gravity, as that all ſeemed (as it did) to come of a moſt fatherly care and regard; ſo that at that time no ſuch Outrage was committed, as was by divers his Followers wiſhed, but the Aſſembly quietly diſmiſſed, and a ſolemn Oath taken on both ſides; of the Grandfather, That he ſhould not appoint any but his Nephew to ſucceed him in the Empire; and of the young Prince, That he ſhould never go about to attempt any thing to the ſhortening or hurt of his Grandfathers life or Empire. But the Conſpirators thronging about him at his coming out, fretted and fumed at him, as if he had broken his Faith and Oath before given them; ſaying, What greater wrong couldſt thou do us, than being by us made ſtrong, and become dreadful unto thine Enemies, to diſpoſe of thine affairs at thy pleaſure to thine own ſafety, and to leave us thy moſt faithful Friends and Servants in the Devils mouth to be devoured? For now they both doubted and feared, leſt their Conſpiracy was diſcovered. With which Speeches he both diſcouraged and aſhamed, ſent for Theodorus Metochita his Grandfathers chief Councellor, requeſting him to deal with his Grandfather for the pardoning of all his Followers, as he had done for himſelf; of which motion he diſliking, told him, That he was to give God thanks, that he had himſelf eſcaped ſo great a danger, and to him alſo, as a mean for the ſafeguard of his life, although he treated not for ſuch traiterous perſons, with whom, if he were well adviſed, he would have nothing to do, either think that they would ever be faithful unto him, that reſpecting neither God nor man, had ſo fouly broken their Faith before given unto the Emperor his Grandfather. With which unexpected Anſwer of ſo great and grave a Counſellor, the Prince not a little troubled, and withall diſcontented, ſtood a while as in a muſe all ſilent, reaſoning as it were with his own paſſions; but afterwards commanding him without further reply to depart, and the old Companions of his follies reſorting unto him, he by their perſwaſions entertained again his former diſloyal thoughts and deſignments; which his Grandfather vehemently ſuſpecting, and therewith not a little grieved, would (as if it had been by Inſpiration) oftentimes in his heavineſs ſay unto them that were about him, In our time is loſt the Majeſty of our Empire, and the devotion of the Church. Yet to prevent the worſt, he thought it good betime to lay hands upon his ſuſpected Nephew, and ſo to detain him in ſafe keeping; acquainting none therewith but Geraſimus the Patriarch and his ghoſtly Father; who preſently acquainted the Prince therewith, and was the cauſe that he haſtned his flight, flying himſelf before. For he now certainly underſtanding the danger he was in, the night before he ſhould have been apprehended, with all the reſt of the Conſpirators his Complices, in the dead time of the night fled out of the City, by the Gate called Gyrolimnia; which Gate (all the reſt being ſhut) was ſtill at his Command, for that he uſed commonly thereby at his pleaſure very early to go out on hunting, as he now pretended to do; but the next day after came to Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus Camp, who then both lay with a great Power at Hadrianople, expecting his coming. The old Emperor, before the riſing of the Sun advertiſed of the flight of his Nephew, the ſame day commanded him to be proclaimed Traytor and proſcribed, with all his Conſpirators, and whoſoever elſe ſhould take his part. And for the more ſurety, every man in the City was ſworn to be loyal and faithful unto the old Emperor, and Enemies unto his Nephew and his Adherents. But he on the other ſide, proclaiming Liberty and Immunity abroad in all the Cities and Villages in Thracia, ſo won the hearts of the Country people in general, that they reſorted unto him from all places in great numbers, ready armed to do whatſoever he ſhould command them. And to begin withall, they firſt laid hands upon the Collectors of the Emperors money (then abroad in the Country) whom they ill intreated, taking from them their money. After that, and yet ſeven days not expired, almoſt an incredible number of Horſemen, Footmen, Archers, and others, departed from Hadrianople toward Conſtantinople, under the leading of Syrgiannes, in good hope at their firſt coming to take the City, being at diſcord in it ſelf, and moſt part of the meaner ſort, in hope of gain, favouring their rebellious proceedings, ſuch as the ſeditious find in ſuch rebellious tumults. So having marched four days, they came and incamped at Selyrbia; but as they were about to have gone on farther, the old Emperor doubting leſt the Citizens, ſeeing ſo great an Army before the City, ſhould therein raiſe ſome tumult or ſtir, to the indangering thereof; thought good before to ſend Embaſſadors unto his Nephew, to prove if happily theſe ſo dangerous troubles, might by their means in ſome good ſort be appeaſed. The chief of theſe Embaſſadors was one Theoleptus Biſhop of Philadelphia, a man no leſs famous for his Vertue than his Wiſdom, and yet for both of all men honoured; and with him alſo was ſent Syrgiannes his Mother, as of all others moſt fit to appeaſe her Son, and to perſwade him not to approach the City, for that thereof might enſue much bloodſhed, and the deſtruction of the City, or at leaſtwiſe the utter undoing of many; whereof if he ſhould be the Author, how could he ever after live in conſcience quiet, but that the torment thereof would follow him even into his Grave; and therefore to requeſt him to retire a little, and ſo to come to talk, and to demand what he pleaſed. Syrgiannes moved as well with the preſence of the reverend Biſhop, as the prayers of his Mother, retired to the young Prince, which lay then about Oreſtias; whither the Emperors Embaſſadors came alſo; with whom (after long debating) it was agreed, That the young Prince ſhould in all Royal manner hold all Thracia, from Criſtopolis unto Rhegium, and the Suburbs of Conſtantinople; and withall, That ſuch Lands as the young Prince had already given unto his Followers, in Macedonia, ſhould ſtill remain unto them (which were ſuch as yearly yielded unto them a right great Revenew;) And that the old Emperor ſhould hold unto himſelf ſelf the Imperial City, with all the Cities and Provinces of Macedonia beyond Criſtopolis; and that he alone ſhould have the honour to hear the Embaſſadors ſent from forreign Princes; and to give them their diſpatch; for that the young Prince took no pleaſure in thoſe weighty Affairs, as by nature more delighted in Hawking, Hunting, and his other youthful Pleaſures. Upon which conditions a Peace was concluded, better liked of the young Prince than of the old Emperor; who although he was deſirous otherwiſe to have redreſt ſo great wrongs, yet wanting Power, was glad to yield to what his Nephew would requeſt. Thus was the Greek Empire in Europe (as then all or the moſt part incloſed within the bounds of Macedonia and Thracia) now divided betwixt the Grandfather and his Nephew; Aſia in the mean time (wherein the Greek Emperors their Predeceſſors ſometime held great Kingdoms) being left for a Prey to the greedy Turks. Othoman on the one ſide even in the heat of theſe troubles laying the foundation of his Empire in Phrygia and Bithynia; and the other the Turks Princes the Succeſſors of Sultan Aladin, encroaching as faſt upon the Emperors Territories and Countries on this ſide the River Meander. And not ſo contented, at the ſame time alſo built great ſtore of Gallies, wherewith they robbed the Chriſtian Merchants trading to Conſtantinople, and ſpoiled the Coaſts of Macedonia and Thracia, and the Iſlands of the Ægeum, and among others took the famous Iſland of the Rhodes; which they held not long before they were again driven out of the ſame by the Knights Hoſpitalers, under the conduct of William Willaret, aided by the Genowaies and the King of Sicilia, which they from that time held (to the great honour and benefit of the Chriſtian Commonweal) by the ſpace of 214 years, known by the name of the Knights of the Rhodes; until that in the memory of our Fathers it was (I ſay no more, but grieve therefore) ſhamefully loſt unto the Turk, for want of relief; never place being more honourably defended, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall appear; ever ſince which time thoſe honourable men (the flower of Chivalry) have ſeated themſelves in the Iſle of Malta, which they to their immortal glory and the comfort of all good Chriſtians, have moſt notably defended againſt the mighty Sultan Solyman, and all the Fury of the Turks, as ſhall be alſo in due place declared.

Articles of agreement betwixt the old Emperor and his Nephew.

The Greek Empire in Europe divided.

whilſt the Grecians are at diſcord amongſt themſelves, Othoman layeth the foundation of the Turks Empire, and the other other Turks incroach upon them alſo.

The Iſland of the Rhodes was by the Knights Hoſpitalers recovered from the Turks in the year 1308.

But to return again unto the troubled eſtate of the Greek Empire. Syrgiannes the Greek Captain, and Author of all the aforeſaid ſtirs betwixt the old Emperor and his Nephew, had even from the beginning thought, as a Companion to the young Prince, to have ruled all with him at his pleaſure, and that nothing either great or little ſhould have been done without him; but ſeeing it now to fall out far otherwiſe than he had before expected, and the Prince to be wholly ruled by Catacuzenus, and himſelf of all others leaſt regarded, and not ſo much as called to any Council; inwardly tormented with grief and envy, he began ſecretly with himſelf to deviſe how he might be revenged of the ungrateful Prince, which unmindful of his former promiſes, had ſo unthankfully caſt him off. Wherefore he reſolved again to revolt to the old Emperor, not doubting but ſo in ſhort time to overthrow all the Councils and Devices of the young Prince, together with his State alſo, by himſelf before raiſed. For he, as worldy wiſe, excluding God from his Councils, had ſuch an opinion of himſelf, that which way ſoever he went, thither muſt all things follow alſo. Wherefore by one of his truſtieſt Friends he ſecretly made the old Emperor acquainted with his purpoſed revolt, and how all things ſtood; for the greater Credit thereof alledging, That he could not abide the ſight of him that ſought to corrupt his Wife, meaning the young Prince. This news from Syrgiannes was unto the old Emperor moſt wellcome; for it grieved him (as an old man of a great Spirit) to ſee himſelf ſo contemned and deluded by his Nephew, his Empire rent, and his old Servitors of all ſorts, by him ſpoyled of their Lands and Poſſeſſions in Macedonia and Thracia. So a ſolemn Oath in ſecret paſſed from the one to the other, Syrgiannes without longer ſtay ſecretly fled to Conſtantinople; which there bruted abroad, rejoyced many, now well hoping the whole Government would again come unto the old Emperor, and that ſo they ſhould again recover their Poſſeſſions wrongfully taken from them by his Nephew. But God not ſeeing it ſo good, all this hope was but in vain, as ere long it appeared; for the young Prince, who of long knew how much he was beloved of the Conſtantinopolitans, and by them ſecretly ſent for; taking occaſion upon the flight of Syrgiannes, with all the power he could make, marched towards the City; and being come within ſight thereof, encamped, laying ambuſhes upon every way and paſſage thereabout, for to have intercepted Syrgiannes; who was then at Perinthus, and the third night after, with three hundred ſelect Souldiers, deceiving them that lay in wait for him as if they had been all aſleep, before the riſing of the Sun came to Conſtantinople; and if the old Emperor would have given him leave, he had ſuddenly charged them that did lie in wait for him, before they were aware of his coming. But as ſoon as it was day, the Prince hearing of the eſcape of Syrgiannes, and no ſuch tumult in the City as he had expected, preſently without more ado retired with his Army the ſame way he came, back again into Thracia.

By and by after, Conſtantine the Deſpot was by the old Emperor his Brother ſent by Sea to Theſſalonica, to take upon him the Government of Macedonia, and by the way to apprehend Xene the Empreſs, the young Princes Mother; and after with all the power he could make to invade the young Prince in Thracia; that ſo ſetting on him on the one ſide out of Macedonia, and Syrgiannes with the Turks (for the Emperor in this civil Diſcord was glad to uſe their help alſo) and the Bithynian Souldiers on the other, they might ſo ſhut him up betwixt them and take him. According to which reſolution, the Deſpot coming to Theſſalonica, there took the Empreſs, whom with all her Family he thruſt into a Gally, and ſo ſent her to Conſtantinople, where ſhe was in the Palace kept cloſe, as too much favouring the proceedings of the Prince. And afterward raiſing all the power he could in Macedonia, invaded the Prince in Thracia, breaking by force through the Wall of Criſtopolis.

The young Prince ſeeing himſelf by this means, now like to be driven to a great ſtrait, ſent Synadenus with his Thracian Army, to defend the Frontiers of his Empire towards Conſtantinople, againſt Syrgiannes with his Turks and Bithynians; in hope himſelf by many ſubtle devices and ſlights, to be able to encounter his Uncle the Deſpot. And firſt he cauſed divers edicts and proſcriptions to be written in haſt, wherein great rewards and preferments were with great ſolemnity of words promiſed to whomſoever could bring unto him the Deſpot either quick or dead; which were of purpoſe given to the Country People paſſing to and fro, to be diſperſed abroad in the high Ways, and about in the Country near unto the Deſpots Camp. And after that, he cauſed the death of the Emperor his Grandfather to be every where proclaimed, and how that he was by the Conſtantinopolitans in a tumult ſlain; which the deviſers thereof, in every place reported. Yea ſome there were, that ſwore they were themſelves preſent at his woful death, and ſaw it with their Eyes; otherſome more certainly to perſwade the matter, ſhewed long white Goats hair, or ſuch like gathered out of white Wool, as if they had been by the furious People pluckt from the old Emperors Head or Beard, at ſuch time as he was ſlain. Which things being commonly reported in every Town and Village, but eſpecially in the Deſpots Camp, wonderfully filled Mens Heads with divers ſtrange and doubtful thoughts; then divers alſo of the diſperſed Edicts being found, and brought to the Deſpot, ſtruck him (and not without cauſe) into a great fear; inſomuch, that by the perſwaſions of his beſt Friends, he without longer ſtay retired in haſt to Theſſalonica. Whither ſhortly after came a Gally from Conſtantinople, with ſecret letters from the Emperor to the Deſpot, for the apprehenſion of five and twenty of the chief Citizens, vehemently ſuſpected for the ſtirring up of the People to Rebellion, and ſo to have delivered the City to the Prince, all whom the Deſpot ſhould have ſent bound in that Gally to Conſtantinople; but they in good time perceiving the danger they were in, ſecretly ſtirring up the People, and by and by after ringing out the Bells (the ſignal appointed for the beginning of the Rebellion) had in a very ſhort time raiſed a wonderful tumult in the City; inſomuch, that all the Citizens were up in Arms, who running headlong unto the Houſe of the Deſpot, found not him (for he forewarned of their coming, was fled into the Caſtle) but ſlew all they met of his, or elſe robbing them, caſt them in Priſon. As for the Deſpots Houſe, they took what they found therein, and afterwards pulled it down to the ground. Then coming to the Caſtle, they fired the Gates; which the Deſpot ſeeing, and not able to defend the place, took horſe and fled to a Monaſtery not far off, where being taken by them that purſued him, he full ſore againſt his Will, for the ſafeguard of his life, took upon him the habit of a Monk; nevertheleſs, he was from thence carried Priſoner to the young Prince his Nephew, who ſhewed himſelf much more courteous to him, than all the reſt of his Nobility and Waiters; for they, as if they would have eaten him up, were even forthwith ready to have torn him in pieces, had not the Prince embracing him in his arms, ſaved his life. Yet the next day after, by the perſwaſion of his Council, he ſent him to Didimotichum, where he was caſt into a moſt loathſom Priſon, being very deep and ſtrait, in manner of a Well, no body to attend upon him but one Boy, where he lay in miſerable darkneſs and ſtink; they which drew up his Ordure from him and the Boy, whether by chance or of purpoſe, pouring it oftentimes upon his Head. Where after he had lien a great while in moſt extreme miſery, wiſhing to die and could not; he was at length by the Princes commandment (entreated thereunto by certain religious men) removed into a more eaſie Priſon, where we will for ever leave him.

Things falling out croſs with the old Emperor, and although they were never ſo well deviſed, ſtill ſorting out unto the worſt, he became very penſive and doubtful what to do. So it fortuned, that one day in his melancholy mood, having a Pſalter in his hand, to reſolve his doubtful mind, he opened the ſame, as if it were of that heavenly Oracle to ask Counſel; wherein the firſt verſe that he light upon was, Dum cœleſtis diſſociat Reges, nive conſpergentur in Salmon; When the Almighty ſcattered Kings (for their ſakes) then were they as white as ſnow in Salmon. Which he applying to himſelf, as if all thoſe troubles, and whatſoever elſe had happened in them, proceeded from the Will of God, although for cauſes to him unknown; he by and by ſought to reconcile himſelf unto his Nephew; contrary to the mind of Syrgiannes, deſiring nothing but trouble. For (as we have before ſaid) the young Prince although he was deſirous of the Power and Liberty of an Emperor, yet he left the Ornaments and Care thereof unto his Grandfather; and had not he oftentimes and earneſtly been egged forward by his Companions to affect the whole Empire, happily could and would have contented himſelf with the former pacification; for being now ſent for, he came firſt to Rhegium, and there viſited his Mother (now ſet at liberty, and ſent thither for the furtherance of the deſired pacification) where he with her and by her Counſel did whatſoever was there done. So within a few days the matter was brought into ſo good terms, that an Attonement was made, and he himſelf went and met the Emperor his Grandfather before the Gates of the City; the old Emperor ſitting then upon his Horſe, and the Prince lighting from his, a good furlong before he came at him; and although his Grandfather was very unwilling, and forbad him ſo to do, yet he came to him on foot, and kiſſed his Hand and Foot as he ſate on horſeback; and afterward taking horſe, embraced him, and there kiſſed one another, to the great contentment of the Beholders; and ſo having talked ſome few words, departed; the old man into the City, and the young man into his Camp, which then lay near unto Pega; where ſtaying certain days, he came divers times into Conſtantinople, and ſo went out again; for as then his Mother, partly for her health, partly for the love of her Son, lay at Pega.

Andronicus the old Emperor ſeeketh for Counſel of the Pſalter as of an heavenly Oracle, and ſo ſeeketh to make peace with his Nephew Pſal. 68. verſ. 14.

But Syrgiannes nothing glad of the agreement made betwixt the Emperor and his Nephew, walked up and down ſick in mind, with a heavy countenance, eſpecially for that in time of Peace his buſie head ſtood the Common-weal in no ſtead. Wherefore in all Meetings and Aſſemblies, he willingly converſed with them which moſt diſliked of the preſent State, and ſpake hardly as well of the Emperor as of his Nephew, wronged as he thought by them both; whereas in the time of their greateſt diſtreſs he had (as he ſaid) ſtood them in good ſtead. But ſeeing one Aſanes Andronicus walking melancholy up and down, as a man with heavineſs oppreſſed; who having done good ſervice for the young Prince, and not of him regarded, had fled to the old Emperor, and there found no ſuch thing as he expected for the eaſe of his grief, although he were a man honourably born, and otherwaies endued with many good parts; with him Syrgiannes acquainted himſelf, as grieved with the like grief that he himſelf was; with whom as with his Friend, without any diſſimulation he plainly diſcourſed of all ſuch things as his grief deſired. But Aſanes handling him with great wiſdom, did himſelf with like words ſpeak hardly both of the Emperor and his Nephew; but yet curiouſly noted whatſoever Syrgiannes ſaid, for he had before hated him for his Ambition, and as then, took it in diſpleaſure, that he was Enemy unto Catacuzanus, his Son-in-Law, who was all in all with the young Prince, and did oftentimes comfort him. But the ſong being throughly ſet, Aſanes came ſecretly unto the old Emperor, and told him the whole matter; and in fine, that except he betime laid hold on Syrgiannes, affecting the Empire, he ſhould in ſhort time be by him brought to his end. Whereupon Syrgiannes was forthwith clapt faſt in Priſon; whoſe Houſe with all his Wealth, the common People took the Spoil of; and not contented to have raſed it down to the ground, converted the Site thereof, together with the pleaſant Vineyards adjoyning unto the ſame, into a place to feed Goats and Sheep in; a worthy reward for his manifold Treacheries. The young Prince ſhortly after going to Conſtantinople, was there crowned Emperor, as fellow in the Empire with his Grandfather; unto which ſolemnity in the great Temple of Sophia, both the Emperors riding, it fortuned the old Emperor by the ſtumbling of his Horſe to be overthrown, and fouly beraied in the mire, the Streets being then very foul by reaſon of much rain but a little before fallen; which many took as ominous, and portending the evil fortune which ſhortly after befel him. During the time of this Peace, it fortuned that as the young Prince was a hunting in Cherſoneſus, ſeventy Turks adventurers, were by force of weather driven on ſhore; who before they would yield themſelves Priſoners, made a great Fight with the Emperors men, and ſlew divers of them; in which conflict the young Emperor himſelf was wounded in the Foot, wherewith he was a great while after exceedingly tormented.

Andronicus the late Prince, and now Fellow in the Empire with his aged Grandfather, held not himſelf long ſo contented, but after the manner of ambitious Men (and continually prickt forward by his aſpiring Favourites) longed to have the whole Government to himſelf, which hardly brooketh any Partner; and therefore weary to ſee his Grandfather live ſo long, reſolved no longer to expect his natural death, (although it could not by courſe of Nature be far off) but by one device or other to thruſt him from the Government; or if that might not be wrought, at once to diſpatch him both of life and ſtate together. And the ſurer to lay the Plot whereon ſo foul and horrible a Treaſon was to be built, he by the Council of his Mother and others, by whom he was moſt directed, ſent for Michael the Prince of Bulgaria, his Brother-in-Law (though before to him unknown, as was his Wife his Siſter alſo) to make with him a firm League, to the intent by him to provide, that if the Prince of Servia (who had but lately married the old Emperors nigh Kinſwoman, and ſo to him much devoted) ſhould take part with him, he ſhould by the Bulgarian his Neighbour be intangled, Who ſo ſent for, with his Wife, the old Emperors Daughter, came to Dydymotichum, where they were many days moſt honourably entertained both by the young Emperor and his Mother; for why, this meeting plotted upon great Treaſon, was finely coloured, with the deſire the young Emperor had to ſee his Siſter and her Husband, as before unto him unknown; and the Empreſs her Daughter, whom ſhe had not ſeen in three and twenty years before. But the ſecret concluſion betwixt them was, that the Bulgarian Prince ſhould to the uttermoſt of his power aid the young Emperor againſt his Grandfather, and he likewiſe him againſt the Servian, as he ſhould have need; and further, that if his Grandfather being depoſed, he ſhould recover the whole Empire, then to give him a great ſum of Mony, with certain ſpecial Cities and Provinces confining upon him, as in Dowry to his kind Brother-in-law, and Companion in his labours. So Michael the Bulgarian Prince honourably entertained by the young Emperor and the old Empreſs his Mother-in-Law, loaded with rewards, and promiſes of greater, returned home into his Country.

A treacherous meeting.

This matter thus diſpatched, the young Emperor therewith encouraged, and knowing alſo the Conſtantinopolitans, beſides the other Cities of Thracia, exceedingly to favour him and his proceedings; by whom alſo he was ſecretly invited to haſten his coming thither (as weary of the long life and lazineſs, as he termed it, of his Grandfather) thought it beſt cunningly to go about the matter; that ſo his Grandfather being with as little ſtir as might be depoſed, he himſelf might alone injoy the Empire. But needing Mony for the effecting of ſo great matters, he by force took all the Mony from the Collectors, whom the old Emperor had ſent into Thracia for the taking up of Mony there, telling them that he was an Emperor alſo, and in need of Mony, and that the common charge was likewiſe by the common Purſe to be diſcharged. After that he took his way towards Conſtantinople, pretending that upon ſpecial cauſes he had occaſion to ſend Embaſſadors unto the Sultan of Egypt; for the tranſporting of whom he was there to take order for the ſetting forth of a great Ship, and other things neceſſary for the journey. Neither went he ſlenderly appointed, but with a great Power; and the Cities of Thracia before well aſſured unto him, ſuch as he ſuſpected being thruſt out of Office, and others more aſſured unto him placed in their ſteads. But whilſt he thus beſtirreth himſelf, one of thoſe that were moſt inward with him, deteſting ſo foul a Treaſon, ſecretly fled from him unto his Grandfather, from point to point diſcovering unto him all the intended Treacheries; and withal, how that his Nephew had determined to depoſe him from his Empire, or otherwiſe to bereave him of his life if he ſhould ſtand upon his Guard; but if in the attempt he ſhould find eaſie ſucceſs, then to ſpare his life; and depriving him of the Imperial Dignity, to thruſt him as a Monk into a Monaſtery; and therefore adviſed him to beware how he ſuffered him after his wonted manner to come into the City, for fear of a general revolt, but rather by force to keep him out. Which the Emperor hearing, and comparing with other things which he had heard of others, yet ſounding in his Ears, deeming it to be true, ſtood up, and in the anguiſh of his Soul thus complained unto God; Revenge my quarrel O God, upon them that do me wrong, and let them be aſhamed that riſe up againſt me; and preſerve thou unto me the Imperial Power, which by thee given unto me, he cometh to take from me whom I my ſelf begot and advanced. After, he began to conſider what courſe to take for the aſſurance of himſelf and his State in ſo great a danger. And firſt he ſent unto his Nephew (come half way) to forbid him from entring the City, and to tell him, that it was a great folly for him, being ſo manifeſt a Traitor, both unto his Grandfather and the State, to think his traiterous purpoſes to be unknown unto the World. And beſide in way of reproof to rehearſe unto him, how many occaſions he had given for the breaking of the League with his Grandfather; firſt in taking away the Mony from the Collectors, whereof the State never ſtood in more need, by reaſon of the diviſion of the Empire, which required double charge; then in that he had in the City every where diſplaced ſuch Governors and Magiſtrates as his Grandfather had ſent thither, and placed others at his pleaſure, with many other like facts, declaring his treacherous aſpiring mind, for which he was not without cauſe by his Grandfather forbidden to enter the City. After that, the old Emperor by ſecret Letters craved aid of Crales Prince of Servia, and Demetrius the Deſpot his Son, who was then Governor of Theſſalonica and the Countries adjoyning; commanding him with Andronicus and Michael his Nephews (Governors of Macedonia) with all the Forces they were able to raiſe, and ſuch aid as ſhould be ſent unto them out of Syria, with all ſpeed to joyn together and to go againſt the young Emperor. But theſe Letters thus written unto the Prince of Servia, the Deſpot, and others, (as is before ſaid) were for the moſt part intercepted, by ſuch as the young Emperor had for that purpoſe placed upon the Straits of Criſtopolis, and the other paſſages; eſpecially ſuch as were written in Paper, yet ſome others in fine white linnen Cloth, and ſecretly ſowed in the Garments of ſuch as carried them, eſcaped for all their ſtrait ſearch, and ſo were delivered. And in truth nothing was done, or about to be done in Conſtantinople, but that the youg Emperor was by one or other advertiſed thereof; whereas the old Emperor on the other ſide, underſtood nothing what his Nephew did abroad, or intended. For all men of their own accord inclined to him; ſome openly both Body and Soul (as they ſay) and ſuch as could not be with him in perſon, yet in Mind and good Will were even preſent with him; and that not only the common ſort of the Citizens of Conſtantinople, but the chief Senators, the great Courtiers, yea and many other of the Emperors neareſt Kinſmen alſo; who curiouſly obſerving whatſoever was done in the City, forthwith certified him thereof. Amongſt whom was alſo Theodorus the Marqueſs, one of the old Emperors own Sons; who many years before by the Empreſs his Mother ſent into Italy, and there honourably married, was by his prodigal courſe of life there, grown far in debt; ſo that leaving his Wife and Children behind him, he was glad after the deceaſe of his Mother, to flie unto his Father at Conſtantinople, and there now lived; who beſide that he moſt honourably maintained him in the Court, and beſtowed many great things upon him, paid alſo all his Debts, which were very great. All which Fatherly kindneſs he forgetting went about moſt Judas like to have betrayed his aged Father. For he alſo dreaming after the Empire, and for many cauſes (but eſpecially for that he was in Mind, Religion, Manners, and Habit, become a Latine) by him rejected, thought he could not do him a greater deſpight than by revolting unto the young Emperor; ſo that the nearer he was in blood, the more he was his Fathers unnatural Enemy. Shortly after, Demetrius the Deſpot, having received the Emperors Letters at Theſſalonica, called unto him Andronicus and Michael his Nephews, the Governors of Macedonia; with whom joyning all his Force, and dayly expecting more aid out of Servia, he firſt ſpoiled the young Emperors Friends and Favourites in Macedonia, giving the Spoil of them in all the Cities and Towns of Macedonia, unto their Souldiers, who made havock of whatſoever they light upon; and whoſoever ſeemed any way to withſtand them or diſlike of their Proceedings, their Goods and Lands they confiſcated, and drave the men themſelves into exile. Neither was the young Emperor Andronicus in the mean time idle, but ſecretly ſent out his Edicts, into all parts of the Empire, yea into the very Cities of Conſtantinople and Theſſalonica, and over all Macedonia; whereby he proclaimed unto the People in general, a releaſement of them from all Tributes, Impoſitions, and Payments; and frankly promiſed unto the Souldiers and Men of War, the augmenting of their Penſions and Pay; which were no ſooner bruited, but that moſt men were therewith moved both in Word and Deed to favour his proceedings, doing what they could to further the ſame, and by ſecret Letters inviting him to haſten his coming into the City; who thereupon coming to Rhegium, by his Embaſſadors ſent from thence, requeſted the old Emperor, either to give him leave according to the League betwixt them, to come into the City, or elſe to ſend him certain of the chief of the Nobility and Clergy, with ſome of the better and more underſtanding ſort of the Burgers and Citizens alſo, unto whom he might frankly ſpeak his mind, for them faithfully to deliver the ſame again unto the Emperor his Grandfather, and the People. Which requeſt the old Emperor perceiving to be full of Deceit and Treachery, for a good ſpace anſwered thereunto nothing at all, but ſtood all ſilent, as doubting which to grant; for, to ſuffer his Nephew to come into the City, he ſaw was dangerous, the Citizens (as he well knew) being for the moſt part inclined to revolt to him ſo ſoon as they ſhould once ſee him within the Gates; and to ſend any forth unto him, as he deſired, might be (as he feared) an occaſion of ſome tumult to be after raiſed in the City; for he knew that his Nephews drift therein was, openly by fair words, and ſecretly with great gifts and large promiſes, firſt to gain them, and by them the reſt of the Citizens. Both which things being dangerous, he made choice of the eaſier, and ſent forth unto him two of the moſt noble Senators, two of the moſt reverend Biſhops, two other grave Prelates, and four of the chief Burgeſſes of the City; unto whom at their coming unto him, he in the open hearing of all men delivered this premeditated and crafty Speech.

The young Emperor ſendeth Embaſſadors unto his Grandfather.

The Speech of the young Emperor to his Grandfathers Embaſſadors.

It is not unknown unto the World, you my Subjects, to have alwaies been unto me more dear than I have been unto my ſelf; and how that I have not upon any ambitious conceit, or deſire of the ſole Government, againſt my Grandfathers good Will, gon out. For you ſee how that I neither ſpare mine own life, or attend my pleaſure, for the care I have of you; I come not unto you compaſſed about with a Guard of armed men, as is the manner not of Kings only, for the envy of their high place, but of others alſo of far meaner calling, whom diſaſter fortune, baniſhed from their Parents and Kindred, hath enforced to wander here and there, with death alſo before their Eyes. Let any man tell me how I came by theſe wounds which I yet bear in my body, but in fight with the Enemies of my Country which paſs over out of Aſia into Thracia; or elſe dwelling near unto Iſther, do with their incurſions from thence miſerably waſte that ſide of Thracia which is next unto them? For I (to tell you the very truth) ſeeing the old Emperor by reaſon of his great years to become ſlothful and blockiſh, and not poſſible to be awaked out of his drowſie ſleep, neither any whit to grieve, when as the poor Chriſtians his Subjects were both by day and night, ſome as Sacrifices ſlain by the barbarous Enemies, ſome carried away into moſt miſerable Captivity, and the reſt poor and naked to be driven out of their Houſes and Cities; not to ſpeak in the mean time of the greater miſchiefs in Aſia, and how many Cities have been there loſt through the old Emperors ſloth and neglience; when I ſaw theſe things (I ſay) ſtrucken with a piercing grief, which my heart could not indure, I went out for two cauſes, either by ſome kind of honourable death to end my grief together with my life, or elſe to the uttermoſt of my power to ſtand my Country in ſome ſtead. For by no means it can come to paſs, but that a man, and he that hath of long time reigned, muſt at length become loathſome unto his Subjects, and encur their deadly hatred. For why, God hath made nothing in this life immutable and firm; whereby it cometh to paſs, as we ſee, that all worldly things joy and delight in change. But if a man will as it were force Fortune to his deſire, and ſtrive to bind things unto a certain firm and conſtant courſe, he ſhall but loſe his labour, and in vain ſtrive againſt nature. But whatſoever is contrary unto nature, or exceedeth the juſt bounds thereof, hath in it neither comfort nor delight. This was it that cauſed the wiſe men to ſay, and to leave to us as Rules, Not to dwell too long upon any thing; and a meaſure to be the faireſt vertue. For you ſee how that my Grandfather being grown to great years, and having reigned ſo long (I may almoſt ſay) as never did any but he, is become hateful unto all his people; and yet regardeth not either how to diſcharge himſelf of ſo great a burthen, or how to relieve the declining State of the Empire, or ſo much as grieveth to ſee the Succeſſors of the Empire to die before him: For my Father is dead without any fruit of the Empire, except the bare Title only; and others alſo neareſt to him of blood, and far younger than he, are dead likewiſe; and happily I my ſelf may die alſo before I ſhall receive any profit thereof; for what can more eaſily happen, eſpecially unto a man that ſhunneth no danger, and regardeth not his life? But ſome perhaps will ſuſpect me of Ambition, for departing from the Emperor my Grandfather, and for refuſing to be ruled by him. Which thing I neither flatly deny, or altogether confeſs: For might I ſee the Empire increaſe, and the bounds thereof inlarged, I could willingly content my ſelf, and at my eaſe take my reſt; chearing my ſelf up with ſuch hope as do they that bear with their Cooks, making them to ſtay long for their dinner, in hope thereby to fare the better. But ſeeing the State of the Empire daily to decline from evil to worſe, and the miſerable people carried away Captives, or ſlain by their Enemies even at the Gates and under the Walls of the Imperial City; what deem you me then to think? For moſt men eaſe their preſent grief, with the hope of future good, although the ſame be but vain: But unto me is not left even ſuch vain hope unto my falſe comfort. And can you marvel at the impotent affection of the Great Alexander of Macedon, grieved and diſpleaſed to ſee his Father to heap Victory upon Victory, and to cut off all the hope of his Sons glory, by leaving him ſo few occaſions of War; and not think me (to whom you ſee the quite contrary is chanced, and from whom not only the hope of the Empire is cut off, for the waſting thereof, but even the courſe of a quiet life) to fret and grieve thereat? Moved herewith, and not able longer to indure it, at length I riſe up, and requeſted of the Emperor my Grandfather, but a thouſand men at Arms, promiſing him by the Power of God with them to preſerve the Cities in Bithynia, and to drive his Enemies further off, (before that having them) they ſhould paſs over the ſtrait, and beſiege the Imperial City of Conſtantinople; which ſo ſmall a requeſt he not only denied me, but hath ever ſince taken me for his mortal Enemy. But this and many other things elſe let paſs: I have now another requeſt unto him by you, which is, That he would give me eight thouſand Duckats to content my Souldiers withall, who of long have from place to place roamed up and down with me, following mine uncertain Fortune: Which granted, I will no more be unto my Grandfather troubleſome, but diſmiſſing my Forces, hold my ſelf right well contented.

Having thus ſaid, he roſe out of his Seat, and taking them apart one after another, courteouſly diſcourſed with them, and ſo filling them with great hopes, ſent them away; who departing from him and coming into the City, became as it were the open Proclaimers of his Praiſes, enflaming the people with a greater deſire of him than before. Which the old Emperor hearing, and perceiving almoſt all his Friends in the City to be in heart revolted from him; and withall fearing to be of them in ſome ſudden concourſe ſlain, was therewith exceedingly vexed. Yet he thought it beſt before any ſuch thing ſhould happen, to prove their minds, and to hear the Counſel of the Patriarch, and Aſanes, and the other Biſhops alſo; unto whom, being by one of the Senators called together, he declared his mind, as followeth:

The Speech of the old Emperor unto the Patriarch and the reſt of the Biſhops and Nobility, concerning the young Emperor his Nephew.

Were I aſſured, that having depoſed my ſelf of the Imperial Dignity, I ſhould my ſelf live in ſafety, and ſee my people well governed, I would I ſhould never be of the Company of the Faithful, if I did not by much prefer a pleaſant quiet contented life before an Empire. For if a man would ſeek for the pleaſure of the mind, what can be more pleaſant, than to be diſburdened of all Cares, and free from ſuch dangers as attend high Eſtates? But if for my ſin and the ſins of my people, as alſo for the ſin of mine Anceſtors, the Vengeance of God in manner of a violent Tempeſt raging againſt us, ſubverteth our Empire; and I yet but a Youth, by the help of God reformed and quieted the State of the Empire, grievouſly troubled with Diſcord in the Church, and the often invaſion of the Enemy; and taught by long experience know not how in ſo great hurle and tempeſt which way to turn my ſelf: How can I with ſafety commit unto my Nephew ſo great a Charge, who as yet is both an unſtayed Youth, and ſo careleſs of his own good, as that he knoweth not how well to govern his own private affairs? For giving over his Power to young unskilful men, and having flung away his Imperial Poſſeſſions amongſt them, he himſelf liveth in penury and want; neither regardeth any thing more than his Dogs and Kites, of whom he keepeth few leſs than a thouſand Currs, and as many Hawks, and not much fewer men to look unto them. Wherefore unto ſuch a man, how may I ſafely commit either my life, or the adminiſtration of mine Empire, by God committed unto me? But I will never witting and willingly caſt away either my Subjects or my Self. For my Nephew I have loved, not only more than my Wife and Children, but (to ſay the truth) more than my ſelf alſo; as you well know how tenderly I have brought him up, how carefully I have inſtructed and adviſed him, as purpoſing to have left him the Heir and Succeſſor both of my Wiſdom and mine Empire, that ſo he might the better pleaſe both God and man. But he, contemning my good counſel, hath ſpent whole nights in Banqueting, and Riot, and Brothelhouſes; where he hath alſo ſlain his own Brother; and to be brief, he hath riſen and lifted up his hand againſt me his Grandfather, and a Grandfather that had of him ſo well deſerved, attempting ſuch a Villany as the Sun never ſaw. Wherefore you ought alſo to hate and deteſt his wickedneſs, and to riſe up to reſtrain his impudent Diſloyalty, and by your Eccleſiaſtical Cenſure to denounce him unworthy of the Empire and the Communion of the Faithful, as one ſeparated from God; that ſo aſhamed and corrected, he may lovingly thither return from whence he is ſhamefully departed, and again be made Heir both of mine Empire and ſtaidneſs; for there is no man alive whom I had rather have promoted unto the Empire, ſo that he would hear my Precepts, and obey my Counſel. As for the concluſion he uſed in his former Speech, it was altogether feigned, crafty, and malitious; for you have heard how many Reproaches he hath given me in all that Speech, wherewith his concluſion agreeth not; but the more to ſtir up the hearers thereof againſt me, did of purpoſe ſo conclude his Speech.

The Patriarch with divers of the Biſhops conſpire againſt the Emperor.

Upon this, moſt of the foreſaid grave and learned Biſhops agreed, that the young Emperor ſhould no more be named in the Prayers of the Church, until he had better conformed himſelf. Howbeit the Patriarch and ſome others ſecretly favouring both him and his proceedings, liked not thereof, and therefore ſaying nothing thereunto, returned home unto their own houſes. But meeting once or twice afterwards in the Patriarchs houſe, they there conſpired together againſt the old Emperor; with whom alſo divers of the Nobility conſented; and thereupon an Oath was conceived in writing, whereby they bound themſelves to continue conſtant in that their wicked Reſolution. Whereupon, about three days after, the Patriarch cauſing the Bells to be rung, and a great number of the common people flocking together, pronounced the Sentence of Excommunication againſt all ſuch as ſhould in their publick Prayers omit the name of the young Emperor, or refuſe to do him all Honour due unto an Emperor. Which thing not a little grieved the old Emperor, as appeared by his Speech, in ſaying, If the Doctor of Peace be ſo mad againſt us, in hope of Reward promiſed by my Nephew, that caſting off all ſhame and gravity, he doubts not to be the Author of Sedition; who ſhall repreſs the raſh attempts of the vulgar people againſt us, if we reſpect but mans help? for the Patriarch ſo much as in him lieth is, I ſee, the murderer of us. So the Biſhops of the contrary Faction, moved with the notable impudency of the Patriarch, excommunicated him likewiſe, as he had done them, with his mad Followers, as the Authors of Sedition and Faction, and incited with Bribes to the troubling of the State; for which cauſe alſo he was by the Emperors Commandment committed unto ſafe keeping in the Monaſtery called Manganium. But about two days after, the young Emperor came to the Walls of Conſtantinople, to know how his Grandfather had accepted the Meſſengers ſent unto him; earneſtly requeſting, that it might be lawful for him alone to enter into the City, to do his duty to his Grandfather. But neither he, neither his words were any whit at all regarded, but was by ſuch as ſtood upon the Walls himſelf with ſtones driven away; who could not abide to hear him ſpeak, but ſhamefully railed at him, ſaying, All his talk to be nothing elſe but deceit and fraud; and ſo for that time he retired a little from the Walls. But night being come, certain buſie heads among the common people (and they not a few) ſecretly meeting together gave him knowledge, that about midnight, when as all the Citizens were aſleep, and the Watchmen in ſecurity, he ſhould come unto the Walls, where they would be ready with Ropes to draw him up unto the top of the Bulwarks; which done, the matter (as they ſaid) was as good as diſpatched; for that they were perſwaded, that the Citizens ſo ſoon as they ſhould once ſee him in the midſt of the City amongſt them, would forthwith all revolt unto him. So he according to this appointment, about midnight approaching the Walls, found there no ſuch matter as he had well hoped, for the receiving of him into the City; But contrariwiſe the Watchmen carefully watching all alongſt the Wall, and calling one unto another. Wherefore finding there no hope, he with Catacuzenus and Synadenus, his chief Counſellors, leaving the South ſide of the City, in a little Boat rowed ſoftly all along the Wall that is toward the Sea, if happily they might there find their Friends, and ſo be received in; but there the Watchmen alſo deſcrying them from the Walls, and calling unto them, but receiving no anſwer, began to caſt ſtones at them, and to make a noiſe, ſo that deceived of their purpoſe, and out of hope, they were glad to get them further off, and to depart as they came.

Theſſalonica yielded unto the young Emperor.

But the evil ſucceſs of this Exploit was ſhortly after with his better Fortune recompenced; for by and by after, ſecret Letters were ſent unto him from Theſſalonica, requeſting him with all ſpeed to come thither, aſſuring him in the name of the Biſhop, with divers of the Nobility, and the good liking of the people in general at his coming to open the Gates of the City unto him: Whereupon he leaving a great part of his Army with Synadenus, to keep ſhort the Conſtantinopolitans, he himſelf with the reſt of his Power ſet forward towards Theſſalonica, where he in the habit of a plain Country man entred the City unſuſpected; but being got within the Gate, and there caſting off that ſimple attire wherewith he had covered his Rich and Royal Garments, and preſently known to be the young Emperor, the people came flocking about him, and with many joyful Acclamations received him as their Lord and Soveraign; yet ſome few, more favouring the old Emperor, fled into the Caſtle, and there ſtood upon their Guard; which after they had for a ſpace notably defended, was at length taken from them.

Theſſalonica thus yielded, Demetrius, Andronicus, and Aſan Michael, the old Emperors chief Captains, then lying with their Army not far off, and not well truſting one another, fled; moſt of whoſe Souldiers preſently went over unto the young Emperor; who departing from Theſſalonica, came to Serre, which by compoſition was delivered unto him alſo, but not the Caſtle; for that was by Baſilicus Nicephorus (the Captain thereof) ſtill holden for the old Emperor. This Baſilicus was a man honourably deſcended, but of no great Capacity or Wit, as the finer ſort ſuppoſed, and therefore not of them much regarded, or thought fit for the taking in hand of any great matter; whom yet the old Emperor for his plain ſincerity, more than for any thing elſe, had made Captain of that Caſtle, and Governor of the Country thereabouts; which he yet ſtill held, and in theſe moſt troubleſome times ſhewed himſelf wiſer than all that had ſo thought of him; of whom ſome died in deſpair, ſome fled, ſome were taken Priſoners, and ſo ſuffered a thouſand evils; the reſt with the loſs of their Honour, traiterouſly revolting from the old Emperor to the young; whereas he alone, looking but even forward upon his Allegiance, with his truſt in God, ſo long as the old Emperor lived, oppoſed himſelf againſt theſe troubles, and ſtood faſt for him, and was not to be moved with any fair Promiſes or cruel Threats of the young aſpiring Emperor, whereof he lacked none. But having ſtrongly fortified the Caſtle committed to his Charge, there kept himſelf, until that hearing of the death of the old Emperor, he then reconciling himſelf to the young, as unto his right Soveraign, delivered up unto him the Caſtle; who in reward of his Fidelity, gave it him again to hold for him, in as ample manner as he had before held it for his Grandfather. For wiſe men honour Vertue even in their Enemies, as did King Philip in Demoſthenes, when as he ſaid, If any Athenian living in Athens, doth ſay that he preferreth me before his Country, him verily would I buy with much money, but not think him worthy my friendſhip; but if any for his Countries-ſake ſhall hate me, him will I impugne as a Caſtle, a ſtrong Wall, or a Bulwark; and yet admire his vertue, and reckon the City happy in having ſuch a man. And ſo in few words to conclude a long diſcourſe, the young Emperor in ſhort time having roamed through all Macedonia, and without reſiſtance taken all the ſtrong Towns and Cities therein, he there took alſo Demetrius the Deſpots Wife and Children, with all his Treaſure, as alſo the Wives of Andronicus and Aſanes, and of all the Senators that followed them; after whom the great Commanders their Husbands were alſo for the moſt part taken and caſt into priſon, ſome at Theſſalonica, ſome at Didimotichum, ſome of the reſt afterward moſt miſerably periſhing in exile. Wherewith the old Emperor diſcouraged, was about to have ſent his Embaſſadors unto his Nephew for Peace, whilſt he was yet thus buſied in Macedonia; and had indeed ſo done, had not another hope ariſing in the mean time, quite altered that his better purpoſe. It fortuned at the ſame time, whilſt the old Emperor was thus thinking of Peace, that Michael the Bulgarian Prince, in hope of great profit thereof to ariſe, ſecretly offered his Aid unto him againſt the young Emperor his Nephew; of which his Offer the old Emperor gladly accepted, and Embaſſadors were ſent to and fro, about the full concluſion of the matter, no man being acquainted therewith, more than two or three of the Emperor his moſt ſecret friends and truſty Counſellors. Yet in the mean time diſdaining to be ſo coupt up as he was, by Synadenus one of his Nephews Captains, even in the Imperial City; ſent out one Conſtantinus Aſſan, with the greateſt part of his ſtrength againſt him; who encountering him at the River Maurus, was there by him in plain battel overthrown and taken Priſoner, the reſt of his diſcomfited Army flying headlong back again to Conſtantinople. All things thus proſperouſly proceeding with the young Emperor, and the Countries of Macedonia and Thracia now almoſt all at his Command, he returned in haſt with all his Power unto Conſtantinople, to prevent the coming of the Bulgarians thither; as fearing leſt that they finding the City weakly manned, ſhould treacherouſly kill the old Emperor, with ſuch as were about him, and ſo ſeize upon the City themſelves; or at leaſtwiſe give him ſuch Aid as might keep him out, and ſo cut off all his hope for obtaining of the ſame. At which alſo there was great want of Victual in the City, he with his Army having ſhut it up on the one ſide by Land, and the Venetians with their Gallies on the other ſide by Sea; who then at odds with the Genoways dwelling at Pera, kept all that ſtrait Sea betwixt Europe and Aſia, in ſuch ſort, as that neither Victuals nor Merchandize could be brought that way, either to Conſtantinople or Pera. The young Emperor coming to Conſtantinople, attempted at his firſt coming to have entred the City, in hope without any great reſiſtance to have been received; but repulſed by the Defendants, was glad to get him further off. About this time came alſo unto the City three thouſand Horſemen, the appointed Aid of the Bulgarian Prince, unto the old Emperor; who although he wanted men, and was right glad of their coming, yet remembring the harms he had before received by foreign Aid, and not now daring to truſt them too far, ſuffered not them to come into the City, more than their General and ſome few others of their Commanders with him. Now the young Emperor upon the coming of this Aid, leſt ſome great harm might betide either the old Emperor or himſelf, to the utter ſubverſion of their State; ſecretly ſent unto his Grandfather, requeſting him to be well adviſed how he truſted thoſe foreign people too far; offering himſelf to do whatſoever he ſhould Command, rather than ſo great a harm ſhould happen unto either of them, as was from them to be feared. But the truſt the old Emperor had conceived of this Bulgarian Aid, had ſo confirmed his mind, as that he little liſtned unto his Nephews requeſt; beſides that, how could he well truſt him that had ſo oftentimes deceived him? Wherewith the young Emperor much grieved, and now again almoſt deſpairing of his further Succeſs, diſlodged, and drew near unto the place where theſe Bulgarian Horſemen lay encamped; from whence he ſent certain Embaſſadors with great Gifts and Preſents unto the General, and the reſt of the chief Commanders; promiſing them far greater, if they would without further troubling themſelves return home again; whereunto they willingly granted, and ſo were of him honourably feaſted, and the next day after conducted upon their way homewards.

Conſtantinople betrayed unto the young Emperor.

It fortuned, that the young Emperor returning back again from the Bulgarians, and incamped in the place where he before lay; two of the Watchmen of the City, the one called Camaris, and the other Caſtellanus, both Smiths, fled ſecretly unto him; who admitted to his Preſence, and all others commanded to depart, excepting Catacuzenus, offered to betray the City unto him, ſo that he would under his hand writing aſſure them of ſuch a ſum of Money, and ſuch Poſſeſſions as they required; which he eaſily granting, and the hour and manner of performing of the ſame, being by them declared and agreed upon, they by and by without longer ſtay, for fear of ſuſpition, returned again into the City. But the Emperor ſtaying four days in the ſame place, cauſed certain Ladders to be made of great Ropes, ſuch as they uſe in great Ships; But the appointed night being come, the two Traytors having before provided great ſtore of good Wine, liberally gave the ſame by way of courteſie unto the Watchmen their Companions near unto them; who drank ſo plentifully thereof, that not able any longer to hold up their heads, they fell into ſo ſound a ſleep, as that but for breathing they differed not much from dead men. About midnight came certain Souldiers of the young Emperors, with the foreſaid Ladders; which the Traytors by and by drawing unto them by a Rope caſt down, and making them faſt unto the top of the Wall, received by the ſame eighteen armed men; who being got into the City, without more ado brake open the Roman Gate, whereby the young Emperor with his Army preſently entred, no man letting him. But it is worth marking, how things appointed to befal us, are by no means to be avoided, although we be thereof before never ſo plainly forewarned: For the ſame night the City was ſurpriſed, immediately after the ſetting of the Sun, the Gates being ſhut, a certain Country man came running in all haſt from out of a Village there by, and knocking hard at the Gate called Girolimna, required to ſpeak with ſome of the Souldiers; who being come, he told them, how that a little before he had ſeen a a great number of the young Emperors men marching towards the City, by the way that leadeth unto the Roman Gate; which being told unto the old Emperor, did not a little trouble him. And therefore thought it good to ſend out certain Scouts, to ſee if all were clear along the Walls toward the Land, from Sea to Sea; which his purpoſe Metochita his chief Counſellor letted, ſaying, It did not beſeem a couragious mind to be upon ſo light an occaſion ſo much moved; for that either the rumor was falſe, or the endeavour of ſo few vain, the Walls and Gates of the City being ſo filled with armed men; which happily he ſaid not ſo much upon ignorance of Martial Affairs, as blinded by a certain commanding Power, that the ſupernal Decree given by God himſelf againſt the old Emperor, might at length take place. And again, the third part of that night yet ſcant paſt, divers other Countrymen came running unto the ſaid Gate Girolimna, and told the Watchmen upon the Walls, that a great number of men were met together at the Roman Gate; whereof the Emperor hearing, was therewith much more troubled than before, inſomuch that ſharply rebuking Metochita, he ſaid unto him, Thou ſeemeſt to be ſtrangely metamorphoſed into a man of Iron, which art become ſo ſecure, as not to have any feeling of the danger wherewith we are incloſed: Seeſt thou not that the matter requireth, not that we ſhould thus ſit ſtill and take our reſt? For the noiſe of my Nephew ſoundeth in mine Ears as the ſound of a great Drum, and diſquieteth my mind. I feel a Sea of Calamity broken out againſt me, which overwhelmeth and drowneth my heart and courage. Nevertheleſs he, firm in his former Opinion, made no reckoning of thoſe Reports; and therefore roſe to go to bed, to ſhew indeed that he accounted nothing of them, but as falſe alarms. But the Emperor left alone, and no body with him unto whom he might break his grief, laid him down upon a Pallet, not putting off his Clothes; but as if he had together with them put on extream deſperation, lay tumbling too and fro as a man in mind troubled with divers many and heavy thoughts. In the mean time he heard a great noiſe at the Court-Gate, and the report of the entring of the young Emperor his Nephew, with a great clattering of Armor; for there were above eight hundred Souldiers entred with him, and withall they of the City on every ſide ſaluted him with moſt joyful Acclamations. But the old Emperor hearing the great Tumult and Out-cry, roſe from his Pallet, exceedingly troubled; and deſtitute of all the help of his Captains and Souldiers, (for why, his Palace was altogether deſolate, except of ſuch as were his ordinary Waiters) betook himſelf unto his Prayers, beſeeching God not to forſake him in ſo great a danger, but in his mercy to defend him from the fury of thoſe wicked men. Who preſently heard him, and ſent him preſent relief; for whilſt he was thus praying in the Palace, the young Emperor without, calling together all his Captains and Lieutenants, ſtraitly charged them upon pain of death, neither by word nor deed to violate the Majeſty of the old Emperor his Grandfather, nor any other about him; for this Victory (ſaid he) God hath given us, and not we our ſelves; his Will ordereth all things, whereunto all things obey; the Stars, the Air, the Sea, the Earth, Men, Floods, Tempeſts, Plagues, Earthquakes, Showers, Dearth, and ſuch like; ſometime to our Bliſs, and ſometime to our Correction and Deſtruction; wherefore uſing us as the Inſtruments of his Chaſtiſement, he hath given unto us this preſent Victory, which peradventure to morrow he will give to others to uſe againſt us, and then as we have been unto them we have overcome, ſuch will they alſo ſhew themſelves unto us again; wherefore if neither nighneſs of blood, neither that we be all of one Country, may move us, yet in reſpect of our ſelves let us uſe mercy, that we feel not the Hand of God upon us in like caſe. In the mean time a Courtier opened a Wicket unto the young Emperor, with this Meſſage from his Grandfather.

The pitiful Supplication of the old Emperor to his Nephew.

Foraſmuch as God this day (my Son) hath given unto thee the Imperial Scepter, taken from me, I requeſt of thee this one good turn, for many which I have even from my birth beſtowed upon thee, (for in this my hard eſtate I let paſs, that I next unto God have been the Author of thy Nativity and Increaſe) give me my life, ſpare thy Fathers head, and with violent Weapon ſpill not that blood from which thou thy ſelf haſt taken the Fountain of life. Man truly beholdeth Heaven and Earth, and Heaven and Earth behold mens Actions; wherefore make not the Heavens and the Earth beholders of ſo wicked an Outrage as never man ever committed. If Brothers blood long ago cried out unto the Lord againſt Cain, how much louder ſhall the Fathers Blood cry unto the Lord, and declare ſo great a wickedneſs unto the Earth, the Sun, and Stars, and make it abhorred of all the Princes of the World? Regard my miſerable old age, which of it ſelf promiſeth unto me ſhortly death, but unto thee a Reſt after long Cares. Reverence the hands which have oftentimes moſt lovingly embraced thee, yet crying in thy ſwathing-Clouts. Reverence thoſe Lips which have oftentimes moſt lovingly kiſſed thee, and called thee my other Soul: Have pity upon a bruiſed Reed, caſt down by Fortune, and do not thou again tread upon it. And ſeeing thou art thy ſelf a man, be not too proud of thy preſent Fortune, but conſider the uncertainty and variety of worldly things, taking by me Example; ſee in me the end of long life, and marvail, how one night having received me an Emperor of many years, leaveth me now ſubject unto another mans power for ever.

The young Emperor Andronicus moved with this Speech, and taking great care of his Grandfathers ſafety, ſcarce abſtaining from tears, entred the place, and coming to his Grandfather, humbly ſaluted him, embraced him, and with chearful words comforted him. Straightway after he went unto the Monaſtery Manganium, where (as is aforeſaid) the Patriarch Eſaius was by the old Emperors Commandment kept in ſafe keeping; whom the young Emperor now took from thence, and carrying him away in one of the Emperors richeſt Chariots, reſtored him again unto his Patriarchal Dignity; wherein he afterwards ſpared not to revenge himſelf to the full, and moſt cruelly to perſecute the old Emperors Friends. That day from morning unto night, a man might have ſeen all the riches and wealth of ſuch Noblemen as had taken part with the old Emperor, carried away, and their goodly Houſes overthrown and made the ſcorn of the baſe common people; but eſpecially the Houſe and Wealth of Theodorus Metochita, a man but the day before in greateſt favour with his Prince, and of all others next unto the Emperor himſelf, of greateſt Authority and Credit, whoſe whole Wealth (not that only which was found in his houſe, but that alſo which he had laid up in truſt with his Friends, diſcovered by Notes found in his Study) became moſt part a prey unto the common people, and the reſt confiſcated unto the Prince. Thus he which earſt of all others next unto the Emperor was accounted moſt fortunate, was now upon the ſudden, with his Wife and Children brought unto extream beggery; and after many years Felicity, in one day caſt into the bottom of deſpair and miſery; where a man might have heard many complaining, ſay, All that Wealth and Treaſure to have been the blood and tears of the poor oppreſſed Subjects, brought unto him by them whom he had made Rulers and Governors of the Provinces and Cities of the Empire; to the intent that when they had dealt cruelly with the people, as with their Slaves, he might ſtop them for coming to complain of their griefs unto the Emperor; and that the eye of the Revenger had not always ſlept, but was now at length awaked, and had of him yet ſcarcely taken ſufficient puniſhment; which every where to hear, increaſed not a little his grief. As for himſelf, he was confined unto Didymotichum, as the place of his exile and baniſhment; where after he had a certain time poorly lived, he was ſent for back again to Conſtantinople; where having nothing left to relieve himſelf (for his houſe at the coming of the young Emperor, was in the fury of the people pluckt down to the ground, and the very pavement thereof digged up) he went unto the Monaſtery of Chora there by, which long before built by the Emperor Juſtinian, and become ruinous, he in the time of his Proſperity had with great charge repaired, and therein now (having made ſhipwrack of all that he had) quietly ſhrouded himſelf, to the great comfort both of his Body and afflicted Mind, where he not long after died.

Niphon incenſeth the young Emperor againſt his Grandfather.

But to return again unto the old Emperor, as yet in doubt what ſhould become of himſelf; it fortuned that the ſame day that the City was taken, the young Emperor at night returning to the Palace, by the way met with Niphon ſometime Patriarch, who asked him how they meant to deal with his Grandfather. Whereunto the young Emperor anſwering, That he would deal with him honourably and Emperor like; he was by him therefore blamed and reproved. For this Niphon being of a crafty ſubtil Wit and malicious Nature, beſides that he ſecretly hated all them upon whom Fortune greatly either fawned or frowned, bare an eſpecial grudge againſt the old Emperor; Firſt, for that at ſuch time as he was right worthily for his ſhameful covetouſneſs and extortion, by the reſt of the Biſhops and Clergy thruſt out of the Patriarchſhip, he was not by him (as he looked for) defended; and ſecondly, for that dreaming again after the Patriarchal Dignity, he thought it one good ſtep thereunto, to have him (as his greateſt Enemy) taken out of the way. Wherefore he ſaid now unto the young Emperor, If thou deſire to Reign without fear, give not thine Honour unto another; but taking all the Ornaments of the Empire from the old man, caſt Hair-cloath upon him, and ſo clap him faſt in priſon, or thruſt him out into exile. This miſchievous counſel this wicked man gave againſt the poor old diſtreſſed Emperor, not remembring how unworthily he had by him been before preferred unto the higheſt degrees both of Honour and Wealth, if he could there have kept himſelf; unto which ungracious counſel, divers others of the Nobility alſo conſenting, ſo wrought the matter amongſt them, that although they could not quite draw the young Emperors mind from his Grandfather, yet they much changed the ſame, ſo that he could no longer indure to take him for his Companion in the Empire. Whereupon after many Meetings and Conſultations had, it was decreed, That the old man ſhould ſtill retain the Name and Ornaments of an Emperor, as before, but not to meddle in any matters, nor to come abroad, but to ſit ſtill quietly in his Chamber, with the yearly maintenance of 10000 Ducats, for the maintenance of himſelf and ſuch as tended upon him; to be raiſed of the fiſhing before the City of Conſtantinople; a poor Penſion for the maintenance of ſo great an Emperor. Of which ſo ſhameful a Decree, Eſaius the Patriarch was alſo a furtherer, who ſeeing an Emperor that had raigned ſo long, caſt down, and ſhut up as it were in priſon, was ſo far from grieving thereat, that fooliſhly rejoycing, he in token thereof abſurdly wreſted this Text of Scripture, ſaying in his merriment, Lætabitur juſtus, cum viderit ultionem; The Juſt ſhall rejoyce when he ſeeth the Revenge; calling himſelf, Juſt, and the Emperor, Revenge. But the old Emperor thus ſhut up in his Chamber (differing in nothing but in Name, from a Priſon) not long after the ſtate of his body overthrown with grief and corrupt humors diſtilling out of his head, firſt loſt one of his Eyes, and ſhortly after the other alſo; and ſo oppreſſed with eternal darkneſs, mingled (as ſaith the Scripture) his drink with tears, and ate the bread of ſorrow, being oftentimes (to his great grief) moſt bitterly mocked and derided, not of them only which were by his Enemies ſet to guard him, but of his own Servants alſo. Not long after, the young Emperor falling ſick, in ſuch ſort as that it was thought he would not recover, Catacuzenus, and the reſt of his greateſt Favorites and Followers careful of their own eſtate, and yet doubtful of the old blind Emperor, deviſed many things againſt him, but all tending to one purpoſe, for the ſhortning of his days. But in the end all other devices ſet apart, they put him to his choice, either to put on the habit of a Religious, and ſo for ever to bid the World Farewel, or elſe to take what ſhould otherwiſe enſue; the beſt whereof was either Death, Exile, or perpetual Impriſonment in the loathſome Caſtle of Forgetfulneſs: For the putting whereof in execution, Synadenus (of all others to him moſt hateful) was appointed. At which hard choice, the old Emperor as with a world of woes ſuddenly oppreſſed, lay a great while upon his bed as a man ſpeechleſs; for what could he do elſe, except he had an heart of Steel or Adamant? being then compaſſed about with many barbarous and mercileſs Souldiers, and his domeſtical Servants kept from him, and no man left that would vouchſafe to direct him (being blind) whither to go, or where to ſtand. But to make the matter ſhort, would he, would he not, they made choice for him themſelves, polling and ſhaving him, and caſting a Monks habit upon him, changed his name, after the name of the religious, and called him by the name of Anthony the Monk. Glad was Eſaius the falſe Patriach, of this the hard eſtate of the old Emperor; for that now that he was profeſſed a Religious, there was left no hope for him to recover again the Empire, either cauſe for himſelf to fear. Yet he thought it good to be adviſed, in what ſort remembrance ſhould be made of him in the Church-prayers, if any were at all from thenceforth to be made. Whereof to be by the old Emperor himſelf reſolved, he (ſeeming to be very ſorry for that which was done, but purpoſing indeed therein to deride him) ſent unto him two Biſhops, to know what his pleaſure was to have done therein. Unto which their demand, he oppreſſed with heavineſs, and fetching a deep ſigh even from the bottom of his heart, anſwered:

The old Emperor becometh blind.

Andronicus the old Emperor againſt his will made a Monk, and called Anthony.

As in poor Lazarus appeared a double miracle, that being dead, he roſe; and being bound, walked; even ſo was it to be done in me, though in quite contrary manner; for loe, being alive, I am dead, as overwhelmed with the Waves of Calamity and Woe; and being looſe, I am bound, not my Hands and Feet only, but my Tongue alſo; wherewith unable to do any thing elſe, I might yet at leaſt bewail my Woes and Wrongs unto the Air, and ſuch as by chance ſhould hear me, and unto this moſt woful darkneſs wherein I muſt for ever ſit. But ſhame hath cloſed my mouth, my Brethren abhor me, and my Mothers Sons account me for a ſtranger unto them, and the very light of mine Eyes is not with him, my Friends and Neighbors ſtood up againſt me, and all that ſaw me, laughed me to ſcorn; my Feet had almoſt ſlipped, and my Footſteps were almoſt overthrown; for I fretted againſt the wicked, when I ſaw the peace of the Ungodly. The Emperors long ago gave great Priviledges unto the Church, even thoſe which it at this day injoyeth; and the Church gave to them again Power, to chooſe whom they would to be Patriarchs. Now concerning him that ſent you, I not only nominated him unto the Patriarchſhip, but I my ſelf made choice of him, and preferred him before many other right worthy and moſt famous men, being himſelf a man grown old in a more private life, never before preferred, or for any other thing famous; I will not ſay how often I have holpen him and done him good. But now when he ſhould again have relieved me in my Calamity, he joyneth hands with mine Enemies againſt me, more cruel upon me than any other bloody-handed Executioner; not aſhamed to ask me how I would be remembred in the Church; feigning himſelf to be ignorant and ſorry for mine eſtate, much like unto the Egyptian Crocodile of Nile, which having killed ſome living Beaſt, lieth upon the dead body and waſheth the head thereof with her warm tears, which ſhe afterwards devoureth together with the body. But what to anſwer him unto this his catching queſtion, I know not; for if I ſhall ſay, As an Emperor, I ſhall forthwith be ſlain by them which for that purpoſe have me in hold; but if I ſay, As Anthony the Monk, it ſhall be taken as the frank confeſſion of mine eſtate, by them which have craftily contrived mine Overthrow; as if I had not by compulſion, but even of mine own free will put on this monaſtical habit, which God knoweth was never in my thoughts.

The notable anſwer of the old Emperor, to the catching queſtion of the proud Patriarch.

Having thus ſaid, he ſent them away without any other anſwer unto their demand; but ſitting down upon his bed-ſide, ſaid, My ſoul return again into thy reſt, for the Lord hath dealt well with thee; neither ſpoke any one word more in declaration of his grief, his Tongue there ſtaid by his ſingular Wiſdom, or elſe with the greatneſs of his grief; and ſo againſt his will in ſilence paſſing over his ſorrow, his mind with the greatneſs of his Woes overcome; and as it were aſtoniſhed, before the humors gathered into the brain could be diſſolved into tears; for as the Sun ſending forth his moderate beams, draweth unto it many exhalations and vapors, but caſting the ſame forth more plentifully, doth with his immoderate heat conſume the ſame before they can be drawn up, ſo the moderate affections of the mind may have their griefs by words and tears expreſſed; but ſuch as exceed all meaſure, and with their vehemency as it were overthrow the mind, commonly make men to ſtand ſtill, mute and ſilent, or if they ſpeak at all, to ſpeak idly, and nothing to the purpoſe, as men beſide themſelves, or in an extaſie; but for the reſolution of the queſtion by the Biſhops demanded, the devout Patriarch decreed, That in the Church-Prayers he ſhould be remembred before the Emperor his Nephew, by the name of the moſt religious and zealous Monk Anthony; which was done (God wot) for no good zeal to the poor blind man, but the better to colour the matter with the common people, as if he weary of the World, had voluntarily taken upon him that ſilly profeſſion. Nevertheleſs, within four days after, Synadenus, underſtanding them in every place to whiſper among themſelves, and ſecretly to mutter againſt the hard dealing with the old Emperor, who had long reigned over them, and ſo by right was again to do, if his Nephew ſhould chance to die, and that the Eccleſiaſtical Laws enforced no man againſt his will to enter into religious Orders; he therewith enraged, ſent to him certain of his own Confederacy, to exact of him an Oath in writing, That he ſhould never more after that time, ſeek after the Empire, or yet accept of the ſame if it were offered him, neither to ſubſtitute any other; which if he refuſed to do, to put him in fear of his life; and the more to terrifie him, ſet a guard of inſolent barbarous Souldiers over him; for fear of whom, he yielded to do whatſoever they required; and ſo his Oath being ſolemnly conceived into writing (another man leading his hand, becauſe he was blind) he ſigned the ſame with a red Croſs above, and a black Croſs beneath, after the manner of the religious. Having thus lived in darkneſs diſgraced, ſhut up in his Chamber as a man forſaken of the World, with an unſure guard ever to attend him, by the ſpace of two years, it fortuned that the 12*th* of February towards night (a day in the Greek-Church dedicated to the Vigil of St. Anthony, whoſe name they had given him) certain of his Friends that were ſuffered to have acceſs unto him, going as their manner was, once in three or four days to viſit him (among whom was his Daughter, ſometime the Prince of Servia his Wife, but as then a Widow, and Nicephorus Gregoras, Author of this Hiſtory) he entred with them, as with his Friends, into a familiar diſcourſe of many matters, wherein he ſo deceived the time, that it was paſt midnight before they perceived how the time paſſed. But the Cocks crowing, he brake off the talk, and bidding them farewel, gave them leave to depart, pleaſantly ſaying, That to morrow they would make an end of their diſcourſe: who all thereupon took their leave and departed, no ſign of any ſickneſs as then appearing upon him; and after they were gone, called for meat and did eat; the meat he eat, was certain ſhell-fiſh, for it was with them a faſting-day, and he had not eat any thing; after which, when as he ſhould have drunk a cup of Wine, for the comforting of his old ſtomach, and digeſting of that ſo hard meat, he drank cold water, as his manner was, when he felt any inward heat, to drink the ſame immoderaly; which hurtful manner of diet he then uſing alſo, began by and by to feel a great pain in his ſtomach, and ſo preſently after became very ſick, falling withall into a great looſeneſs of body, ſo that in the ſpace of one quarter of an hour he was glad oftentimes to ariſe, and to go unto an homely Houſe of Office in an inner-Chamber thereby to diſcharge natures burden; where after many Evacuations, ſitting down upon an homely bed faſt by, and not able to recover his own Bed, having as then none to help him, there before it was day, died, after he had reigned 43 years. His death was by many ſtrange ſigns and accidents as it were foretold; firſt a great Eclipſe of the Sun appeared, juſt ſo many days before his death as he had lived years; and after that, another Eclipſe of the Moon; and with it an Earthquake, the day before he died at night, being St. Anthony his even, whoſe name his Enemies had thruſt upon him; at which time alſo, the Sea with a great Tempeſt riſing above the wonted Bounds, made divers breaches in the Walls of the City towards the Sea, as if it had been ſome violent Enemy, and overflowed alſo divers Houſes in the City. Many Croſſes and Pinacles were then alſo from the tops of Churches and other high Buildings overthrown; and with them a great Pillar, ſometime one of the Ornaments of the City, ſtanding before the Church, commonly called the Church of the forty Martyrs; which being very high, and below burnt and worn away with time, had put many in fear as they paſſed by it, leſt it ſhould have fallen upon them; inſomuch that the Emperor upon a time paſſing that way, was requeſted by ſome of the Nobility there preſent, to ride farther off from it, for fear of falling upon him; who ſmiling at their vain fear, by chance anſwered, O would to God I might live ſo long as this Pillar will ſtand; which now falling out according to his Speech gave many of them that had heard him ſo ſay, occaſion to marvel. His dead body was honourably buried in the Monaſtery of Libe, which his Mother Theodora the Empreſs had not long before new built, and his Obſequies there (after the manner of that time) yearly ſolemnly kept by the ſpace of nine days.

The Turks Kingdom founded by Othoman in Aſia, at ſuch time as the Greek Emperors were at variance betwixt themſelves in Europe

Thus at length having paſſed through the troubled State of the Greek Empire, during the long Reign of the old Emperor Andronicus, the conſiderate Reader may eaſily ſee the cauſes of the declining and ruine alſo of this famous Empire; and how that the Greek Emperors, troubled with their tempeſtuous Affairs nearer home in Europe, yea in the very Imperial City it ſelf, and in their own Palaces, were not at leiſure to look over the Strait into Aſia, but glad to leave their Territories there unto the weak defence of themſelves. At which time, and even in the midſt of the aforeſaid trouble, Othoman on the one ſide, with great induſtry laid the Foundation of his Empire in Phrygia and Bithynia, now the greateſt terror of the World; and then did thoſe things which we now have of him written. The other Princes of the Turks alſo, the Succeſſors of Sultan Aladin, at the ſame time on the other ſide, alongſt the River Meander encroaching on as faſt; until that at laſt amongſt them they had thruſt the Greek Emperors quite out of Aſia, and in fine became themſelves, together with the Greek Empire, a Prey unto the Othoman Kings, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall more at large appear.

Pruſa yielded unto the Turks.

But again to return unto Othoman himſelf, who all this while (that old Andronicus the Greek Emperor was thus troubled) had with his Son Orchanes ſought by all means on every ſide to inlarge his Kingdom; the Garriſons by him left in the two late built Caſtles near unto the great City of Pruſa, under the Charge of the two valiant Captains Actemur and Balabanzuck (as is before declared) having now continued there certain years, had by ſhutting up the paſſages, and ſpoiling of the Country, brought the City into ſuch diſtreſs and penury, that many of the Citizens and other the poor Chriſtians fled into the City, there died of Famine. The reſt now out of all hope to be relieved by the Greek Emperor, not then able to relieve himſelf, came to Compoſition with Orchanes (for Othoman was then ſick of his old Diſeaſe the Gout) covenanting with him, that they might in ſafety with life and liberty depart, and ſo much of their Goods as they themſelves could carry; and ſo yielded to him the City. Which conditions (as moſt write) were on the Turks behalf well and faithfully performed; yet ſome there be that report them to have been in moſt part by Orchanes broken. Thus was Pruſa, one of the greateſt Cities of that part of Aſia, yielded unto the Turks, in the year of our Lord, 1327. and was afterwards by Orchanes made the Royal Seat of the Othoman Kings.

The death of Othoman. Othoman buried at Pruſa.

About this time, or very ſhortly after, Othoman in the eight and twentieth year of his Reign died, at the age of 69, in the year of our Lord, 1328. and lieth buried at Pruſa, where his Tomb is yet at this day to be ſeen, in a certain Chappel of an old Monaſtery in the Caſtle, ſtanding in the midſt of the City, covered with a Mantle of green Chamlet, and a little Tulipant or Turkiſh Hat (ſuch as he uſed to wear) lying over his head, differing from thoſe which the Turks now wear, eſpecially the better ſort of them, ſo great that they can therewith ſcarcely come in at a door. There is alſo another Monument of him to be ſeen at Sugutd, faſt by the Sepulchre of his Father Ertogrul, there made by his Sons in remembrance of him; whereof ſome have reported him to have been there buried. Howbeit the Turks themſelves generally ſuppoſe the true Monument wherein he is interred, to be at Pruſa, as is aforeſaid. He was wiſe, politick, valiant, and fortunate, but full of diſſimulation, and ambitious above meaſure; not raſh in his Attempts, and yet very reſolute; what he took in hand, he commonly brought to good effect; to all men he was bountiful and liberal, but eſpecially to his Men of War, and the poor, whom he would many times feed and cloth with his own hands. Of a poor Lordſhip he left a great Kingdom, having ſubdued a great part of the leſſer Aſia; and is worthily accounted the firſt Founder of the Turks great Kingdom and Empire. Of him, the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors ever ſince have been called the Othoman Kings and Emperors, as lineally of him deſcended; and the Turks themſelves Oſmanidæ, the People or Subjects of Othoman, or Oſman, for ſo he is of the Turks commonly called.

NOte, That in the reckoning up of certain of the great Chriſtian Princes and Prelates of the ſame time, at the end of every of the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors Lives, the firſt and greateſt number following their Names, ſheweth the Year of our Lord, wherein ſuch an Emperor, King, or Biſhop began to Reign, or Sit; and the number following, how long he reigned or ſate; As for example, Andronicus the elder began to Reign in the Eaſt, in the Year of Grace, 1282. and reigned 43 years; and ſo of the reſt. Wherein we ſeek not the exact Computation unto a month or day (as not much material to our Hiſtory, or any part of our purpoſe) but only the reaſonable view of the great Princes of the fore-paſſed Times, as they lived in Ages together.

ORCHANES OTOMANI FI. SECVNDVS TVRCARVM REX. ANNO 1328.

Suscipit Orchanes defuncti Sceptra Parentis:
Major ut ingenio, sic magis Arte valens.
Bithynos, Phrygiamq; domat, Prusamq; Superbam:
Et populos late (Marte favente) premit.
Sic lætus tantis Asiam turbaſse ruinis;
Transit in Europam, Callipolimque capit.
Rident interea Græci sua damna: sed ecce
Dum sua contemnunt, in sua ſata ruunt:

His Fathers glorious Race now being run,
The politick Orchanes mounts the Throne:
Bithynia, Phrygia, Prusa, farr and neare,
All by his prosperous Armes subjected were:
Proud of his Asian spoiles, his Banners spread
To Europe, ore the beauteous Nicomede;
Meanwhile the Greeks th' impending Tempest scorne,
And are by th' mighty Torrent overborne.

ORCHANES or URCHAN, Second King of the Turks.

AFTER the death of Othoman, his two Sons, Orchanes (whom the Turks call Urchan) and Aladin his Brother, having with great Solemnity enterred their Father at Pruſa, immediately ſummoned a Parliament, whereunto both the Brethren came accompanied with the chief of their Nobility. This Parliament was called eſpecially, for the eſtabliſhing of the Succeſſion in this new Kingdom, and for the diviſion of Othomans Treaſure and Goods, betwixt them two, his Sons. But upon view taken, there was no Mony, Plate, or Jewels found in the Kings Coffers, for that he had in his life time moſt bountifully beſtowed it upon his men of War; ſo that all the Wealth he left unto them his Sons, was, the honourable remembrance of his Life for them to imitate, large Dominions for their Poſſeſſions, ſtore of ready Horſes and Armor fit for ſervice; with great Herds of Beaſts and Cattel for Houſhold Proviſion. Whereupon Orchanes demanded of his Brother Aladin, what order he thought was beſt to be taken with thoſe things by their Father ſo left? To whom Aladin anſwered, That it was moſt requiſite, firſt to eſtabliſh a King in their Fathers Kingdom; which like a good Shepherd might govern and defend his Subjects, rule and maintain his men of War, providing all things meet for defence of his Kingdom; And that unto him of right belonged all theſe other things by their Father left, as the Patrimony of his Succeſſor, for the common good and maintenance of his Eſtate. As for mine own part (ſaid Aladin) I claim no intereſt therein, you being my elder Brother, and ſo unto me inſtead of a Father; by whom alſo you have been theſe two years, as it were already put in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, all things being committed to your Government, during the time of his late ſickneſs. This modeſty of Aladin was greatly commended of all the ancient Counſellors; by means whereof, the Kingdom in all peaceable manner deſcended to Orchanes. In regard of which courteſie, Orchanes would gladly have made Aladin his Brother Preſident of his Council; which Honour he would in no wiſe accept, but requeſted rather that he would give him the Lordſhip of Fodore in Tekences Country; which Orchanes frankly granted. In which Lordſhip of Fodore, Aladin moſt part lived a private and quiet life, and afterwards built two Mahometan Churches, and an Abbey at Pruſa, there yet at this day to be ſeen.

The wealth that Othoman left unto his two Sons Orchanes and Aladin.

Some Latine Hiſtoriographers otherwiſe report this beginning of Orchanes his Reign; as that Othoman ſhould have three Sons, and that Orchanes the youngeſt obtained the Kingdom by murthering of his other Brethren. A practice of late much uſed amongſt the Turkiſh Princes, but not before the time of Bajazet the firſt of that name, who firſt of the Turkiſh Monarchs embrued his hands with his Brothers Blood; whereas before, they uſed all brotherly love one to another, as the moſt probable Hiſtories collected out of the Turks own Chronicles affirm.

hen that arbarous anner of urthering heir Brethren firſt egan among the urkiſh ultans.

The Chriſtian Princes and Captains, preſently upon the death of Othoman recovered the City of Nice, with divers other Caſtles and Forts, out of the hands of the Turks; as it commonly chanceth, that Dominions lately won with great peril, are ſoon again loſt, the Conqueror dying before there be a firm Government eſtabliſhed. Amongſt other ſorts by the Chriſtians repoſſeſſed, the Caſtle of Tzuprichiſer, ſituate upon the paſſages of the River Sangarius, moſt grieved the Turks, for thereby their paſſage into that part of Bithynia was much impeached. Wherefore Orchanes deſirous to recover this Caſtle, diſguiſed himſelf with a few other of his beſt Souldiers, in the apparel of Chriſtian Merchants, and came to the Caſtle, craving leave to paſs as Merchants; the Warders of the Caſtle verily ſuppoſing them by their Attire to be Merchants, opened the Gates, and let them into the Caſtle; who preſently drew their Swords, ſlew the Warders, and ſo by force poſſeſſed the Caſtle, to the great benefit of the Turks, and the hurt of the poor Chriſtians yet left in the Country of Bithynia. For they now having opened a way over the River Sangarius, and as it were broken down the ſtrongeſt defence of that ſide of the Greek Empire, at their pleaſure forraged the Country in ſuch ſort, as that the great City of Nice (for want of Victuals to relieve ſo great a multitude as for fear of the Turks was fled out of the Country into it) was brought to great extremity and want. For the relief whereof, and for the repulſing again of the Turks, Andronicus the young Emperor, who then commanded, with ſuch an Army as he was then able to raiſe, paſſed himſelf in perſon over the Strait of Conſtantinople, into Aſia; the greateſt Strength of his Army conſiſting in two thouſand choice Horſemen; the reſt as well Horſe as Foot, being for the moſt part Artificers taken up in the City, men altogether unacquainted with Arms (who in token of their cowardiſe, and that they were more mindful of Flight than of Fight, carried over with them almoſt as many long Boats and ſuch other ſmall Veſſels, as they were men, to be ready to receive them at ſuch time as they ſhould flie) or elſe abject Raſcals, taken up here and there, men of whom no great thing was to be expected, and of all others moſt unfit for ſo great a Prince (as was the Emperor) to commit the defence of his Perſon and Honour unto. But Orchanes hearing of his coming, ſent certain of his moſt expert Captains, to forelay the ſtrait paſſages of the Country whereby the Emperor was to paſs; following alſo himſelf after with his Army, of purpoſe to encounter the Emperor. Who in three days march after his landing in Aſia, being come to Philochrene, a little Town in Bithynia, and underſtanding that Orchanes having before taken the Straits, lay not far off encamped with his Army; he there at Philochrene pitched his Tents, and ſtaied that night alſo. But the next morning, the Sun as yet ſcarcely riſen, he ſeeing divers Companies of the Turks coming downg from the Mountains faſt by, put his Army into order of Battle, and ſo ſet forward to meet them; where to begin the Fight, the Turks Archers freely beſtowed their piercing ſhot amongſt the Chriſtians, ſtill keeping themſelves aloof off, ſo to do the more harm. Which the Emperor miſtaking, and ſuppoſing that their keeping off to have proceeded of fear, encouraged therewith, commanded certain looſe Companies diſorderly to march forward, and to skirmiſh with them, which his more expert Captains not liking, would have otherwiſe perſwaded him, as to have kept his Strength together againſt the danger of the Battel. Nevertheleſs, ſuch was his youthful heat, as that he could by no means be otherwiſe intreated, but that forward needs they muſt. But all the forenoon ſpent in this light and tumultuary kind of skirmiſhing, and the Sun at the higheſt now ſhining very hot, Orchanes from the top of the Mountains perceiving the Chriſtians well wearied with the heat of the day and long skirmiſhing, came down from the Hills with a world of men following him; who with a moſt hideous cry, charged the Chriſtians on every ſide, ſome a far off with their Arrows, and ſome hand to hand with their Swords and other Weapons; whoſe aſſault the Chriſtians at the firſt moſt valiantly received and a great while right worthily defended themſelves, having wounded and ſlain a number of their Enemies. Which hard Fight was on both ſides couragiouſly maintained, until the approaching of the night, with great ſlaughter on both ſides; at which time, the Chriſtians weary of the long Fight, and oppreſſed with the multitude of their Enemies, diſorderly retiring toward their Trenches, and hardly purſued by the Turks, received there a great loſs, as well of their Horſemen, as of their Foot; but by the coming on of the night, the Battle was at length ended with uncertain Victory. Among others there hurt, the Emperor himſelf was wounded in the Foot with an Arrow. That night happened a woful miſhap, and a manifeſt token of God his Wrath; for Orchanes having to his coſt made proof of the Strength and Valour of the Chriſtians, and doubting they would the next day come on further into the Country, left three hundred Horſemen as Scouts, to attend the Enemies removing; and himſelf with his Army retired before hand to take advantage of ſuch places as the Chriſtians were to paſs by. But the Emperor in the Evening leaving his Camp, and going to Philochrene, a little Town faſt by, the better to have his Wound dreſſed; the reſt of the Army underſtanding of his departure, and ſuppoſing him to have fled for fear (as if Orchanes with a great Army would that night have ſlain them all) fled themſelves alſo out of the Camp, every Mothers Son, ſome to their long Boats and other little Veſſels they had for that purpoſe brought over the Strait; ſome haſting toward the Town Gates, were by the multitude of others runing headlong after them, overborn and trodden to death; otherſome hanging at one anothers Tail, like a Chain, got ſome part of them up to the top of the Rampiers of the Town; otherſome drawn back by them that hung upon them, falling down together by heaps, and trod upon by other, there periſhed; ſome (as is reported) died there for very fear, no man either chaſing or hurting them, ſo weak is mans Courage, when God withdraweth from him his Strength. But in the morning the Sun ariſing, the three hundred Turks left for Scouts, perceiving the Flight of the Chriſtians, entred the forſaken Camp, where they found Horſes, Armor, and empty Tents, yea the Emperors own Furniture, and his Horſes ready ſadled; of all which, two hundred of theſe Turks took the Spoil at their pleaſure, and the other hundred purſuing the diſperſed Chriſtians, like heartleſs men wandring here and there, ſlew a great number of them. The Emperor himſelf ſeeing his Army thus (as it were by the hand of God) overthrown and diſperſed, took ſhipping alſo, and ſo returned to Conſtantinople. After whoſe departure, the Turks ſeiſing upon many Sea-Towns alongſt the Coaſt of Bithynia, and there ſeating themſelves, laid heavy Tributes upon the other Country Towns and Villages; for the benefit whereof they ſpared to deſtroy them, together with the Inhabitants, which they might at their pleaſure full eaſily have done.

The Emperor wounded.

Now lay the great City of Nice in the Suds, the Enemy commanding all the Country about it, living as ſick men do by hope, and holding out only upon hope of a thouſand Horſemen which the Emperor (notwithſtanding his late diſcomfiture) had promiſed forthwith to ſend, there to lie in Garriſon for the ſuppreſſing of the Turks. Of which aid ſo promiſed Orchanes underſtanding, furniſhed eight hundred of his Horſemen after the manner of the Chriſtians; and fetching a great compaſs about, came at length into the high way that leadeth from Conſtantinople to Nice, and ſo trooped directly towards the City, as if they had come from Conſtantinople. At the ſame time he ſent three hundred of his other Horſemen in the habit of Turks, to forrage and ſpoil the Country as much as they could within the view of the City, now for want of Victuals brought into great extremity; which whilſt they were a doing, the other eight hundred Horſemen in the Attire of Chriſtians, following upon them, as if it had been by chance, charged them, and in the ſight of the Citizens put them to Flight; which done, theſe Counterfeit Horſemen returned directly again towards Nice. The Citizens, which with great pleaſure had in the mean time from the Walls ſeen the moſt part of the skirmiſh, and how they had put the Turks to Flight, ſuppoſing them to be the Conſtantinopolitan Horſemen, whom they dayly expected, with great joy opened the Gates of the City to receive them as their Friends. But they being entred the Gates, preſently ſet upon the Chriſtians, fearing no ſuch matter; and being ſeconded with the other three hundred, which in diſſembling manner had fled before, and were now ſpeedily returned, bringing alſo with them other Companies of Turks, before laid in ſecret ambuſh not far off, they won the great and famous City of Nice, which they have ever ſince until this day poſſeſſed; the Spoil whereof was given unto the Souldiers for a Prey, and the Citizens all lead away into miſerable Captivity and Thraldom. Whilſt Orchanes was thus buſied, his other Captains did with great Courage and Succeſs inlarge his Dominions on all ſides, dayly incroaching upon their weak Neighbors the Chriſtians. Cunger-Alpes one of his valiant Captains, ſubdued the Country of Mudrun, or Modrin, in Phrygia; and Bolli in Paphlagonia; appointing one Abdurachman a man of great Valour, to govern the Country. And at the ſame time another of his old Captains called Accecozza, brought Candara in Paphlagonia, and Ermeni, a Country near unto the Mountain Horminius, into the Turkiſh Subjection; placing Garriſons in all the Caſtles and Forts which he had won, of whom ſome part of thoſe Countries was after called Cozza Ilini, that is to ſay, The old mans Country. So that Orchanes his Kingdom grew dayly greater and greater, as well by the induſtry of his Chieftains, as of himſelf.

The City of Nice ſurpriſed by the Turks.

About this time it fortuned, the Captains Son of Scamandria (a Town not far from the ruines of the ancient City of Troy, and about a days journy from the renowned Caſtle of Abydus to depart out of this World; unto whoſe Funerals, being kept in the Country, whilſt his woful Father the Captain with his Friends out of Scamandria reſorted, the old crafty Turk Accecozza lying always in wait, as a Fox for his Prey, ſuddenly ſet upon thoſe heavy Chriſtians, whereof he ſlew the moſt part, and took the reſt Priſoners. Amongſt whom he alſo took the Captain of Scamandria, with his Caſtle and Country; whom he afterwards led Priſoner unto the Caſtle of Abydus, which is one of the moſt famous Caſtles ſituate upon the Sea Coaſt of Aſia, over againſt Seſtus in Europe; where the Sea of Helleſpontus by the narrow Strait falleth into the Sea of Ægeum; two Caſtles much renowned by reaſon of their nigh Situation, and yet placed in divers parts of the World; eternized alſo by the ever living Wits of Poets, for the adventurous paſſage of Leander over the fret of the Sea, to his Love Hero; which Caſtles are now called Dardanelly. Accecozza having brought the Captive Captain of Scamandria (lately a man of great account in that Country) ſo near as he could unto the Caſtle of Abydus, offered to ſet him at liberty if they would ſurrender their Caſtle, otherwiſe they ſhould ſee him cruelly ſlain before their Faces. Theſe Turkiſh threats nothing moved them of Abydus, more than to ſay, That they might if they would cut off his Head, ſeeth him and eat him, but the Caſtle they intended not to deliver. The ſame Captain was afterward by the commandment of Orchanes profered to the Emperor of Conſtantinople to be redeemed, which he refuſed; yet at the laſt he was ranſomed by the Governor of Nicomedia, and again ſet at liberty. Accecozza of long time held the Caſtle of Scamandria; yet ſo continually moleſted with the Garriſon of Abydus, and men of War ſent from Conſtantinople, that he with his Followers were glad for the moſt part to live on horſeback, to be alwaies in more readineſs againſt the attempt of their Enemies. The Captain of the Caſtle of Abydus had at that time a fair young Gentlewoman to his Daughter, who (as ſhe ſaid) chanced to dream (what ſhe had happily waking for the moſt part wiſhed) That being fallen into a deep myrie Ditch, out of which ſhe could by no means help her ſelf, a luſty young Gallant coming by, did not only help her out, but alſo in friendly made her clean, and afterwards apparelled her in rich and coſtly Attire. The danger of this dream much troubled the tender Gentlewoman, but the image of the young Gentleman was ſo well phantaſied in her brain, that waking, ſhe thought ſhe ſtill ſaw him, and ſleeping longed ſore for what ſhe ſaw not. Thus whilſt this young Gentlewoman with great devotion entertained this imaginary man, the old gray-headed Turk Accecozza came, and with a ſtrong Company beſieged her Fathers Caſtle of Abydus. During which Siege, this Gentlewoman oftentimes went up into the high Turret of the Caſtle, from whence ſhe might at pleaſure ſee the Martial Deeds on both ſides, and take full view of all the Enemies Camp. But ſee the chance, as Abdurachman with great Courage and no leſs Bravery, approached near to the Siege of the Caſtle, ſhe thought (upon the firſt ſight of him) that he was the very man whom ſhe had before dreamed of, and whoſe Idea was in her Heart ſo deeply imprinted; wherefore ſhe fully reſolved to perform what ſhe had without witneſs with her ſelf determined. And waiting another time when Abdurachman approached the Caſtle, ſhe caſt down to his Feet a Letter written in Greek, and made faſt unto a Stone; which Letter he taking up, delivered the ſame to the General Accecozza. Wherein after ſhe had diſcovered her paſſionate affection, ſhe promiſed to deliver the Caſtle into Abdurachmans Power, if the Turks would raiſe their Siege, and Abdurachman himſelf with ſome few would ſecretly return to the Caſtle in the dead time of the night, and then follow her direction. Accecozza like an old Fox, which is ſeldom taken in the trap, gave ſmall credit to thoſe loving lines, for fear of Treaſon; yet for ſo much as you are the man (ſaid he to Abdurachaam) whom ſhe upon ſpecial liking hath made choice of for the purpoſe, will you adventure your Perſon? And he armed with a manly Courage, a ſurer defence than any Armor of proof, incited alſo with hope of Honour, Riches, and Beauty, all worthy prizes for Martial minds; ſaid he would undertake the Atchievement of that Exploit, if it were his pleaſure ſo. Whereupon Accecozza, becauſe nothing ſhould be ſuſpected by his ſudden departure, gave a ſharp Aſſault to the Caſtle, as if he would have taken it by fine force, yet in the end retired, and preſently brake up his Siege, as deſpairing of the winning thereof. The Defendants of the Caſtle thinking themſelves delivered of a great danger, greatly rejoyced; and as in the like caſe it oftentimes falleth out, in their great jollity ſurcharged themſelves that night with exceſs both of Meat and Drink. But Abdurachman at the time in the Letter appointed, put himſelf upon the way with certain ſelect Souldiers, and about Midnight came to the appointed place of the Caſtle, where the young Gentlewoman was attending his coming; and he by her means was conveyed into the Caſtle, and ſo by her directed to the Porters Lodge; where he ſlew the Porter being faſt aſleep, and opening the Gates, let in his Followers; which went directly to the Captains Lodging, and there took him Priſoner, being before their coming overtaken with Wine, and faſt aſleep. Thus was the Caſtle of Abydus ſurpriſed by the Turks, from whence they had a fair proſpect out of Aſia into Europe. The Captain with his fair Daughter, and the greateſt part of the rich Spoil of the Caſtle, was delivered to Abdurachman, to be preſented to Orchanes at his Court, then lying at Neapolis. Who wonderful glad of ſo good news, gave the fair Gentlewoman, with the greateſt part of the Prey to Abdurachman. The Poſterity of this man (as they ſay) yet remains among the Turks. Amongſt others of the Warlike Captains there was alſo one Cararachman, whoſe name was ſo dreadful to them of Conſtantinople, that when their Children cried, they would terrifie them to make them hold their peace, by ſaying, Cararachman comes. Not long after, the two valiant aforenamed worthy Captains, Cunger-Alpes and Accecozza died. After whoſe death, Orchanes made his Sons, Solyman and Amurath, Lords and Governors of thoſe Countries and Provinces. And intending (by the perſwaſion of Abdurachman) to beſiege Nicomedia, he levied a great Army, wherewith he took divers ſmall Caſtles and Forts as he marched towards the City. Nicomedia was at that time governed by an honourable Lady, Kinſwoman unto Andronicus the Emperor of Conſtantinople; but ſhe ſeeing her City beſieged by the Turks, and doubting her own Forces not to be able to hold out the Siege, by a truſty Meſſenger offered to yield the City unto Orchanes, upon condition, That ſhe with ſo many Citizens as would, might in ſafety depart with their Lives, Liberty, and Goods; which being granted, ſhe with ſo many as would follow her, departed out of the City by night, taking ſhipping for Conſtantinople.

Nicomedia yilded unto Orchanes.

Orchanes having taken Nicomedia, made his Son

Solyman Governor of the ſame. The Churches of the Chriſtians he converted unto Turkiſh Meſchitas or Temples. The greateſt Church (being of wonderful Beauty) he converted into a Colledge or School, for the learned Profeſſors and Students of Mahomets Law, which is yet called in Nicomedia, Orchanes his School or Colledge. And becauſe the Country near unto Nicomedia, lying upon the Sea, was ever in danger to be ſpoiled by the Gallies of Conſtantinople, he placed in thoſe Countries divers of his moſt experienced Souldiers to defend the ſame, appointing to every of them Poſſeſſions and Penſions, according to their degrees and merit. After this Orchanes by the counſel of his Brother Aladin, commanded all his men of War to wear white Caps, thereby to be known from others, which commonly wore red. Such manner of Caps the Janizaries uſe at this day. The Turks alſo in Orchanes Reign, and long time after, uſed not to cut or ſhave their Beards, but did wear them long; ſo that if the King would diſgrace any man, he would in his diſpleaſure command his Beard to be cut or ſhaven. The manner of cutting and ſhaving their Beards which they now uſe, they learned of the Italians; of whom they have alſo borrowed many other faſhions, not only differing, but quite contrary to their ancient Manners and Cuſtoms. Orchanes about this time removed his Court to Nice, where he lay a long time after. There he built a ſumptuous Church, appointing a Preacher to preach to the People every Friday; he erected in Nice alſo two fair Abbies, in the one of which, he with his own hands ſerved the Strangers and Poor the firſt dinner. He was the firſt that builded Abbies or Monaſteries among the Turks; whoſe example moſt of his Succeſſors have imitated, and is amongſt them uſed unto this day.

Orchanes removeth his Court to Nice.

The Government of Nicomedia Orchanes committed to his eldeſt Son Solyman (as is before ſaid) a Prince of great towardlineſs; giving him in great charge to have a vigilant Eye to the Towns of Taraxa, Govinuca and Mudurne, which were nigh unto Nicomedia, yet in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians; all which Towns, with the Countries adjoyning, Solyman in ſhort time got without force, by compoſition. This Solyman was of a Princely Diſpoſition, ſo tempering Juſtice with Clemency in his Government, that many Chriſtians allured with his Vertues, became of his Religion, and gladly put themſelves under his Subjection; the politick Laws of the Country he neither abrogated nor changed, but maintained as they had been of ancient time accuſtomed, whereby he greatly won the Hearts of the People. Amurath his younger Son, Orchanes made Lord and Governor of Pruſa, after he had removed his Court to Nice. And the Caſtle of Chara-chiſar, with the Seigniory thereto belonging, he gave to his Couſin Artemure, the Son of his Uncle Jundus.

Orchanes invadeth the Country of Caraſina.

There was at this time in Orchanes Court a Noble young Gentleman called Turſon-Beg, the Son of Dharaſis King of Charaſia; by whoſe perſwaſion Orchanes in Perſon himſelf with a ſtrong Army, made an Expedition into that Country; for that his Fathers Subjects after the death of the King his Father, denied their Obedience to his elder Brother, wiſhing rather to have Turſon for their Soveraign. In whoſe behalf Orchanes taking that journy, ſurpriſed by the way many Caſtles and Towns to his own uſe. Orchanes was no ſooner entred the Country of Charaſia, but Turſons elder Brother fled to Pergamum, whither the Turks ſhortly purſued him; where Turſon deſirous to ſpeak with his Brother, unwarily approaching the City, was wounded with an Arrow ſhot from the Walls, and there ſlain. With whoſe death Orchanes was ſo greatly offended, that he threatned to deſtroy the whole Country with Fire and Sword, if they did not by a day prefixed, generally ſubmit themſelves to his mercy. The People terrified with this proclamation of ſo great a Prince already in Arms, yielded themſelves unto his Subjection. The Kings Son alſo that was fled into Pergamum, upon reaſonable conditions yielded himſelf unto Orchanes, who ſent him to Pruſa, where after he had there lived two years, he died of the Plague; after whoſe death Orchanes made his Son Solyman Prince of Caraſina. Neither is this taking in of the Country of Caraſina to be accounted a ſmall Conqueſt; one of the greateſt Houſes of the Turks the Succeſſors of the Iconian Sultan Aladin, now thereby taking end, and their Dominions (which were not ſmall, as containing almoſt Lydia, with ſome good parts of Miſia, Troas, and the leſſer Phrygia) now united unto the Othoman Kingdom. Orchanes upon his return, for the good ſucceſs of this journy, built a Church and Monaſtery at Pruſa, placing therein religious men, with all diligence ſought for out of all his Kingdom; of which Religious the Turks write many Fables, better worth the ſmiling at, than the ſerious reporting. Hitherto the Kingdom of Othoman and Orchanes his Son, was contained within the bounds of the leſſer Aſia, which the Turks call Anatolia.

The Country of Caraſina yielded unto Orchanes.

Now it reſteth to be ſhewed, upon what occaſion Orchanes or rather his Son Solyman Baſſa, as it were fatally, with a ſmall power firſt paſſed over Helleſpontus into Europe; where they and their Succeſſors have by little and little ſo enlarged their Dominions, that they have now long ago quite overthrown the Grecian Empire, with many other great Kingdoms, and are at this preſent a terror to all Chriſtian Princes bordering upon them; to the perpetual Infamy of the Greeks, who for want of courage, and buſied with civil diſcord, never ſought in time to impeach their greatneſs.

Orchanes having now ſo augmented his Kingdom, that he might from many parts thereof out of Aſia take view of the pleaſant borders of Europe, from whence he was excluded only by the narrow Sea of Helleſpontus; and continually incited with the inſatiable and reſtleſs deſire of Soveraignty, began to deviſe how he might poſſibly paſs that ſtrait Sea, and ſet foot in Europe another part of the World. Which his conceit one day he imparted to his Son Solyman; who preſently anſwered his Father, That if it would pleaſe him to give him leave, he would not doubt to paſs the Strait of Helleſpontus; and in time to plant the Mahometan Religion in thoſe Countries of Europe poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians. Which anſwer of Solyman much pleaſed his Father, who gave him leave to depart into his Country, and in that matter to proceed further, as he thought beſt, and as occaſion ſhould beſt ſerve. Solyman taking leave of his Father, took his journey into Caraſina, where riding up and down the Country, as it had been for his pleaſure only, he made his way to the place where it is thought the famous City of Troy ſometime ſtood; where yet (as the Turks and ſome others ſay) are to be ſeen the wonderful ruins of that unfortunate City by the Sea ſide. In this place Solyman ſtood ſtill a great while, as it were in a ſtudy, forecaſting (as it ſeemed) ſome great matter, without ſpeaking one word to any of his Followers. When one of his Chieftains called Ezes-Beg, to put him out of his deep thoughts, boldly ſaid unto him, My Lord and great Soveraign, what ſtrange thing is this, that you are ſo deeply drowned in theſe your melancholy thoughts? undoubtedly it is ſome great matter that you are ſtudying upon. Truth it is, (ſaid Solyman) for I was thinking how it were poſſible to paſs over this Sea of Helleſpontus into the borders of Europe, and to take view of that Country, and ſo to return undiſcovered. If this be the matter, (ſaid Ezes-Beg joyning unto him one Fazil-Beg, a man of no leſs valour than himſelf) we two will by the power of God perform unto you this Enterpriſe. Then was Solyman deſirous to know of them, about what place they would paſs over; which they well knowing the Sea coaſt, ſhewed him not far off. Wherefore Solyman giving them leave, they departed; and ſhortly after making a little Boat, or rather as ſome ſuppoſe a Raffe, paſſed over Helleſpontus by night, and arrived in Europe ſide, near unto a Caſtle of the Turks, called Zemenic or Zembenic, but of the Greeks Coiridocaſtron, that is to ſay, The Hogs Caſtle, not far from Seſtus; where going aſhore, they took Priſoner a Greek in a Vineyard near unto the Caſtle, whom they finding to be a good ſenſible Fellow, without delay put him into their Boat or Raffe, and returning back again, preſented him to Solyman. This Chriſtian Captive Solyman entertained courteouſly, giving him great Gifts, and rich Apparel, to diſcover unto him the Eſtate of his Country; and in fine, learned of him a means to take the Caſtle Zembenic, before the Chriſtians ſhould thereof be awar. For atchievement whereof, certain Boats were ſpeedily made ready by Solymans Commandment, and he with eighty choſen Souldiers eaſily paſſed over in them by night, with their Chriſtian Guide the Greek; for in that place, the Strait betwixt Aſia and Europe is not paſt an Italian mile over. This Guide brought Solyman directly to the aforeſaid Caſtle, where was a great Dunghil, ſo high, that from the top thereof Solyman with his Souldiers eaſily got into the Caſtle, which they won without any great reſiſtance; for it was then Harveſt time, and moſt part of the People were in the Vineyards, or treading out of their Corn all night, as the uſe of thoſe Countries is. Solyman thus poſſeſſed of the Caſtle of Zembenic, uſed no extremity againſt the Inhabitants thereof, ſeeking rather by courteſie to gain their good Wills, than by extremity to force them to his; yet ſuch Gentlemen as he took, with ſome others alſo of the better ſort, he ſent by ſhipping into Aſia, and by the ſame Ships returned Souldiers as faſt as he could into Europe; ſo that he had in one day two hundred Souldiers more brought over unto him; and manning ſuch ſmall Veſſels as he had left about the Caſtle, ſent Ezes-Beg alongſt the coaſt on Europe ſide, to burn ſuch ſhipping or Veſſels as he could find, leſt the Chriſtians ſhould by them hinder his paſſage upon the Strait of Helleſpontus. So in a few days Solyman had tranſported into Europe two thouſand good Souldiers of the Turks, whom he ſo governed, that they did not in any violent ſort injury to the vulgar Chriſtians, by reaſon whereof the common People began to like reaſonable well of the Turks, and to converſe with them without fear. This was the firſt coming over of the Turks into Europe, with purpoſe there to conquer and inhabit, under the fortune of the Othoman Kings. For albeit that ſome of that Nation had at ſundry times before come over, as men ſeeking after Spoil, or otherwiſe ſent for, yea ſometimes by the Greek Emperors themſelves; yet never ſtaid they long, but having done what they came for, or elſe loſt themſelves, returned back again into Aſia; until that now conducted by Solyman, and poſſeſſed of the little Caſtle of Zembenic (as is aforeſaid) they there took ſo faſt footing, as that they and their Poſterity after them, were never thence to be ſince that time removed; but ſtill more and more encroaching upon the Chriſtians, have unto their Aſian Kingdom joyned a great part of Europe alſo, to the terror of the reſt, that yet remaineth, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall (if God will) at large appear.

The Caſtle of Maditus taken by the Turks.

About two miles from Zembenic in Cherſoneſus was another Caſtle called Maito, or more truly Maditus, which Solyman alſo took; ſo that now he had gotten two Caſtles in Europe, both which he ſtrongly manned. After which time, the Turks in great numbers came out of Aſia into Europe over that narrow Strait of Helleſpontus, to dwell in Cherſoneſus; and Solyman inſtead of them, to make room for his Turks, ſent Chriſtians out of Europe to be placed amongſt the Turks in Aſia. The report of this coming over of the Turks into Cherſoneſus, and of the taking of the Caſtle of Zembenic, carried in poſt to Conſtantinople, was ſufficient to have ſtirred up any provident or careful men, preſently to have taken up Arms for the recovery of the loſt Caſtle, and the driving out again of the barbarous Enemies out of Europe, before they had gathered any greater Strength, or ſetled themſelves in thoſe places; but ſuch was the careleſs negligence and great ſecurity of the proud Greeks, that inſtead thereof, they to extenuate the greatneſs of the loſs, commonly ſaid, That there was but a Hogſty loſt; alluding unto the name of the Caſtle; and vainly (as ſaid a grave Father of their own) jeſting at that was not to be jeſted at, and laughing at that was not to be laughed at, but lamented for, as in few years it proved; their fooliſh laughter being not without good cauſe converted into moſt bitter tears.

Callipolis taken by the Turks.

Solymans Strength ſo ſtill increaſing by the dayly coming over of the Turks, he proceeded further to ſpoil the Country of Cherſoneſus, almoſt as far as Callipolis, diſtant from the Caſtle Zembenic about two and twenty miles; after which pleaſant City the proud Turk began now to long. Which the Governor thereof perceiving by the Turks continual incroaching upon him, raiſed what power he was able to make, and ſo went out againſt them; all the reſt of the Greeks in the mean time lying ſtill, as if they had been aſleep, or that the matter had not concerned them; but meeting the Turks, he was by them (after a great conflict) overthrown, and for ſafeguard of his life glad to flie into his City; after whom the Turks following, ſpoiled the Country round about, and in their return, by plain force took the City, together with the Caſtle alſo; which happened in the year of our Lord 1358. Where the madneſs of the Greeks was again more than before to be wondred at; for the news of the loſs of Callipolis being brought to Conſtantinople, the People there made ſmall account thereof, although it was indeed a right great loſs, and much concerned the State; but to extenuate the matter, when they had any talk thereof, in jeſting wiſe commonly ſaid, That the Turks had but taken from them a Pottle of Wine. But by taking of ſuch Hogſties and Pottles of Wine (as they termed it) the Turks in a few years after had gone ſo far in Thracia, that Amurath (the ſame Solymans Nephew which now took from the Greeks the City of Callipolis) even in the heart as it were of the Greek Empire, placed his Royal Seat at Hadrianople; and immediately after him, Bajazet his Son (having ſubdued all the Country even to the Walls of Conſtantinople) for certain years laid hard Siege unto the Imperial City it ſelf; and had no doubt then carried it, had not the great expedition of the mighty Tartar Prince Tamerlane (unto Bajazet fatal) in the mean time happened; whereby (God ſo appointing it) the proſperous ſucceedings of the Turks were for a ſpace well ſtaied, that they ſhould not before the time by him prefixed, devour the Reliques of the Greek Empire. And it were to be wiſhed, that the Chriſtians of our time alſo (by their example warned) would at length awake out of their dead ſleep; who of late hath loſt unto the ſame Enemy, not the Caſtle of Zembenie, or the City of Callipolis, but whole Kingdoms, as Hungary and Cyprus, and are ſtill fair in the way; I ſay no more for grief, and foreboding of evil fortune. But again to our purpoſe; Solyman having made this proſperous entrance into Europe, and there got ſtrong footing, by ſpeedy Meſſengers certified his Father what he had done, and that it was expedient for him with all ſpeed to ſend unto him a great ſupply of men of War, as well for the ſure defence and keeping of thoſe Caſtles and Forts by him already gotten, as for the further invaſion of the Country. This meſſage was wonderful welcome unto Orchanes, and whereas many Families of the Saraſins at that preſent were come into the Country of Caraſina, to poſſeſs the Dwellings and Places of them, which in hope to better their Eſtate were before gon over into Europe; all theſe Saraſins he commanded to paſs over into Europe likewiſe; which they did accordingly, ſeating themſelves for a time in the Country near to Callipolis. In the mean time Solyman omitted no opportunity to enter further into the Country, winning ſmall Forts and Holds, and ſtill peopling the ſame with his Turks. And on the other ſide, they of Caraſina paſſed over into Europe, placing themſelves as it were in a new World. For which cauſe, and for the great deſire they had to extend the Turkiſh Dominion and Religion, they refuſed no pains of War; ſo that all things at that time proſpered with the Turks, and went backward with the Chriſtians.

In the time of theſe Wars, not far from Callipolis was a little Caſtle called Congere, the Captain whereof was by a Greek name called Calo Johannes, a valiant and painful man; this Captain continually moleſted and troubled the Turks which lay on that ſide of Callipolis, under the leading of Ezes-Beg, many of whom he ſlew and took Priſoners, as he could find them at any advantage. Solyman much angred herewith, by crafty and ſecret Eſpials learned a certain time when he was gone out of his Caſtle to do ſome exploit upon the Turks. Whereupon he preſently ſo beſet the Caſtle with Souldiers, that he could by no means return thither, but he muſt firſt fall into their hands; and for more aſſurance placed others alſo in by-ways, leſt he ſhould by any ways eſcape. The Captain ignorant of all this, proſecuted his enterpriſe, and having taken a Turk Priſoner, thinking to return to his Caſtle, was haſtily purſued by Fazil-Beg; for which cauſe making the more haſte, he ſuddenly fell into the danger of the Turks laid in ambuſh; where his men were all ſlain, and himſelf taken and brought before his own Caſtle, and had there his head preſently ſtruck off; whereupon the Caſtle was forthwith by them that were therein (having now loſt their Captain) ſurrendred, and Chazi Ili-Beg, a valiant Captain of the Turks, placed therein; who from thence never ceaſed to trouble the Country, even to the Walls of Dydimotichum, as did Solyman alſo out of Callipolis.

Thus in the ſpace of one year the Turks got ſtrong footing in Europe, poſſeſſing divers Caſtles and Towns, with the Country about them, which Solyman gave in reward unto his Captains and Souldiers, as appeareth by the Graves and Tombs of Ezes-Beg and Fazil-Beg, the two which firſt came over into Europe, which are there yet well known.

The death of Solyman Baſſa Orchanes his eldeſt Son.

The death of Orchanes.

About this time it fortuned, that as this Martial Prince Solyman was for his diſport hawking in the Fields of Bolayre on Europe ſide, galloping in to his Falcon, was with his Horſe overthrown in a ditch, of which Fall he being ſore bruiſed, ſhortly after died. The news of his death being brought to Orchanes his Father, gave unto him (then being ſick) juſt occaſion of great ſorrow; ſo that within two months after he died alſo, being fourſcore years old, when he had raigned thereof 31 years; and died about the year of our Lord 1359. Some Hiſtories report otherwiſe, both of his death, and of the time wherein he lived; as that he ſhould be ſlain in a Battel againſt the Tartars; or as others write, with an Arrow at the Siege of Pruſa, in the year of our Lord 1349. But Joannes Leunclavius in his Hiſtory collected out of the Turks own Chronicles (whom we follow as moſt probable) reporteth it as before.

This Orchanes was wiſe, courteous, and bountiful, more ingenious than his Father in deviſing warlike Engins. He built divers Princely Churches, Abbies, Colledges, and Cells, and was in his ſuperſtitious Religion very zealous; in ſo much that he appointed Penſions to all ſuch as could in the Church ſay the Book of Mahomets Law by heart; and appointed competent maintenance for all Judges of his Courts, becauſe they ſhould not take any thing in reward of his Subjects, for the perverting of Juſtice. He greatly inlarged his Kingdom in Aſia, and not content to be incloſed with the Seas of Euxinum and Helleſpontus, ſet faſt footing in Europe, which ſome attribute to his Son Amurath. He was to the Chriſtians always a moſt mortal Enemy, and ſo died.

AMVRATHES TERTIVS TVRCARVM IMPERATOR SEXTVS 1574

Non ego fortis eram: quis tanto nomine dignus!
Ni fortem faciat mens generosa virum.
Me tumidum fortuna tumens evexit in altum,
Et par fortuna mens mea semper erat.
Sic quamvis tenero mihi nil nisi molle placeret:
Nominis augendi raptus amore fui.
Emisique meos ad fortia facta miniſtros:
Per quos sublatum est, nomen in aſtra meum.

Mustapha, Ferhates, Sinan et ter maximus Osman, Terrores Orbis, Succubuere mihi.
Armenios domui fortes, Medosque feroces;
Et mihi paruerat Regia Taurisij.
Sed mihi quid prodest tantorum parta labore
Gloria, Si Subito maxima quæque ruant!
Et nihil est tanti, quod non brevis auferet hora
Sic mea cum multis gloria victa jacet.

Valiant I was not, none deserve that name
But those, whose generous minds bespeake their fame.
Fortune advanc'd me high, and fickle Shee
Still found a Soule, bravely prepard in me,
Soft in my tender years tho' I became,
Yet still I priz'd the glory of my name:
I Sent abroad my Ministers of State,
To doe the Slavish drugery of my fate.

Osman, Ferhates, Sinan, Mustapha
The terrors of the World, did me obey.
I broke the Medes, and the Armenian Power
And batterd downe the proud Taurisian Towers
Yet what's all this to my ill gott renowne,
Since greateſt things are sooneſt tumbled downe.
We're robb'd of all we have, in one short houre,
And quickly we, and ours shall be no more.

AMURATH,
The Firſt of that NAME,
Third King of the Turks,
And the great AUGMENTOR of their Kingdom.

Amurath ſucceedeth his Father Orchanes in the Turkiſh Kingdom.

AMurath the younger Son of Orchanes ſucceeded his Father in the Turkiſh Kingdom, his elder Brother Solyman being dead a little before his Father. This Amurath with greater zeal than any one of the Turkiſh Kings, advanced the Mahometan Religion, and had therein wonderful Succeſs. In the beginning of his Reign, he gathered a great Army out of all parts of his Kingdom, to Pruſa; purpoſing to paſs over Helleſpontus, to invade the Chriſtians in Thracia. But underſtanding, that the other Mahometan Princes in Aſia had combined themſelves againſt him, he was thereby inforced to leave his former determination for Europe, and to turn his Forces upon them. In which Wars he mightily prevailed againſt them, and returned with Victory to Pruſa. But having ſo ſubdued thoſe Confederate Princes, he the next year after proſecuted his Wars before intended againſt the Chriſtians in Europe. For which purpoſe having levied a ſtrong Army in Aſia, he paſſed over to Callipolis, accompanied with his Tutor, whom the Turks call Lala Schabin; whoſe grave advice and counſel he moſt followed in all his weighty Affairs, being at that time one of his chief Counſellors. From Callipolis he marched to the Caſtle of Benutum, which was by compoſition yielded unto him. From thence he went to Tzurulus, where the Chriſtians gave him a ſharp encounter; but in the end he won the Town, and carried away the Victory. And ſo proceeding farther, took divers other ſmall Caſtles and Towns in that part of Thracia, which of the ancient Roman Colonies was then called Romania, and now of the Turks Rumilia, namely Meſine, Burgos, and others; whereof ſome he utterly raſed, and into the reſt put ſtrong Garriſons. At this time alſo, Chaſi-Ilbeg and Eurenoſes, two of his moſt valiant Captains, took certain Forts ſtanding upon the River Meritza, in ancient time called Hebrus; whereby they much troubled the Inhabitants of the Country thereabouts. Wherewith the Captain of Didymotichum offended, gathered his Souldiers together, intending to have intercepted the great Captain Chaſi-Ilbeg; in which Attempt he loſt moſt of his Followers, and was himſelf there taken Priſoner. For whoſe Ranſom and certain other Conditions, the Citizens of Didymotichum yielded the City unto the Turks.

Shortly after, Amurath ſent his Tutor Lala Schabin to beſiege Hadrianople, now called Adrianople, but in ancient time Oreſtias; of whoſe coming the Chriſtians hearing, encountred him upon the way, and fought with him a great battel, wherein many were on both ſides loſt; but in the end the Chriſtians being put to the worſt, retired again to the City. Of this Victory Schabin ſent News unto Amurath, with certain of the heads of the ſlain Chriſtians; who thereupon ſending Chaſis and Eurenoſes before, he himſelf with a great Army followed after to the Siege of Hadrianople; of whoſe coming, the Governor of Hadrianople underſtanding, fled ſecretly out of the City by night to Ænus. The Citizens ſeeing themſelves ſo forſaken of their Governor, yielded their City unto Amurath, in the year of our Lord, 1362.

Hadrianople yielded unto the Turks.

The taking of theſe ſtrong Cities in Thracia, eſpecially of Didymotichum and Hadrianople, is (by ſome of the Turks own Hiſtories) otherwiſe reported; which, becauſe it is neither improbable nor diſagreeing from the ſubtil dealings of the Turks, and of themſelves alſo received, I have thought good to ſet down as their own Hiſtoriographers report the ſame.

The Turkiſh King Amurath had (as they ſay, and as truth was) in the beginning of his Reign concluded a Peace with the Chriſtians of Thracia; during which Peace, the Governor of Didymotichum intending to fortifie his City with new and ſtronger Fortifications againſt the Aſſaults of the Turks, entertained all the Maſons, Carpenters, and other Workmen he could by any means get; which Amurath underſtanding, ſecretly cauſed two hundred good and luſty Workmen and Labourers to come out of Aſia, to offer their Service unto the Governor; who gladly entertained them, uſing their help in that his great and haſty Work. Which thing ſome of the wiſer ſort of the Citizens diſliking, wiſhed the Governor to beware of thoſe Aſian Workmen, as by them ſuſpected. But he preſuming upon the Peace made with Amurath, and conſidering they were but baſe Workmen and no Souldiers, had the leſs care of them; nevertheleſs (uſing their work all day) he commanded them to lodge without the Walls of the City every night. Amurath underſtanding that theſe Workmen were thus by the Governor entertained, ſent for the valiant Captain Chaſis-Ilbeg, and requeſted him with thirty other good Souldiers diſguiſed as poor Labourers, to go to Didymotichum to ſeek for Work, and in doing thereof to eſpy if any opportunity might be found for the ſurpriſing of the City. Chaſis with theſe thirty according to Amurath his direction, coming as poor men lacking Work, found entertainment at Didymotichum, where they carried ſtones, morter, and ſuch like things, ever ſhewing themſelves very diligent in their work; Chaſis with vigilant eye ſtill awaiting what might beſt ſerve his turn for the ſurpriſing of the City. When night was come, the Turkiſh Workmen and Labourers after their accuſtomed manner, and as they were by the Governor appointed, went out of the City into the Suburbs to their Lodgings; from whence Chaſis ſecretly departing in the night, came to Amurath and ſhewed him how one of the gates of the City might upon the ſudden be taken, if it would pleaſe him to place a ſufficient number of Turks in ambuſh near unto the City, to joyn with him and the other Turkiſh Labourers when occaſion ſhould ſerve. Which being reſolved upon, Amurath ſent him back again to put this his device in execution: So Chaſis returning to Didymotichum, brake the matter to ſo many of the Aſian Workmen as he thought convenient, fully inſtructing them what was to be done. The next day (according to his appointment) the Chriſtians being then at dinner, theſe Turkiſh Workmen and Labourers fell at words among themſelves, and from words to fained blows; in which counterfeit Brawl and Tumult, they ſuddenly ran to one of the Gates of the City faſt by (as was before appointed) and there laying hands upon the Warders Weapons, as if it had been to defend themſelves againſt their Fellows, ſuddenly ſet upon thoſe Warders, being in number but few, and then at dinner alſo, and ſo preſently ſlew them; which done, they opened the Gate of the City, and let in the other Turks which lay in wait not far off; who with great celerity entring the City, preſently took the ſame, and there put the chiefeſt of their Citizens to the Sword, ſparing the reſt of the meaner ſort.

Rhodeſtum ſurpriſed by the Turks.

The City of Rhodeſtum (of the old Writers called Rhœdeſtum) was by Amurath his commandment, in this time of peace, by ſudden aſſault given in the night by the Lord Eurenoſes, taken alſo.

With this foul dealing and breach of League, yet in force, the Chriſtians hardly charged Amurath; who turned it over to the unrulineſs of his Captains and Men of War, whom he threatned with great ſeverity to puniſh; and to give the better colour that it was done without his privity, he had fained himſelf ſick all the while theſe things were in doing; but being requeſted to reſtore thoſe Cities ſo wrongfully taken from the Chriſtians, he utterly refuſed ſo to do, ſaying, That it was againſt the Law of his great Prophet Mahomet, to deliver again to the Chriſtians, any Town or City wherein the Mahometan Religion had been once openly taught. Whereupon Wars began again to ariſe on freſh betwixt the Chriſtians and him, wherein ſometime the one prevailed, and ſometime the other; in ſuch ſort, as thoſe Wars at length became unto them both very tedious. Wherefore Amurath made peace again with the Chriſtians of Hadrianople, Selybria, and Conſtantinople; yet deſiring nothing more in heart, than to take the City of Hadrianople; which the better to bring to paſs, he cauſed Chaſis-Ilbeg as a diſcontented Captain to fly to Hadrianople, pretending himſelf to have been hardly uſed by the Tyrant his Maſter; where having in his Company other ſuch diſſembling Fugitives as was himſelf, he oftentimes iſſued out of the City and valiantly skirmiſhed with the Turks; which ſo greatly pleaſed the Governor of Hadrianople, that he thereby grew into his great favour.

Many other Turks alſo under pretence of like diſcontentment, reſorted unto Chaſis; wherewith finding himſelf well ſtrengthned, he writ Letters ſecretly unto Amurath, That he would deliver one of the Gates of Hadrianople unto him at a certain appointed time, if he would againſt the ſame time be ready to ſend him preſent Succors. All things being agreed upon, Chaſis at the appointed time came in the dawning of the day to one of the Gates of the City, accompanied but with ten of his Followers, as if he would have gone forth to hunt, as he had before accuſtomed. But ſo ſoon as the Gates were opened, he with the other ten well appointed for the purpoſe, furiouſly ſet upon the Warders, whom they ſlew; and being aided by the reſt of the Fugitive Turks (which with all ſpeed by appointment before made, reſorted unto them) they poſſeſſed the Gate; until a great power of the Turks, whom Amurath the night before had placed in ambuſh near unto the City, having knowledge what was done, and hearing the alarm, ſpeedily came on, and by that Gate entred the City; where was fought a cruel fight all that day, even from morning until night. But in the end the Turks prevailing, took the City, which they have ever ſince poſſeſſed unto this day.

Theſe great Cities of Thracia thus taken, or otherwiſe as aforeſaid (for that I leave for the Reader to think of as he pleaſeth) Amurath appointed the Seat of his Royal Court at Hadrianople, as a place of all others moſt fit for the further invaſion of the Chriſtians, and inlarging of his Kingdom in Europe; from whence ſuch a world of Miſchiefs and Woe hath ſince that time overflowed a great part of Chriſtendom, and drowned ſo many goodly Kingdoms in Europe, as that both they, and moſt part of the reſt that yet remain (daily in dread of like deſtruction) might juſtly accurſe and deteſt the woful careleſneſs and degenerate cowardiſe of the Greeks, were not they themſelves together with the glory of their Church and Empire, ſwallowed up in the ſame gulf of Calamity and Woe, and ſo become of all others moſt miſerable; but what avail vain Complaints, but to increaſe old griefs? wherefore again to that we have in hand.

The proud Sultan Amurath (having to his great content thus ſeated himſelf at Hadrianople, in the midſt of Thracia) preſently ſent out his Tutor Lala Schahin with a great Power to invade the Country about Philippopolis with the Country of Zagora, which lieth towards the great Mountain Hœmus, where the beſt Turkiſh Scimitars were made, giving like charge unto Eurenoſes, for the ſubduing of the Territory of Ipſala; who both notably performed what he had commanded, and in ſhort time brought all thoſe Countries under his Subjection, wherein he ſhortly after placed divers Sanzacks or Governors, for the better aſſurance thereof, being ſo lately gained.

About this time (by the ſuggeſtion of Cara Ruſtemes a Doctor of the Mahometan Law) Zinderlu Chelil, then Cadeleſher or chief Juſtice among the Turks, but afterwards better known by the name of Catradin Baſſa, by the Commandment of Amurath, took order, that every fifth Captive of the Chriſtians, being above fifteen years old, ſhould be taken up for the King, as by Law due unto him; and if the number were under five, then to pay to the King for every Head 25 Aſpers, by way of Tribute; appointing Officers for collecting both of ſuch Captives and Tribute money, of whom the aforeſaid Cara Ruſtemes himſelf was chief, as firſt deviſer of the matter. By which means great numbers of Chriſtian Youths were brought to the Court as the Kings Captives, which by the counſel of the ſame Zinderlu Chelil, were diſtributed among the Turkiſh Husbandmen in Aſia, there to learn the Turkiſh Language, Religion, and Manners; where after they had been brought up in all painful labour and travel by the ſpace of two or three years, they were called unto the Court, and choice made of the better ſort of them to attend upon the Perſon of the Prince, or to ſerve him in his Wars; where they daily practiſing all feats of activity, are called by the name of Janizars (that is to ſay, new Souldiers.) This was the firſt beginning of the Janizars under this Sultan Amurath the Firſt, but had great increaſe under Amurath the Second, inſomuch that Jovius with ſome other Hiſtoriographers, attribute the beginning of this Order to him; which nevertheleſs (as appeareth by the Turks own Hiſtories) had the beginning as is aforeſaid; and hath ever ſince been continued by the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors, by the ſame and ſome other greater means, ſo that in proceſs or time they be grown to that greatneſs as that they are oftentimes right dreadful to the great Turk himſelf; after whoſe death they have ſometimes preferred to the Empire ſuch of the Emperors Sons as they beſt liked, without reſpect of prerogative or age, contrary to the will of the great Sultan himſelf; and are at this day the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh Empire, and not unlike in time to be the greateſt cauſe of the ruine thereof; the finger of the Higheſt oftentimes (as we have before ſaid) turning even thoſe helps which were by mans wiſdom provided for the eſtabliſhing of Kingdoms, unto their more ſpeedy deſtruction; and eſpecially theſe continual Garriſons of martial men, no leſs to be feared than truſted, as in the courſe of this Hiſtory may appear.

When Amurath had thus a great while continued at Hadrianople, determining now to return unto Aſia, he made Schahin his Tutor Beg-Lerbeg or Vice-Roy of Romania; and Eurenoſes Lord Governor of the Marches; Zinderlu Chelil he made Vezir Azemes or Lord Preſident of his Counſel, and changing his name, called him Cairadin Baſſa, that is to ſay, The Baſſa that had well deſerved, his name witneſſing his good deſert. After this he returned into Aſia, where he ſpent that Winter at Pruſa. Theſe two great men Cairadin Baſſa and Cara Ruſtemes before named, ſometimes two Doctors of the Mahometan Law, were (as the Turkiſh Hiſtories report) the firſt that corrupted the Turkiſh Court with Covetouſneſs and Bribery, and are therefore of them even yet much blamed.

Whilſt Amurath thus wintred in Aſia, News was brought unto him, That the Chriſtians of Servia and Bulgaria had gathered a great Army for the beſieging of Hadrianople; which cauſed him to prepare great Forces in Aſia, to aid his Captains in Europe. But in returning out of Aſia, he by the way took the Town of Boga; where he put to the Sword all the Chriſtians that were therein able to bear Arms, leading the reſt into Captivity, and with the ſpoil rewarded his Souldiers. This ſtrong Town was not long after again recovered by the Chriſtians, who requited the Turks with like meaſure, and doubting the keeping thereof, raſed it down to the ground; yet was it afterwards reedified by the Turks, as it is at this preſent to be ſeen; which was done in the year of our Lord, 1365.

Boga new built by the Turks.

In the mean time, the Chriſtian Army of Servia and Bulgaria, in number betwixt forty and fifty thouſand, marching towards Hadrianople, and now come very near the ſame, fell in mutiny among themſelves. Whereof the Turks by their Eſpials having intelligence, ſuddenly in the night ſet upon them; who blinded with inward hatred, and no leſs fearing one another, than their Enemies, neglected to joyn their Forces againſt them, but were ready to turn their Weapons one upon another; and ſo by their own diſcord, more than by the Enemies force, were made a prey to the Turks, by whom they were put to flight, and ſlain with ſo great a ſlaughter, that the place wherein they fell, not far from Germia, is thereof at this day called Zirf-Zindugi; that is to ſay, the place wherein the Servians were overthrown. The news of this ſo notable a Victory, with the fith part of the Spoil, and a great number of the heads of the ſlain Chriſtians, were (after the barbarous manner of the Turks) ſent to Amurath into Aſia, being now ready with a great Power to have come over to Callipolis; who joyful thereof, and glad to ſee ſuch a Preſent, the aſſured witneſs of the Victory, returned again to Pruſa. This was done in the year, 1366. In which year alſo Amurath with wonderful Triumph circumciſed his two Sons, Bajazet and Jacup. At which time he alſo built a Temple, with a Monaſtry and a Colledge, at Bilezuga; and another fair Church at Neapolis: At Pruſa he alſo built a ſtately Palace in the Caſtle, with a great Church at the Gates thereof; in which City he alſo founded an Abbey and a Colledge. Germean Ogli, a great Mahometan Prince in Aſia (whoſe Territory for the moſt part lay in the greater Phrygia, and the Countries thereabout, bordering upon the Othoman Kingdom) having always envyed at the riſing of the Othoman Kings (as did all the reſt of the Mahometan Princes of the Selzuccian Family) and fearing that their Greatneſs might after his death grow dangerous to his ſon Jacup, being now himſelf very aged, thought good for the more ſafety of his State to joyn in Alliance with Amurath. And for that purpoſe ſent Iſaac (a learned Doctor of the Mahometan Law) Embaſſador to him, with many rich Preſents, and to offer his Daughter, the Lady Hatun, in marriage unto his Son Bajazet; promiſing with her in Dowry divers great Cities and Towns, with their Territories in Phrygia and Bithynia, adjoyning upon the Othoman Kingdom; namely Cutaie, Simau, Egregios, Tauſanle, and others. Neither was this a ſmall Dowry, but well beſeeming ſo great a Prince; the City of Cutaie being at this day the place whereat the Turkiſh Emperors great Lieutenant or Vice-Roy in Aſia is always reſiant, as in the heart of his Kingdom in the leſſer Aſia. Of which Match ſo offered, Amurath liking well, contracted his Son Bajazet unto the ſaid Lady; and for Solemnization of the Marriage, prepared all things with great Magnificence, ſending his Embaſſadors to moſt of the Mahometan Kings and Princes both far and near, to invite thereunto; commanding alſo moſt of the Nobility of his Kingdom, to honour the ſame with their preſence. The time of this Marriage drawing near, Embaſſadors came to Amuraths Court, from all the Princes before invited; amongſt whom, the Embaſſador from the Egyptian Sultan had the higheſt place. Theſe Embaſſadors brought with them many great and rich Gifts, ſuch as well beſeemed the great Princes their Maſters, which they with all Reverence preſented unto Amurath. At length amongſt the reſt of his own Nobility came the Lord Eurenoſes, whom he had before left Governor of the Frontiers of his Kingdom in Europe; who beſides many other rich Gifts not eaſily to be valued, preſented unto Amurath an hundred goodly Boys, with as many beautiful young Maidens, all Chriſtian Captives, ſutably attired in Garments richly embroidred with Gold and Silver, every one of them carrying a Cup of Gold in the one hand, and a Cup of Silver in the other; the Cups of Gold having in them divers precious Stones of great value, and the Cups of Silver being filled with Gold. The richneſs of this Preſent was ſo great, that all the Embaſſadors of the foreign Princes much wondred thereat. All which rich Gift Amurath moſt bountifully beſtowed upon the ſtrange Embaſſadors; and the Preſents which were ſent unto him from other Princes, he liberally gave to Eurenoſes. The Learned and Religious which came to that Marriage he ſo bountifully rewarded alſo, that none came to the ſame poor, but he went away rich. He had before ſent divers of his Nobility, with an hundred Ladies and Gentlemen, and a Guard of three thouſand Horſemen, to attend the coming of the Bride. On the other ſide, the old Prince Germean-Ogli meeting this honourable Company upon the way, ſaluted every man of Account according to his Degree; and bringing them to one of his Cities, in moſt Royal manner feaſted them, beſtowing upon them many rich and princely Gifts; all which things with great Solemnity performed, he delivered his Daughter the Bride to two of the moſt ancient Ladies, whereof the one had been Bajazets Nurſe; and ſo taking leave of his Daughter, ſent her away, accompanied with his Wife Jenſes, and other of his Courtiers, who conveying her to Pruſa, ſhe was there in moſt Royal manner married to Bajazet. The Cities and Towns promiſed in Dowry, were accordingly delivered into the Poſſeſſion of Amurath, who ſhortly after took Poſſeſſion of the ſame, and furniſhed them with his own Garriſons.

Appolonia won by the Turks.

At this Marriage Chuſen-Beg Prince of Amiſum in Galatia, by his Embaſſador ſold his Territory of Amiſum unto Amurath, with many fair Cities and Towns; doubting, as it was thought, how to be able to keep them, now that Amurath was come ſo near him, whom he ſaw not to let ſlip any occaſion offered unto him for the inlarging of his Kingdom. When Amurath had in this ſort ſpent great time in Aſia, he gathered a ſtrong Army to return into Europe; but before his departure, he committed the Government of his Kingdom in Aſia (which the Turks call Anatolia) unto his Son Bajazet, joyning with him Temurtaſes a valiant man of great experience; and having ſet all things in order in Aſia, paſſed over Helleſpontus, to Calipolis, from whence he marched towards Hadrianople; and becauſe he would take ſomething in his way, he beſieged Magalgara, which he in ſhort time won; where Lala Schahin and Eurenoſes with all their Forces came to him; which two Captains he ſent to beſiege the City Pheræ, which was by them after a few days ſiege taken. But he himſelf to be revenged upon Lazarus the Deſpot, led his Army into Servia; where after he had without reſiſtance forraged the Country fourteen days, underſtanding by his Captains, That the ſtrong City of Niſſa, being the Metropolitical City of Servia, was as it were the Key of that Kingdom, he preſently marched thither, and laid ſiege to the ſame; and by the advice of Jaxis-Beg the Son of Temurtaſes, in ſhort time won it. Which thing ſo daunted Lazarus Deſpot or Lord of Servia, that he deſpairing in his own Forces, having ſo ſoon loſt one of his ſtrongeſt Cities, forthwith ſent Embaſſadors to Amurath to intreat a Peace; offering to pay him a yearly Tribute of fifty thouſand pounds, and to aid him with a thouſand men in his Wars, whenſoever he ſhould require; upon which conditions Amurath granted him Peace, and ſo departed out of Servia. In this Expedition he alſo with much ado won the great City of Appolonia, near unto the Mount Athos, and gave leave unto moſt of the Chriſtians, with their Wives and Children to depart, and ſuch part of their goods as was not in the taking thereof ſpoiled by the Souldiers. This done, he returned back to Hadrianople, leaving Eurenoſes upon the Marches, who ſhortly after took Berrhea, with divers other Towns. At which time alſo Lala Schahin won Zichne and Seres, in the Confines of Macedonia, with many other ſtrong Towns upon the Frontiers of Theſſalia and Thrace. In the City Seres Eurenoſes made his abode, as in a chief Frontier Town; and becauſe the Chriſtians for fear of the Turks were all fled out of the Country about Seres, great numbers of people were ſent for out of Aſia, to inhabit that Country by the Chriſtians forſaken in the Confines of Macedonia. Amurath had not long continued at Hadrianople, but that he was advertiſed out of Aſia, That Aladin his Son in law King of Caramania, did with Fire and Sword invade his Dominions in Aſia; with which News he was exceedingly troubled. And for that cauſe ſending for his Counſellors and Nobility to the Court, told them, how that Aladin forgetting all the bonds of Religion, Faith, Peace, and Alliance, with all Hoſtility invaded his Provinces in Aſia, whilſt he with great danger of his Perſon, and greater terror of his Enemies, ſought with honour to increaſe the Mahometan ſincere Religion (as he termed it) in Europe; from which godly War (ſaid he) I am againſt my will enforced to turn my Sword, in juſt defence of my ſelf, againſt men joyned with us both in Religion and Alliance. And having thus declared his mind, he appointed Chairadin Baſſa his Lieutenant-General in Europe, and alſo made his Son Alis Baſſa one of his Council, although he were by ſome thought too young for ſo great a place. And ſo having ſet all things in order according to his mind in Europe, took paſſage from Callipolis into Aſia, and ſo to his Court at Pruſa, where he ſpent that Winter. In which time Embaſſadors came unto him from the Sultan of Egypt, for the renewing of their former Amity and Friendſhip; which Amurath took very thankfully, and ſent them back again loaden with kind Letters and princely Rewards.

Amurath and Aladin prepare themſelves for war.

When the Spring was come, in the year, 1387. he levied a mighty Army to make War upon the Caramanian King his Son in Law. Whereof Aladin certainly informed, prepared no leſs Power to meet him, aſſociating unto him all the leſs Mahometan Princes of Aſia, which were not under Amuraths Obeyſance, to whom the Othoman Kings were now grown terrible; which Princes brought with them great Supplies to joyn with Aladin.

Aladin thus aided by his Friends, thinking himſelf now ſtrong enough for Amurath his Father in law, ſent an Embaſſador unto him, certifying him, That he was nothing in Power inferior to him, and therefore nothing feared him; yet if it pleaſed him to have Peace, that he could for his part be content to hearken unto the ſame upon reaſonable conditions; but if he had rather have War, he ſhould find him ready to dare him battel in the Field, whenſoever he ſhould come. For anſwer of which Embaſſage, Amurath willed the Embaſſador to tell the perjured King his Maſter, That he had of late, contrary to his Faith before given, in moſt cruel manner invaded his Dominions, whilſt he was buſied in moſt godly Wars (as he termed it) againſt the misbelieving Chriſtians; from proſecuting whereof, he was by his violence (as he ſaid) withdrawn, contrary to the Law of their great Prophet; for which Outrages and Wrongs he would ſhortly come and take of him ſharp Revenge; and that therefore he was to expect nothing at his hands but War, for which he willed him ſo to provide, as that at his coming he might not find him wanting to himſelf. Aladin by his Embaſſor having received this anſwer from Amurath, aſſembled all the Confederate Princes his Allies, with great Perſwaſions and greater Promiſes encouraging them to this War; and they again kiſſing the ground at his Feet, as the manner of that Nation is before great Princes, promiſed with ſolemn Oaths never to forſake him, but to do all things which Princes deſirous of Honour or Fame, ought by their Oath to do for their Soveraign, to whom they ought Homage and Duty.

The death of Chairadin Baſſa.

In this great preparation for Wars in Aſia, Chairadin Baſſa general Governor in Europe died; which Amurath underſtanding, appointed Alis Baſſa his Son to go into Europe, there to be Governor in his Fathers ſtead. But he was ſtayed in his Journey by urgent occaſions; which Amurath underſtanding, ſent for him back again in poſt.

Aladin forecaſting the great dangers like to enſue of this War, ſent another Embaſſador to Amurath, with reaſonable conditions of Peace; to whom Amurath anſwered, That if Aladin had made that Offer one month before, he would perhaps have accepted thereof; but for ſo much as he had done him great wrong, and that he had now to his infinite Charge drawn him into the field ſo far from home, he would not make any other end than ſuch as the chance of War ſhould appoint. And whereas he in diſgrace had called me a Herdſman or Shepherd (ſaid he) if he be not ſuch an one himſelf, as he ſaith me to be, let him meet me in the field and there try his valor. Hereunto the Embaſſador replied, ſaying, That the King his Maſter made this Offer of Peace not for any fear, but to ſave the effuſion of innocent blood; which conſideration ſet apart, he ſhould find him not inferior to himſelf, either in number of moſt expert Souldiers, or other War-like Proviſion; and that therefore if he rejected this Offer of Peace, he needed not to doubt but to meet with men of courage, which would bear themſelves ſo valiantly in the field againſt his Turks, as that he ſhould have no great cauſe to rejoyce of his coming thither. Which words of the Embaſſador ſo netled Amurath, that in great rage he commanded him to depart, and to will his Maſter, if he were a man of ſuch courage and valour as he ſaid, to ſhew himſelf in the field with all his Forces, there to make an end of all quarrels; where he doubted not but in ſhort time to chaſtiſe him according to his due deſerts. So after the Embaſſador was departed, marching forward three days, Alis Beg came unto him; of whoſe coming he not a little rejoyced; for why, he loved him dearly, and although he was yet of years but young, relied much upon his Council.

The Embaſſador returning, recounted unto Aladin all that Amurath had ſaid, not omitting his hard Speeches and proud Threats, and how that he hoped ſhortly to take from him Iconium and Larenda (the principal Cities of Caramania) with many things more, leaving nothing untold. Which Aladin hearing, ſaid unto the Confederate Princes that were with him, Verily Amurath threatneth to take from us the Cities of Iconium and Larenda; but let him take heed that we take not from him his fair City of Pruſa. Then demanding of the Embaſſador, of what ſtrength Amurath might be; it was anſwered by him, that he deemed him to be about ſeventy thouſand ſtrong. Whereat Aladin not a little rejoycing, ſaid, Aſſuredly when he ſhall ſee our Army, he will not dare to give us battel; or if he do, he ſhall fight upon great diſadvantage, his men being both fewer in number than we, and ſore wearied with long and painful travel.

In the mean time Amurath held on his way towards Caramania, daily encouraging his Souldiers with Perſwaſions and Gifts bountifully beſtowed upon them, filling their heads with promiſes of greater, the War once happily ended. At length he came to the great Plains in Caramania, called the French Plains, becauſe in former time the Chriſtians (whom the Turks for moſt part call Franks) in thoſe places incamped their great Armies, as they went to the winning of Jeruſalem (as in the former part of this Hiſtory is declared.) Into theſe Plains alſo came Aladin with his Army, and was now incamped within one days march of Amurath, and ſo reſted that night.

The next morning Amurath put his Army in order of battel, appointing the leading of the right Wing to his youngeſt Son Jacup, with whom he joyned Cutluzes Beg, Ein Beg Subbaſſa, Egridum Subbaſſa, Seraze, and Cuſtendil, two Chriſtian Princes, all Captains of great experience. The left Wing was led by Bajazet his eldeſt Son, with Ferize and Hozze, both valiant Captains; in which Wings were alſo placed the Chriſtian Souldiers ſent by Lazarus out of Servia, according to the late convention of peace; in the main battel he ſtood himſelf; the Vauntguard was conducted by Temurtaſes; and the rereward by the Subbaſſa of Oxyllithus (called alſo Temurtaſes) and Achmetes. Aladin on the other ſide, with no leſs care and diligence ſet his men likewiſe in order of battel, placing himſelf in the main battel, as did Amurath; and the Princes his Allies, with his other expert Captains, ſome in the right Wing, and ſome in the left, as he thought moſt convenient; in ſuch ſort, as that in all mens judgment he was in Force nothing inferior to his Father in Law.

Aladin flieth to Iconium. Iconium beſieged by Amurath.

Theſe great Enemies thus ranged, with Enſigns diſplaid came on couragiouſly, one directly upon the other; where approaching together, the confuſed noiſe of Trumpets, Drums, Fifes, with other Inſtruments of War, the neighing of Horſes, and clattering of Armor, was ſo great, that whilſt War-like minds thereat rejoyced, Cowards thought Heaven fell. But the ſign of battel on both ſides given, Samagazes one of the Confederate Princes, with exceeding courage firſt charged Temurtaſes in the Vantguard, and broke his Ranks; at which time Teberruſes a Tartar Prince, and Varſacides another of the Confederates, delivered their Arrows alſo upon the Vantguard, as if it had been a ſhower of Hail. Which Bajazet ſeeing, and how hardly Temurtaſes was charged, having before obtained leave of his Father, brake in upon the Enemy with ſuch violence, as if it had been the lightning; whereof he was ever after ſirnamed Gilderun, which is to ſay, The lightning. Ferizes and Hozze, with the other valiant Captains in that Wing, following Bajazet, with invincible courage entred the battel; where for a great ſpace was made a moſt dreadful and doubtful fight. A man would have thought two rough Seas had met together, ſwaying one againſt the other, doubtful which way the current would at length fall. In this conflict many thouſands were on both ſides ſlain, ſo that the field lay covered with the dead bodies of worthy Men and valiant Souldiers; yet at length theſe Confederate Princes, finding themſelves overmatched by Bajazet and his Souldiers, reſerving themſelves to their better Fortunes, turned their backs and fled; when Aladin ſeeing a great part of his Army thus overthrown, and himſelf now ready to be charged with Amurath his whole Power, deſpairing of Victory, ſped himſelf in all haſt to Iconium, his ſtrong City. The ſpoil which Amurath got in this battel was great, moſt part whereof he gave in reward to Temurtaſes and his Souldiers, which had indured the greateſt fury of the battel. Amurath after this Victory with all ſpeed marched to Iconium, and there beſieged Aladin the Caramanian King, in his ſtrongeſt City, giving out Proclamation in the mean time, That none of his Souldiers upon pain of death ſhould uſe any violence to any of the Country-people, or take any thing from them; to the intent it might appear unto the World, that he made that War againſt that Mahometan King, rather to propulſe Injury and Wrong, than for deſire of Soveraignty or Spoil. Which his ſo ſtrait a Proclamation, the Chriſtians ſent by Lazarus, amongſt others, tranſgreſſed; and therefore by his commandment ſuffered (many of them) exemplary puniſhment; which was the cauſe of the Servian War which not long after enſued, fatal both unto Amurath and Lazarus the Deſpot, as hereafter ſhall appear.

Aladin now on every ſide beſieged in Iconium, and without all hope of eſcape, ſent to the Queen his Wife, Amuraths Daughter, bewailing unto her his deſperate eſtate, and requeſting her by all the love that ſo honourable a minded Lady might bear unto her miſerable Husband, to adventure her ſelf to go to her angry Father, and to crave pardon for his great Treſpaſs and Offence. The Queen forthwith attiring her ſelf, as was fitteſt for her Husbands preſent eſtate, came to her Father; where falling down at his Feet upon her knees, with words wiſely placed, and tears diſtilling down her fair Cheeks from her fairer Eyes, as if it had been from two Fountains, in moſt ſorrowful manner, craved her Husbands Pardon, imputing to the heat of Youth whatſoever he had done; and would not be comforted or taken up, until ſhe had obtained Grace. Amurath moſt entirely loved this his Daughter, and therefore for her ſake not only granted unto her, her Husbands life (which in ſhort time was like to have been in his power to have ſpilt) but alſo his Kingdom, which he as a Victorious Conqueror might by Law of Arms have of right detained. She now aſſured of her Fathers promiſe, ſent unto her Husband Aladin, wiſhing him the next day without fear to come out of the City, and in humble ſort to acknowledge his fault before her Father. Who the next morning accordingly came out, and proſtrating himſelf before Amurath, acknowledged his undutifulneſs; of whom (for his Wives ſake) he obtained Pardon, and Reſtitution to his Kingdom, with many other great Gifts, contrary to his evil deſert. The Latine Hiſtories miſtaking the man, report this Caramanian War, to have been fought againſt the King of Caramania, Amurath his own Grandfather by the Mother ſide; and that he was by Amurath then ſpoiled of a great part of his Kingdom; but it agreeth not with the Turkiſh Hiſtories, which make Amurath to be the Son of Orchanes and Lulufer, the Daughter of the Governor of the Caſtle of Jarchiſer, as is before declared in the life of Othoman; which Lulufer lieth buried by her Husband Orchanes in Pruſa.

This great Victory gotten by Amurath againſt the Caramanian King, and the other Confederate Princes, was the true beginning of the greatneſs of the Othoman Kingdom in Aſia; wherewith the other Mahometan Princes of the Selzuccian Family were ſo diſcouraged, that they were glad to ſubmit themſelves thus firſt unto Amurath, and after that unto his Son Bajazet; until that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince, ſome few years after, taking Bajazet Priſoner in a great battel at Mount Stella, abated the Othoman Pride, and reſtored the other oppreſſed Mahometan Princes to their old Poſſeſſions and Kingdoms.

Amurath returning homewards, by the way took the City of Deſpotopolis, and coming to Cutaie, brake up his Army, and ſo in triumph returned to his Court at Pruſa.

Lazarus, Deſpot of Servia (in old time called Myſia) had ſent a thouſand armed men to Amurath in this the late Caramanian War, according to the convention of the Peace not long before made betwixt them; ſome of which Souldiers, were with great ſeverity (to the terror of others) executed in Caramania, for tranſgreſſing Amurath his commandment. This great War being ended, and the Army broken up at Cutaie, they with others were licenſed to depart into their own Country. Whoſe General (whom they call the Vayvod) returning home, reported unto Lazarus the Deſpot, the ſucceſs of that War, and withall in what cruel and tyrannical manner the men he had ſent were in that Service uſed by the commandment of Amurath. With whom (ſaid this General) you without cauſe have made a moſt diſhonourable Peace; firſt, by giving your Faith to ſuch a Miſcreant, and then in ſending your loyal Subjects, in recompence of their good Service, to be ſo butchered at his pleaſure; beſide the ſhameful Tribute which you yearly pay unto him. Whereas if it would pleaſe you in the depth of your wiſdom but to know your own ſtrength, you ſhould find your ſelf in War-like force and power nothing inferior to the Tyrant; for we your Servants being in number but a handful, were in theſe his late Wars a terror unto his Enemies, and by our valour, and not his own, he got the Victory over them. What cauſe is there then, that you ſhould ſubject your ſelf unto your Inferior? I know he cannot of himſelf bring into the field above fifty thouſand fighting men; but admit he were able to bring a hundred thouſand, are not you (if you ſo pleaſe) able to levy a far greater Power? and for all other War-like proviſion you are ten-fold better provided than he. Beſides that, the mighty Chriſtian Princes will ſend you ſuch Aid againſt this hateful and common Enemy, that being united with yours, his Barbarian Forces will be nothing in compariſon of thoſe which you ſhall then be able to bring into the field againſt him; which no doubt the Chriſtian Princes will the rather do, as men deſirous to quench this devouring fire in another mans houſe, rather than in their own.

Lazarus the Deſpot by his Embaſſador craveth aid of the King of Boſna.

Theſe words of the Vayvod ſo much moved Lazarus, that he determined in himſelf to break that ſervile League which he before had made with Amurath. And for that cauſe ſent his Embaſſador with ſecret Inſtructions to the King of Boſna (in time paſt called Illyria) his Neighbour; whereof the chief point was, to crave his Aid againſt the Turk their common Enemy. By whom the King of Boſna returned this anſwer, That it had been much better ſuch conſideration had been thought upon before the foul contract (full of diſgrace both to himſelf and all other Chriſtian Princes) was upon a vain fear by him raſhly made with the Turkiſh Tyrant; yet for ſo much as things done could not be undone, letting that paſs which was remedileſs; he promiſed to joyn with him his whole Forces againſt ſo dangerous an Enemy. And thereupon appointing a place for an Interview, met accordingly, and there fully concluded all the Articles of their Confederation.

There was in the Confines of Boſna a Caſtle called Alexandria, the Captain whereof being a Chriſtian, was yet Tributary unto the Turk; wiſhing unto him ſuch good, as men oppreſſed uſe to do to them by whom they are ſo wronged. This Captain under the colour of Friendſhip went to Amurath, and in great ſecrecy opened to him the whole State of the Kingdom of Boſna; and withall, that the King thereof intended ſome great matter againſt him; for the preventing whereof he offered his own Service, and ſhewed ſome probable means how that Kingdom might be brought into his Subjection, if he would but ſend ſome worthy General with a convenient Power for the undertaking thereof. This wonderfully pleaſed the ambitious old Tyrant, who therefore commanded a rich Garment to be caſt upon the Captain (which amongſt the Turks is taken for a ſure token of the Kings great Favour) and forthwith appointed his Tutor Lala Schabin, according to this Captains direction, to invade the Kingdom of Boſna. Who joyning himſelf with this deceitful Captain of Alexandria, with an Army of twenty thouſand men entred into Boſna; where overrunning a ſide of the Country, he without reſiſtance took great Booties; and ſeeing no apparent cauſe of fear, to do the more harm, by the advice of the ſame Captain divided his Army, which he ſent into divers parts of the Country, the more to burn and ſpoil the ſame. Of all whoſe proceedings the King of Boſna by ſecret Meſſengers from the Captain advertiſed, had in convenient places laid ſtrong Ambuſhes for the intercepting of his Enemies. So that as Schabin was returning homeward with a rich booty, having then with him but a thouſand men, ſuddenly appeared in his way thirty thouſand Chriſtians well armed; which Schabin ſeeing, thinking it folly to oppoſe ſo few againſt ſo many, would have preſently fled; but the reſt of the Gallants that were with him, preſuming of their good Fortune, and loth to loſe their rich Prey, would needs firſt Skirmiſh with the Chriſtians; in which deſperate Conflict they were almoſt all ſlain, and the ſpoil they had taken, all recovered by the Chriſtians. As for Schabin, he was glad by ſhameful flight to ſave himſelf. The like miſhap befel the other Turks in the other parts of Boſna, who for the moſt part were likewiſe intercepted and ſlain; ſo that of twenty thouſand, ſcarce five thouſand returned home.

Amurath marrieth the Emperor of Conſtantinoples daughter.

Whilſt theſe things were doing in Europe, Amurath in great Triumph at Neapolis married the Emperor of Conſtantinople his Daughter; whoſe two Siſters were alſo given in marriage to his two Sons; at which time he with great Solemnity circumciſed three of Bajazets Sons. At this time alſo returned Jazigi Ogli, whom he had before ſent Embaſſador to the Sultan of Egypt in requital of the honourable Embaſſage before to him ſent from the ſaid Sultan. Now Amurath underſtanding of the loſs of his men in Boſna, with the revolt of Lazarus Deſpot of Servia, was therewith much diſquieted. Wherefore he commanded Alis Baſſa his chief Counſellor, with all ſpeed to ſend forth Commiſſions into all parts of his Kingdom, for the levying of a Royal Army; which was done in ſuch poſt haſt, that it was thought he would have taken the Field before the beginning of the Spring. At which time alſo the other Mahometan Kings and Princes of Aſia, Caraman Ogli, Teke Ogli and the reſt, bound unto him by Homage, with divers others of ſmaller Power, were ſent for, to Aid him in his War; who partly for fear, and partly moved with the zeal of their Mahometan Superſtition, brought their Forces with great devotion. Unto this War againſt the Chriſtians, came alſo great numbers of the Mahometans from far Countries, as voluntary Souldiers. Bajazet his Son alſo, then Governor of Cutaie, with a great part of Galatia, gathering all his Forces, came to aid his Father in this religious War (as it was by them termed.) The Chriſtian Tributary Princes were not then forgotten; of whom two came, namely Cuſtendil and Seratzil; other two forſaking Amurath, came not, which was Saſmenos Prince of Bulgaria, and the Prince of Karna and Dobritza; with whom Amurath was highly offended. In the time of this ſo great Preparation, old Lala Schabin, Amuraths Tutor and faithful Servitor, died, being a man of great years; and Temurtaſes was appointed Governor in his place.

The revolting of the two Chriſtian Princes, Saſmenos and the Prince of Varna, much grieved Amurath; Wherefore he commanded Alis Baſſa, with an Army of thirty thouſand to invade and ſpoil Saſmenos his Country, now called Bulgaria, and in ancient time the lower Myſia. Alis Baſſa according to that was given him in charge, calling unto him Jaxis Beg the Son of Temurtaſes, Ulu Beg, Suratze Baſſa, with other Captains and Commanders of the Turks Provinces in Europe, aſſembled an Army of thirty thouſand for the Invaſion of Bulgaria. With this Army the Baſſa took many ſtrong Towns and Caſtles in Bulgaria, as Piravade, Venuzina, Madra, Suni, and others.

In the mean time, whilſt Alis Baſſa had thus begun the War againſt the Chriſtians in Bulgaria, Amurath having gathered a great Army in Aſia, determined in the beginning of the Spring to paſs over with the ſame into Europe; commending the Government of his Countries in Aſia, to Temurtaſes Baſſa, Ferices Beg, Temurtaſes Subbaſſa, Cutlu Beg, and Haza Beg; and ſo all things ſet in order in Aſia, he drew down his Aſian Forces toward Helleſpontus, where he was a while ſtayed with contrary Winds, but was afterwards tranſported to Callipolis, by Jenitze Beg Sanzack there. This was the third time that Amurath brought his Army out of Aſia into Europe. But whilſt he ſtayed at Callipolis, Bajazet his Son with a great Power came unto him thither: Alis Baſſa alſo underſtanding of Amuraths arrival in Europe, retired out of Bulgaria, and came to him at Alcide, recounting unto him the whole Succeſs of his Expedition into Bulgaria.

Saſmenos Prince of Bulgaria, ſeeing his Country ſpoiled, his ſtrong Cities and Caſtles taken by the Turks, and withall hearing of their great Preparations for War; by the advice of his Nobility thought it beſt betimes again to ſubmit himſelf unto Amurath; wherefore tying a Winding-ſheet about his Neck, in token that he had deſerved death (after the manner of the Barbarians) he came to Amurath at Calcide, where falling flat upon the ground, at the Horſes feet whereon Amurath ſate, he in moſt humble wiſe craved pardon; offering by a certain day to deliver Siliſtria the chief City of his Dominion, into Amuraths Poſſeſſion, as a pledge of his Fidelity; who thereupon granted him pardon, and to aſſure him of his Favour, commanded a rich Garment to be caſt upon him, after the manner of the Turks, ſending Alis Baſſa at the time appointed, to take poſſeſſion of Siliſtria. But Saſmenos repenting himſelf of that he had ſo largely promiſed, would not deliver his City, but in ſtrongeſt manner he could preſently fortified the ſame. Wherewith Amurath more offended than before, commanded the Baſſa with Fire and Sword again to ſpoil and waſt his Country; who according to his commandment entred again into Bulgaria, and ſtruck ſuch a terror of his coming into the hearts of the people, that many ſtrong places were voluntarily yielded into his Power, namely Diritze, Coſſova, with the City of Ternova, the Seat of the Princes Court; Tzernevi, Novakeſtri, Ziſtova, with divers others; and proceeding farther, he laid ſiege to Nicopolis, the ſtrongeſt City of Bulgaria, upon the ſide of the great River Danubius, whether Saſmenos was for fear himſelf fled. Who finding himſelf unable to hold out the Siege, once again (with ſhame enough) tying a Winding-ſheet about his Neck, as he had done before, and taking his Son with him, went out of the City, and in moſt abject manner falling down at the Baſſa his Feet, craved pardon; which the Baſſa, moved with compaſſion to ſee the miſery of ſo great a man, and having already taken from him the greateſt part of his Dominion, and now out of fear of further reſiſtance, eaſily granted. And having thus ended the Bulgarian War, returned to Amurath, of whom he was right joyfully received.

Amurath had now made great Preparation for the invading of Servia, for which purpoſe he had drawn over into Europe the greateſt Forces he poſſibly could out of Aſia; ſending alſo for his youngeſt Son Jacup, Governor of Caraſia, who underſtanding his Fathers pleaſure, repaired unto him with all the Power he could make. This Army by Amurath thus aſſembled, was the greateſt that ever was before that, brought by the Tutks into Europe. Lazarus not ignorant of this great Preparation made by Amurath, had drawn into the ſociety of this War, the King of Boſna (as is aforeſaid) with Vulcus Prince of Macedonia, his Son in law, who both brought unto him great Aid; he had alſo by his Embaſſadors procured great Supplies from other Chriſtian Kings and Princes, out of Valachia, Hungaria, Croatia, Sclavonia, Albania, Bulgaria, and Italy, beſides great numbers of other voluntary devout Chriſtians, which all aſſembled and met together, did in number far exceed the great Army of the Turks.

The Caſtle of Sarkive with the City joyning unto it, taken by the Chriſtians and raſed.

With this Army Lazarus the Deſpot encamped upon the ſide of the River Morova the greater, not far from whence ſtood the ſtrong Caſtle of Sarkive, which Alis Baſſa had of late taken from Saſmenos the Bulgarian Prince, ſtanding as it were betwixt Bulgaria and Servia; this Caſtle being now poſſeſſed of the Turks, was thought by Lazarus dangerous to his Country, who therefore ſent one Demetrius, a right valiant Captain, with certain Companies of ſelect Men to take in the ſame. The name of this Captain Demetrius, was a general terror unto the Turks, for the harm he had done them; ſo that they in the Caſtle hearing that he was come, without further reſiſtance yielded the ſame unto him. Whereof Amurath underſtanding, ſent Eine, and Sarutze Baſſa to recover the ſame; but Lazarus doubting that the Caſtle would hardly be kept in that dangerous War, ſent Vulcus his Son in law with twenty thouſand Men, to bring away all that was therein, and in the City near unto it, leſt it ſhould become a prey unto the greedy Turks; which he accordingly did, and at the ſame time raſed both the Caſtle and the City, before the coming of Jaxis Beg, ſent from Amurath to have done the ſame exploit; which he coming thither, found already done to his hand by Vulcus.

As Amurath was marching towards Servia, Seratze and Cuſtendil, two Chriſtian Princes his Tributaries, met him with their Forces, whom he cauſed to march before him, as his Guids; and paſſing through Cuſtendil his Country, was there refreſhed with plenty of all things neceſſary; until at length paſſing the River of Morova the leſs, he drew ſo near to the Plains of Coſſova (where the Chriſtian Army lay) that he with his Son Bajazet from a little Hill took full view of the Chriſtian Camp, which was ſo great, that it covered all thoſe large Plains from ſide to ſide, and ſo daunted Amurath, as that returning to his Army, he preſently entred into a great conſultation with his greateſt Captains and Commanders, what courſe to take againſt ſuch a puiſſant Enemy.

Theſe great Armies being now come ſo nigh together, as that they might the one well deſcry the other, Amurath had purpoſed the ſame day to have given the Chriſtians battel; but being diſſwaded by Eurenoſes, both for that it was extream hot, and his Souldiers wearied with travel, he reſted that night. The next morning as ſoon as it was day, he put his Army in order of battel, placing his Son Bajazet with Eurenoſes and Eine Beg Subbaſſa, in the right Wing; his youngeſt Son Jacup, with Sarutze Baſſa in the left Wing; the main battel he led himſelf. Lazarus in the mean time had alſo ſet his Army in good order; giving the charge of the right Wing to Vulcus his Son in law; the left Wing was led by the King of Boſna, and his Sons; in the main battel ſtood Lazarus himſelf; the Italians, Valachians, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Bulgarians, he placed in both Wings. It is thought, greater Armies than thoſe two had ſeldem before met in Europe. Lazarus as the Turkiſh Hiſtories report (but how truly I know not) having in his Army five hundred thouſand men; and Amurath ſcarce half ſo many.

To begin the battel, Amurath had drawn a thouſand of his beſt Archers, under the leading of Malcozzeus, out of the right Wing of his Army; and the like number of Archers out of the left, under the conduct of one Muſtapha; which ſo placed on both ſides of the Army, as he thought beſt, Eurenoſes a man of great experience, told Amurath, That the Chriſtians were for the moſt part well and ſtrongly armed, and ſhouldring cloſe together in their charge, would be like a Rock of Iron, unable to be pierced; but if in joyning the battel, he would a little retire, the Chriſtians following upon good hope, would ſo looſe their cloſe ſtanding (the chief part of their ſtrength) and leave an entrance for his Men. Upon which reſolution, Amurath commanded the Archers to give the firſt charge; which they couragiouſly performed. At which time, the Turks Army gave ground a little; which the Chriſtians perceiving, with great force aſſailed the left Wing of their Army, and after a hard and cruel fight put the ſame to flight; which Bajazet ſeeing, with ſuch fury renewed the battel, that the Turks which before as men diſcouraged fled in the left Wing, began now to turn again upon their Enemies; and the Chriſtians, having as they thought already got the Victory, were to begin a great battel. In which bloody fight many thouſands fell on both ſides; the brightneſs of the Armor and Weapons, was as it had been the Lightning; the multitude of Launces and other Horſemens Staves, ſhadowed the light of the Sun; Arrows and Darts fell ſo faſt, that a man would have thought they had poured down from Heaven; the noiſe of the Inſtruments of War, with the neighing of Horſes, and out-cries of Men was ſo terrible and great, that the wild Beaſts of the Mountains ſtood aſtonied therewith; and the Turkiſh Hiſtories, to expreſs the terror of the day (vainly ſay) that the Angels in Heaven amazed with that hideous noiſe, for that time forgot the heavenly Hymns wherewith they always glorifie God. About noon time of the day, the fortune of the Turks prevailing, the Chriſtians began to give ground, and at length betook themſelves to plain flight; whom the Turks with all their force purſued and ſlew them down right, without number or mercy. In which battel Lazarus the Deſpot himſelf was alſo ſlain. Howbeit ſome Hiſtories report otherwiſe, as that he with his Son were taken Priſoners, and by and by afterwards (in revenge of Amurath his death) cruelly ſlain; otherſome alſo reporting that he died in Priſon. Amurath after this great Victory, with ſome few of his chief Captains taking view of the dead bodies, which without number lay on heaps in the field like Mountains; a Chriſtian Souldier, ſore wounded and all bloody, ſeeing him, in ſtaggering manner aroſe (as if it had been from death) out of a heap of ſlain men, and making towards him, for want of ſtrength fell down divers times by the way as he came, as if he had been a drunken man; at length drawing nigh unto him, when they which guarded the Kings Perſon would have ſtayed him, he was by Amurath himſelf commanded to come nearer, ſuppoſing that he would have craved his life of him. Thus the half dead Chriſtian preſſing near unto him, as if he would for honour ſake have kiſſed his Feet, ſuddenly ſtabbed him in the bottom of his belly with a ſhort Dagger, which he had under his Souldiers Coat; of which Wound that great King and Conqueror preſently died. The name of this man, (for his courage worthy of eternal memory) was Miles Cobelitz; who before ſore wounded, was ſhortly after in the preſence of Bajazet cut into ſmall pieces. The Turks in their Annals ſomewhat otherwiſe report of the death of Amurath; as that this Cobelitz, one of the Deſpot his Servants, in time of the Battel, coming to Amurath as a Fugitive, offering him his Service, and admitted to his preſence, in humbling himſelf to have kiſſed his Feet (as the barbarous manner of the Turks is) ſtabbed him into the belly and ſo ſlew him; being himſelf therefore ſhortly after (as is aforeſaid) in the preſence of Bajazet moſt cruelly hewen into ſmall pieces. Whereupon ever ſince that time, the manner of the Turks hath been, and yet is, that when any Embaſſador or Stranger is come to kiſs the Sultan his hand, or otherwiſe to approach his Perſon, he is as it were for honours ſake, led by the Arms unto his preſence, betwixt two of the great Courtiers; but indeed by ſo intangling him, to be ſure that he ſhall not offer him the like violence, that did this Cobelitz unto Amurath.

The dead body of Amurath was preſently with all ſecrecy conveyed into his Tent by the Baſſaes and Captains preſent at his death; whether Bajazet was alſo brought with an Enſign before him, as the Succeſſor in his Fathers Kingdom. His younger Brother Jacup, ſirnamed Zelebi (or the Noble) yet ignorant of that had hapned, was by the great Baſſaes ſent for, as from his Father; who caſting no peril, but coming into his Fathers Tent, was there preſently by them ſtrangled, by the commandment of Bajazet, as moſt Hiſtories report; howbeit the Turks Annals charge him not therewith. This was the beginning of the moſt unnatural and inhumane cuſtom, ever ſince holden for a moſt wholſome and good policy among the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors, in the beginning of their Reign moſt cruelly to Maſſacre their Brethren and neareſt Kinſmen, ſo at once to rid themſelves of all fear of their Competitors.

This Amurath was in his Superſtition more zealous than any other of the Turkiſh Kings; a man of great courage, and in all his Attempts fortunate; he made greater ſlaughter of his Enemies, than both his Father and Grandfather; his Kingdom in Aſia he greatly inlarged by the Sword, Marriage, and Purchaſe; and uſing the Diſcord and Cowardiſe of the Grecian Princes, to his profit, ſubdued a great part of Thracia, called Romania, with the Territories thereto adjoyning, leaving unto the Emperor of Conſtantinople, little or nothing more in Thracia, than the Imperial City it ſelf, with the bare name of an Emperor, almoſt without an Empire; he won a great part of Bulgaria, and entred into Servia, Boſna, and Macedonia; he was liberal, and withall ſevere; of his Subjects both beloved and feared; a man of very few words, and one that could diſſemble deeply. He was ſlain when he was threeſcore and eight years old, and had thereof reigned thirty one, in the year of our Lord, 1390. His dead body was by Bajazet conveyed into Aſia, and there Royally buried at Pruſa, in a fair Chappel at the Weſt end of the City, near unto the Baths there; where, upon his Tomb lieth his Souldiers Cloke, with a little Turkiſh Tulipant, much differing from thoſe great Turbants which the Turks now wear. Near unto the ſame Tomb are placed three Launces, with three Horſe-tails faſtned at the upper end of them, which he uſed as Guidons in his Wars; a thing in ancient time not ſtrange. There ſtandeth a Caſtle with a Tomb, made in remembrance of him, in the Plains of Coſſova, where he was ſlain and his Entrails buried; which giveth occaſion for ſome to report that he was there alſo himſelf enterred.

BAJAZET,

The Firſt of that NAME,

The FOURTH and moſt UNFORTUNATE

King of the Turks.

BAjazet, or as the Turks call him, Baiaſit, of his violent and fierce Nature ſirnamed Gilderun, or Lightning, ſucceeded his Father Amurath in the Turkiſh Kingdom, his younger Brother Jacup being ſtrangled immediatly after his Fathers death, as is before declared. He in the firſt year of his Reign invaded Servia, and there beſieged Cratova, a City of the Deſpots; whereunto the Silver Mines of Servia (not the leaſt cauſe of that War) belonged. Which City was yielded unto him, upon condition, That the Chriſtian Inhabitants might with Life and Liberty depart. Who were no ſooner gon out of the City, but that by his commandment they were all moſt cruelly ſlain by his men of War, for that purpoſe ſent out after them. At this time he alſo won Uſcupia, with divers other Caſtles in the Country near unto Cratova.

Bajazet invadeth Servia.

Sigiſmund at the ſame time King of Hungary (a young Prince of great hope, and Brother to Wenceſlaus, then Emperor of the Weſt) advertiſed from the Servians his Allies and Confederates, of theſe proud proceedings of Bajazet; by his Embaſſadors ſent of purpoſe, requeſted him, That as he was a juſt Prince, and wiſhed to live in quiet with his own, to deſiſt from doing of ſuch open wrong, and from invading of ſuch Countries of his Friends and Confederates, as he had no right in. Which Embaſſadors ſo ſent, Bajazet detained without anſwer, until ſuch time as he had overrun a great part of the Deſpot his Country, and therein done what he thought good. Then calling the ſaid Embaſſadors unto him into one of the ſtrong Towns which he had in every corner filled with his own Souldiers, told them that they might there ſee, that his Right both unto that Town and the reſt by him taken, was good enough, for as much as the very Walls acknowledged the ſame; And ſo giving them leave to depart, willed them ſo to tell their Maſter. Which his proud anſwer, by the ſame Embaſſadors reported unto the young King, no leſs troubled him, than if open War had by them been denounced unto him, ſeeing the Tyrant (as it ſhould ſeem) pretended Right unto whatſoever he could by force get; nevertheleſs, being himſelf not yet well ſetled in his Kingdom, and in doubt of the contrary Faction (that altogether liked not of his Election into Hungary for their King) he was glad at that time to put it up, and ſo to hold himſelf content.

Servia the ſecond time invaded by Bajazet.

The next year, Bajazet by Feriſes-Beg, took the City of Vidina, with many other ſtrong Towns and Caſtles in Servia, and afterwards returned to Hadrianople. But whilſt that he thus raged in Europe, the Caramanian King invaded and ſpoiled the Frontiers of his Countries in Aſia; which although he was not then at leiſure, he forgot not afterwards to revenge to the full. At the ſame time Eurenoſes, Lord Governor of the Marches of his Kingdom in Europe towards Grecia, departing from Seres (where he then lay) took the City of Sitros in Theſſalia. And Feriſes-Beg, not content to have taken Vidina (as is aforeſaid) paſſed over the great River of Danubius, and grievouſly ſpoiled Valachia; from whence he returned loden with a great Prey. This was the firſt time (that I read of) that the Turks ever paſſed over the River Danubius. At this time alſo Jegides Baſſa entred the Kingdom of Boſna, from whence he carried a great number of Captives to Hadrianople, where Bajazet ſpent that Winter.

Philadelphia beſieged by Bajazet.

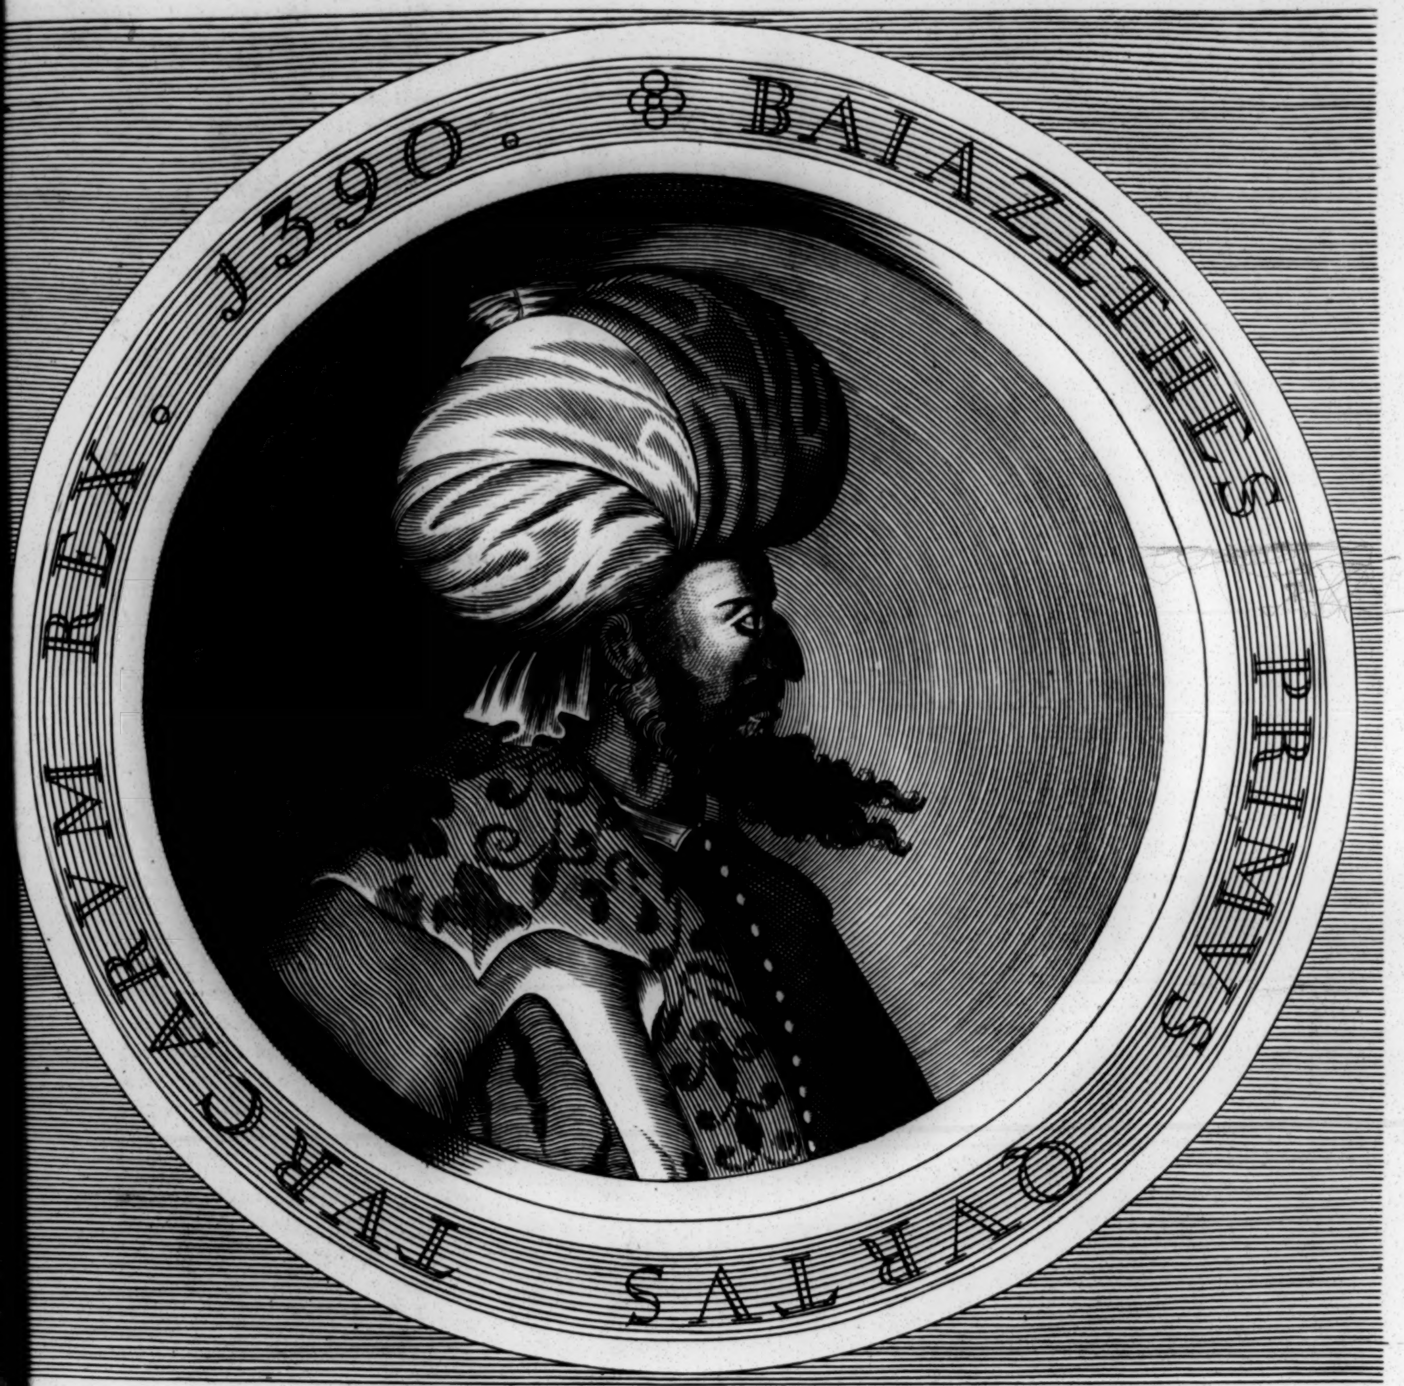
In the beginning of the next Spring Bajazet paſſed over Helleſpontus to Pruſa, where he built a fair Mahometan Temple, with a Colledge, and an Alms-Houſe; which works finiſhed, he returned again into Europe, and built a Monaſtery at Hadrianople; and ſo returned again into Aſia, leaving Temurtaſes, Begler-Beg (or his Viceroy) in Hadrianople. After he was come into Aſia, he laid Siege to the ſtrong City of Philadelphia in Lydia, which was at that time the only City in the leſſer Aſia, yet holden by the Chriſtians in the midſt of the Mahometan Princes; for now was the Greek Emperor by the Othoman Kings and the other Turks quite driven out of the leſſer Aſia. In the beginning of this Siege, Bajazet gave ſtrait commandment to his Souldiers, That they ſhall not ſpoil or hurt any thing in the Country belonging to the Citizens; hoping by ſuch feigned courteſie to make them the more willing to yield themſelves unto his Obedience. But diſappointed of his expectation, and finding them reſolved to hold it out unto the laſt, he forthwith gave out contrary commandment, not to ſpare any thing they could waſt or deſtroy; which was accordingly by his greedy Souldiers performed.



BAIAZETHES PRIMVS QVRTVS TVRCARVM REX. 1390.

Fulminis in morem celeri rapit agmina motu
Bajazethes, fidei pacis et impatiens.
Regni Hadrianopolim Sedes sibi legit ut eſset,
Poſset et Europæ jungere regna suis.
Constantinopolim gemina obsidione fatigat:
Iam Græcas vana spe sibi spondet opes.
Cum Tamerlano præbet sua terga, catenis
Victus, et in cavea probra pudenda subit.

Faithleſs, and furious Bajazet's Armes now fly,
As swift as Thunderbolts dart through the sky;
In Adrianople plants his haughty Throne,
To make all European Crownes his owne.
Constantinople twice with sieges tires,
And twice he takes it only in desires.
Till Tamerlane, for all his bloudy paines, Rewards the Monster with a Cage, and Chaines.

performed. After long Siege, the Citizens ſeeing the Country about them utterly waſted, and themſelves unable longer to indure, and out of all hope of relief, yielded their City unto the pleaſure of Bajazet. It is written by ſome, that this famous City was not beſieged without the conſent of the Emperor of Conſtantinople; and that the Greeks themſelves, moved with envy to ſee that City ſo long hold out, did help the Turks in the winning thereof.

In the time of this Siege Aidin Ogli Prince of Caria, a Mahometan, came to Bajazet, and yielded himſelf into his power as his Vaſſal; unto whom Bajazet reſtored certain places which he had in this expedition a little before taken from him; yet upon ſuch condition, as that he ſhould not from that time coin any Mony in his own name, either be remembred in publick Prayers as a Prince in their Mahometan Temples, as he had before been; but that all ſuch things ſhould be done in the name of Bajazet, as his dread Lord and Soveraign. With which diſgrace the poor Prince was glad to content himſelf, and to live as his Vaſſal. From Philadelphia he led his Army into the Country of Saruchania, in ancient time called Ionia Maritima, which he ſubdued unto himſelf upon like conditions. After that, he paſſed farther to Menteſia, or Mentz, ſometime called Myndos in Caria; the Prince whereof for fear fled to Cutrun Bajazet, Prince of Caſtamona and part of Pontus, leaving his Country to the pleaſure of the Tyrant. And foraſmuch as the young King of Caramania had invaded his Countries whilſt he was buſied in Europe, Bajazet in revenge thereof entred with his Army into Caramania, and took Ceſaria, with divers other places there; ſo that the young King diſcouraged with the loſs of his Towns, and fearing Bajazet his greatneſs, was glad to hold himſelf contented with his loſs, and to make Peace with him as it pleaſed him to grant it. As Bajazet was making this expedition into Caramania, another young Mahometan Prince, the Son of Prince Germian, came unto him with one of his chief Counſellors, and were both by him ſent Priſoners over the Strait to the Caſtle of Ipſala, where they lay in durance many years after. Thus Bajazet having oppreſſed and wronged moſt of the Mahometan Princes, the Succeſſors of Sultan Aladin in the leſſer Aſia, at laſt returned again himſelf in triumph to Pruſa.

The Prince of Menteſia, who for fear of Bajazet was fled out of his Country, as is aforeſaid, had now incited Cutrun Bajazet, Prince of Caſtamona, with a great power to invade that ſide of Bajazet his Kingdom which bordered upon him. Which Bajazet underſtanding, gathered a great Army to go againſt this Mahometan Prince. At which very time the Vayvod of Valachia, hearing of Bajazet his troubles in Aſia, with a ſtrong Army paſſed over Danubius into thoſe parts of Servia and Bulgaria that were by the Turks as then poſſeſſed; where he ſpoiled the Country, and ſlew great numbers of the Turks, making Mahometan Saints and Martyrs by heaps; for ſo the Turks account all them whom the Chriſtians kill in their War; which done, he retired back again into Valachia, carrying with him alſo many of the Turks Priſoners. Bajazet thus at once invaded both in Aſia and Europe; deferred his Wars purpoſed againſt the Prince of Pontus, until a more convenient time, converting his Forces againſt the Valachians. Wherefore paſſing over the Strait to Hadrianople, he ſent his Army from thence to Nicopolis, and there paſſing the River of Danubius, entred into Valachia, burning and ſpoiling the Country before him as he went. Where the Vayvod to repreſs his Fury, met him in the Field and gave him Battel, but was therein overthrown, and many of his People ſlain; ſo that at laſt he was glad to ſue for Peace, which he obtained, by ſubmitting himſelf to Bajazet, and yielding to pay him a yearly Tribute.

Theſſalia invaded by Bajazet.

Whilſt Bajazet was thus buſied in Valachia, news was brought unto him, That the Chriſtians of the Weſt with a Fleet of Gallies did great harm alongſt the Coaſts of his Dominions in Aſia. In revenge whereof, he entred with his Army into Theſſaly, deſtroying all the Country unto Theſſalonica; in which expedition he took the City of Neapolis in Greece, and Joannina in Ætolia, and after that returned into Aſia, where he ſpent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring, he with a great Power paſſed the Strait of Callipolis to Hadrianople, intending to have invaded Hungary. But as he was upon the way, it chanced that a Conſtantinopolitan Spy was by the Turks intercepted, with Letters from the Greek Emperor to the King of Hungary, giving him warning both of the Turks preparation and coming. By which Spy Bajazet alſo underſtood of another Meſſenger before ſent into Hungary for like purpoſe. Whereupon Temurtaſes (then his great Lieutenant in Europe) perſwaded him to deſiſt from his intended Wars in Hungary, and to beſiege the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, as a thing of more honour, and leſs danger; the City being already (as he ſaid, and as in truth it was) ſurrounded with the Turkiſh Provinces; bringing in Philadelphia (but a few years before won) for example of the like exploit. Of whoſe Counſel Bajazet liking well, returned with his Army, and ſhortly after came and ſate down therewith before Conſtantinople, laying hard Siege thereunto, firſt by Land, and after by Sea, with his Gallies ſent from Callipolis. Which hard Siege continued (as moſt Hiſtories report) the ſpace of eight years; in which long time he drave the Emperor Emanuel Paleologus to that Strait, that he was glad to leave his City, and himſelf in perſon to crave Aid of Wenceſlaus the German Emperor, and Charles the Sixth the French King, and other Chriſtian Princes alſo. At which time the Citizens were at length brought to ſuch extremity, that they were even at the point to have yielded up the City; and happily had ſo done, had not Sigiſmund King of Hungary (aſſiſted with a great Army of the French, and other voluntary Chriſtians almoſt out of every part of Chriſtendom, to the number of an hundred and thirty thouſand, under the leading of John Count of Nivers, and after Duke of Burgundy) for the relief of the beſieged Emperor, paſſed over Danubius into the Turkiſh Dominions; and there having recovered Vidina, with certain other ſtrong Holds in Bulgaria, laid Siege to Nicopolis; out of which City the Turks oftentimes ſallied, and gave him many an hot skirmiſh. It is reported, That the young King Sigiſmund beholding the greatneſs of his Army, in his great jollity hearing of the coming of the Turks Army, ſhould proudly ſay, What need we to fear the Turk, who need not at all to fear the falling of the Heavens? which if they ſhould fall, yet were we able with our Spears and Haldberts to hold them up from falling upon us. But Bajazet underſtanding what Spoil the Hungarian King had made in his late gained Countries, and of the Conſtantinople eight years beſieged by Bajazet.

Siege of Nicopolis; commanded the Ladders and other great proviſion now in readineſs for the ſcaling and aſſaulting of the City of Conſtantinople, to be burnt, becauſe they ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians; and ſo raiſing his Siege, marched with a right puiſſant Army to Nicopolis, ſending Eurenoſes before, of purpoſe to intercept ſome of the Chriſtians, thereby to learn the State of their Camp and Army. But they hearing of his coming, ſo well looked to themſelves, that he with ſhame returned to his Maſter as he came, without any one Priſoner taken. Which thing much troubled Bajazet, as fearing he ſhould have to do with a wary Enemy. Sigiſmund underſtanding of the approach of Bajazet, leaving a ſufficient Power for the continuing of the Siege, roſe himſelf, and with the reſt of his Army went to meet his proud Enemy. Of whoſe coming and approach Bajazet underſtanding, divided his Army into two parts; and being now come within the ſight of the Chriſtian Army, made ſhew but of the one half, keeping himſelf cloſe in ſecret ambuſh not far off with the other. The Chriſtians deeming themſelves (as they were) far more in number than the Turks which they ſaw, divided their Army alſo into two parts, purpoſing betwixt them to have incloſed the Turks. Of all the Chriſtians that were there preſent, the French deſired to have the honour of the firſt charge to be given upon the Turks, and in their heat upon good hope ſet forward (the Hungarians, with a great part of the Army, not yet ſet in order) and ſo began the Battel; where betwixt them and the Turks was fought a right cruel Fight, and in a little time many thouſands ſlain. But this Fight had not long endured, when Bajazet with the other half of his Army ſuddenly ariſing, came on with ſuch violence, as well became his ſirname of Gilderun or Lightning; and ſo hardly charged the French, that they amazed at the ſuddaineſs of the danger, and oppreſſed with the fury and multitude of the unexpected Enemy, ſtood at the firſt as men diſmaid; but ſeeing no remedy, encouraging one another, valiantly fought it out until they were almoſt all either ſlain or taken Priſoners; ſtill in hope to have been relieved by the Hungarians and the reſt. In this hard conflict divers of the French Horſemen having forſaken their Horſes, fought on Foot, as their manner was; which Horſes running back without their Riders, upon the Hungarians, cauſed them to doubt that the French were quite overthrown; wherewith diſmaied, they without further coming on, all turned their backs and fled, in ſo great haſt, as that it booted not the King or any other great Commander to go about to ſtay their Flight. The French thus by their too much haſt overthrown, the Turks purſuing the Hungarians and the reſt of the Chriſtians, made of them a great ſlaughter; of whom alſo many were drowned in the great River Danubius. At which time alſo the Turks took ſo many Priſoners, that it was thought every ſeveral Turk had his Priſoner. King Sigiſmund himſelf, who but a little before had deſpiſed even the falling of the Heavens, had then alſo undoubtedly fallen into his Enemies hands, had he not in a little Boat by good hap got over Danubius; not unlike another Xerxes, who having covered the Seas with his Ships, and with a world of men paſſed over into Grecia, was afterwards by the ſtrange change of Fortune, himſelf alone in a ſmall Fiſher-Boat glad to get back again into Aſia. Sigiſmund being thus got over Danubius, and fearing the violence of the Hungarians for the loſs of the Battel, fled by Sea into Thracia unto Conſtantinople, from whence he ſailed unto the Iſland of the Rhodes; and from thence ſailing through the Ægean and Ionian Sea, landed at length at Dalmatia; and ſo having wandred from place to place, toſſed with many Fortunes, after eighteen Months long and painful travel returned again into Hungary. Where he found the State of his Kingdom in his abſence much troubled, the contrary Faction in the mean time having made choice of Ladiſlaus King of Naples for their King; who was even then with a great Army going to have taken poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, had not Sigiſmund in good time by the help of certain of the chief of the Hungarian Nobility prevented him. In this Battel, called the Battel of Nicopolis, were of the Chriſtians twenty thouſand ſlain, and of the Turks threeſcore thouſand. The Count of Nivers the French Kings near Kinſman, was there taken Priſoner, with three hundred great Commanders more; where after he had endured great contumely and reproach in the preſence of Bajazet, he was commanded to make choice of five other of the Captains, ſuch as he liked beſt, all the reſt being cut in pieces before his Face, and he with the other five left alive, ſent Priſoners to Pruſa, from whence they were afterwards ranſomed for two hundred thouſand Ducats. This bloody Battel of Nicopolis was fought in the year of our Lord 1396.

Conſtantinople the ſecond time beſieged by Bajazet.

Bajazet after this great Victory, having worthily relieved his beſieged City, returned again to the Siege of Conſtantinople, laying more hardly unto it than before, building Forts and Bulwarks againſt it on the one ſide towards the Land; and paſſing over the Strait of Boſphorus, built a ſtrong Caſtle upon that Strait over againſt Conſtantinople, to impeach ſo much as was poſſible, all paſſage thereunto by Sea. This ſtrait Siege (as moſt write) continued alſo two years, which I ſuppoſe by the circumſtance of the Hiſtory, to have been part of the aforeſaid eight years. Emanuel the beſieged Emperor wearied with theſe long Wars, ſent an Embaſſador to Bajazet to intreat with him a Peace; which Bajazet was the more willing to hearken unto, for that he heard news, that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince intended ſhortly to war upon him. Yet could this Peace not be obtained, but upon condition, that the Emperor ſhould grant free Liberty for the Turks to dwell together in one Street of Conſtantinople, with free exerciſe of their own Religion and Laws, under a Judge of their own Nation; and further, to pay unto the Turkiſh King a yearly Tribute of ten thouſand Ducats. Which diſhonourable Conditions the diſtreſſed Emperor was glad to accept of. So was this long Siege broken up, and preſently a great ſort of Turks with their Families were ſent out of Bithynia, to dwell in Conſtantinople, and a Church there built for them; which not long after was by the Emperor pulled down to the ground, and the Turks again driven out of the City, at ſuch time as Bajazet was by the mighty Tamerlane overthrown and taken Priſoner.

Bajazet in the beginning of his Reign, preſently after the death of Lazarus the Deſpot, ſlain in the Battel of Coſſova, won part of Servia, (as is aforeſaid) the other part being ſtill holden by Lazarus his Son, called Stephen the Deſpot; who about this time ſent an honourable Embaſſador to Bajazet with loving Letters, and Royal Preſents; by which Embaſſador alſo the old Princeſs Lazarus his Widow, offered her fair Daughter Deſpina, Stephens Siſter, a Lady of incomparable Beauty, in marriag to him, if it ſhould pleaſe him to vouchſafe his Handmaid (as ſhe termed her) ſo high a place. This Lady was long before promiſed him, whilſt his Father Amurath yet lived. Of this Embaſſador Bajazet was very glad, but eſpecially for the fair Ladies ſake; which being known to the Princeſs her Mother, and the Deſpot her Brother, ſhe was forthwith honourably ſent to Bajazet, and ſo to him with great Solemnity and Triumph ſhortly after married. Of all his Wives he held her deareſt, and for her ſake reſtored to her Brother Stephen the City and Caſtle of Semendre (otherwiſe called S. Andrew) and Columbarium in Servia; ſhe allured him to drink Wine, forbidden the Turks by their Law; and cauſed him to delight in ſumptuous Banquets, which his Predeceſſors, Othoman, Orchanes, and Amurath, never uſed.

As the Turkiſh Kingdom grew in greatneſs, ſo Corruption, the Canker of great States and Commonweals, increaſed likewiſe; but eſpecially in the Men of Law, and Judges of his Courts. Wherewith Bajazet grievouſly offended, commanded divers of the ſame Judges to be apprehended, determining (to the terror of others) to have executed them; whoſe dangerous Eſtate was much pitied, and alſo favoured of Alis Baſſa, and other the Kings great Counſellors; yet for ſo much as Bajazet was of a furious Nature, and in his anger dangerous to be ſpoken unto, none of them durſt adventure to intreat him in their behalf; no not Alis Baſſa, Charadyn Baſſa his Son, ſometime Judge of Pruſa, although he were a man in ſuch ſpecial Favour with him, that he was therefore of the Common People not only reverenced, but as the King himſelf honoured.

There was at that time in the Court an Æthiopian Jeſter, who under ſome covert pleaſant Jeſt, would many times bolt out that to the King in his greateſt heat, which his graveſt Counſellors durſt not once ſpeak to him of in ſecret; this Jeſter, Alis Baſſa, requeſted to deviſe ſome means to intreat with the angry King in the behalf of theſe Judges; promiſing to give him what he would reaſonably deſire, if he could appeaſe the Kings Diſpleaſure. The Æthiopian without fear undertook the matter, and preſently putting upon his Head a rich Hat all wrought over with Gold, after the manner of the Turks Embaſſadors, and fitting himſelf with other Apparel better beſeeming an Embaſſador than a Jeſter; thus attired preſented himſelf before the King, with a great counterfeit gravity. Whereat Bajazet marvelling, asked him the cauſe why he was ſo gay. I have a requeſt unto your Majeſty (ſaid he) and wiſh to find Favour in your ſight. Bajazet more deſirous than before to know the matter, asked what his requeſt was. If it ſtand with your pleaſure (ſaid the Jeſter) I would feign go as your Embaſſador to the Emperor of Conſtantinople, In hope whereof I have put my ſelf in this readineſs. To what purpoſe wouldſt thou go? (ſaid Bajazet) To crave of the Emperor (ſaid he) ſome forty or fifty of his old grave Monks and Fryers to bring with me hither to the Court. And what ſhall they do here? (ſaid Bajazet) I would have them placed (ſaid the Jeſter) in the rooms of the old doting Judges, whom you intend (as I hear) to put to death. Why (ſaid Bajazet) I can place others of my own People in their rooms. True (ſaid the Æthiopian) for gravity of look and countenance, and ſo would the old Monks and Friers ſerve as well; but not ſo learned in your Laws and Cuſtoms of your Kingdom, as are thoſe in your Diſpleaſure. If they be learned (ſaid Bajazet) why do they then contrary to their Learning, pervert Juſtice, and take Bribes? There is a good reaſon for that too (ſaid the Jeſter.) What reaſon? (ſaid the King.) That can he that there ſtandeth by better tell than I, (ſaid the Jeſter, pointing to Alis Baſſa) who forthwith commanded by Bajazet to give the reaſon; with great reverence before done, ſhewed, That thoſe Judges ſo in diſpleaſure, were not conveniently provided for, and were therefore inforced many times for their neceſſary maintenance to take rewards, to the ſtaying of the due courſe of Juſtice. Which Bajazet underſtanding to be true, commanded Alis Baſſa to appoint them covenient Stipends for their maintenance, and forthwith granted their pardon. Whereupon the Baſſa ſet down order, That of every matter in ſuit exceeding one thouſand Aſpers, the Judge ſhould have twenty Aſpers Fee for Judgment; and for every Writing and Inſtrument out of the Court, twelve Aſpers; which Fee they yet take in thoſe Courts at this day.

Not long after, Bajazet in his fury ſent for certain of his Captains and Commanders of his Men of War, with whom he was for ſome ſmall occaſion grievouſly offended, intending in his rage to have put them all to death, which was with him no great matter. Theſe Captains being brought before him, the Counſellors ſeeing him all in Choler, ſat looking on the ground, hanging down their Heads, as the manner of the Turks is, not daring to look him in the Face, nor to ſpeak a good word for them. When ſuddainly the aforeſaid Æthiopian Jeſter ſtept forth, earneſtly requeſting the King, not to ſhew them any favour, but to execute them preſently, as Villains and Traitors; railing upon them, as if he had known ſome great Fault by them. Bajazet thinking he could have accuſed them of ſome great Crime, becauſe of his earneſtneſs, asked what reaſon he had ſo to exclaim againſt them. Reaſon (quoth the Jeſter) becauſe the Knaves be good for nothing; and they ſay that Tamerlane is with a great Army coming againſt us; if you will but take up an Enſign in your Hand, and I go before you with a Drum, I will ſtrike up ſuch a terrible march, and you make ſuch a dreadful ſhew, that we ſhall need none of theſe bad Fellows or their Souldiers in the Field to get the Victory over our Enemies. This conceit of the Jeſter ſtruck ſuch a melancholy imagination into Bajazet his Head, that he ſtood muſing a great while as it were in a deep ſtudy; at laſt having well conſidered the drift of the Jeſters Speech, and his fury now ſomewhat aſſwaged, granted them pardon, which they looked not for.

This Æthiopian Jeſter, Bajazet upon a time ſent unto the old Queen his Mother, to bring her news of the good ſucceſs of his Wars againſt the Chriſtians, for that ſhe had ſo deſired; who coming unto her, was by her commanded to ſit down, ſhe began to demand of him, how the King her Son did, and of the ſucceſs of his Wars. Whereunto he anſwered, That he did very well, and had won from the Chriſtians a great Country, and greatly inriched his Souldiers. But after a little more talk, the Queen Mother deſirous to hear again the good news, (or elſe after the manner of ſome, which think nothing ſufficiently told, except it be told an hundred times) asked him again, how the King her Son did; and how he ſped in his Wars. Whereunto he anſwered every word as before; but asking him the third time the very ſame queſtion, how her Son did? Doſt thou ask me ſo often (ſaid the Æthiopian) how he doth? Bre Cachpe (O Whore, ſaid he) thou haſt brought forth a Son like a Divel, who roaming up and down, doth nothing but burn and deſtroy the World where he cometh. Whereat the Queen crying out, up ſtarted the Æthiopian, and betaking himſelf to his Heels, was never more afterwards ſeen.

In the Wars which Bajazet had againſt Sigiſmund, the Vayvod of Valachia had given aid to the Hungarian King; wherewith Bajazet being offended, determined now at length to be revenged; and therefore intending to make War upon the Valachian Prince, left Temurtaſes his great Lieutenant at Ancyra in Aſia, and ſo paſſed over Helleſpontus himſelf againſt the Valachians. Upon whoſe departure, Aladin his Siſters Son the young King of Caramania, with a great Power came ſuddainly in the night to Ancyra, and took Temurtaſes Priſoner; who then feared nothing leſs, than in time of Peace to be ſo ſurpriſed, and carried away in bonds into Caramania. But when he underſtood that Bajazet had ended his Wars in Valachia, and was with Victory returned to Pruſa, he fearing his heavy indignation for ſo great an outrage, preſently releaſed Temurtaſes out of Priſon, apparelled him richly after the manner of that Nation, craved pardon for the wrong he had done him, and ſet him at liberty to go whither he would, and withal ſent one of his Noblemen with great Gifts and Preſents to Bajazet, to make his excuſe in the beſt manner he could; unto which Embaſſador Bajazet (yet in choler) would not give audience, or ſuffer him to come in his ſight; but at the ſame time levied a great Army to invade Caramania. Which Aladin underſtanding, and now out of all hope to appeaſe this mighty Enemy, levied all the Forces he could in his own Kingdom, and withal entertained all the Mercenary Souldiers he could get, intending to try his Fortune in the Field, as a man of Valour, rather than to be thruſt out of his Kingdom like a Coward; and ſo in readineſs, hearing of the coming of Bajazet, met him upon the way, and at a place called Aczac gave him Battel; but being too weak, he was overcome and put to Flight; in which Flight his Horſe ſtumbling, and he falling to the ground, was there before he could recover himſelf, taken by his Enemies which had him in chaſe, and ſo brought bound to Bajazet; his two Sons Mahamet Beg and Alis Beg, being taken in that Battel alſo, were ſent Priſoners to Pruſa. Aladin himſelf was by Bajazets command delivered to his Enemy Temurtaſes; who in revenge of the wrong he had before done him, preſently cauſed him to be hanged; which when Bajazet underſtood, he ſeemed very ſorry that he had ſo put him to death; for that he was his own Siſters Son. Bajazet following the courſe of his Victory, won Iconium, Larenda, Nigde, with all the reſt of Aladin his Kingdom. About this time alſo, Amaſia the great Metropolitical City of Capadocia, was by the Prince thereof delivered unto Bajazet, being too weak himſelf to defend the ſame againſt the force of Caſi-Burchanidin, Prince of the great and ſtrong City of Sebaſtia, his Enemy; now grown to be a man of great Power in that part of Aſia, and had ſollicited the Sultan of Egypt to aid him againſt Bajazet. Whereupon Bajazet returning from the Conqueſt of Caramania, led his Army towards Sebaſtia, where the Citizens had a little before deprived Caſi-Burchanidin of his Government, for his Cruelty, and placed his Son in his ſtead; but in ſhort time no leſs weary of the Son, than before of the Father, they with like inconſtancy ſent word to Bajazet, That if he would come that way, they would yield unto him the City; upon whoſe approach, Caſis (his Son) for fear fled out of the City, to Prince Naſradin his Brother-in-Law. After whoſe departure, the Citizens according to their promiſe, delivered the City unto Bajazet at his coming, wherein he left Solyman his eldeſt Son Governor. And ſo having in this notable expedition conquered the Kingdom of Caramania, and taken the great Cities of Amaſia and Sebaſtia, with moſt part of Capadocia, and all that part of Aſia which the Turks call Rumilia Aſiatica, he returned to Pruſa and there wintered.

Bajazet invadeth Iſſendiar Prince of Caſtamona.

The next Spring, Bajazet hearing that his old Enemy Cutrun Bajazet Prince of Caſtamonia and Pontus, was dead, came to Caſtamona with a great Army; which Iſfendiar (Cutrun Bajazets Son, and then Prince of that Country) hearing, fled out of the City of Synope, a little City upon the coaſt of the Euxine; from whence he ſent an Embaſſador to Bajazet, humbly requeſting him, to ſuffer him to have that little City, as his Servant to live in, (which he was ſure he would otherwiſe beſtow upon ſome other of his Servants) and not to ſeek the innocent blood of the Son for the Fathers offence. Which his requeſt Bajazet, moved with pity, eaſily granted; yet nevertheleſs took from him Caſtamona, with the greateſt part of his Dominion in Pontus, which he gave to his Son Solyman. At the ſame time he violently oppreſſed the Prince Germean, and took from him the Cities of Deſpotopolis and Hierapolis, with all the reſt of his Dominion.

The Prince of Menteſia, long before driven out of his Country by Bajazet, (as is before declared) and having all this while made his abode at Caſtamona, doubting now of his own ſafety, after the death of his good Friend Cutrun Bajazet, in the Habit of an Hermit fled to the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane.

Bajazet returning to Pruſa, there built a magnificent Mahometan Temple; during which work he with great Superſtition forbore drinking of Wine, repoſing himſelf with the Company of grave and learned men, and the adminiſtration of Juſtice; whereby he greatly won the Hearts of his Subjects, and had now ſo inlarged his Kingdom, that all Kings and Princes bordering upon him ſtood in great fear of him.

It fortuned about this time, that Achmetes King of Bagdat (or New Babylon) and Eiracum, with Joſephus Niger King of Colchis, inforced with the violent incurſions of Tamerlane and his Tartars, for ſafeguard of their Lives were glad to flie into Syria: where they being diſcovered, were both caſt in Priſon by the commandment of the Egyptian Sultan, who then commanded over Syria: from whence they afterwards hardly eſcaping, fled to Bajazets Court. Where after Achmetes had ſtaid two months, he by the aid of Bajazet recovered the poſſeſſion of Eiracum part of his own Inheritance. Joſephus the other Mahometan King having tarried in Bajazets Court eight Months, at length procured him to invade the Dominions of the Egyptian Sultan; in which expedition he mightily prevailed, and having ſlain the Egyptian Sultans General, and diſcomfited his Forces, took the City of Malaty or Meletine in Armenia, with Diorige, Derende, and Bexene, taken from the Turcomans, and ſpoiled all the Country thereabouts. From thence marching with his Army toward Erznitzane, the Prince thereof called Tachretin met him upon the way, yielding his City and Country into his Power; which Bajazet preſently gave to Joſephus Niger; who after he had ſix days enjoyed this new Government, finding the People unwilling to be governed by him a Stranger, ſurrendred the ſame again into the Hands of him that gave it. Whereupon the Citizens of Erznitzane humbly requeſted of Bajazet, That they might be again governed by their old Prince Tachretin, now his Vaſſal. Which thing he at their earneſt requeſt granted; but taking his Wife and Children as a Pledg of Loyalty, ſent them away to Pruſa, where they were all not long after made away.

The Mahometan Princes of Aſia oppreſſed by Bajazet, diſguiſed flie unto Tamerlane for aid.

When Bajazet had now many years thus mightily prevailed againſt the Chriſtian Princes in Romania, Bulgaria, Boſna, Theſſalia, Valachia, and other places of Europe, as is before declared, and inflamed with inſatiable Ambition, had in worſe manner oppreſſed the Mahometan Kings and Princes of Aſia (of whom ſome were by him ſlain, ſome driven into exile, ſome impriſoned, and otherſome brought into ſuch ſubjection, that they lived as it were but at his Devotion) and was now grown to that greatneſs, that in the Pride of his Heart he ſtood in fear of no man, but was (as he thought) a terror unto the World, having under his obeiſance great and large Dominions in Europe, but far greater in Aſia; it fortuned that divers of theſe miſerable and diſcontented Mahometan Princes, by great fortune, as if it had been by appointment, to meet together at the Court of the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane, whether they were fled for Relief and Succor. The Prince Germian Ogli, after long impriſonment in the Caſtle of Ipſala in Europe, brake Priſon, and with Hiſſar-Beg his great Counſellor and Priſon-Fellow, conſorted themſelves with a Company of loytring Companions, roaming from place to place, delighting the Country People with their Apiſh Toys; in which Company he paſſed Helleſpontus, as a Bearward, and at length with much ado came to Tamerlane his Court; whither the Prince of Menteſia was come before in the habit of an Hermit (as is aforeſaid) with his Head and Beard ſhaven; Aidin Ogli paſſing through the Country as a Pedlar, with a Pack at his Back, came thither alſo; the Prince Tachretin as a Servingman, came attending upon the Prince Iſfendiar; who came alſo, but in ſome better faſhion than the reſt, as an Embaſſador from ſome other Prince. All theſe poor Princes, with divers others in like miſery, in ſhort time arrived at Samarcand (Great Tamerlane his Court) every one particularly complaining of his own Private grief, and altogether earneſtly requeſting that mighty Prince to take upon him their defence, and to revenge the wrong done unto them by the Turkiſh Tyrant Bajazet. Whoſe pitiful complaints much moved the Noble Tartarian; but eſpecially the long and wrongful impriſonment of Germian Ogli; and the pitiful complaint and moan of Tachretin, who had of late loſt his Wife and Children by the Cruelty of Bajazet. Yet in this matter of ſo great and important conſequence, Tamerlane made no great ſhew of his forwardneſs, (although he was by Nature in nothing more delighted, than in relieving of the diſtreſſed, and chaſtiſing of the proud) but coldly anſwered theſe Princes, That he could not tell whether all were ſo as they had reported of Bajazet, or not, but that he well knew him to be a very zealous King in ſetting forth of the Mahometan Religion, and that he had therefore made great Wars upon the Chriſtians, in which godly cauſe (he ſaid) perhaps they had refuſed to aſſiſt him, or elſe had given him ſome other greater occaſion of offence, to him unknown; For I can hardly believe (ſaid he) that ſo great and religious a Prince as he, would without juſt and ſufficient cauſe, offer ſuch violence as you complain of, eſpecially unto you his Neighbour Princes, and of the ſame Religion with himſelf; nevertheleſs, whatſoever I intend concerning your requeſt (ſaid Tamerlane) I will ſend firſt an Embaſſador unto him, to underſtand more of him and his proceedings, before I reſolve upon any thing; with which anſwer he willed them until then to hold themſelves contented. But as Tamerlane was about to have diſpatched his Embaſſador to Bajazet, he was advertiſed, that Achmetes late King of New Babylon, and Joſephus King of Colchis, both by him driven out of their Kingdoms, having broken out of Priſon from the Sultan of Egypt, were now come to Bajazet his Court, to crave his aid and aſſiſtance; wherefore he deferred to ſend his Embaſſador, ſuſpecting that Bajazet incited by theſe two exiled Kings, would firſt in their quarrel begin to make War upon him. But not long after, underſtanding that they were both again departed from his Court, as is before declared; he then diſpatcht his Embaſſador to Bajazet, with many rich Gifts and Preſents; courteouſly requeſting him, the rather for his ſake to deal kindly with theſe poor Mahometan Princes, his Friends; as alſo with the Greek Emperor Emanuel his Ally, for whom he was now become an Interceſſor unto him. Some report alſo, that he beſides this, requeſted to have the two aforeſaid Mahometan Kings of Bagdat and Colchis delivered unto him; and withal ſeemed not a little to diſlike of Bajazet his proceedings againſt the Turcomans his Friends. But Bajazet being a Prince of a great and haughty Spirit, and unaccuſtomed to hear of any thing that fitted not his humor, highly offended with this Embaſſage, in great ſcorn rejected the Preſents by Tamerlane ſent unto him, and ſpecially certain Garments which Tamerlane after the manner of thoſe Eaſtern Nations,had in kindneſs amongſt other things ſent him; willing the Embaſſador to bid his Maſter meddle with his own matters, and to preſcribe Laws unto his own Subjects, and not unto him, with whom he had nought to do; and to ſend his Rags for Preſents unto his Inferiors, and not to Princes of greater Power and State than himſelf. Adding thereunto many other words full of deſpight and diſdain, affording him no better Stile than the plain name of Tamerlane; calling him the Huſband of a Whore, if he met him not in the Field; and wiſhing unto himſelf again, to take unto him his thrice divorced Wife, after ſhe had been polluted by another man (as the greateſt diſhonor that might be) if he failed to meet him whereſoever he durſt to dare him Battel. Which proud anſwer of the Turk, by the Embaſſador reported unto Tamerlane, and aggravated by Axalla (a Chriſtian of the Race of the Genowaies, born at Capha, and then one of the greateſt Counſellors about him, and the Greek Emperors great Friend) was ſo evil taken by him, that all other things ſet apart, he reſolved to go againſt the Turk, and to take in hand that War, as of all other the fitteſt for the increaſe of his Honour and Glory. Beſides that, he thought it not in reaſon fit for the Greatneſs of the Tartarian Empire, to ſuffer ſuch an unquiet Neighbour to grow great; as ſtill encroaching upon other the weak Princes confining to him, and adding Conqueſts unto Conqueſts; and yet never the more contented, might in the end prove dangerous unto his own Eſtate and Soveraignty; a common care to ſuch as be themſelves great, and mounted up unto the higheſt degrees of Worldly Honor, to have in Jealouſie and Diſtruſt the ſuddain riſing of others near or farther off, as perilous or diſgraceful to themſelves, or their Eſtate; whoſe growing Greatneſs they therefore ſeek by all means to hinder; as did now the mighty Tamerlane the proceedings and increaſing of the great Othoman King, Bajazet; and the rather being continually prickt forward ſo to do, by the ſollicitation of the Greek Emperor Emanuel, the other oppreſſed Mahometan Princes, and by the great Captain Axalla (as is aforeſaid) a Chriſtian; of whom for all that Tamerlane himſelf, a Mahometan, for the great Fidelity, Valor and Vertue he found in him, made no ſmall reckoning, but was contented even in his greateſt and moſt weighty Affairs to be by him adviſed; diſliking of no man for his Religion whatſoever, ſo as he did worſhip but one only God, Creator of Heaven and Earth, and of all that therein is; being himſelf of opinion, That God in Eſſence one, and in himſelf immutable, without change or diverſity; yet for the manifeſting of his Omnipotency and Power, as he had created in the World ſundry kinds of People, much differing both in Nature, Manners and Condidition, and yet all framed to the Image of himſelf; ſo was he alſo contented to be of them diverſly ſerved, according to the diverſity of their Natures and Manners; ſo that they worſhipt none other ſtrange Gods, but him alone, the Maker and Creator of all things; which was the cauſe that he ſuffered the uſe of all Religions within the Countries ſubject to his Obedience, were they not meer Atheiſts, Idolaters, or Worſhippers of ſtrange and vain gods.

Tamerlane his opinion concerning the diverſity of Religions.

Neither was proud Bajazet as one ignorant of the Power or Purpoſe of Tamerlane, in the mean time idle, but ſtill proſecuted his good Fortune for the inlarging of his Empire, and increaſing of his Strength; wiſely deeming (as the truth was) whatſoever Meſſages were ſent to him from Tamerlane, to be no other than meer Threatnings and Forewarnings of his more dangerous Purpoſes and Deſigns againſt him and his State; which he was ſo far from fearing as that to provoke him the more, he ſpared no intemperate Speech, which might move him to Wrath; wiſhing (as it ſhould ſeem) for nothing more, than to meet him in the Field, there to try the fortune of a Battel with him. So weak is our foreſight of our Fortunes to come, and the reach of our Underſtanding for the apprehenſion or declining of the fatal doom even preſently hanging over our Heads; as that we oftentimes through ignorance moſt deſirouſly wiſh for thoſe things which are unto us the chief occaſions of our utter ruin and overthrow.

But here before we enter into farther Diſcourſe of the mortal War betwixt theſe two ſo puiſſant Princes, it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe to ſtep a little out of the way, to ſee what this mighty Tamerlane (of whom ſo many Princes craved Aid) was, who living, held the Eaſt in ſuch awe, as that he was commonly called, The Wrath of God, and Terror of the World; which he then filled with the glory of his Name. Moſt Hiſtoriographers report him to have been poorly born, of baſe and obſcure Parents; and ſo himſelf alſo in his Youth to have lived as a poor Shepherd or Herdſman in the Mountains; where conſorting himſelf with other ſturdy Companions of like quality and diſpoſition, ſuch as there lived by robbing of Merchants and other Paſſengers, he became a maſterful Thief amongſt them; unto whom other ſuch leud Mates dayly ſtill more and more reſorting, he in ſhort time grew (as they ſay) to that greatneſs, that he is reported to have been of ſuch power, as never man but he ever yet came unto. A matter almoſt incredible; for albeit that the Roman Empire, yea and this great Empire of the Turks alſo, with ſome others, had their beginnings not much better or greater, the one under Romulus, and the other under Othoman; yet grew they not as on the ſuddain, in their times to any great luſtre (neither was it poſſible for them of ſo ſmall beginnings ſo to do) but by many degrees, and that in long time; every of the ſucceeding Princes, according to their Fortunes, adding ſomething to their State, before it could be made great; whereas he (by their report) contrary to the courſe of things both natural and civil (which from their ſmall beginnings grow to no notable perfection or greatneſs, but by degrees, and that in the long revolution of time) taking his beginning of nothing, grew upon the ſuddain to be a burthen and terror unto the World. Wherein our late Hiſtoriographers ſeem too much to have followed the report of the Turks, who by him brought low, and their Kingdom almoſt in one Battel ſubverted, report nothing ſimply of him; but in what they may, detracting from his worthy praiſes, wrongfully charge him with many untruths, not concerning his Parentage only, but even in the courſe of his whole life alſo, making him (as they would have the World to believe) firſt to have been a very abject among men; and then for his inhumane Cruelty a very Monſter in Nature, or (as it was long before, but more truly ſaid of another great one much like himſelf) a Lump of Earth tempered with Blood. Which incredible Reports concerning ſo great a Monarch, I liſt not to follow, as too full of diſhonour, eſpecially whereas others of no leſs credit than they, with far more modeſty and greater probability report of him the greateſt honour that may be. He was (as they and the others alſo ſay) born at Samarchand, the chief City of the Zagataian Tartars, pleaſantly ſituated upon the River Juxartes; his Father was called Zain Cham, or as ſome others will, Og, Prince of the Zagataian Tartars, and of the Country of Sachetay (ſometime part of the famous Kingdom of Parthia) third in deſcent from Zingis, the great and fortunate Leader of the Tartars, before in the former part of this Hiſtory remembred. Which Og, as a Prince of a peaceable Nature (accounting it no leſs honour quietly to keep the Countries left him by his Father, than with much trouble and no leſs danger to ſeek how to enlarge the ſame) long lived in moſt happy reſt with his Subjects no leſs happy than himſelf; not ſo much ſeeking after the hoording up of Gold and Silver (things of that Nation not regarded) as contenting himſelf with the increaſe and profit of his Flocks of Sheep, and Herds of Cattle; then, and yet alſo, the principal revenues of the Tartar Kings and Princes; which happily gave occaſion to ſome, ignorant of the manner and cuſtom

The baſe opinion ſome have, concerning the Birth and Riſing of Tamerlane.

The cauſe why ſome have reported him to have been a Shepherd or Herdſman.

cuſtom of thoſe Nothern Nations and Countries, to account them all for Shepherds and Herdſmen; and ſo alſo to have reported of this mighty Prince, as of a Shepherds Son, or Herdſman himſelf; vainly meaſuring his Nobility by the homely manner of his People and Subjects, and not by the Honour of his Houſe, and Heroical Vertues, ſuch as were hardly to be found greater in any Prince of that or other former Ages. His peaceable Father now well ſtricken in years and weary of the World, delivered up unto him (not yet paſt fifteen years old) the Government of his Kingdom, joyning unto him two of his moſt faithful Counſellors, Odmar and Ali, to aſſiſt him in the Government of his State (retiring himſelf unto a ſolitary life, the more at quiet to ſerve God, and ſo to end his days in Peace;) which two his truſty Servants and grave Counſellors he dearly loved whilſt they lived, and much honoured the remembrance of them being dead. The firſt proof of his Fortune and Valour, was againſt the Muſcovite, for ſpoiling of a City which had put it ſelf under his protection; and for entring of his Country; and for proclaiming of War againſt him; whom he in a great Battel overthrew, having ſlain five and twenty thouſand of the Muſcovites Footmen, and between fifteen and ſixteen thouſand Horſemen, with the loſs of ſcarce eight thouſand Horſemen, and four thouſand Footmen of his own. After which Battel he beholding ſo many thouſands of men there dead upon the ground, was ſo far from rejoycing thereat, that turning himſelf to one of his Familiars, he lamented the condition of ſuch as commanded over great Armies, commending his Fathers quiet courſe of life; accounting him happy in ſeeking for reſt, and the other moſt unhappy, which by the deſtruction of their own kind, ſought to procure their own glory; proteſting himſelf even from his Heart to be grieved to ſee ſuch ſad tokens of his Victory. With this overthrow the Muſcovite diſcouraged, ſent Embaſſadors to him for peace, which upon ſuch honorable Conditions as pleaſed him to ſet down, was by him granted, and ſo the Peace concluded. Now the great Cham of Tartaria (his Fathers Brother) being grown old, and out of hope of any more Children, moved with the Fame of his Nephew, after this Victory ſent him divers Preſents, and withal offering him his only Daughter in marriage, and with her to proclaim him Heir apparent unto his Empire; as in right he was, being his Brothers Son, and the Daughters not at all ſucceeding in thoſe Empires. Which ſo great an offer Tamerlane gladly accepted, and ſo the marriage was afterwards with great Triumph at the old Emperors Court ſolemnized; and he proclaimed Heir apparent unto that great Empire. Thus was Tamerlane indeed made great, being ever after this marriage by the old Emperor his Uncle, and now his Father-in-Law, ſo long as he lived, notably ſupported, and after his death ſucceeding him alſo in that ſo mighty an Empire. Yet in the mean time wanted not this worthy Prince the envious Competitors of theſe his ſo great Honours; inſomuch, that whilſt by the advice and perſwaſion of the old Emperor, he was taking in hand to make War againſt the great King of China (who had as then gon far beyond his bounds) and ſo was now well onwards on his way, he was by the Conſpiracy of Calix (a man of greateſt Power and Authority in the great Cham his Court) almoſt thruſt out of his new Empire; Calix with a right puiſſant Army having already ſeized upon the great City of Cambalu, and the Citizens alſo generally favouring thoſe his traiterous proceedings, as diſdaining to be governed by the Zagatian Tartar. For redreſs whereof, Tamerlane was enforced with the greateſt part of his Army to return, and meeting with the Rebel (who then had in his Army fourſcore thouſand Horſe, and an hundred thouſand Foot) in a great and mortal Battel (wherein of the one ſide and of the other were more than fifty thouſand men ſlain) overthrew him (though not without the great danger of his own Perſon, as being there himſelf beaten down to the ground) took him Priſoner, and afterwards beheaded him. Which ſo dangerous a Rebellion, with the death of the Traitor, and the chief of the Conſpirators repreſſed, and his State in the newneſs thereof by this Victory well confirmed, he proceeded in his intended War againſt the great King of China; brake down the ſtrong Wall, which the Chinoies had made four hundred Leagues long betwixt the Mountains, for the repreſſing of the incurſions of the Tartars, entred their Country, and meeting with the King, leading after him three hundred and fifty thouſand Men (whereof there were an hundred and fifty thouſand Horſemen, and the reſt on Foot) in a great and dreadful Battel, with the ſlaughter of ſixty thouſand of his Men, overcame him, and took him Priſoner; whom for all that he (in the courſe of ſo great a Victory wiſely moderating his fortune) ſhortly after ſet again at liberty; yet ſo, as that having before taken from him the one half of his Kingdom, and therein left Odmar his truſty Lieutenant, with a ſufficient Power for the reſtraining of the proud King, if he ſhould again begin to raiſe any new ſtirs; and withal impoſed ſuch other conditions as pleaſed himſelf, with the yearly Tribute of three hundred thouſand Crowns, he well provided for the aſſuring of thoſe his new Conqueſts; and ſo in Triumph returned with Victory unto the old Emperor his Father-in-Law at Cambalu, not a little glad to ſee both him and his Daughter, who had in all thoſe Wars ſtill accompanied him. But leaving him, now thus by Birth great, by his Fortune greater, but by his Vertue greateſt of all, (as able now to draw after him almoſt the whole Power of the Eaſt) let us again return thither from whence we have for the better knowledge of him, thus with him digreſſed.

amerne marieth the aughter nd Heir the great ham of artary.

The War againſt the Turkiſh Sultan Bajazet (as is aforeſaid) by Tamerlane reſolved upon, he ſent Axalla the great Captain to his Country of Sachetay (called of ſome Zagatay) to give beginning to the aſſembling of his Forces from all parts; to the end, that with the firſt of the Spring he might ſet forward for the relief of ſo many diſtreſſed Princes, and the abating of the Pride of ſo great and mighty a Tyrant as was Bajazet. Now had Tamerlane procured from the great Tartarian Emperor, his Uncle and Father-in-Law, an hundred thouſand Footmen, and fourſcore thouſand Horſemen, hoping to have as many more from Sachetay his own Country, beſides the Lords that for his honours ſake would accompany him in that his ſo honourable an expedition, from whom he made account alſo of fifty thouſand men more which they would bring unto him, and divers other great ſupplies which he expected from other places alſo; wherewith he doubted not well to perform what he had ſo honourably determined to take in hand, for the abating of the Othoman Pride; for which and other ſuch like, he was (as he would oftentimes ſay) by God himſelf appointed; ſo taking his leave of the old Emperor his Father-in-Law, and of the Princeſs his Wiſe (then left behind him for the comfort of her aged Father) he departed from Cambalu towards Samarcand, the place of his Birth and Seat of his Empire; leaving behind him the Forces brought from the great Emperor his Uncle, to come after him to Ozara, where he had appointed the general meeting of his Army. At which time amongſt other Princes that thither brought or ſent their Supplies, the great Muſcovite being requeſted ſo to do, promiſed to ſend him fifteen thouſand Horſe, with a certain ſum of Mony, and leave for his Army to paſs through ſo much of his Territories as ſhould be neceſſary; all which he afterwards performed unto Tamerlane, being glad that he did ſet upon others, rather than on himſelf; and that ſo great a preparation ſhould fall upon them, whoſe greatneſs was as dreadful and dangerous unto him as unto any other. All the Earth almoſt at that time being aſtoniſhed at the ſuddain greatneſs of this Othoman King, and the happy ſucceſs he had in all his Wars; not the leaſt cauſe that moved Tamerlane to oppoſe himſelf againſt him, deeming it much better to go and ſet upon him in his new Conqueſts, than to ſtay until he therein ſetled, were come nearer to him, and ſo ſhould debate the quarrel within his own Empire, to his dammage. A good and ſound reſolution; firſt in that it tended to the deſtruction of the Enemies Country; and then, that if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe with him than well, his Country ſhould not thereby receive any ſuch aſtoniſhment as if the danger were nearer or within the Bowels of the ſame. Now in the mean time that Tamerlane lay at Samarcand, Axalla the great Captain and Tamerlane his Lieutenant General, had aſſembled all the Army at Ozara. Whereof Tamerlane underſtanding, ſent for him to Samarcand, to confer with him about the ſetting forward of his Army. For although he were ſtill accompanied with great renowned Princes, yet were they no body in compariſon of Axalla, whoſe ſound Counſel had won him ſuch credit with his Lord and Maſter, as by his advice he did all things, and without him nothing; which his ſo great Authority and Favour with his Prince, wanted not the envy of the Court, but that his great Vertues, and rare ſound Courteſie (in ſo great Fortune) together with ſo many worthy ſervices as he had done, ſupported him againſt the malice of the ſame. He by the commandment of Tamerlane, leaving the charge of the Army at Ozara, with the Prince of Thanais, another of Tamerlanes great Captains, came himſelf to Samarcand, and there at large diſcourſed with him, about the eſtate and order of his Army. And ſhortly after, departing with Axalla and the reſt from Samarcand, for to go to Ozara the place where all his Army met; being come thither, entred into a great conſultation with his moſt expert Captains, about the taking of his journy and conducting of his Army; as whether it were better to lead the ſame by the Coaſts of the Muſcovite directly towards Capha, or elſe on the other ſide of the Caſpian Sea by the skirts of Perſia; where after long diſcourſe and ſundry opinions with their reaſons delivered, it was at laſt reſolved (although the way were the longer) to paſs by the Muſcovite, ſo to come to the Georgians, and to Trebizonda, and from thence to enter into the Othoman King his Country. And ſo ſetting forward from Ozara, he came at length to Maranis, where he ſtaied three days looking for the Forces which Prince Odmar ſhould ſend him from China, not long before by him conquered; whereof he there received news, and there cauſed his Army to be paid, and a general Muſter thereof to be taken. He had alſo there news of the aid the Muſcovite did ſend him; and cauſed an infinite quantity of Victuals, and moſt part of his Furniture to be conveighed by the Caſpian Sea, being a great commodity and eaſe to his Army, which marching by Land, was of neceſſity to paſs ſome twenty Leagues through places deſtitute both of Victuals and Water. Tamerlane all the way coaſting along the Sea ſhore, paſſed the time in hunting, his Army not coming near him by ten Leagues, which was ſo great, that it extended it ſelf full twenty Leagues. Coming to the River of Edel, he ſtaid at Zarazich whilſt his Army paſſed the River at Mechet, and two other Bridges which he had cauſed to be made for that purpoſe. Now the Circaſſians, and Georgians, hearing of the approach of Tamerlane with his huge Army, by their Embaſſadors offered him all the help and aſſiſtance they could in his journey as he paſſed that way. Theſe Georgians were and yet are Chriſtians, a great and warlike People, of long time Tributaries unto the Greek Emperors; and afterwards ſometimes Tributaries, and ſometimes Confederates unto the Perſians; but always Enemies unto the Turks, by whom of late (and in our remembrance) but eſpecially by Amurath the Third, they together with ſome part of the Perſian Kingdom, have been grievouſly oppreſſed, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory may appear. Of theſe warlike People, glad of Tamerlane his coming for the repreſſing of the Turks, Axalla drew great numbers unto the ſervice of his Prince, who not a little eſteemed of them, being all tall men, very beautiful, of great Strength and Courage, and withal moſt expert Souldiers; as having oftentimes reſiſted the Power of the Othoman Kings, by reaſon of the advantage their Country affordeth them, being very rough and hard to come into. By theſe kind People, Tamerlane was in every place honourably entertained, and his great Army with all neceſſaries plentifully relieved. In paſſing through which Country and the reſt as he marched, he took ſuch order with his Souldiers, that none of the People whereby he paſſed, were any thing by them injured; inſomuch that if a Souldier had taken but an Apple, or other thing of like value from any man, he died therefore, ſo ſevere were his Commands. It is reported that one of his Souldiers, having taken a little Milk from a Country Woman, and ſhe thereof complaining, he cauſed the ſaid Souldier to be preſently killed, and his Stomach to be ript; where the Milk that he had of late drunk being found, he contented the Woman, and ſo ſent her away; who had otherwiſe undoubtedly died for her falſe accuſation, had it not ſo appeared. Which his ſo great ſeverity, and in other like caſes, was of many accounted for extream Cruelty; yet was it indeed the wholeſom preſervation of his Army, being ſo great, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible to have found ſufficient Victuals for the relief thereof; whereof for all that, there was no want, either of any thing elſe neceſſary for the uſe of man, his Camp being ſtill as a moſt populous and well governed City, ſtored with all manner of things; whereunto both Artificers and Merchants, from far Countries reſorted with their Commodities and Merchandiſe, as to ſome famous Mart; and the Country People, without fear from every place brought in their Country Commodities, for which they received preſent Mony, and ſo in ſafety again departed.

departed. So marching on, he at length came to Bachichieh where he ſtaid to refreſh his Army eight days, and there again took a general muſter thereof, wherein were found (as moſt write) four hundred thouſand Horſe, and ſix hundred thouſand Foot; or as ſome others that were there preſent affirm, three hundred thouſand Horſemen, and five hundred thouſand Foot of all Nations. Unto whom he gave there a general Pay, and as his manner was, made unto them an Oration, informing them of ſuch orders as he would have kept, to the end they might the better obſerve the ſame; with much other Military Diſcipline, whereof he was very curious with his Captains. At which time alſo, it was lawful for every common Souldier to behold him with more boldneſs than on other days, foraſmuch as he did for that time, and ſuch like, lay aſide his Imperial Majeſty, and ſhew himſelf more familiar unto them.

Now could he hardly be perſwaded, that Bajazet having ſubdued the moſt part of Grecia, diſtreſſed the Greek Emperor, and ſo a great means to recover whatſoever he ſhould loſe in Aſia, would be ſo adventurous as to come over the Straits out of Europe, to try the Fortune of a Battel with him; but rather warily protract the time, to weary him at length with Wants, that in a ſtrange Country drew ſuch a world of People after him. Wherein he found himſelf much deceived; for having paſſed the Georgian Country, and being come to Buyſabuich, Axalla (whom he had not ſeen in eight days before, becauſe he led the Head of the Army) came unto him with ſuch News as he knew would be right welcome unto him; which was, that Bajazet had raiſed his Siege of Conſtantinople (as indeed he had) for to come and defend his new Conqueſts in Aſia; and that he was certainly reſolved, to come to a day of Battel, not ſo much truſting unto the multitude of his Army, as to the Valour and Experience of his Souldiers, being all men of long time well trained up in the Wars. At which unexpected news, Tamerlane greatly rejoyced; yet without inſolence or vaunting, but rather with the countenance of ſuch an one as judged the events of Battels to be (as they are) always doubtful; ſaying ſometimes, that a ſmall number well conducted, did oftentime carry away the Victory from the confuſed multitude. Three days he ſtaied at Buyſabuich, and cauſed his Souldiers continually to march forward, which at Garga and Chiuſerig paſſed over the River Euphrates; which he did the rather to maintain his Army upon the Spoil of the Enemy, in attending his coming, than upon himſelf, or his Allies. All the Cities that yielded unto him by the way as he marched, he favourably received; the other that refuſed to ſubmit themſelves unto his Obedience, he uſed with all extremity; eſpecially the great and ſtrong City of Sebaſtia, where certain of the Forerunners of his Army were by the Turks there in Garriſon cut off and ſlain, and the Gates of the City as it were in contempt of him, ſet wide open; wherewith Tamerlane offended, ſent out certain of his Tartarian Horſemen, commanding them on pain of his Diſpleaſure, ſo to bear themſelves againſt their Enemies, as that he might at his coming either find the City taken, or the Gates thereof ſhut againſt him; for he had his men at ſo great command, that no danger was unto them more dreadful than his Diſpleaſure, neither did he puniſh any thing ſo ſeverely as Cowardiſe; inſomuch, that if in his diſport of hunting the wild Beaſt, any did for fear give way to the Lyon or Bear, and ſlew him not, was ſure to die therefore himſelf; and to turn his Back upon the Enemy, was no leſs danger than to run upon his own death. Now the Turks in Garriſon at Sebaſtia, ſeeing theſe Tartarian Horſemen marching towards the City, making little account of them, for that they were not in number many, iſſued out for to meet them; where they were ſo furiouſly charged by theſe few Horſemen, that they were glad to retire, and for haſt to ſhut part of their own men out of the City, leſt the Enemy following them at their Heels, ſhould have entred the Gates together with them. Which Turks ſo ſhut out, were by the Tartarians ſlain at the Gates of the City. Shortly after came Tamerlane with all his Army, and ſate down before the City, where he lay ſtill ſeven days, not making ſhew of any violence at all; the Defendants becauſe the City was of great Strength, all that while thinking that he had intended by long Siege to diſtreſs the ſame, and the more becauſe of his long lying ſtill. But about the eighth day, the Walls and Towers of the City in many places undermined, were ſuddainly overthrown, leaving large breaches for the Enemy to enter. Wherewith the Turks in the City diſmaied, forthwith yielded the City to Tamerlane, in hope ſo to have ſaved their lives; but he (as the Turks report) being entred the City, commanded a great number of deep Pits to be digged, and all the People of the City, without reſpect of Age, Sex, or Condition, to be thrown into the ſame, and there buried quick. Which done, the City was by his commandment utterly raſed alſo. After that, calling unto him Malcozzius, the Governor of the City, whom he had for that purpoſe only ſpared, he commanded him to go and tell his Maſter what was happened to his ſtrong City of Sebaſtia, and what he had there himſelf ſeen. Of which tragical action, Malcozzius having made true relation unto Bajazet, was by him demanded, whether of the two Armies he thought bigger or ſtronger; for now Bajazet had aſſembled a mighty Army of three hundred thouſand men, or as ſome report of three hundred thouſand Horſmen, and two hundred thouſand Foot. Whereunto Malcozzius having before craved pardon, anſwered, that it could not be, but that Tamerlane might in reaſon have the greater number, for that he was a Commander of far greater Countries. Wherewith proud Bajazet offended, in great choler replied, Out of doubt, the ſight of the Tartarian hath made this Coward ſo afraid, that he thinketh every Enemy to be two.

Sebaſtia yielded to Tamerlane.

Moſt of the Latine Hiſtories report, that when Tamerlane had taken Sebaſtia, he put all the men to the Sword, and bringing the Women and Children into the Fields, without the City, there over-ran them with his Horſemen, excepting ſome few which were reſerved for Priſoners. As alſo that Bajazet there loſt his eldeſt Son Erthogrul (of ſome called Orthobules) whoſe death with the loſs of the City, ſo much grieved him (as it is reported) that marching with his great Army againſt Tamerlane, and by the way hearing a Country Shepherd merrily repoſing himſelf with his homely Pipe, as he ſate upon the ſide of a Mountain feeding his poor Flock; ſtanding ſtill a great while liſtening unto him, to the great admiration of many, at laſt fetching a deep ſigh, brake forth into theſe words; O happy Shepherd, which hadſt neither Orthobules nor Sebaſtia to loſe; bewraying therein his own diſcontentment; and yet withal ſhewing, That worldly Bliſs conſiſteth not ſo much in poſſeſſing of much, ſubject unto danger, as joyning in a little, contentment devoid of fear. Howbeit the Turks themſelves reporting the taking of Sebaſtia, ſpeak not of Orthobules at all, but give him loſt ſix years before, in the Wars againſt Caſi Burchaniden; and lieth buried by his Father at Pruſa. In this City of Sebaſtia was loſt twelve thouſand Turks, Men, Women and Children, as their Hiſtories report. The reſt of the Cities all the way as Tamerlane marched, warned by the deſtruction of Sebaſtia, yielded themſelves for fear of like danger; the Citizens whereof he courteouſly uſed, eſpecially the Chriſtians, whom he ſet at liberty, in reſpect of Emanuel the Greek Emperor, whom he ſeemed wholly therein to gratifie. But he had not gon far into the Turks Dominion, but that he was certainly advertiſed, how that Bajazet, with a great Army was coming againſt him, and now within thirty Leagues of him; which cauſed him after that time, to march with his Army more cloſely. Axalla leading the Vantguard, ſent forth Chianſon Prince of Ciarcan, with four thouſand Parthian Horſemen, to get knowledge of the Turks Army, and where Bajazet lay, as alſo what Country that was beyond Sennas, and if he could learn any thing thereof, to make relation of it unto him. This Prince of Ciarcan was Tamerlanes near Kinſman, a man of great reputation, and next unto Axalla, in whoſe abſence he had the commanding of the Avantguard, his charge; who alſo ſent before him another Parthian Captain with five hundred Horſemen. So he had not ridden ten Leagues but that he heard news of Bajazets coming, and having ſurpriſed Sennas, underſtood there the certain eſtate of the Turks Army, which was then at Tataia, and ſo marching forward. Whereof Tamerlane certified, commanded him not to retire from that place, until he did ſee the arrival of the Enemy, and thereof to give him advertiſement every hour; being himſelf reſolved to paſs on no further, as come to a fair large Plain, and a Country of advantage for the order of his Battel; for he knew that his Army was far greater than Bajazets, and therefore he made choice of thoſe great Plains. Yet for that his Army conſiſted of divers Nations, and withal conſidering that he was not to fight againſt the Chinois, a ſoft effeminate People, (as of late) but againſt the Turks, a moſt warlike Nation, and well acquainted with all manner of Fights and Martial Stratagems, he thought it good to be well adviſed how he proceeded againſt them. Wherefore he preſently ſent for Axalla, with him to view the ſaid place, and to have his opinion, Whether it would be for his advantage or not, there to ſtay? who not miſliking of the choice of the place, yet adviſed him alſo to keep Sennas ſo long as he poſſibly could; and ſo ſent word unto them that were therein, upon the approach of the Enemy to ſet fire upon the ſame, and ſo to withdraw themſelves from thence, to the end that the Enemy ſhould not have any deſire to incamp there, but come ſtill forward near to thoſe Plains where Tamerlane deſired to fight, eſpecially for that he was ſtronger in Horſe than Bajazet. Thus the Turks ſtill marching on, thought to have ſurpriſed ſome of their Enemies in Sennas; who as ſoon as they drew near, retired all, excepting ſome hundred left of purpoſe to fire the Town; who having performed the ſame, retired of purpoſe in great diſorder. Now the Prince of Ciarcan had divided his Forces into two parts, and given commandment to the firſt, that as ſoon as they perceived the Enemies to purſue the hundred Horſe that ſo diſorderly of purpoſe fled, they ſhould receive them, and ſo retire all together. He in the mean time with the reſt of his Power ſtood cloſe in a Valley, near to a Wood ſide, unſeen at all. Where having ſuffered two thouſand of the Enemies Horſe (the Vantcurriers of the Turks Army) to paſs by him, he following them in the tail, charged them home, the other which before retired, now turning upon them alſo; ſo that the Turks ſeeing themſelves thus beſet, and hardly laid unto both before and behind, as men diſcouraged fled; in which Flight moſt of them were ſlain, and the reſt taken Priſoners. This was the firſt incounter betwixt the Turks and the Parthians; all the Priſoners there taken, were by the Prince as a Preſent ſent to Tamerlane, and among the reſt the Baſſa of Natolia who led theſe Troops; of whom Tamerlane earneſtly demanded, what cauſed Bajazet ſo little to eſteem of him, as to ſhew ſo great contempt of his Army, which he ſhould find ſtrong enough to abate his Pride. Whereunto the Baſſa anſwered, That his Lord was the Sun upon Earth, which could not endure any equal; and that he rather was aſtoniſhed to ſee, how he from ſo far had enterpriſed ſo dangerous a journey, to hinder the fortune of his Lord, in whoſe favour the Heavens (as he ſaid) did bend themſelves to further his greatneſs, and unto whom all the world ſubjected it ſelf; and that he committed great folly in going about to reſiſt the ſame. Unto which ſo proud a Speech Tamerlane replied, That he was ſent from Heaven to puniſh his raſhneſs, and to teach him, That the Proud are hated of God, whoſe promiſe is to pluck down the mighty, and raiſe up the lowly. As for thy ſelf (ſaid he) thou haſt already felt (although I pity thy miſhap) what the Valor of my Parthian Horſe is againſt thy Turkiſh; and thy Maſter I have already cauſed to raiſe his Siege of Conſtantinople, and to look to his own things here in Aſia. Furthermore, Tamerlane changing his Speech demanded, If his Maſter did come reſolved to bid him Battel? Aſſure your ſelf (ſaid he) there is nothing he more deſireth; and would to God I might acknowledge your greatneſs, in giving me leave to aſſiſt my Lord at that Battel. Good leave have thou, (ſaid Tamerlane) go thy ways and tell thy Lord that thou haſt ſeen me, and that he ſhall in the Battel find me on horſeback, where he ſhall ſee a green Enſign diſplayed. The Baſſa thanking him, ſwore, that next unto his Lord he vowed unto him his Service. And ſo returning, declared unto Bajazet, how that he had ſeen Tamerlane and truly reported unto him all that he had willed him to ſay; not forgetting over all, to publiſh his Courteſie and Bounty; who beſides that he had frankly ſet him at liberty, had alſo given him a very fair Horſe well furniſhed, although he well knew he was to ſerve againſt himſelf. Whereunto Bajazet anſwered no more, but that he would ſhortly make trial of him, and that he well hoped before the march were ended, to make him acknowledg his own folly. The next day the two Armies drew near together, and incamped within a League the one of the other; where all the night long you might have heard ſuch noiſe of Horſes, as that it ſeemed the Heavens were full of Voices, the Air did ſo reſound, and every man thought the Night long, to come to the trial of his Valour, and the gaining of his deſires. The Scythians (a People no leſs greedy than needy) talked of nothing but the Spoil; the proud Parthians, of their Honour; and the poor Chriſtians, of their deliverance, all to be gained by the next Days Victory; every man during the Night time ſpeaking ſpeaking according to his own humour. All which Tamerlane walking this Night up and down in his Camp heard, and much rejoiced to ſee the hope that his Souldiers had already in general conceived of the Victory. Who after the ſecond watch returning unto his Pavillion, and there caſting himſelf upon a Carpet, had thought to have ſlept a while; but his Cares not ſuffering him ſo to do, he then as his manner was, called for a Book, wherein was contained the lives of his Fathers and Anceſtors, and of other valiant Worthies, the which he uſed ordinarily to read, as he then did; not as therewith vainly to deceive the time, but to make uſe thereof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, and declining of ſuch dangers as they by their Raſhneſs or Overſight fell into. And afterwards having a little ſlumbred, he commanded Axalla to be ſent for, who forthwith came unto him, with divers other great Lords and Captains the chief Commanders of his Army; with whom after he had a while conſulted of the order of the Battel, he mounted on Horſeback himſelf, and ſent every one of them to their own Charges, to put the ſame in readineſs. At which very inſtant he received News, that the Enemy marched forward, and came to take his ground for the Battel; whoſe order of march Tamerlane was deſirous to ſee, that ſo accordingly he might marſhal his own. And having cauſed three thouſand Horſemen to advance forward, with charge to begin the skirmiſh, himſelf followed after to lodge every part of his Forces in ſuch places as he had foreſeen to be fitteſt for his advantage. Now ſeeing the Janizaries march in a ſquare Battel in the midſt, and upon the two Fronts two great Squadrons of Horſemen, which ſeemed to be thirty thouſand Horſe; and another which advanced and covered the Battalion of the Janizaries; he thought this their order to be very good, and hard to be broken; and thereupon turning himſelf to Axalla, who was near unto him, ſaid, I had thought this Day to have fought on Foot, but I ſee that it behoveth me now to fight on Horſeback, to give Courage unto my Souldiers, to open the great Battalion of our Enemies. And my Will is, That my men come forward unto me as ſoon as they may, for I will advance forward with an hundred thouſand Footmen, fifty thouſand upon each of my two Wings, and in the midſt of them forty thouſand of my beſt Horſemen. My Pleaſure is, that after they have tried the force of theſe men, that they come unto my Avauntguard, of whom I will diſpoſe, and fifty thouſand Horſe more in three Bodies, whom thou ſhalt command; which I will aſſiſt with eighty thouſand Horſe, wherein ſhall be mine own Perſon; having an hundred thouſand Footmen behind me, who ſhall march in two Squadrons; and for my Rereward I appoint forty thouſand Horſe, and fifty thouſand Footmen, who ſhall not march but to my aid. And I will make choice of ten thouſand of my beſt Horſe, whom I will ſend into every place where I ſhall think needful within my Army, for to impart my Commands. Over the firſt forty thouſand Horſe the Prince Ciarcan commanded; over the foremoſt Footmen was the Lord Synopes a Genoeſe, Kinſman to Axalla, and his Lieutenant over the Footmen, a Captain of great eſtimation; the Prince Axalla his own charge conſiſted of five Squadrons of Horſemen. Bajazet his Army being alſo both fair and great, came bravely ſtill on forward towards their Enemies, who ſtirred not one whit from the place they had taken for the Battel; except certain light Horſemen, Scithians, Parthians and Muſcovites, who ſent out as looſe men, hotly skirmiſhed betwixt the two Armies. Now was Tamerlane by an Eſpy advertiſed, that Bajazet having before given order for the diſpoſing of his Army, was on foot in the midſt of thirty thouſand Janizaries, his principal men of War, and greateſt Strength; wherein he meant that day to fight, and in whom he had repoſed his greateſt hope. His Battel of Horſe was very fair, amounting to the number of an hundred and forty thouſand Horſe, all old Souldiers. The Sultan of Egypt having alſo ſent unto his Aid thirty thouſand Mamalukes, all very good Horſemen, with thirty thouſand Foot. So that his Army marching all in one Front, in form of an Half-Moon (but not ſo well knit together as was Tamerlanes, whoſe Squadrons directly followed one another) ſeemed almoſt as great as his; and ſo with infinite numbers of moſt horrible Outcries ſtill advanced forward; Tamerlane his Souldiers all the while ſtanding faſt, with great ſilence.

great mortal ttle be-ixt Ba-et and mer-e.

There was not poſſible to be ſeen a more furious charge, than was by the Turks given upon the Prince of Ciarcan, who had commandment not to fight before the Enemy came unto him; neither could have been choſen a fairer Plain, and where the skilful choice of the place was of leſs advantage for the one or the other; but that Tamerlane had the River on the left hand of his Army, ſerving him to ſome ſmall advantage. Now this young Prince of Ciarcan with his forty thouſand Horſe, was in this firſt encounter almoſt wholly overthrown; yet having fought right valiantly, and entred even into the midſt of the Janizaries, (where the Perſon of Bajazet was) putting them in diſorder, was himſelf there ſlain. About which time Axalla ſet upon them with the Avantguard, but not with like danger; for having overthrown one of the Enemies Wings, and cut it all to pieces, and his Footmen coming to joyn with him, as they had been commanded, he faced the Battalion of the Janizaries, who right valiantly behaved themſelves for the ſafety of their Prince. This hard fight continued one hour, and yet you could not have ſeen any ſcattered, but the one ſtill reſolutely fighting againſt the other. You might there have ſeen the Horſemen like Mountains ruſh together, and infinite numbers of Men die, cry, lament and threaten all at one inſtant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to ſee the event of this ſo mortal a Fight; but perceiving his men at length to give ground, he ſent ten thouſand of his Horſe to join again with the ten thouſand appointed for the Rereward, and commanded them to aſſiſt him at ſuch time as he ſhould have need of them; and at the very ſame time charged himſelf, and made them to give him room; cauſing the Footmen to charge alſo, over whom the Prince of Thanais commanded, who gave a furious onſet upon the Battalion of the Janizaries, wherein was yet the Perſon of Bajazet, who had ſuſtained a great burden. Now Bajazet had in his Army a great number of Mercenary Tartars, called Deſtenſes, with many thouſands of other Souldiers taken up in the Countries of the poor exiled Mahometan Princes; in whoſe juſt quarrel, and the Greek Emperors, Tamerlane had chiefly undertaken that War; theſe Tartarians and other Souldiers, ſeeing ſome their Friends, and otherſome their natural and loving Princes in the Army of Tamerlane; ſtricken with the terror of Diſloialty, and abhorring the Cruelty of the proud Tyrant, in the heat of the Battel revolted from Bajazet to their own Princes; which which their revolt much weakned Bajazets Forces. Who nevertheleſs with his own men of War, eſpecially the Janizaries, and the help of the Chriſtian Souldiers brought to his aid from Servia and other places of Europe, with great Courage maintained the Fight; but the Multitude, and not true Valour, prevailed; for, as much as might be done by valiant and couragious men, was by the Janizaries and the reſt performed, both for the preſervation of the Perſon of their Prince, and the gaining of the Victory. But in the end, the Horſemen with whom Tamerlane himſelf was, giving a freſh Charge, and his Avantgard wholly knit again unto him, reinforcing the Charge, he with much ado obtained the Victory. Bajazet himſelf wounded, and now mounted on Horſeback, thinking to have eſcaped by Flight, fell into the hands of Axalla; unto whom he yielded himſelf, thinking it had been Tamerlane; who for a ſpace knew him not, but took him for ſome other great Commander of the Turks. Muſa (ſirnamed Zelebi, or, the Noble) one of Bajazet his Sons, with divers others of Bajazet his great Captains, were there taken alſo; and amongſt the reſt, George the Deſpot of Servia, who notwithſtanding this misfortune, had that day gained unto himſelf the reputation of a great and worthy Captain; inſomuch that Tamerlane even in the very heat of the Battel marvelling to ſee him and the Servians, with the other Chriſtians which he had brought to the aid of Bajazet, ſo valiantly to fight, ſaid unto ſome of the Captains that were near unto him, See how courageouſly yonder Religious fight; ſuppoſing them by their ſtrange Attire to have been ſome of the Turks ſuperſtitious Votaries. But being now taken, and afterwards brought to Tamerlane, he was by him courteouſly welcomed; but yet withal reproved, for that he had fought for Bajazet againſt him, who was come in favour of the Chriſtian Emperor, and the other poor oppreſſed Princes, ſuch as the Deſpot himſelf was. Who thereunto boldly anſwered, That indeed it was not according to his duty, but according to the proſperity of Bajazet, unto whom it ſeemed that all the World did bend; and that his own ſafety had cauſed him, though againſt his Will, to take part with him. Whereupon Tamerlane held him excuſed; and ſo without more ado gave him leave at his own pleaſure to depart.

Bajazet alſo himſelf being afterwards brought unto Tamerlane as a Priſoner, and by him courteouſly entertained, never ſhewed any token of Submiſſion at all, but according to his proud Nature, without reſpect of his preſent ſtate, preſumptuouſly anſwered him unto whatſoever he demanded. Wherewith Tamerlane moved, told him, That it was now in his power to make him to loſe his life. Whereunto he anſwered no more, but, Do it; for that, that loſs ſhould be his greateſt happineſs. Tamerlane afterwards demanding of him, What made him ſo proud, as to enterpriſe to bring into his Subjection ſo Noble a Prince as was the Greek Emperor? he anſwered, Even the ſame thing that hath moved thee to invade me, namely the deſire of Glory and Soveraignty. But wherefore then (ſaid Tamerlane) doſt thou uſe ſo great cruelty towards them thou haſt overcome, without reſpect of Age or Sex? That did I (ſaid he) to give the greater terror unto my Enemies. And what wouldſt thou have done with me (ſaid Tamerlane) had it been my fortune to have fallen into thy Hands, as thou art now in mine? I would (ſaid Bajazet) have incloſed thee in a Cage of Iron, and ſo in triumph have carried thee up and down my Kingdom. Even ſo (ſaid Tamerlane) ſhalt thou be ſerved. And ſo cauſing him to be taken out of his preſence, turning unto his Followers, ſaid, Behold a proud and cruel Man, he deſerveth to be chaſtiſed accordingly; and to be made an Example unto all the proud and cruel of the World, of the juſt Wrath of God againſt them. I acknowledge, that God hath this day delivered into my Hands a great Enemy; to whom we muſt therefore give thanks. Which he performed the ſame day; for the Battel was won at four of the Clock, and there was yet five hours of day-light. The next day Tamerlane commanded the dead to be buried; where among the reſt they found the body of the Prince of Ciarcan, dead in the midſt of the Janizaries, where he lay incloſed with their dead bodies, in token he died not unrevenged; whoſe untimely death Tamerlane for all that greatly lamented, for he was his Kinſman, and like enough one day to have done great ſervice. Whoſe dead Body Tamerlane cauſed to be embalmed, and with two thouſand Horſe (and divers of the Turks Priſoners chained and tied together) to be conveyed to Samercand, until his coming thither. All the other dead Bodies were with all honour that might be, buried at Sennas.

This great and bloody Battel fought in the year of our Lord 1397. not far from the Mount Stella, (where ſometime the great King Mithrydates was by Pompy the Great in a great Battel overthrown) was fought from ſeven a Clock in the Morning, until four in the Afternoon; Victory all that while, as it were with doubtful Wings, hovering over both Armies, as uncertain where to light; until at length the fortune of Tamerlane prevailed. Whoſe Wiſedom, next unto God, gave that days Victory unto his Souldiers; for that the politick tyring of the ſtrong Forces of Bajazet, was the ſafeguard of his own; whereas if he had gone unto the Battel in one Front, aſſuredly the multitude finding ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, had put it ſelf into confuſion, whereas this ſucceſſive manner of aiding of his men, made them all unto him profitable. The number of them that were in this Battel ſlain, is of divers diverſly reported; the Turks themſelves reporting, That Bajazet there loſt the Noble Muſtapha his Son, with two hundred thouſand of his men, and Tamerlane not many fewer; and ſome other ſpeaking of a far leſs number, as that there ſhould be ſlain of the Turks about threeſcore thouſand, and of Tamerlane his Army not paſt twenty thouſand. But leaving the certainty of the number unto the credit of the Reporters, like enough it is, that the Slaughter was exceeding great in ſo long a Fight, betwixt two ſuch Armies as never before (as I ſuppoſe) met in Field together.

Bajazet like a Beaſt ſhut up in an Iron Cage.

By this one days event is plainly to be ſeen the uncertainty of worldly things, and what ſmall aſſurance even the greateſt have in them. Behold, Bajazet the terror of the World, and as he thought, ſuperior to Fortune, in an inſtant with his ſtate in one Battel overthrown into the bottom of miſery and deſpair; and that at ſuch time as he thought leaſt, even in the midſt of his greateſt Strength. It was three days (as they report) before he could be pacified, but as a deſperate man ſtill ſeeking after death, and calling for it; neither did Tamerlane after he had once ſpoken with him, at all afterwards courteouſly uſe him, but as of a proud man cauſed ſmall account to be made of him; And to manifeſt that he knew how to puniſh the haughty, made him to be ſhackled in Fetters and Chains of Gold, and ſo to be ſhut up in an Iron Cage made like a Grate, in ſuch ſort as that he might on every ſide be ſeen; and ſo carried him up and down as he paſſed through Aſia; to be of his own People ſcorned and derided. And to his further diſgrace, upon Feſtival days uſed him for a Footſtool to tread upon, when he mounted to Horſe; and at other times ſcornfully fed him like a Dog, with crums fallen from his Table. A rare Example of the uncertainty of worldly Honour, that he unto whoſe ambitious mind Aſia and Europe, two great parts of the World, were too little, ſhould be now carried up and down cooped up in a little Iron Cage, like ſome perilous wild Beaſt. All which Tamerlane did not ſo much for hatred to the man, as to maniſeſt the juſt judgment of God againſt the arrogant Folly of the Proud. It is reported, That Tamerlane being requeſted by one of his Noblemen that might be bold to ſpeak unto him, to remit ſome part of his Severity againſt the perſon of ſo great a Prince; anſwered, That he did not uſe that Rigor againſt him as a King, but rather did puniſh him as a proud ambitious Tyrant, polluted with the blood of his own Brother.

Now this ſo great an overthrow brought ſuch a fear upon all the Countries poſſeſſed by Bajazet in Aſia, that Axalla ſent before by Tamerlane with forty thouſand Horſe, and an hundred thouſand Foot, without Carriages, to proſecute the Victory came without reſiſtance to Pruſa, whither all the remainder of Bajazet his Army retired, with the Baſſa Muſtapha; the Country as he went ſtill yielding unto him. Yea, the great Baſſa with the reſt hearing of his coming, and thinking themſelves not now in any ſafety in Aſia, fled over the Strait of Helleſpontus to Callipolis, and ſo to Hadrianople; carrying with them out of the Battel, Solyman, Bajazet his eldeſt Son, whom they ſet up in his Fathers place; Mahomet his younger Brother preſently upon the overthrow being fled to Amaſia; of whom, and the reſt of Bajazet his Children, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter. Axalla coming to Pruſa, had the City without reſiſtance yielded unto him, which he rifled; and there with other of Bajazet his Wives and Concubines, took Priſoner the fair Deſpina, Bajazet his beſt beloved Wife, to the doubling of his grief.

Emanuel the Greek Emperor now hearing of Tamerlane his coming to Pruſa, ſent his Embaſſadors (the moſt honorable of his Court) thither before to Axalla; by whom they were there ſtaid until the coming of Tamerlane; who received them with all the Honour that might be, ſhewing unto them all his magnificence, and the order of his Camp, to their great admiration; For it reſembled a moſt populous and well governed City, for the order that was therein, which brought unto it plenty of all kind of Victuals and other Merchandiſe, as well for pleaſure as for uſe. By theſe Embaſſadors the Greek Emperor ſubmitted all his Empire, together with his Perſon, unto Tamerlane the great Conqueror, as his moſt faithful Subject and Vaſſal; which he was bound (as he ſaid) to do, for that he was by him delivered from the moſt cruel Tyrant of the World; as alſo for that the long journy he had paſſed, and the diſcommodities he had indured, with the loſs of his People, and the danger of his Perſon, could not be recompenced but by the offer of his own Life and his Subjects; which he did for ever dedicate unto his Service, with all the Fidelity and Loyalty that ſo great a benefit might deſerve; beſides that, his ſo many Vertues and rare Accompliſhments, which made him famous through the World, did bind him ſo to do. And that therefore he would attend him in his chief City to deliver it into his Hands as his own, with all the Empire of Greece. Now the Greek Embaſſadors looked for no leſs than to fall into bondage to Tamerlane; thinking that which they offered to be ſo great and delicate a Morſel, as that it would not be refuſed, eſpecially of ſuch a conquering Prince as was Tamerlane; and that the acceptance thereof in kindneſs and friendſhip, was the beſt bargain they could make therein. But they received anſwer from this worthy Prince, far beyond their expectation; for he with a mild countenance beholding them, anſwered them, That he was not come from ſo far a Country, or undertaken ſo much pains, for the inlargement of his Dominions, already large enough, (too baſe a thing for him to put himſelf into ſo great danger and travel for) but rather to win Honour, and thereby to make his name famous unto all Poſterity for ever; And that therefore it ſhould well appear unto the World, that he was come to aid him, being requeſted as his Friend and Allie; and that his upright meaning therein was the greateſt cauſe, that God from above had beheld his power, and thereby bruiſed the Head of the greateſt and fierceſt Enemy of mankind that was under Heaven; and now to get him an immortal name, would make free ſo great and flouriſhing a City as was Conſtantinople, governed by ſo noble and ancient an Houſe as the Emperors; That unto his Courage he had always Faith joyned, ſuch as ſhould never ſuffer him to make ſo great a breach in his reputation, as that it ſhould be reported of him, That in the colour of a Friend he came to invade the Dominions of his Allies; That he deſired no more, but that the ſervice he had done for the Greek Emperor, might for ever be ingraven in the Memory of his Poſterity, to the end they might for ever wiſh well unto him and his Succeſſors, by remembring the good he had done them; That long might the noble Emperor live, happily to govern his Eſtate; and that before his return he would ſo well conſider for the eſtabliſhing of the ſame, as that he ſhould not lightly fall again into the like jeopardy, alwaies aſſuring himſelf of his good Will and Favour towards him. Eaſie it is to judge what Joy theſe Greek Embaſſadors received, to hear this ſo kind an anſwer from the mouth of Tamerlane himſelf; who rather than he would ſeem to break his Faith, refuſed an Empire offered unto him, with one of the moſt ſtately and magnificent Cities of the World. Few Princes (I ſuppoſe) would perform ſuch a part; but ſo there be likewiſe but few Tamerlanes in the World. Theſe Embaſſadors by the commandment of Tamerlane, were by Axalla Royally feaſted, and all the Honour done them that might be. One of them being ſent back to carry theſe unexpected news unto the Greek Emperor, filled both him and all the City of Conſtantinople with exceeding joy and gladneſs, which both he and his Subjects in general ſpared not with Bonfires and all other ſigns of Joy and Pleaſure to manifeſt. And the more to ſhew his thankfulneſs, ſhortly after by the advice of his grave Counſellors, paſſed over the Strait into Aſia, to ſee Tamerlane at Pruſa, and in Perſon himſelf to give him thanks; who hearing of his coming, and very glad thereof, preſently upon the firſt days journy ſent the Prince Axalla to meet him, and to certifie him of the Joy that he conceived, to have the good hap for to ſee him, as alſo to conduct him to Pruſa; where thoſe two great Princes, with the greateſt magnificence that might be, met, and ſo ſpent one whole day together. The Greek Emperor the next day taking his leave, was by Tamerlane with much Honour conducted out of the City. Now had Tamerlane himſelf conceived a ſecret deſire to ſee this ſo famous a City as was Conſtantinople, from which he was not now far, yet would he not go thither as a Conqueror, but as a private perſon; which by the means of Axalla was accompliſhed, and he thereinto by the Greek Emperor privately received, and with all Familiarity poſſible entertained; the Emperor ſhewing unto him all the rare and excellent things that were therein to be ſeen; and the other Greek Princes deviſing all the means they could to do him pleaſure, and them which did accompanie him; who were in a manner all apparelled after the Greek Faſhion. At which time the Greek Emperor himſelf was curious to ſhew unto him all the fair Gardens alongſt the Sea Coaſt, a League or two from Conſtantinople, and ſo privately conducting him, ſpent five or ſix days with all the Mirth that might be poſſible; Tamerlane by the way oftentimes ſaying, That he had never ſeen a fairer City, and that it was indeed the City (conſidering the fair and rich Situation thereof) of right, worthy to command all the World. He wondred at the coſtly Buildings of the Temples, the fair ingraven Pillars, the high Piramides, and the making of the fair Gardens; and oftentimes afterwards ſaid, That he nothing repented him of his ſo long and dangerous a voiage, if it had been only but to have preſerved from Fire and Sword ſo noble a City as that was. In the Greek Emperor he commended greatly his mild Nature and Courteſie; who knowing him above all things to take pleaſure in fair ſerviceable Horſes, gave unto him thirty of the faireſt, ſtrongeſt, and readieſt, that were poſſible to be gotten, all moſt richly furniſhed; and ſent likewiſe fair Preſents unto all the Princes and great Commanders of the Army, and bountifully cauſed to be delivered unto them all things which he thought to be neceſſary for the Army. So after many great kindneſſes in ſhort time paſſed, and a ſtrait bond of Friendſhip made, and by ſolemn Oath confirmed betwixt the two great Princes, Tamerlane with great contentment took his leave of the Emperor, and returned again to his Army at Pruſa. Wherewith he now at his pleaſure without reſiſtance waſted and ſpoyled all Bajazet his Dominion in Aſia, no man daring to make head againſt him.

The year being now well ſpent, and Winter drawing on, Tamerlane diſperſed his Army into divers of the Provinces of the leſſer Aſia, expecting ſtill when ſome of Bajazet his Sons or other Friends ſhould make ſuit or means unto him for his deliverance, but none came; ſome fearing Tamerlane his heavy indignation, and others no leſs dreading the fierce Nature of Bajazet himſelf, who if he had been delivered, was like enough (as was thought) to have taken ſharp revenge upon all them which forſook him in the late Battel; and therefore never made interceſſion for him. Whereupon Tamerlane one day paſſing by him, ſaid unto him, I marvel that none of thy Sons or Friends either come to ſee thee, or to intreat for thee, it muſt needs be that thou haſt evilly deſerved of them, as thou haſt of others; yet how thinkeſt thou, if I ſhould ſet thee at liberty, would they again receive thee as their Lord and Soveraign, or not? To whom Bajazet boldly anſwered; Were I at liberty, thou ſhouldſt well ſee, how that I want neither Courage nor means to revenge all my Wrongs and to make thoſe diſobedient and forgetful to know their Duties better. Which his proud anſwer, made Tamerlane to keep a ſtraighter hand over him.

Damaſco won by Tamerlane.

In this great and bloody War, wherein the Othoman Empire had almoſt taken end, the Sultan of Egypt had (as is aforeſaid) given aid unto Bajazet; which Tamerlane took in ſo evil part, as that he reſolved to be thereof revenged; for as he was unto his Friends of all others moſt kind and courteous, ſo was he to his Enemies no leſs terrible and dreadful. Yet thinking it good before his departure out of the leſſer Aſia, to take ſome good order with theſe his new Conqueſts; and finding nothing more honourable to reſolve upon, he reſtored unto the poor Mahometan Princes (Tachretin, Iſfendiar, Germian, and the reſt before fled unto him for refuge) all their ancient Inheritance, with ſomething more; as he did alſo divers Cities and Countries of Natolia unto the Greek Emperor, for the yearly Tribute of four hundred thouſand Ducats of Gold, and eight hundred thouſand Franks of Silver, which the Emperor promiſed to pay unto him yearly. And ſo having enriched his Army with the Spoils of the Othoman Empire in Aſia, he turned his Forces againſt the Egyptian Sultan, and ſo paſſing through Caramania, entred into Syria, then part of the Sultans Kingdom; where near unto Aleppo (being before yielded unto him) was fought betwixt them a great and mortal Battel, the Sultan having in his Army an hundred thouſand Foot, and ſeventy four thouſand Horſe; whereof there were thirty thouſand Mamalukes, accounted the beſt Horſemen in the World. In which Battel Axalla the great Captain, with the Vantguard of Tamerlane his Army, was hardly diſtreſſed, and Axalla himſelf taken; but forthwith again reſcued by Tamerlane; who had he not by his coming on with new Forces, ſpeedily reſtored the Battel, cunningly protracted by Axalla, that day was like enough to have made an end of his good Fortune. But the Victory after a long and cruel Fight (wherein were fourſcore thouſand men on both ſides ſlain) inclining to Tamerlane, the Sultan fled, Tamerlane purſuing him by the ſpace of three Leagues. After which Victory, Tamerlane dividing his Army, ſent Axalla with forty thouſand Horſe and fifty thouſand Foot to purſue the Sultan alongſt the Coaſt of Arabia; who oftentimes ſhewed himſelf with ſome four thouſand Horſe to have hindred Axalla, who having the ſmalleſt Forces, followed him the neareſt. Tamerlane himſelf in the mean time, with threeſcore thouſand Horſe, and an hundred thouſand Foot, marching alongſt the Sea Coaſt, had all the Cities as he went yielded unto him; as Magata, Aman, otherwiſe called Apamea, Tortoſa, Barruto, and Nephthalin; only the ſtrong City of Damaſco refuſed to receive him, whereinto the Sultan had put the Prince Zamadzen, with a ſtrong Garriſon, who did what he might to have defended the ſame; But all in vain, for Tamerlane having by Battery overthrown a great part of the Wall, by Aſſault won the City, only the Caſtle yet remaining, as being of a wondeful Strength, and almoſt impregnable; whereinto ſuch a multitude had at the taking of the City retired themſelves, as was not poſſible therein long to live; who in ſhort time pinched with Hunger, and many of them dead, the reſt upon ſafeguard of their Lives offered to yield; whom for all that Tamerlane would not receive to mercy, to make them feel what it was to hold out againſt him; ſo that moſt of them dying of Famine, the reſt yielded without Condition, and were for their Obſtinacy almoſt all ſlain. Which his Severity towards them of Damaſco, cauſed, that thirty Leagues off they brought the Keys of their Cities unto him, in token of their Submiſſion; whom he no way moleſted, more than in contributing unto the charge of his Army. From Damaſco, he turned directly towards Jeruſalem, at which time time they of the City had driven out the Sultans Garriſon, as had almoſt all they of Judea, ſubmitting themſelves unto Tamerlane. At Chorazin the Sultan had left ſix thouſand men in Garriſon for the defence of the place, who at the firſt ſeemed to ſtand upon their Guard; but afterwards diſmaied to ſee ſo great an Army before it, and that Tamerlane having approached the Walls, was ſet down to have it, they ſubmitted themſelves and found mercy. In which City Tamerlane left certain of his men in Garriſon, for the better repreſſing of the Mamalukes, who with often incurſions troubled his Army. So marching on, he himſelf with certain Horſemen for his Guard, rode to Jeruſalem to viſit the Sepulchre ſo much reverenced of all Nations, and there to make his Oblations; where he was of the Inhabitants joyfully received, and having ſought out all the Antiquities of the ancient City, would be conducted unto all the places thereabouts, where Jeſus Chriſt had preached, even as the Pilgrims do; and coming to the Sepulchre, gave thereunto, and the devout there, many rich and precious Gifts, to the great contentment of all men (to ſee him honour thoſe holy places) but of the Jews only, who greatly blamed him for ſo doing; of whom of all others, Tamerlane made no reckoning, but called them the accurſed of God. There had he news that the Sultan had gathered all his Forces, and being come into Egypt, was there fortifying of his Cities, eſpecially the great Cities of Alexandria and Caier. Tamerlane his Army in the mean time by his commandment came towards Egypt to Damiata; which ſtrong City he thought not good to leave behind him, although he was by ſome perſwaded ſo to do, for that it was thought impregnable, as well in reſpect of the Caſtle, as of the ſtrong Garriſon that the Sultan had put thereinto; but he, whoſe Fortune nothing could hinder, would needs go thither; and ſo having commanded Axalla to ſet upon it, followed himſelf after with the reſt of his Army. Now Axalla having ſummoned the City, and declared unto the Inhabitants (who were moſt of them Chriſtians) the mildneſs and courteſie of Tamerlane, as alſo who himſelf was, and what Religion he held; cauſing many of the Greek Captains to ſpeak unto them, and to tell them of the miſery they indured under the Moors and Mamalukes; ſo far prevailed with them, that they all determined to adventure their Lives, to put the Mamalukes out of the City, with all them that favoured the Sultan. And ſo in the night taking up Arms, made themſelves Maſters of one quarter of the City, and delivered one of the Gates to Axalla; whereby he entring put all the Mamalukes to the Sword, or took them Priſoners, and ſo gained the City. Whereof Tamerlane hearing, being as yet upon his march, was in good hope of ſo proſperous a beginning, to find an happy end alſo of his Deſigns in Egypt. For beſides the good Fortune thereof, he knew that this Haven of Damiata might ſerve him with Victuals out of all the parts of Greece, as the Emperor Emanuel had promiſed him, and wherein he nothing failed him. Into which Port Tamerlane having made his entrie, left there in Garriſon two thouſand of the Emperor Emanuel his Souldiers, with a Governor, of whom he took an Oath for their Obedience. So having ſtaied a ſpace at Damiata, he cauſed his Vauntguard to march towards Alexandria; and having paſſed over the River, even in an inſtant turned directly unto Caier, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Sultan, who made proviſion for the defence of Alexandria, as the neareſt unto danger. But underſtanding of theſe news, uſed ſuch diligence, that he entred into the City with forty thouſand Horſe, and threeſcore thouſand Foot, even as Tamerlane his Army approached, purpoſing in Perſon himſelf to defend it. By whoſe coming the great City ready before to have revolted, was again in his obedience confirmed, to the great hindrance of Tamerlane his Affairs; for to remain long before it, was impoſſible, for want of Victuals for ſo great an Army in the Enemies Country. Yet notwithſtanding all this, did not Tamerlane forbear to draw near unto it, and with all his Army to encamp near unto the ſame, having cauſed a great Trench to be made for to cover his Horſemen, and thereby to lodge his Army more ſafely; during which time he cauſed divers onſets to be given, as well to try what confidence the Enemy had in himſelf, as to ſee how the People of the City, eſpecially the Slaves (which in that populous City are infinite) were affected towards him; who certainly informed him of the ſtate of the City, and the Army; as glad to ſee the ſame by him ſhut up, and the proud Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſt. But thus lying ſtill at the Siege, one day he thought it good to ſhew his Army before the City, to try whether the Enemy had a deſire to come to a day of Battel or not; as alſo to view what Forces he had, and ſo indeed to ſeek occaſion to fight; in hope alſo, that if the Sultan did come forth with all his Army into the Field, ſome revolt might happen within the City, as well by the Slaves (unto whom Liberty was by him promiſed) as by the Citizens themſelves (diſcontented with the inſolency of the Mamalukes entred of late into the City with the Sultan) unto whom he had made it known by certain Slaves (for that purpoſe fled as Fugitives out of his Army into the City) how that he was not come to hurt them, but only for the deſtruction of the Mamalukes, both his and their Enemies. But betimes ſtanding ſo in Battel array, no man came forth, neither was there any tumult or ſtir raiſed in the City, as he had expected. For the Sultan in ſo great a City well provided of all things, was reſolved to weary him out with lying ſtill, and not to put all to the hazard of a Battel. Which Tamerlane perceiving, and ſet down not to depart from thence, but victorious, reſolved likewiſe to force him even in his greateſt Strength, in the Heart of his greateſt City; although it were not to be done, but with great adventure; ſuch confidence he had in the Strength and Multitude of his Army. Now his purpoſe was, firſt to take one of the Cities (for Caire is divided into three) and therein incamping himſelf by little and little to advance forward as he might, ſtill fighting with the Enemy. Upon which reſolution, he commanded an Aſſault to be given, and having brought his Footmen to the place where he would have them to give the onſet (for the City was not walled, but only fortified with Ditches and Trenches) he commanded the Prince of Thanais with fifty thouſand Footmen to begin the Aſſault, even in the Face of the Enemy; which he moſt valiantly performed, and there began a moſt terrible and cruel Fight. Axalla in the mean time, deeming (as the truth was) that the Sultan had drawn his greateſt Forces to the place where the Prince of Thanais ſought to enter, as unto a place of greateſt danger; fet a compaſs about, and upon another quarter of the City, with ſmall reſiſtance paſſed the Trenches; where he preſently left thirty thouſand men to fill up the Ditches, and to make way for the Horſemen to enter; advancing forward himſelf, againſt twenty thouſand ſent by the Sultan to have ſtopt his further paſſage; the Prince of Thanais being at that ſame time almoſt beaten back by the Mamalukes. But the way being made plain, by them that were for that purpoſe left by Axalla, and ten thouſand Horſe entred, which charged upon the Backs of the Mamalukes, where the Sultan himſelf was; and they ſeconded by ten thouſand more ſent in by Tamerlane, following himſelf after, with all his Power; the Sultan retired unto a ſecond Strength, which he had made in the next City. The Fight indured full the ſpace of ſeven hours; wherein were ſlain of the Sultan his men above ſixteen thouſand; and of Tamerlanes betwixt ſeven and eight thouſand. Who contented to have diſlodged the Enemy, and gained a third part of the City, cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, in hope the next day to win all the reſt, as indeed he did. For the Prince of Thanais the next day forcing the Enemies Trenches in one place, and Axalla in another, the Sultan after a great Fight finding himſelf hardly preſſed by the obſtinate Enemy, and too weak long to hold out, retired, and ſo forthwith abandoned the City, and encamped himſelf along the ſide of the River Nilus, with purpoſe to paſs the ſame, and to flie to Alexandria his ſecond Strength and Refuge. Which Tamerlane ſuſpecting, followed after him with his Horſemen (who only were in order) and ſome few Foot, hardly drawn from the City, which their Fellows were in ſpoiling; ſo as he was glad to promiſe them eſpecially, to regard and reward their good ſervice. Againſt whom the Sultan upon a narrow Cauſey, had oppoſed twelve or fifteen thouſand men, whom he called his Slaves (to favour his paſſage) but were indeed his beſt Souldiers, and ſtood faſt, the place ſerving greatly for their advantage; who for all that at length forced by their Enemies, ſtill increaſing upon them, (though not without great loſs) caſt themſelves into the great River, and made a moſt honourable Retreat; every man having his Weapon in the one Hand, and ſwimming with the other to the further Bank. The Sultan flying with ſome eighteen thouſand Horſe (for the reſt were ſundry waies fled or elſe drowned) is reported in his Flight to have comforted his men, by telling of them, that they were not men that had vanquiſhed them, but gods, there appeared in them ſo great Wiſdom, Force, and Valour; divers of the Mamalukes taken in the late Fight, being brought before Tamerlane, and by him courteouſly uſed, were of him demanded, if they could be content to ſerve him, now that their Maſter was fled and gon? which they all utterly refuſed; whom notwithſtanding for their Fidelity, Tamerlane ſet at liberty to go again to the Sultan; as no leſs deſirous to be admired of his Enemies for his Bounty and Courteſie, than feared for his Force and Valour. The wonderful Wealth of this ſo great and famous a City became a Prey unto his Souldiers; who for the ſpace of four and twenty hours had the Spoil thereof, every man being then by open Proclamation commanded to repair to his Quarter. The Citizens he ſet at liberty, not ſuffering any of them to be taken Priſoners; and ſo leaving ten thouſand good Souldiers, with a great number of others (whereof he carried a great multitude in his Army, planting every where as he paſſed as it were new Colonies) and carrying away with him ſuch of the Inhabitants as he thought might hurt him, and taking order for all things neceſſary for the keeping of ſuch a City, he cauſed his Army to paſs over the River for to follow the Sultan to Alexandria, to the end not to leave his Victory unperfect; Axalla haſting before with the Avantgard, for to hinder the Sultan for joyning his Forces again together; and the reſt of his Army conducted by the Prince of Thanais; he himſelf with an infinite number of Boats and Souldiers to attend upon him, going by Water, taking great pleaſure to behold the fair River, and his ſwift courſe ſometimes, and in an inſtant to become ſo calm as if it ſcarce moved. The Citizens of Alexandria hearing of his coming, and fearing what might betide them, beſought the Sultan to have compaſſion of their Eſtate, and to withdraw himſelf into Lybia, whither Tamerlane for the Barrenneſs of the Country could not with any great Power follow him; reſolved for their parts to give place unto Fortune, and to do as the time required, and no more to reſiſt ſo great a force, whereof they had already made ſufficient trial; promiſing yet to remain in Heart ſtill his, and upon the firſt occaſion offered, to make the ſame to him appear. Whereupon the Sultan ſeeing all things deſperate, determined for a time to retire, in hope, that time would bring ſome change; as alſo that Tamerlane his populous Army would not long remain there. And ſo departing out of Alexandria with tears ſtanding in his Eyes, oftentimes ſaid, That God was angry with him and his People, and that he muſt of neceſſity ſuffer the fatal overthow of his Eſtate, himſelf having done as much as in him lay, according to his Charge and the Expectation the World had of him; and yet that he hoped at length to return again, and deliver his People from the Bondage, whereunto they muſt now needs ſubmit themſelves. Tamerlane coming to Alexandria (before yielded to Axalla) there ſtaid a great while, ſending Axalla to purſue the Sultan, exceedingly grieved that he could not get him into his Hands; and therefore ſtill fearing ſome innovation to be by him raiſed, which cauſed him to deal the more hardly with them whom he ſuſpected to favour him. Now the bruit of theſe Victories having with Axalla paſſed beyond Alexandria into Lybia, had brought ſuch a fear, not only upon the People adjoyning unto theſe Conqueſts, but alſo upon all Africa (they ſuppoſing that Tamerlane did follow) that two and twenty of the Moor Kings ſent their Embaſſadors unto him, to offer unto him their Obedience; the Sultan as a man forſaken of Fortune, ſtill flying before him. Of the neareſt of which Kings Tamerlane took Hoſtages; as for the other farther off, he contented himſelf with their Faith given, and with the other outward ſigns of their good Wills.

The Sultan flieth from Alexandria.

Tamerlane deſirous to return into his Country.

Now after this long travel and pains taken, was Tamerlane more deſirous than he had before uſed, to ſee the pleaſures of his own Native Country; the rather thereunto moved by the requeſt of his Wife, then longing for his return; and the News he heard of the Sickneſs of the old Tartarian Emperor his Father-in-Law; beſides that, Age it ſelf began to bring unto him a deſire of reſt; with whom alſo, the deſires of his Souldiers well agreed, as men now weary to have run ſo many and divers Fortunes. The only ſtay was, that he expected the coming of Calibes, an old and faithful Servant of his, whom he for his good deſert had of his own accord appointed Governor of all his new Conqueſts in Egypt and Syria, a great Honour no doubt, but not too great for him that had ſo well deſerved. So mindful was he of the good deſerts of his faithful Servants, as that he needed not by others to be of them put in remembrance, brance, were they never ſo far off, as was now Calibes; who at this time was with the third part of his Army making way for him along the great River Euphrates, for the Conqueſt of Meſopotamia, and Perſia; whoſe coming was now with great devotion looked for of the whole Army, deſirous to return. Which their expectation he long delaied not, but being ſent for, came to Alexandria, whither the whole Army was now by the commandment of Tamerlane again aſſembled. Upon whoſe coming, Tamerlane departed from Alexandria, having there left the Prince Zamalzan (a man of great reputation) with ſix thouſand Horſemen and ten thouſand Foot, as Governor of that place, and Lieutenant General under Calibes; whom Tamerlane (as I have ſaid) had now appointed to command over all Egypt and Syria, together with the Countries newly conquered in Lybia and Barbary; and now conducting him unto the great City of Caire, and there taking the beſt order he could for the preſervation of his new Conqueſt, left him with forty thouſand Horſe and fifty thouſand Foot. And ſo having ſufficiently inſtructed him how he would have thoſe Kingdoms governed, diſmiſſed him, not like a Maſter, but as a Companion, ſeeming very ſorry to leave him deſtitute of his preſence. So ſetting forward with his Army, conducted by the Prince of Thanaus, Tamerlane himſelf, with a few to guard him, by the way turned aſide unto Jeruſalem; Where he remained eleven days, dayly viſiting the Sepulchre of Chriſt Jeſus (whom he called the God of the Chriſtians) and the ruins of Solomon his Temple; much wondering thereat, and at Jeruſalem, the Seat of Davids Kingdom, and of that great Solomon; but grieved that he could not ſee them fully in their former Beauty. He only deſpiſed the Jews, which had committed ſo cruel a Murder againſt him that came to ſave them. And to ſhew his devotion towards the Holy City, commanded it to be free from all Subſidies and Garriſons of men of War; and gave great Gifts unto the Monaſteries, and honoured them ſo long as he remained there. Departing from Jeruſalem, he came to Damaſco; which great City, as well for that it was infected with the opinion of Jezides (accounted an arch Heretick among the Mahometans) as alſo evil affected to his proceedings, he cauſed to be raſed, and the Bones of Jezides the falſe Prophet to be digged up and burnt, and his Grave before much honoured, in deſpight to be filled with Dung. So marching on, and blaſting the World before him as he went (for long it were and from our purpoſe, to recount all his Victories) he paſſed over the River Euphrates, and having conquered Meſopotamia, with the great City of Babylon, and all the Kingdom of Perſia, laded with the Spoil of the World, and eternized for ever, he returned at length to Samarcand, the famous place of his Birth, and glorious Seat of his Empire.

The miſerable death of Bajazet.

Now had Bajazet (but a little before one of the greateſt Princes on Earth, and now the ſcorn of Fortune, and a By-word to the World) with great impatience lain two years in moſt miſerable Thraldom, for moſt part ſhut up in an Iron Cage, as ſome dangerous Wild Beaſt; and having no better means to end his loathed Life, did violently beat out his Brains againſt the Bars of the Iron Grate wherein he was incloſed, and ſo died about the year of our Lord 1399. Yet of his Death are divers other Reports; ſome ſaying, that he died of an Ague, proceeding of Sorrow and Grief; others, that he poiſoned himſelf; and the Turks affirming, that he was ſet at Liberty by Tamerlane, being by him before-hand poiſoned, whereof he dyed three days after he was inlarged (a Report not like to be true;) but howſoever it was, his end appeareth to have been right miſerable. His dead Body at the requeſt of his Son Mahemet, was by Tamerlane ſent to Aſprapolis, from whence it was afterwards conveighed to Pruſa, and there lieth buried in a Chappel near unto the great Mahometan Temple without the City Eaſtward; where alſo lieth his beloved Wife Deſpina, with his eldeſt Son Erthrogul. And faſt by in a little Chappel lieth buried his Brother Jacup, whom he in the beginning of his Reign murthered.

A compariſon betwixt Bajazet and Tamerlane.

Theſe two great and mighty Princes, Tamerlane and Bajazet, (both of them whilſt they lived, a burthen to the World) as they took their beginning from the Scythes or Tartars, ſo were they of like honourable Progenitors deſcended; Bajazet being the fourth in deſcent from the Warlike Othoman, the raiſer of his Family; and Tamerlane in like degree from the great Zingis, the firſt and moſt fortunate Leader of the Tartars (his Countrymen) unto the pleaſures of the Eaſt; both Princes of great Power and like Spirit; wiſe, hardy, painful, reſolute, and moſt skilful in Martial Affairs; but ambitious above meaſure, the ground of all the former troubles by them raiſed, to the aſtoniſhment of the World. Howbeit, the great Vertues and other the honourable qualities of Bajazet, were in him by his cholerick and waiward Nature much obſcured; which made him to exceed both in Cruelty and Pride; being alſo much more hand-faſt than were his honourable Predeceſſors. For which cauſes he was much feared and leſs beloved of his Souldiers and Men of War in general, and of them at his moſt need forſaken; He uſed commonly to ſay, That his Treaſures were his Childrens Meat, and not his Souldiers Pay; which by way of reproach was by a Common Souldier caſt in his Teeth, when he raged to ſee himſelf by them forſaken in the great Battel againſt Tamerlane; telling him as he fled, that he ran not away, but went to ſeek his Pay, wherewith to provide his Children Bread. Whereas all the aforeſaid Vertues in Tamerlane were graced with divers other of like Nature, no man being to his Friends more courteous or kind, either unto his Enemies more dreadful or terrible. The good ſervice of his Servants he never forgot, either left the ſame long unrewarded; being thereof ſo mindful, as that he needed not by them or others in their behalf, to be put in remembrance thereof, having always by him a Catalogue both of their Names and good Deſerts, which he daily peruſed. Oftentimes ſaying that day to be loſt, wherein he had not given them ſomething; and yet never beſtowing his Preferments on ſuch as ambitiouſly ſought the ſame (as deeming them in ſo doing unworthy thereof) but upon ſuch as whoſe Modeſty or Deſert he thought worthy thoſe his great Favours; ſo tempering the Severity of his Commands with the Greatneſs of his Bounty, as that it is hard to ſay, whither he was of his Nobility and Men of War, for the one more feared, or for the other beloved; both, the great Staies of Princes States; Fear keeping the Obſtinate in Obedience; and Love, the Dutiful in Devotion. But with Bajazet it was not ſo, who deeming all done for him but Duty, and by Nature cholerick and proud (after the manner of Tyrants) deſired above all to be of his Subjects feared, not much regarding how little he was of them beloved; not the leaſt cauſe of his great fall and miſery, and that therein he was of his own ſo ſmally regarded; wherein for all that he is to be accounted more fortunate than the other great Conqueror his Enemy, having ever ſince in the lineal deſcent of himſelf, had one of the greateſt Monarchs of the World to ſucceed ſtill in his Kingdom and Empire; as he hath even at this day. Whereas the glory of Tamerlane his Empire, even in his own time grown to the height thereof, and labouring with the greatneſs of it ſelf, and by him divided amongſt his Sons, ſhortly after his death decaied, rent in ſunder by Ambition and Civil Diſcord; and not long after, together with his Poſterity, rooted out by Uſun-Caſſanes the Perſian King, to the Worlds wonder, took end; nothing of the huge greatneſs thereof now or ſince then remaining, more than the fame thereof; as doth alſo the miſery of the other ſo brought low. But leaving this mirror of miſhap (Bajazet) unto his reſt, and Tamerlane for a while to triumph in Samarcand; let us now proceed in the courſe of our Hiſtory, yet not forgetting by the way to remember ſuch Chriſtian Princes as then lived together with theſe two great Monarchs.

1603 MAHOMETHES III TVRCARVM IMPERATOR SEPTIMVS

Si quid in humanis, magnum te reddere poſsit:
Quid prohibet magnis nomen ineſse tuum?
Qui subjecta vides, tot diſsona regna, tot urbes:
Et nulli cedens, sceptra superba geris.
Cum tamen ignores, quid sit Sapientia Christi,
Omnia quæ jactas sunt, Mahomete, nihil

If any thing on earth can make man great,
Great as the greatest art thou Mahomet,
Who overlookst the World from thy bright Throne,
And seest the largest part of it thine owne.
But since the Christian Law thou dost disdeigne,
Thy labours to be truely Great, are all but vaine.

MAHOMET,
The Firſt of that NAME,
Fifth King of the Turks,
And RESTORER of their ſore ſhaken Kingdom.

Divers opinions concerning the Succeſſors of Bajazet.

HOw wonderfully the Turkiſh Kingdom was by the Violence of Tamerlane ſhaken, and the Majeſty thereof defaced, it well appeareth, in that the Hiſtories of that time, as well thoſe of the Greeks, as of the Turks, in nothing more differ, than in the Succeſſors of Bajazet, their late unfortunate King. Some writing, that he had two Sons, Orchanes (otherwiſe called Calepinus) and Mahomet; and that Calepinus in the ſecond year of his Reign was ſlain, and his Kingdom poſſeſſed by Mahomet his Brother. Others reporting, that Bajazet had two Sons, namely, Calepinus and Muſtapha; and that Calepinus ſucceeding his Father in the Turkiſh Kingdom, when he had reigned ſix years, died, leaving behind him two Sons Orchanes and Mahomet; and that Orchanes being young, was ſlain by his Uncle; whom Mahomet in revenge of his Brothers death, afterwards ſlew, and poſſeſſed the Kingdom himſelf. Others reckon up ſeven Sons of Bajazet; Joſua, Muſulmanes, Moſes, Calepinus, Joſua the younger, Muſtapha and Halis; with an uncertain Succeſſion amongſt them alſo. This diverſity of Opinions, full of no leſs uncertainty; as I mean not to follow in report of this Hiſtory, ſo will I not ſpend any time in refuting the ſame, (although much might be ſaid in the matter) but leave theſe Reports, together with the Hiſtory following, to ſuch credit as they ſhall hap to find with the conſiderate Readers.

The Greek Hiſtoriographers (beſt like to know the Turkiſh Succeſſion, as well by reaſon of their nearneſs, as in that they were by them as their bad Neighbours, ſo much troubled) make no mention at all either of Calepinus or of Orchanes: In like manner, Hiſtoriæ Muſulmanæ Turcorum, diligently gathered out of the Turks own Hiſtories by Jo. Leunclavius (a learned Phyſitian, and himſelf a great Traveller amongſt them, and therefore deſerving the more credit) do not ſo much as name the Succeſſion of Calepinus or Orchanes, after the Captivity of Bajazet, but rejecteth them both as Counterfeits. But in my opinion (without prejudice to any, that upon better reaſon may deem otherwiſe) the great confuſion of the Turkiſh Kingdom, in ſhort time wrought by the mighty Tamerlane and his Tartars, with the civil Diſcord and War afterwards ariſing among the Sons of Bajazet, ſtriving all as it were at once, for the reſtleſs room of Soveraignty, which ſuffereth no Partners; and every one of them, according to his hap or power, laying hand upon ſome one part or other thereof, and bearing himſelf therein for a time as King, in Countries ſo far diſtant; never leaving, until they had like the Earth-born Brethren, wrought one anothers deſtruction; might give juſt occaſion of ſuch diverſity of Reports as is before ſpoken of, concerning the Succeſſion of that time, in that troubled and rent Kingdom; ſome reckoning one, ſome another; and ſome, ſuch as never were, to have ſucceeded in the Government, and ſo untruly augmenting the number of the Turkiſh Kings. Wherefore leaving Calepinus and Orchanes unto them that firſt found them, with that little, which without any good ground and leſs probability is written of their ſuppoſed Reign; I (following the authority of the Turkiſh Hiſtory) reckon this Mahomet one of the youngeſt Sons of Bajazet (of whom we are now to intreat) Fifth King of the Turks; who after great and dangerous Wars as well againſt his own Brethren, as his foreign Enemies; was at length ſolely inveſted in the Turkiſh Kingdom, about ten years after the Captivity of his Father Bajazet, as ſhall hereafter be declared.

The true Poſterity of Bajazet.

Bajazet after the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, having laid up the hope of his Poſterity in the common Treaſure-houſe of Nature, rather than in the body of one lawful Wife, had by divers Wives and Concubins ſeven Sons, Erthogrul, otherwiſe called Orthobules, Emer-Solyman, Muſtapha-Zelebi, (that is to ſay, the Noble) Iſa-Zelebi, Muſa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Caſan-Zelebi. Of whom Erthogrul the eldeſt was loſt in the Wars againſt Caſi Burchaniden, as is before ſaid in the life of Bajazet. Muſtapha was ſlain in the great battel againſt Tamerlane, and there buried in the Bed of Fame. Caſan the youngeſt was a Child in Bajazet his Court, when his Father was taken, and afterwards with his Siſter Fatime delivered as Hoſtages, by their Brother Solyman, unto Emanuel the Emperor of Conſtantinople, where they both happily became Chriſtians, and ſo ſhortly after died.

Solyman was by Alis Baſſa Preſident of Bajazet his Council, and other great Captains, conveyed out of the battel againſt Tamerlane, into Europe, and ſo by them at Hadrianople ſaluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the ſame battel to Amaſia in Capadocia, where he was in his Fathers time Governor. Iſa hearing of his Fathers Captivity, after the departing of Tamerlane with his Tartars, ſeiſed upon Pruſa a City of Bithynia, the ancient Seat of the Turkiſh Kings, with the Country adjoyning, and there reigned as King. Muſa-Zelebi was taken Priſoner with Bajazet his Father, and afterwards ſet at liberty by Tamerlane. But of their Fortunes more ſhall be ſaid in this Hiſtory following.

Mahomet Governor of Amaſia.

Mahomet was but fifteen years old when his Father Bajazet in the unfortunate battel of Mount Stella was taken Priſoner, and was at the ſame time by his appointment Governor of Amaſia, with a great part of Capadocia adjoyning; which places became ſo troubleſome after the great Victory of Tamerlane, that the Turks in that Country were glad day and night for the ſafeguard of themſelves, their Wives, and Children, to keep continual Watch and Ward; inſomuch that many of them wearied with thoſe Troubles, and deſpairing of better Times, went into voluntary Exile, becauſe they would not ſee ſo great Miſeries; which thing much griev'd young Mahomet. Wherefore calling unto him his moſt faithful Counſellors, to conſult what courſe to take in the midſt of ſo many dangers, it was by general conſent thought beſt (for ſo much as they could not without apparent danger continue near unto Tamerlanes Forces) to get themſelves further off into places of more ſtrength, and from thence to expect the departure of their Enemies, and in the mean time to content themſelves with ſuch advantages as occaſion and chance of War might miniſter; cutting them ſhort by policy, whom they were not able to meet in the plain Field, and ſo by little and little to weaken or weary their mighty ſtragling Enemies. For albeit that Tamerlane himſelf was not near him, as then lying in Caria; yet did the Captains of his great and victorious Army, at their pleaſure ſpoil and forrage the Countries far and near all over the leſſer Aſia. Upon this Reſolution he with all his Forces departed from Amaſia, to Derby in Paphlagonia; where by the way he incountred with Cara Jabia a nigh Kinſman to the Prince Iſfendiar of Caſtamona, his Enemy; whom he put to flight with great ſlaughter of his Men. This was the beginning of Mahomets good Fortune. From thence he went to Kereden, and there ſtaying certain days, ſent a Spy into Tamerlanes Camp, to ſee how all things went there; and afterwards entred again into Council with his Captains, concerning his further proceedings. In which Conſultation ſome were of opinion, That it was beſt for him to withdraw himſelf into the Mountains of the leſſer Aſia, as a place of good ſafety, until the departure of Tamerlane, which was ſhortly hoped for; for that it was not to be thought, that Tamerlane would with his huge Army purſue him in that Mountain-Country, flying from Hill to Hill, and as it were from ſtrength to ſtrength. Others better adviſed, thought thoſe Mountains to be no places to truſt unto, and therefore that it were more honourable, and as free from danger, for him to return again to Amaſia, there to live amongſt his Subjects, protecting them in ſuch ſort as he might, and not to leave them for a Prey to every ſtragling Company of the rude Tartarians; which counſel he followed, as moſt reaſonable; and being ready to ſet forward, the Spy before by him ſent into Tamerlanes Camp, returned, certifying him that he had ſeen his Father Bajazet in good health in the Tartars Camp, but could not by any means ſpeak with him, by reaſon of the ſtraight Guard ſet over him; and that all that part of Aſia was by Tamerlane poſſeſſed, who then with his Army wintred in Caria and Lyſia; whereupon Mahomet returned back again into Amaſia; where he had not long ſtayed, but that News was brought unto him, That one of the Tartarian Princes called Cara Duletſchach (that is to ſay, the fortunate black King) was with an Army of twenty thouſand coming to ſpoil his Country, being given him by Tamerlane. With which News he was exceedingly troubled; wherefore with all ſpeed calling together his Forces for the ſafeguard of his Country, ſent before a Spy to diſcover the Enemies doings. This diligent Spy returning in all haſt, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet lay at the Town of Ægiolus in Galatia, in great ſecurity, having about him but a ſmall Power; for that he fearing no danger, had at that time diſperſed his Army, to ſeek after Pillage abroad in the Country. Mahomet taking hold of this opportunity, marched thither with great celerity, and ſuddenly ſetting upon Cara Dulet, overcame him. In which Conflict Cara Dulet himſelf was ſhot through the Head with an Arrow and ſlain, and his Army utterly diſcomfited. Mahomet returning back to Amaſia with Victory, refreſhed and rewarded his Souldiers, yet no leſs careful for the ſafety of his Kingdom than before.

Mahomet ſendeth Spies into Tamerlane his Camp.

Shortly after, he was advertiſed that Cubad Ogli with a great Army laid hard Siege to the City of Cæſaria in Capadocia, and was like in ſhort time to take it, if it were not ſpeedily relieved. By taking of which City, that Tartar Prince was like to make a great Entrance, to the hazarding of the whole Country. Wherefore Mahomet having his Army always in readineſs, marched day and night with ſuch ſpeed to Cæſaria, as that he was upon Cubad Ogli before he was aware of his coming, and there ſlew moſt of his Souldiers, and put him with the reſt to flight. After that, he returned into Cubad Ogli his Country in Pontus, and grievouſly ſpoiled and deſtroyed the ſame; at which time he alſo by force won the ſtrong Caſtle Peltæ in the Confines of Phrygia.

Immediately after that, Inal Ogli another of Tamerlanes Captains (which at their pleaſure without let forraged all the Countries of the leſſer Aſia, during the time that Tamerlane made his abode within the Turks Dominions) upon the ſudden entred into Capadocia with an Army of twenty thouſand fighting men, killing the Inhabitants, and ſpoiling the Country before him; ſo that the people for fear left their dwellings, and fled into the Woods and Mountains to hide themſelves from his fury. Whereof Mahomet hearing, was therewith exceedingly grieved, and wrote unto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet, unto the Prince Inall Ogli.

Mahomet his Letters to Inall Ogli the Tartar Prince.

Whereas without any juſt or lawful Cauſe, or any War proclaimed, you have invaded Our Kingdom, and ceaſe not cruelly to kill Our Subjects, by God committed to Our Protection; and to ſpoil their Wealth and Labours, to the great diſturbance of the Mahometan Commonweal; and make no end of your malice and cruelty; you do therein quite digreſs from the Manners and Laws of the true Mahometans, or right Believers. For if thou wouldſt not only be accounted, but indeed be a true Muſul-man, thou ſhouldſt forthwith depart out of my Kingdom with thine Army; thou ſhouldſt not thus ſhed the innocent blood, or without cauſe thus wrong my people; but foraſmuch as thou knoweſt not what beſeemeth thee, neither wilt liſten unto good Counſel, but wilfully proceed in thy wicked purpoſe, falſly perſwading thy ſelf, this my Kingdom to be deſtitute of a lawful Inheritor, and therefore doſt ſo great Wrong and Injury unto the Defenders of the true Mahometan Religion; I would thou ſhouldſt know, that I with my ſo often Victorious Army will ſhortly by the Power of God come againſt thee, and in plain Field, according to thy deſerts, chaſtiſe thee. Therefore whilſt thou yet maiſt, reclaim thy Self, and proceed not too far in thine obſtinacy; obſtinacy; too late Repentance did never man yet good. Thus much We thought good to adviſe thee, that thou ſhouldſt not be ignorant of Our purpoſe, but mighteſt ſo better conſider and diſpoſe both of thy ſelf and thine affairs. In the year after the departure of the great Prophet Mahomet 806.

Unto which Letters Inall Ogli returned this Anſwer in writing:

Prince Inall Ogli, to Mahomet.

Inall Ogli his anſwer to Mahomet.

W*Hy doſt thou* Mahomet with ſuch Letters provoke me? why doſt thou ſo uncivilly taunt me, being thy ſelf but a Boy, and in truth a very Child? It beſeemeth thee not to have entred into theſe Countries, or to lay hands thereon, wrongfully gracing thy ſelf with the Title of a Sultan. Neither is there any cauſe why thou ſhouldſt complain, that I ſhould lie in wait or ſeek after thy Life, thy Kingdom, or any thing that thine is. I challenge unto my ſelf this Kingdom, but none of thine; out of which it is reaſon for thee, as a wrongful intruder of thy ſelf, to depart; whom otherwiſe I will forthwith thruſt out, and joyn the ſame unto the reſt of my Territories. Wherefore except thou without delay get thee packing, and ceaſe to oppoſe thy ſelf againſt my deſigns, I denounce unto thee all the Calamities of War, and wiſh thee with ſpeed to prepare thy ſelf to battel, for that I mean ſhortly to meet with thee. This year of our great Prophet, 806.

Inall Ogli over-thrown by Mahomet.

Shortly after, Mahomet according to his promiſe meeting with this Tartar Prince, by plain force overthrew him, and had of him a notable Victory.

The like good hap he had alſo not long after, againſt Coſter Ogli and Kiupeck Ogli, two other Tartarian Captains, at the Caſtle of Chara-chizar and the Plain of Artuck-Ova. And hearing that one Meſites a Turk, had fortified himſelf in the Ruins of Sebaſtia, and from thence ſpoiled the Country round about, he ſent Bajazet one of his Baſſaes againſt him; who in ſhort time took him,and brought him bound unto him; by whom he was adjudged to die. But ſeeing in the man an invincible courage, and contempt of death at ſuch time as he ſhould have been executed, moved therewith, he gave him his pardon; for which he ever after continued unto him faithful, and did him great Service.

Mahomet having many times thus vanquiſhed the ſtragling Tartarian Princes, which had ſought the ſpoil of his Country, became thereby famous amongſt the great Commanders of Tamerlane his Army; inſomuch that the bruit of his name came at length to Tamerlanes Ear, yet lying in the leſſer Aſia; who as he thought it not worth his Greatneſs and Labour, himſelf in Perſon to go againſt ſo great an Enemy; ſo he thought it not good or convenient quite to neglect him, but by ſome other means (if he could) to overtake him. For which purpoſe he began to ſpeak many times very honourably of him, highly commending his great valour and forwardneſs in ſo tender years. And calling for Bajazet, told him what great commendation he had heard of his Son Mahomet, and that he was therefore very deſirous to ſee him; where if he found that true which was reported of his great Vertues, he would beſtow one of his Daughters upon him in Marriage, with many other great Preferments; and therefore willed Bajazet to write unto him, Not to doubt to come unto him, to the great good both of himſelf and his Father. Which thing Bajazet at the firſt doubting the worſt, requeſted Tamerlane not to believe that of his Son, being yet very young, and not worthy of ſo great a Favour. Nevertheleſs partly perſwaded by Tamerlane his Proteſtations, and importuned by him that might now command him; he with an evil will wrote to his Son Mahomet to ſuch effect as Tamerlane required. With which Letters, and others of like purport from himſelf, with many rich Preſents, Tamerlane ſent Hozza Mahomet (one of his ſecret Counſellors) Embaſſador to Mahomet, of whom he was right honourably received, and likewiſe entertained. But having read the aforeſaid Letters, and thereby underſtood the cauſe of his coming, he entred into Council with the great Baſſaes about him, whether he were beſt to go to Tamerlane or not. Where his Counſellors were all clear of one Opinion, that it was not good for him to adventure his Perſon to the danger of ſuch a Journey, or the mercy of ſo mighty an Enemy, of whoſe Faith he had no aſſurance. And if ſo be (ſaid they) he therewith offended, will by force ſeek to have you, we at his coming will take the refuge of the Woods and Mountains, and there ſhroud our ſelves until he be departed again; for that he with his huge Army cannot here long ſtay in this bare Country, for want of Neceſſaries. Nevertheleſs Mahomet hoping that his Journey might be both for the good of his Father, and his own Advancement; contrary to the mind of all his Counſellors, reſolved to go; and ſo having prepared all things needfull for the honour and ſafety of his Journey, ſet forward. But as he was upon the way in the Marches of Pontus, Cara Jahia whom he had before overthrown, underſtanding of his coming that way, thinking now to be revenged, and having got unto ſome of the Prince Iſfendiars Forces, ſet upon him by the way; but with as evil Succeſs as before, moſt of his Men being there by Mahomet ſlain, and himſelf glad ſhamefully to fly. So travelling on further, he underſtood that Alu Beg, a great Lord in thoſe Countries, went about to intercept him alſo; which cauſed him in ſuch haſt to go on, that he was upon Alu before he was aware of his coming, or well provided for him; ſo that for fear he was glad to betake himſelf to flight. Mahomet conſidering the danger he had eſcaped in that Journey, and that the nearer he came to Tamerlane, the more like he was to fall into greater, although happily without Tamerlane his knowledge; by the advice of his grave and faithful Counſellors,reſolved to go no further. Wherefore calling unto him Tamerlanes Embaſſador, he thus ſpake unto him:

Mahomet his Speech to Tamerlanes Embaſſador.

You ſee the Dangers and Injuries I indure in this my Journey, and my mind forbodeth greater to enſue; for which cauſes I may not go any further, but here return: Commend me therefore I pray you unto the moſt mighty Tamerlane, with my Father; and tell them what dangers have happened unto me upon the way; which conſidered, I hope they will have me excuſed. For which purpoſe I will alſo ſend in your company an Embaſſador of mine own.

Mahomet at that time had with him a grave, wiſe, and learned Man, called Sophis Bajazet, ſometime his School-Maſter; whom he ſent Embaſſador to Tamerlane and his Father, to have him unto them both excuſed; and ſo departed he homewards, leaving the way he came (for fear of further danger) and they towards Tamerlane, who honourably received Mahomets Embaſſador and Letters. But taking pleaſure in the man ſent unto him, gave him honourable Entertainment, but would never after ſuffer him to return again unto his Maſter.

It was not long after, but that old Bajazet died of impatiency (as is aforeſaid:) whoſe dead body Tamerlane left at Apropolis with the Prince Germean, to be delivered unto his Son Mahomet; with Muſa his elder Brother (who all this while had been kept Priſoner with Tamerlane) if Mahomet ſhould require them. And ſo the mighty Prince Tamerlane, after he had long time waſted Phrygia, Caria, Lydia, with the moſt part of the leſſer Aſia; and conquered all Syria, Judea, Egypt, and Perſia, with many other great Countries and Provinces; returned at laſt into his own Kingdom, unto the great City of Samercand, which he wonderfully inlarged, and beautified with the Spoils of a great part of the World, before by him waſted; where he afterwards in great Peace and Glory reigned, no leſs honoured than feared of all the Princes of the Eaſt. To the terror of whom, and for the aſſuring of his Eſtate, he kept always a ſtanding Army of forty thouſand Horſe, and threeſcore thouſand Foot ready at all aſſays; beſide other his great Garriſons which he kept in Syria,Egypt, China, and Cambalu; as alſo againſt the Muſcovite, and Turks; being commonly in every place threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, though not ſtill in field, but as occaſion required. Until that at length hearing of the riſing again of the Turkiſh Kingdom, under the Othoman Princes, the Sons of Bajazet, with whom the oppreſſed Mamelukes of Egypt, and the Greek Emperor (as doubtful of his eſtate) had now alſo for fear of him combined themſelves; he by the perſwaſion of Axalla (then General of his Imperial Army) made great preparation for a ſecond Expedition to be made for the utter rooting out of the Othoman Family, and the Conqueſt of the Greek Empire. But having now all things in readineſs, and alſo given a good beginning unto theſe his intended Conqueſts, (one of the great Turks Baſſaes being by Axalla his Lieutenant in a great battel overthrown, and thirty thouſand of the Turks ſlain) he in the midſt of theſe his great hopes, as alſo of his greateſt Power, died of an Ague the 27th day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1402. A little before whoſe death, appeared a great and terrible Blazing-Star, portending as it were to the World the death of ſo great a Prince. He was a man of a middle ſtature, ſomewhat narrow in the ſhoulders, otherwiſe well limmed, and of a great ſtrength. In his eyes ſate ſuch a rare Majeſty, as a man could hardly indure to behold them without cloſing of his own; and many in talking with him, and often beholding of him became dumb; which cauſed him oftentimes with a comely modeſty to abſtain from looking too earneſtly upon ſuch as ſpake unto him, or diſcourſed with him. All the reſt of his Viſage was amiable and well proportioned; he had but little hair on his Chin; and ware the hair of his Head long and curled, contrary to the manner of the Tartars, who ſhave their Heads, having the ſame always covered; whereas he contrariwiſe was for the moſt part bare headed, commanding his Son alſo to be ſo by his Tutors brought up; his hair was of a dark colour; ſomewhat drawing toward a Violet, right beautiful to behold; which his Mother coming of the Race of Sampſon (as he gave it out) willed him to nouriſh, in token of his deſcent; the cauſe that made him to be the more reſpected of his Men of War; moſt part of them believing that in thoſe hairs was ſome rare vertue, or rather ſome fatal deſtiny; an old practiſe of many great Commanders of former Ages, to fill the heads of their Souldiers with ſome ſtrange Opinion conceived of them, to be the more of them honoured; as if in them had been ſome one thing or other more than in other men.

The death of Tamerlane.

The deſcription of Tamerlane.

Mahomet goeth againſt his Brother.

His great Empire by himſelf divided betwixt his Sons, was by their diſcord, and the ambition of ſome of their diſloyal Subjects, in ſhort time after brought to great confuſion, and his Poſterity utterly rooted out by Uſun-Caſſanes, the Armenian Prince, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory may appear. But to return again to our purpoſe; Mahomet delivered of his greateſt fear, by the departure of Tamerlane out of thoſe Countries, determined to go to Pruſa in Bithynia, where his Brother Iſa as then reigned; but underſtanding that Iſa had before taken the Straits whereby he ſhould paſs the Mount Horminius, he took another way about, and came to Palæo-Caſtron, where the valiant Captain Eine-beg Sub-baſſa then remained; who with all honour and gladneſs received him, and there for certain days refreſhed both him and his Army. Afterwards greater Forces ſtill repairing unto him, he marched thence to Ulabad, called in ancient time Lopadium. Of whoſe coming Iſa before underſtanding, and having aſſembled his Army, marched thither alſo, and encamped on the other ſide of the Town towards Pruſa, ready to give him battel. But Mahomet ſeeing his Brother ſo forward, conſulted with his Captains what were beſt to be done; where Eine Sub-baſſa a man of great experience, and of late one of Bajazet his great Counſellors and Captains, told him, That it was not for their Honours, being Brethren, to pollute their hands one in the others blood; but to aſſay if the quarrel might by ſome other good means be compoſed, and they made Friends. For which purpoſe, Mahomet preſently ſent Letters unto his Brother Iſa, concerning the partition of their Fathers Kingdom in Aſia betwixt them: offering unto him the Provinces of Aidinia, Saruchania, Germeania, Charaſia, Charamania, with other Countries to them belonging; ſo that he might have Pruſa with all other Provinces about the ſame. Which Letters, when Iſa had read, and ſaw that Mahomet offered him but Titles for Kingdoms, and ſuch Countries as were rather ſometimes Tributaries unto their Father Bajazet, than any part of his Kingdom, and now of late by Tamerlane again reſtored unto their ancient Liberty and Governors, ſharing out the beſt and ſtrongeſt part thereof unto himſelf, he brake forth into choler and ſaid:

The anſwer of Iſa to Mahomet his Offers.

What, doth not my Fathers Kingdom of right belong unto me being the elder Brother? Mahomet is yet but a Youth, and ſcarce crept out of the ſhell; by what right then can he claim my Fathers Kingdom as his Inheritance? If he can by the Sword win it, let him take it, and ſo hold it.

Mahomet having received his Anſwer, prepared himſelf to the field, where his Brother as ready as himſelf, ſtood expecting his coming; and having ſet Army in order of battel, gave the firſt Charge; which was the beginning of a moſt cruel and bloody fight, wherein, as it commonly falleth out in doubtful Battels, many were on both ſides ſlain. At laſt the fortune of Mahomet prevailing, Iſa his Army began to retire; which he ſeeing, left nothing undone for the encouraging of his fainting Souldiers, which belonged to a politick General, or valiant Souldier to do; but preſſing into the thickeſt of his Enemies, there with his own hand ſlew the ancient and valiant Captain Eine Sub-baſſa, who had many times been General of the Footmen in old Bajazet his Wars. But what prevaileth courage againſt evil fortune? Iſa muſt either fly or die. And therefore having done what he could in ſo deſperate a caſe, being himſelf on every ſide forſaken; in the end was glad himſelf to fly to the Sea-ſide; where finding a Ship ready bound for Conſtantinople, he paſſed over thither in ſafety, and there yielded himſelf unto the Protection of the Greek Emperor Emanuel. In this chaſe Mahomet his Souldiers took the valiant Captain Temurtaſes Priſoner, another of Bajazet his great Commanders, and brought him to Mahomet; who in revenge of the death of Eine, commanded his Head preſently to be ſmitten off, and his Body to be hanged upon a Tree by the High-way ſide. Of this Victory, Mahomet certified his Brother Solyman at Hadrianople, and in token thereof ſent him Temurtaſes his Head. This battel was much ſpoken of, both for that it was fought betwixt two Brethren; and alſo for the death of the two famous and old Captains Eine and Temurtaſes, who both together as loving Friends,had fortunately fought many great battels under Bajazet his Enſigns; and now as it were by deſtiny, and againſt their wills, without any private grudge, were both drawn into contrary Factions and ſlain; both whilſt they lived wiſhing a good Peace betwixt the ambitious Brethren. But as the Turks uſe to ſay, What is by God written in a mans forehead before his Birth, cannot in his life be avoided.

After this Victory, Mahomet thinking himſelf now in ſure poſſeſſion of all his Fathers Dominions in Aſia, led his Army to Pruſa, where he was of the Citizens joyfully received as their Sultan; and for his great bounty, of all men highly commended and honoured. From thence he went to Nice, and ſo to Neapolis, and there in both places was likewiſe received. Thither reſorted unto him all the Garriſons of Caraſina, Saruchania, and Aidinia,with other the Inhabitants of thoſe Countries, with all Loyalty ſubmitting themſelves unto him, with ſuch Honour and Reverence as belonged to their King.

The body of Bajazet honourably buried at Pruſa.

All things thus ſorting according to his deſire in Aſia, he ſent to the Prince Germean for the Body of his Father Bajazet, and for his Brother Muſa, which were there left by Tamerlane, as is before declared. This Body was by the ſame Prince at the requeſt of Mahomet, with great Solemnity ſent to Pruſa, and there ſumptuouſly buried, with all the Turkiſh Obſequies and Ceremonies; the Turkiſh Alcoran or Book of their Law, being read ſeven days upon his Tomb. All which time great chear was kept for all Commers, and much given to the Poor (upon the Turkiſh devotion) for Bajazet his Soul; but above all others, exceeding bounty was extended to the Poſterity of their Prophet Mahomet, which are known from others amongſt the Mahometans, by the colour of their Apparel, which is all green, and not lawful to be worn of any but of them; ſo that they were by the bounty of Mahomet, at that time greatly enriched. He alſo endowed the Abbey which his Father had there lately built, with great Lands and Poſſeſſions for the maintenance thereof. All which things done, and the Solemnity paſt, he went in Progreſs to all parts of his Kingdom, and was in every place joyfully received; and ſo afterward returned to Amaſia; and there in great pleaſure ſpent that Summer. Where we will for a while leave him, to ſee what Solyman his eldeſt Brother in the mean time doth at Hadrianople.

Solyman the eldeſt Son of Bajazet (who kept his Court at Hadrianople, there peaceably Reigning all this while over the Countries which his Father Bajazet ſometime poſſeſſed in Europe) hearing what his Brother Mahomet had done, and how violently againſt all Right he had driven Iſa out of Pruſa, and made him glad to fly to Conſtantinople; was with this his outragious dealing much offended, and thereupon calling unto him his Baſſaes and faithful Counſellers, declared unto them the unnatural proceedings of Mahomet againſt his Brother Iſa. Wherein (ſaid he) he doth me alſo great wrong in taking upon him the Soveraignty over thoſe great Dominions and Countries in Aſia, which of right belong to me his elder Brother, and not to him the youngeſt of ſix. In revenge of which Injury and Wrong, I intend in mine own Right, to paſs over into Aſia with a ſtrong Army, and by force of Arms to recover mine Inheritance there, if I may not otherwiſe come by it. Unto which Speech one of his grave Counſellors replied, That in his opinion it was not the beſt courſe for himſelf to go in Perſon into thoſe Wars. For although (ſaid he) your Brother Mahomet be but young, and therefore by your greatneſs leſs accounted of, yet is his Fortune great, and his experience above his years. None have yet had to do with him, but they have had enough of him; yea it is worth the noting, how politickly he hath born himſelf for his own ſafety, and the ſafeguard of the Countries which he governed all the while that the great and mighty Tamerlane with his innumerable Forces covered the face of the Countries faſt by him; moſt part whereof, Mahomet hath now ſince his departure, again recovered. Wherefore it were beſt for you to ſend for your angry Brother Iſa, to Conſtantinople, and to make him General of the Army you intend to ſend into Aſia againſt Mahomet. In which Wars, it is not unlike, but that one of your Brethren will be loſt, whereby you ſhall have one Competitor of your Kingdom the leſs. So ſhall you afterwards with leſs trouble ſubdue him that is left, or at leaſtwiſe pleaſe him with ſome part of that which they have ſo mightily ſtriven for. This Counſel was of Solyman and all the reſt well liked of, and approved. So was Iſa preſently ſent for unto Conſtantinople, and a great Army levied. Who being come to Hadrianople, was by Solyman courteouſly welcomed, and made General of his Army; and therewith ſhipped over the Strait of Helleſpontus into Aſia. Where at his firſt coming, he poſſeſſed the whole Countrey of Caraſia or Lydia; and paſſing further, in all places where he came, was received of the people with great Reverence, they all promiſing him their Obedience, if it were his fortune to prevail againſt his younger Brother Mahomet; wherewith he held himſelf well contented. So coming to the City of Beg-Bazer, otherwiſe called Deſpotopolis, he there wintered with his Army. In which time, he with many kind and loving Letters ſtill directed to Mahomet as his younger Brother, ſeemed to be glad that he was ſo well obeyed and liked of by his Subjects; and that preſuming of his Love and Favour, he was as his loving Brother, and not as an Enemy come into Aſia, to intreat with him of ſuch matters as much concerned the good of them both. Whereunto Mahomet with like diſſimulation anſwered, That he was right glad of his coming; for which he needed not (as he ſaid) to make any excuſe, for that he was entred into a Kingdom, in part his own, and the reſt open before him; in token whereof he commanded a rich Garment to be caſt upon the Meſſenger as a favour, ſending alſo divers rich Preſents unto his Brother, with great Proviſion of Victuals, and other neceſſaries for his Souldiers.

Iſa with a great army ſent by his Brother Solyman into Aſia againſt Mahomet.

But Winter paſt, and the Spring come, Iſa marched with his Army to Pruſa, and there ſhewed unto the Citizens the loving Letters he had at ſundry times before received from Mahomet; and telling them that he was in good hope that they ſhould in ſhort time right well agree; requeſted to have the Caſtle deliverd unto him, ſometime their Soveraign; whereinto the better ſort of the Citizens had retired themſelves, and made faſt the Gates againſt him; but when he ſaw that he could by no fair words or policy gain the poſſeſſion of the Caſtle, enraged with that repulſe, he ſet fire upon that goodly City, and burnt it down to the ground. Mahomet not ignorant how his Brother Iſa roamed up and down his Kingdom, uſing all kindneſs to ſuch as yielded unto him; and exerciſing no leſs cruelty upon ſuch as refuſed his Obedience; and how that he had raſed the Royal City of Pruſa; having gathered a ſtrong Army, marched in ten days from Amaſia to Pruſa, and by the way meeting with his Brother Iſa, in a great battel overthrew him with all his Forces. Iſa himſelf accompanied with no more but ten perſons, fled unto Caſtamona, Prince Iſfendiar his City; who hearing of his arrival there, entertained him with all the Honor he could, in recompence of the great Friendſhip he had before found at his hands, at what time he was an humble Suiter in his Father Bajazet his Court.

Pruſa burnt by Iſa.

Mahomet coming to Pruſa, grieved exceedingly to ſee that fair City ſo deſtroyed; yet to comfort the poor Citizens, he gave exceeding Sums of Money to be beſtowed amongſt them, and took order for the new building of the City, and there continued certain days himſelf to ſee the Work begun.

Iſa in the mean time having incited the Prince Iſfendiar in his quarrel to invade his Brother Mahomet, and going thither himſelf in Perſon, was by him now the third time overthrown and put to flight. Nevertheleſs he with ſome ſmall Forces twice afterwards entred into Mahomets Dominion, but finding few or none willing to follow his evil Fortune, was glad at laſt to fly to the Prince of Smyrna, by whom he was both honourably entertained, and comforted.

This Prince of Smyrna moved with Iſa his pitiful Complaints in ſo manifeſt a wrong, did not only promiſe him what help he could of himſelf, but alſo by his Embaſſadors ſolicited the Princes of Aidinia, Saruchania, and Menteſia, to give him Aid in ſo juſt a quarrel, for the relief of Iſa, againſt his uſurping Brother. Theſe Princes pitying the caſe of the diſtreſſed Prince, and moved with the Requeſt of the Prince of Smyrna, and fearing alſo the ambitious ſpirit of Mahomet; amongſt them ſent ſuch Aid, that being all aſſembled together, Iſa had now twenty thouſand men in Arms. Mahomet underſtanding of this great Preparation made againſt him, and having raiſed a ſtrong Army, thought it not beſt to expect his Brothers coming into his Country (where perhaps many might joyn themſelves unto him, being ſo ſtrong in the field) but entred the Prince of Smyrna his Country, with ſuch ſpeed, that he was upon him and the reſt of his Enemies before he was looked for; where after a great and bloody Fight he obtained of them a notable Victory. Iſa having loſt the battel, and therewith his hope alſo, fled into Caramania, and there in ſuch obſcurity ended his days, that no man can tell where nor how he died. This was the end of this noble Prince, always of greater courage than fortune. The Prince of Smyrna the chief Author of this War, humbling himſelf to Mahomet, obtained his Favour. The other Confederate Princes which gave Aid to Iſa, were ſhortly after by Mahomet for moſt part ſpoiled of their Dominions. Which done, he returned with Victory to the building of Pruſa, hoping now to live more at quiet.

Iſa flieth into Caramania, and there dieth in obſcurity.

But whilſt Mahomet after this Victory dreading no danger, was in the midſt of his Pleaſures at Pruſa, he was certainly advertiſed, That his Brother Solyman had raiſed a great Army in Europe, to invade him in Aſia. Upon which advertiſement he furniſhed the Caſtle of Pruſa with a ſtrong Garriſon, and all things needful for the induring of a long Siege, and placed Jacup-Beg the Son of Firoſes, Captain therein; and afterwards departed himſelf, becauſe that City (lately before burnt by Iſa) was not as yet to be defended, much leſs to be accounted of as a place to retire unto if need ſhould ſo require. From Pruſa he came to Ancyra, and from thence directed Commiſſions for the taking up of Souldiers in all parts of his Kingdom. At which time he wrote Letters alſo to Doioran a Tartar Prince (whom he had many times greatly pleaſured) for Aid; who preſently came unto him with certain Troops of brave Horſe, promiſing him his faithful Service.

Not long after, hearing that his Brother Solyman was with a puiſſant Army now come over Helleſpontus, he conſulted with his beſt Leaders, what courſe firſt to take; being himſelf of opinion, without delay to meet his Brother in the Field, deeming it great ſhame, not to offer him preſent battel. But he was by his more expert Captains adviſed, to conſider that he was to fight againſt his eldeſt Brother, of whoſe good or bad Fortune he had as yet no experience; and that many ſecretly favoured his Quarrel and Claim, as the eldeſt Son and right Heir of his Father Bajazet; and therefore it were better for him to retire further off into the ſtrength of his Kingdom; and ſo temporizing, to await all good opportunities that might chance, as it doth in nothing more than in Martial Affairs; rather than to commit all to the hazard of one battel, wherein if Fortune failed him, all were then utterly loſt. Upon which Reſolution he retired from Ancyra towards Amaſia. At which time Doioran the falſe Tartarian, marching out at the other ſide of the City, fell to robbing and ſpoiling of Mahomets Subjects as an Enemy, burning the Country-Villages as they went; which thing when Mahomet underſtood, he with his Horſemen purſued him, and overtaking him before he was looked for, ſlew moſt part of his men, and recovered all the ſpoil which he had before taken; all which Mahomet gave to his Souldiers: Doioran himſelf hardly eſcaping by flight. And ſo Mahomet having revenged himſelf upon his diſſembling Friend, held on his way towards Amaſia.

Solyman being come into Aſia, led his Army towards Pruſa; where the Citizens underſtanding of his coming, went out of the City to meet him, and having done unto him ſuch Honour and Reverence as belonged to their Sultan, brought him peaceably into the City. But Jacup-Beg ſtood upon his guard, and would by no means deliver unto him the Caſtle, which was before by Mahomet committed to his charge; for which cauſe Solyman laid hard ſiege unto it, and gave thereunto divers ſharp Aſſaults, whereby the Defendants were greatly weakned, many of them being ſlain, and the reſt for the moſt part wounded. Whereupon Jacup by Letters ſent by one Eine Hozze, certified Mahomet how things ſtood, and that the Caſtle could not long be holden againſt the furious Aſſaults of Solyman, except it were with ſpeed relieved; upon which News he in all haſt made towards Pruſa, returning the ſame Meſſenger before him, with Letters to the Captain of the Caſtle, if happily he could find means to deliver the ſame; wherein he highly commended him for faithful Service, and and promiſed him ſpeedy relief. This Meſſenger with his Letters chanced by Solyman his Souldiers to be intercepted, and brought to Alis Baſſa, Solyman his chief Counſellor, a man of a ſharp conceit, who of nothing could make ſomething, but having any thing to work upon could do wonders; he having ſtraitly examined the Meſſenger, and peruſed the Letters, ſuppreſſed the ſame, and preſently writ others in the name of Mahomet, commending the Captain for that he had already done in his Service; but yet foraſmuch as he could not poſſibly in time relieve him, he willed him therefore to deliver up the Caſtle, and to provide for the ſafeguard of himſelf and his Garriſon, by ſuch conditions as he could beſt obtain. Theſe counterfeit Letters Alis Baſſa found means to be as cunningly delivered unto the Captain, as they were craftily indited; who having read the ſame, and now out of all hope of relief, expecting alſo every hour to be aſſaulted by the furious Enemy; upon reaſonable conditions yielded the Caſtle to Solyman. The news whereof being brought unto Mahomet, now come within one days march of Pruſa, exceedingly grieved him; but ſeeing no remedy, he returned back again to Amaſia; whither Solyman (now poſſeſſed of the City and Caſtle of Pruſa, and having thereby got a great Name in Aſia) ſhortly after came with his Army, and hardly beſieged his Brother in Amaſia, but ſeeing no hope to win the City, he retired back again to Pruſa, and there after his wonted manner ſpent his time in riot and exceſs, whereunto he was exceedingly given. Jacup-Beg for yielding of the Caſtle, was afterward by Mahomet ſtraitly impriſoned, and in danger to have been put to death, had not the great Baſſaes become earneſt Interceſſors for him.

Mahomet lying at Amaſia, was by his ſecret Eſpials advertiſed, That his Brother Solyman having diſperſed his Army, lay in great ſecurity at Pruſa, guarded but with a ſmall Power, paſſing his time in all voluptuous pleaſure, his common Exerciſe. Whereupon he in all haſt marched with his Army thitherwards, to have ſurpriſed him before he ſhould be able to call together his diſperſed Forces. But when he was come to the River Sangarius, he was diſcovered by Solyman Subbaſſa a great Captain, whom Sultan Solyman had ſent for the taking up of men in that ſide of the Country. Who returning in all haſt, gave Solyman knowledge of his Brothers coming; with which ſudden news he was ſo diſmayed, being now of ſmall ſtrength, that for the avoiding of the imminent danger, he would preſently have fled into Europe, had not Alis Baſſa otherwiſe perſwaded him; telling him, That if he ſhould ſo cowardly fly away, it would not only blemiſh and defame his Honour, but diſcourage his Friends alſo in Aſia, and incourage his Enemies to purſue him perhaps unto the Gates of Hadrianople; and that therefore it were better with ſuch Forces as he had to take the Straits of Neapolis, and ſo to ſtay his Brothers further paſſage into that Country, until ſuch time as he might aſſemble the reſt of his Army. According to which good Counſel he firſt took the beforenamed Straits and Paſſages, whereby Mahomet was of neceſſity to paſs, and there ſtrongly fortified himſelf. Mahomet coming thither, with great force entred thoſe Straits, but was ſtill valiantly by Solyman repulſed. The like attempt he many times valiantly gave, for that he knew himſelf to be at that time too ſtrong for his Brother; but Solyman having the advantage of the place, with little danger or loſs fruſtrated thoſe his Brothers brave Attempts, although he were then a great deal the weaker. Alis Baſſa, whoſe wily head, fraught with long experience, could (with nothing) effect great matters, in the mean time was not idle, but (making Solyman before acquainted with his doings) ſent a ſecret Meſſenger (one of his own truſty Servants) to Mahomet with Letters; certifying him, That moſt of his Nobility and great Captains had ſecretly conſpired to betray him into the hands of his elder Brother Solyman, as the undoubted Heir of his Father Bajazet; and ſo with the price of his Head, to make their own Peace and Atonement with him; and that for the performance thereof they had bound themſelves firſt unto Solyman, and afterwards one to another, by ſolemn Oath. Which Treaſon he diſcovered unto him, with great proteſtation of his love and good will, as he that had a long time eaten Bread and Salt (as the Turks uſe to ſay) in his Fathers Court, and therefore could not but wiſh well unto him, being one of his Lord and Maſters Sons. Theſe Letters ſomething troubled Mahomet, breeding in his head many a jealous conceit; for all that, he ceaſed not for ſix or ſeven days ſpace, to give many a hot Skirmiſh for the gaining of thoſe ſtrait paſſages, but all in vain. In which time it chanced, one of his Servants near about his Perſon, to fly unto the Enemy; which cauſed him the more to ſuſpect all that to be true, whereof Alis Baſſa had forewarned him. Which conſidered, and that by lying there he prevailed nothing, but loſt and wearied his Men, (for it was all that while exceeding foul Weather) and withall doubting to be betrayed, returned as he came, to Amaſia. And Solyman glad alſo of his departure, retired to Pruſa, giving order into all parts of his Kingdom, for the aſſembling of a great Army; but underſtanding that the King of Caramania had made a League with his Brother Mahomet, and that they were agreed to joyn their Forces againſt him, for the driving of him out of Aſia, he forthwith drew all his Forces to Ancyra, as a place of more ſafety.

Whilſt Solyman thus lay at Ancyra, it fortuned that Muſa (which had all this while remained with his Brother Mahomet, ſince he was ſet at Liberty by Tamerlane, though not altogether well pleaſed with his own eſtate) one day by way of talk, thus ſpake unto his Brother; You ſee (ſaid he) how our elder Brother Solyman ceaſeth not to vex and moleſt us daily, and is not unlike in the end to prevail againſt us, to our utter deſtruction: Now if it might pleaſe you to give me leave, I would go to Iſfendiar Prince of Caſtamona and Pontus, our Brothers Enemy, and of him procure ſhipping to paſs over the Euxine Sea into Europe; where I doubt not to find opportunity to make ſome great Innovation in that Kingdom, now in my Brothers abſence; by reaſon whereof Solyman ſhall of neceſſity be driven to leave Aſia, to be again by you ſolely poſſeſſed; or elſe be brought in danger there to loſe his Kingdom in Europe. Which if it ſhall be my good hap to gain out of his hands by your ſupportation, I promiſe you faithfully to hold the ſame of you as of my Lord and Soveraign. This greatly pleaſed Mahomet, and thereupon not long after they concluded betwixt themſelves, one to ſtand faſt unto another, and the one to help the other in what they could, during life; confirming the ſame with great Solemnity of their Turkiſh Faith given and taken. Whereupon Mahomet furniſhed his Brother Muſa with great Sums of Money and other needful things for the taking in hand of ſo great an Enterpriſe.

Muſa thus furniſhed, taking his leave of his Brother, ſet forwards towards the Prince Iſfendiar; who hearing of his coming, met him on the way, and entertained him as a great Prince. But after that Muſa had made him acquainted with his purpoſe for paſſing into Europe, and had obtained grant of his help therein, he took his leave of him for a time, and went to viſit the King of Caramania; who alſo moſt honourably entertained him, and the rather in deſpight of Solyman. But whilſt Muſa was thus paſſing the time in Caramania, it fortuned that Mark (of ſome called Merxes) Prince of Valachia, having his Country much ſpoiled by Solyman his Garriſons; and hearing that Muſa one of Bajazet his Sons was with the Prince Iſfendiar, he writ unto him, promiſing to beſtow his Daughter and Heir in marriage upon Muſa, if he would come over into Europe, and revenge the wrong done unto him by Solyman. Whereof Muſa advertiſed by the Prince Iſfendiar, gladly returned out of Caramania, and was by him tranſported over the Euxine or Black Sea, into Europe; where the Prince of Valachia glad of his coming, received him with great Honour, and according to his promiſe gave him his Daughter in marriage.

Muſa marrieth the Prince of Valachia his daughter.

The fame of Muſa his coming into Europe and of his Marriage, was in ſhort time bruted through all Solyman his Kingdom in Europe, and wrought ſuch effect in the minds of the mutable vulgar people (always deſirous of Novelty) that they all as it were with one conſent ſubmitted themſelves unto him, as unto their Lord and Soveraign; in ſo much that coming to the Royal City of Hadrianople, in the abſence of his Brother Solyman he was there received as their King.

Muſa in the abſence of Solyman received at Hadrianople as King.

Solyman now lying at Ancyra in Aſia, underſtanding of theſe proceedings of Muſa in Europe, and that he was poſſeſſed of a great part of his Kingdom there, was therewith exceedingly troubled. Wherefore leaving his Deputy in Ancyra, he with all his Army came to the Strait of Boſphorus, and there of Emanuel the Greek Emperor obtained paſſage, promiſing for the ſame to reſtore unto him certain places before taken from him in Aſia; for Muſa had ſo provided, that he could have no help of the Turkiſh ſhipping, which was by his Commandment all before brought over unto Europe ſide. Muſa hearing of Solyman his arrival in Europe, made towards him with a great Power; but after that both their Armies were come the one within view of the other, and now ready to joyn battel, many of Muſa his Captains forſook him, and fled to Solyman the elder Brother, and their undoubted King; which Muſa beholding, was glad to fly, and to take the ſafeguard of the Woods and Mountains for his Refuge. After which Victory, Solyman returning to Hadrianople, took again poſſeſſion of his Kingdom, and there without meaſure gave himſelf to riot and exceſs, according to his wonted manner.

After the departure of Solyman out of Aſia Jacup-Beg (but lately before again received into Mahomet his Favour, and now left as Solyman his Deputy) delivered Ancyra, with the Caſtle of Pruſa, and all the reſt that Solyman had gained in Aſia, to Mahomet; who ſhortly after led his Army through the Countries of Caraſia, Aydinia, Sarucania, Tekenſis, and Germeania, reducing them once again unto his Obeyſance; and afterwards returned to Pruſa, where he now the ſecond time took poſſeſſion of his Fathers Kingdom in Aſia.

Muſa goeth againſt Solyman.

Muſa ſtill aided by the Valachian Prince his Father in law, gave many great Attempts againſt his Brother Solyman, but was ſtill put to the worſe. At length having gathered ſome good ſtrength, and diligently attending the leaſt ſmile of better Fortune, drew near unto the place where Solyman lay; who at that time was (as his manner was) banquetting with great pleaſure in his Camp, and full of Wine. Inſomuch that when News was brought unto him, that his Brother Muſa was at hand with a great Power, he in his Drunkenneſs cauſed the Meſſenger that brought the News, to be beaten; and when he had with greater earneſtneſs than was to his liking, affirmed that his Report to be true, he commanded him to be ſlain for troubling his Mirth. But ſhortly after, Muſa was come ſo near, that the Vantcourriers of his Army did Skirmiſh with ſome of Solyman his Souldiers; when as Chaſis Eurenoſes one of his Fathers old Captains, preſſing in, told him that Muſa was at hand, and had skirmiſhed with part of his Army. Whereof Solyman (now far in Wine) had no regard, but ſaid, Good Tutor do not trouble me no more; my Brother Muſa dares not come ſo nigh me; if I do but hold up my Cap, he is gone. With which anſwer the old Captain going out diſcontended, ſent in Chaſan, Aga of the Janizaries; who boldly coming unto him, told him plainly of the imminent danger, and ſharply reproved him for his Intemperance and Security. With whoſe free Speech Solyman moved, in great rage commanded his Beard to be cut off, then no ſmall diſgrace amongſt the Turks. Chaſan preſently coming forth thus diſgraced, ſaid to them that ſtood waiting without, This is the Honour wherewith Sultan Solyman in his Exceſs rewards his moſt faithful Servants. Wherefore be it known to you all, I will from henceforth (and not without cauſe) ſerve Muſa, a Prince of greater Temperance and Diſcretion; who ſo will follow me, come and welcome. So mounting to Horſe, and accompanied with a number of his Janizaries (of whom he was greatly beloved) went over to Muſa; as did many other great Captains alſo with their Companies, moved by his Example ſo to do. But when Solyman underſtood that Chaſan with moſt part of the Janizaries, and many other worthy Captains, with the greateſt ſtrength of his Army, were revolted to Muſa, then faſt by, and ready to ſet upon him; it then repented him too late of his diſſolute folly; and finding no other remedy now to eſcape, hid himſelf until it was dark night; then taking Horſe, accompanied only with Caratze-Beg and Cara Muchil, two of his Noblemen, and one Country Turk whom they had retained for their Guid, thought to have fled to Conſtantinople. This malicious Clown having of purpoſe led them by unknown ways all that night to and fro, as it were in a maze, (oftentimes miſnaming unto them the places they paſſed by, as if they had been in the right way) brought them in the morning to a Village not far from the place from whence they departed the evening before; and there riding a little before them of purpoſe, gave warning to a ſturdy Peaſant or two of his Acquaintance, that Solyman was coming after; willing them to make ſtay of him. Theſe rude Country Churls, with ſome others of like breed, running out with Bats and Staves, and ſuch other homely-Tools as firſt came to hand, ſlew Caratze and Cara Muchil, which would not yield unto them, but ſtood upon their Guard, and took Solyman alive; where, as it commonly falleth out in the vulgar peoples fury, ſome cried out to kill him, and ſo to end the Wars; ſome likewiſe to burn him; and ſome to hang him; and ſome few to ſave him; every one as his rude affection led him. In the heat of this Country uproar came Muſa; who glad to find his Brother Solyman ſo hardly beſet, cauſed him preſently to be there ſtrangled, when he had reigned in Hadrianople ſix years and ten months.

This Solyman is that ſame whom ſome call Celebinus, and other ſome, Calepinus, and reckon him for the fifth King of the Turks.

This was the miſerable end of Solyman, the eldeſt Son that Bajazet left alive. A man much given to Exceſs, otherwiſe indued with many great Vertues, being both of great valour, and exceeding bountiful. In his time lived the learned Doctor Achmetes, which wrote the Hiſtory of Alexander the Great in Turkiſh Verſe, and publiſhed it in the name of Solyman himſelf; for which he was by him bounteouſly rewarded. The dead body of Solyman himſelf, was by the commandment of Muſa conveyed to Pruſa, and there lieth buried faſt by the body of his Grandfather Amurath. So now of theſe Cadmeian Brethren remained none but Mahomet and Muſa, the one reigning in Aſia, and the other in Europe, divers parts of the World, and well bounded with the ſureſt bounds of Nature; yet not ſufficient to content or contain their ambitious minds, until that the younger had moſt unnaturally devoured the elder.

Muſa preſently after the death of his Brother Solyman, took upon him the Turkiſh Kingdom in Europe; who in the beginning of his Reign diſplaced moſt of them which had born great Offices before in the time of his Brother Solyman, and had now of late revolted to him; fearing to be by them betrayed or forſaken, as his Brother was; and in their rooms placed other his own Creatures. And not ſo content, proceeded further, upon ſmall cauſes moſt unkindly to impriſon and put to death many of them who had of him well deſerved. Which cruel dealing ſo alienated the minds of his Nobility, that many of them kept themſelves out of the way, doubtfully expecting the event of ſuch his Tyrannical Government: Chaſis Eurenoſes that old and renowned Captain, to eſcape his hands, was glad to feign himſelf blind, ſo to abſent himſelf from Court. At this time he alſo by his Embaſſadors demanded of divers Chriſtian Princes his Neighbours, ſuch Tribute as they had in times paſt either payed or promiſed to pay unto his Father Bajazet; and in that Quarrel invaded many of them, namely the Princes of Servia and Bulgaria. Amongſt other he ſent Ibrahim Baſſa (a learned man of great experience, and ſometimes one of his Fathers grave Counſellors) unto Emanuel Palæologus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, to demand the like Tribute of him. Who ſo ſoon as he was come to Conſtantinople, from thence by Letters advertiſed Mahomet of the undiſcreet Government of his Brother Muſa in his new gotten Kingdom; and what untimely ſtirs he began to make before he was therein well ſetled, loſing the love both of his Subjects and Neighbour Princes; with much other matter concerning his miſgovernment. Which things when Mahomet underſtood, he ſent a Meſſenger with Letters back again to Conſtantinople, requeſting the Baſſa to come over unto him into Aſia, and in token of his great Favour ſent him divers rich Garments, with many great and princely Promiſes; wherewith the Baſſa moved, and deteſting the cruel Government of Muſa, went over unto him to Pruſa, and there was of him honourably entertained, and ſworn one of his Privy-Council; in which Place of Honour he long time afterwards ſerved him faithfully; and after him, his Son Amurath alſo.

Mahomet thinking, upon the advantage of his Brothers evil Government, to find means to thruſt him out of his Kingdom, and ſo to draw the whole Government of the Turkiſh Empire unto himſelf, as well in Europe as in Aſia; aſſembled an Army of fifteen thouſand choice Souldiers to invade his Brother in Europe, before he were there well eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom. And ſo ſhocking down towards the Straits of Boſphorus, by his Embaſſador concluded a League with Emanuel the Greek Emperor, That one of them ſhould never wrong or damnifie the other; and that if Mahomet ſhould hap to obtain the Turkiſh Kingdom in Europe, he ſhould always Honour and Reverence the Emperor as his ſpecial good Friend; but if it ſhould chance him to be diſtreſſed or overthrown by his Brother Muſa, that then the Emperor ſhould preſently tranſport him and his Army back again into Aſia. This League was with great Solemnity of words on both parts confirmed. And ſhortly after, Mahomet with all his Army was by the Emperors ſhipping at the Strait of Boſphorus near unto Conſtantinople, tranſported over into Europe; for Muſa poſſeſſed of Callipolis, had ſtopped all the other paſſages.

The battel betwixt the two Brethren, Mahomet and Muſa.

Muſa having before knowledge of his Brothers coming, was forthwith in readineſs to meet him with a ſtrong Army. So that Mahomet had not marched far from the Sea-ſide, but that the Vantcourriers of his Army met with his Brothers, at a place called Intzuge, and there began a light Skirmiſh; wherein Muſa his Forerunners were by Mahomets put to flight, and chaſed unto Muſa his Camp. Whereof ſuch a ſudden fear aroſe in the Army, that they were almoſt ready to fly, thinking Mahomet had been upon them with all his Power; but underſtanding the truth of the matter, both Armies reſted that night, which as then drew faſt on. The next day theſe two Brethren, armed with equal hope, brought their Armies into the Field, and gave the ſignal of the battel, whereupon began a mortal and bloody Fight; in the Fury whereof Michael Ogli Baſſa of Romania, and certain other of Muſa's great Captains, upon ſecret diſcontentment revolted to Mahomet; wherewith many of Muſa his Souldiers diſcouraged, fled. Which Mahomet his Souldiers ſeeing, purſued the chaſe with ſuch earneſtneſs and fury, that few were left with himſelf; yet with ſuch as were left, in hope of good hap, he ſet upon his Brother; who although he was half diſcomfited with the flight of the greater part of his Army, whom the Enemies had yet in chace, yet ſtood he faſt himſelf with 7000 Janizaries, his beſt Souldiers; ſo taking the unexpected good hap, preſented unto him by his Brothers forwardneſs, valiantly received his Charge. But Mahomet finding there a greater ſtrength than he had before ſuppoſed, and himſelf too weak to withſtand the fury of the Janizaries, becauſe moſt of his men alſo were following the Chace, was now for ſafeguard of his life glad to fly himſelf to Conſtantinople; whither he came accompanied ſcarcely with two hundred men; and was from thence, according to the agreement before made betwixt him and the Emperor, ſpeedily ſhipped over into Aſia. Muſa having thus put his Brother to flight, with great ſlaughter of his men, preſently took his Tents with all that was therein, and there encamped himſelf. They of Mahomets Army, which followed the Chace of ſuch as had fled in the beginning of the battel, not knowing what had happened to Mahomet, returning to the Camp, doubting no peril, and finding it at their return poſſeſſed by their Enemies, ſtood as men amazed, and utterly diſcouraged; at which time Muſa would not ſuffer his Souldiers to put them to the Sword, as they would fain have done, but commanded them to be diſpoiled of their Arms and ſuch other things as they had, and ſo with life ſuffered them to depart.

After this Overthrow, whilſt Mahomet lay ſtill at Pruſa, the Prince of Smyrna forcibly entred into Aidinia, purpoſing to paſs through into Sarucania; which thing Mahomet hearing, gathered a great Army, and entring into the Princes Country, made ſuch ſpoil as he went, and ſo diſtreſſed the Prince himſelf, that he was glad to ſubmit himſelf unto him; and from thenceforth to hold his Dominion of him, as of his Lord and Soveraign, and ſo returned unto Amaſia.

Mahomet could not well digeſt the loſs he had ſo lately received in Europe, and therefore levied an Army of choice Souldiers out of all parts of his Kingdom, once again to try his fortune againſt his elder Brother Muſa. For the better Succeſs wherein, he by his Letters craved Aid of the Prince Dulgader Ogli, written to this effect:

Sultan Mahomet unto the Prince Dulgader Ogli, his Father in Law.

Mahomet his Letters unto the Prince Dulgader Ogli, his Father in law.

MY purpoſe is to lead mine Army into Romania in Europe, and there again to try my quarrel with my Brother Muſa. My hope is, that you will not with your Aid be wanting unto me your Son in law, in my ſo great Affairs, neither for want of good will to hinder this my purpoſe. Fare you well. In the year of our great Prophet Mahomet, 814. From Amaſia.

Whereunto the Prince returned this kind Anſwer:

Prince Dulgader Ogli unto the great Sultan Mahomet.

The anſwer of Prince Dulgader Ogli to Mahomet.

I Doubt not moſt mighty Monarch, but that whitherſoever your deſires ſhall draw you for the undertaking of any great Exploit, he that ruleth above in Heaven, will be always your Aid, proſper your Attempts, miniſter unto you fit Occaſions, and bring all your Actions unto a moſt happy end, with moſt aſſured Victory. Wherefore ſeeing (God ſo dipoſing our Affairs) I cannot my ſelf in Perſon come unto you with my Power, and give you my truſty help in this your intended War; yet will I in no caſe fail with all ſpeed to ſend my Son your Servant, to Aid you with our Forces, in this War. Fare you well. This ſame Year of our Prophet, 814.

And ſo ſhortly after, the Prince ſent unto him his Son, according to his Promiſe, with a Company of brave Souldiers, excellently furniſhed; for the welcoming of whom, Mahomet his Brother in law made a great and royal Feaſt; and there in his mirth gave unto the young Prince the rich Apparel he wore himſelf, with the Horſe he rode upon, and all the rich Plate of Gold and Silver wherein they were ſerved at that Feaſt, a matter of great value. And to every one of his Noblemen he gave a rich Garment, made for that purpoſe, with ſome other Gift, as a Favour; and afterwards gave them all to underſtand, That he intended forthwith to paſs over into Europe, and there to recover all his Fathers Kingdom, or elſe there to end his days; as for the ſpoil and prey (ſaid he) it ſhall be theirs that can win it; one Horſe, one Sword, one Horſemans Mace ſhall content my ſelf. So having furniſhed his Army with all things needful for ſo great an Enterpriſe, he ſet forward and came to the Strait of Boſphorus; and from thence gave knowledge of his coming to the Emperor of Conſtantinople; who glad thereof (for the diſpleaſure he bare to Muſa) tranſported him and all his Army over that Strait into Europe, and there in one of his Country-Palaces royally feaſted him. At which time Mahomet requeſted the Emperor to joyn with him in that War againſt their common Enemy; but he excuſed himſelf by reaſon of his great age; yet nevertheleſs, aſſiſted him with certain Companies of valiant Chriſtians, whoſe Service afterward ſtood the Turk in great ſtead.

Hadrianople beſieged by Mahomet.

So Mahomet taking his leave of the Emperor, marched with his Army to the River Wyzen in Thracia, where by the way he received Letters from the ancient Captain Chaſis Eurenoſes, adviſing him to be very circumſpect in his marching, and not to make too much haſt to joyn battel with his Brother; counſelling him alſo (if he could by any means) to allure Jegides Baſſa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, to forſake his Brother, and to follow his Enſigns; for that in thoſe men conſiſted Muſa his greateſt ſtrength; and promiſed in good time to come unto him himſelf alſo, if he were not too haſty. This Meſſenger that brought this News, Mahomet bountifully rewarded, and ſo ſent him away. Shortly after, as he was marching towards Hadrianople, part of the Enemies Army began to ſhew it ſelf under the leading of Cara Calile, and was preſently charged by Michael Ogli, and put to flight. So holding on his way to Hadrianople, he laid ſiege to the City; where the Citizens ſent out to him certain of their graveſt and moſt ſubſtantial Burgeſſes, to certifie him, That by reaſon of the Garriſon there left by Muſa, they could not as then deliver the City unto him; but if it ſhould pleaſe him to go and try his Fortune in the Field againſt his Brother, who ſhould be the Commander thereof, he ſhould find them ready to follow his good Fortune, and to yield themſelves, the City, and all therein, to his pleaſure, if it were his good hap to carry away the Victory. With which anſwer Mahomet contenting himſelf, raiſed his Siege, and took the way towards Zagora. In that place Muſa is reported to have come ſecretly diſguiſed into Mahomet his Camp, and to have taken full view thereof; but perceiving himſelf too weak to encounter his Brother, withdrew his Army into the ſafeguard of the great Woods and ſtrong Places; and ſo from thence retired with his Army towards Philippolis, and ſo marched along the River Meritze, called in ancient time Hebrus; where Jegides Baſſa, with Hamza Beg, and Iſmir Ogli (three of Muſa his great Captains) ſet upon the rereward of Mahomets Army, and were by Michael Ogli repulſed. Mahomet holding on his way, came to Sophia; where as he went, Muſa divers times from the Mountains made ſhew of his Army, but durſt not come down into the Plain to give him battle. Mahomet having refreſhed his Army at Sophia, marched to Sarkive, where he received Letters from Jegides Baſſa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, all ſecretly perſwaded by old Eurenoſes to revolt unto him; the tenor whereof in brief was this:

Jegides Baſſa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, unto the great Sultan Mahomet.

WE are three young men (moſt mighty Monarch) and have with us three thouſand choice Souldiers, men of incomparable valour, ſuch as the World hath ſcarce the like; draw your Forces near unto us with as much ſpeed as you can, and you ſhall find us ready to come over unto you. Fare you well.

Muſa his chief Captains revolt to Mahomet.

Whereupon he marched all the next night after, untill he came to the River Morava, and there encamped; where the three aforenamed Captains, according to their promiſe joyned themſelves unto him with all their Souldiers. Thither came alſo old Eurenoſes, of all others the moſt famous Captain amongſt the Turks, and now no longer blind, bringing with him a great company of moſt expert Souldiers. Mark the Deſpot of Servia (for the diſpleaſure he bare unto Muſa) ſent him Aid thither alſo. By which Supplies, Mahomets Army was greatly increaſed; who after he had courteouſly welcomed all theſe new come Captains, he began again to march farther until he came to Coſſova, the unfortunate Plain; where Hamza Beg the Prince of Smyrna his Son, having forſaken Muſa, came unto him with five hundred Horſe, certifying him, that all the Nobility had forſaken his Father; ſo, as he marcht from place to place, his Forces ſtill increaſed, by the revolt of his Brothers. Muſa ſeeing his Souldiers thus daily fall from him, inſomuch that he had almoſt none now left, but the Souldiers of the Court (which were indeed his beſt men of War, and always unto him faithful, becauſe he had been ever unto them exceeding bountiful) thought it beſt to attempt ſomething, before he were left himſelf alone. Wherefore having yet with him ſeven thouſand of thoſe expert Souldiers, he drew nearer unto his Brother, ſeeking to have taken him at ſome advantage. But Mahomet having knowledge of his purpoſe, and contented to be adviſed by his old expert Captains, had ever a vigilant eye unto him. Yet at laſt, whether it were upon good hope, or elſe prickt forward with deſpair, Muſa upon the ſudden, valiantly ſet upon his Brothers Army; but his Souldiers oppreſſed with multitude, rather than overcome with true valour, after a hard and bloody Fight were put to the worſt; which he ſeeing, deſperately brake into the midſt of his Enemies, ſeeking there for death amongſt the thickeſt of them. But being known by Bajazet Baſſa, Mahomet his Lieutenant General, deſirous to take him alive, he was beſet on every ſide; where ſeeing himſelf in more danger to be taken than ſlain, he with great courage brake from amongſt the midſt of them, and fled. In which flight his Horſe falling into a deep muddy Ditch (or as ſome others ſay) hoxed by Sarutzes his own Servant, and himſelf wounded) overthrew him, and there before he could again recover himſelf, was taken by Bajazet Baſſa (the great Lieutenant) Michael Ogli and Barac Beg, which had hardly purſued him out of the battel; and ſo with his hands bound, by them brought through the midſt of the Army. Which pitiful ſight, grieved not a little the hearts of many; to ſee him but even now ſo great a King, and one of the Sons of great Bajazet, by the ſtrange change of Fortune, bound like a Captive Slave led forth to Execution; yet were moſt part glad thereof, hoping theſe long Civil Wars would now in him take end. Shortly after came unto him a Nobleman called Balta Ogli, ſent (as they thought) from Mahomet himſelf; who after he had in few words bitterly reproved him, for the cruelty by him before ſhewed unto his Brother Solyman, in like caſe, cauſed him preſently to be ſtrangled with a Bow-ſtring. His dead body was by and by after preſented to his Brother Mahomet; who ſeeing it, ſhed a few Crocodils tears over it. He reigned three years end ſeven months, and was afterwards conveyed to Pruſa, and there lieth buried by the body of his Brother Solyman, in the ſame Chappel with his Grandfather Amurath.

Mahomet after the death of Muſa, now free from all Competitors, took upon him the ſole Government of the Turkiſh Kingdom, as well in Europe as in Aſia. And here the Turkiſh Hiſtories begin the Reign of this Mahomet fifth King of the Turks; accounting the troubleſome time from the Captivity of Bajazet, unto the death of Muſa, as a time of vacancy or Anarchy, wherein the Turkiſh Kingdom was not at any time wholly poſſeſſed by any one of Bajazet his Sons; Iſa poſſeſſing one part, whereof he was by Mahomet diſpoſſeſſed; who afterwards uſurped all that part of the Turkiſh Kingdom in Aſia, being the right of his elder Brother Solyman; who at that time reigning in Europe, was depoſed and ſtrangled by his Brother Muſa; who was in like manner ſerved by his youngeſt Brother Mahomet, the only Son of Bajazet then left, as is before declared. Which divers Mutations, and interrupted Succeſſions, was the cauſe that the Hiſtoriographers do ſo greatly diſſent upon the Succeſſor of Bajazet; ſome reckoning one, ſome another; and ſome more, ſome fewer; and ſome, ſuch as never were. But foraſmuch as Mahomet held all or moſt part of the Turkiſh Kingdom in Aſia, during his troubleſome time, and in the end poſſeſſed the other part thereof in Europe alſo, I reckon him for the fifth King of the Turks, and Succeſſor to his Father Bajazet; including alſo in this Hiſtory of his life, all that Inteſtine and Serpentine-like Tragedy, wherein he himſelf was the principal Actor.

Whilſt Mahomet was (as is aforeſaid) thus buſied in his Wars in Europe, againſt his Brother Muſa, the King of Caramania taking the advantage of his Troubles there, with a great Army invaded his Kingdom joyning upon him in Aſia, burning and ſpoiling all before him as he went; Eivaſes Baſſa, Mahomet his Lieutenant, then lying at Pruſa, not able to withſtand him; and fearing his coming thither, becauſe it was the Seat of the Othoman Kings in Aſia, cauſed the Citizens to bring the greateſt part of their Wealth into the Caſtle; whereinto he alſo received ſo many of the Citizens as he conveniently could, willing the reſt to ſhift for themſelves as they might, in ſuch caſe of extremity. Shortly after, the King of Caramania (according to his expectation) came to Pruſa, and without reſiſtance took the City, not as yet fully fortified; which he without delay cauſed the ſecond time to be burnt down to the ground; and afterwards laid ſiege to the Caſtle, giving many great Aſſaults thereto by the ſpace of thirty days, but was always valiantly repulſed by Eivaſes the Baſſa, who ceaſed not continually to encourage his Souldiers, ſtill putting them in comfort, that Mahomet having now overcome his Enemies in Europe, would in few days undoubtedly come to their Relief. It chanced at the ſame time that the dead body of Muſa, ſent to Pruſa to be buried, was honourably conveyed upon the way, with much people following it. The Caramanian King hearing of the coming of ſuch a multitude, and fearing it to have been Mahomet with his Power, raiſed his Siege, and with ſpeed departed; whereat the Turks long time after jeſted, ſaying, If the Caramanian King run away for fear of the dead body of the Othoman King, what would he do if he had come againſt him alive? But the truth was, he feared Mahomet and his Power.

Pruſa burnt by the Caramanian King.

Orchanes the Son of Solyman (yet a Boy) having lived at Conſtantinople ever ſince the death of his Father, about this time departed thence, becauſe of the League lately made between the Emperor and his Uncle Mahomet, purpoſing to have gone into Valachia; but by the way as he was travelling, the Turkiſh voluntary Souldiers underſtanding that he was the Son of their late King Solyman, reſorted unto him in great numbers, offering in his Quarrel to ſpend their lives. Of which Inſurrection Mahomet hearing, marched thither in all haſt, with a great Power to ſuppreſs the ſame; of whoſe coming the Souldiers with Orchanes underſtanding, diſperſed themſelves and fled. As for Orchanes himſelf, he was by his unlawful Tutor Zaganos betrayed unto his Uncle Mahomet; who preſently cauſed his Eyes to be put out, and ſo ſent him to Pruſa; allowing him great Revenues to live upon, and ever after uſed him with great Honour. The Siſter of this Orchanes he gave in marriage to one of his Noblemen, with a great Dowry. This is that Orchanes, whom ſome Hiſtoriographers reckon up among the Turkiſh Kings, as one of the Succeſſors of Bajazet; and that he was betrayed to his Uncle Moſes; erring as I ſuppoſe, both in Succeſſion and the Name, miſtaking Moſes for Mahomet.

1416. Mahomet invadeth the Caramanian King.

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the Injury which the Caramanian King had done to him in his abſence, returning to Pruſa, aſſembled a great Army to revenge himſelf of that wrong. At which time, he ſent to the Prince Iſfendiar for Aid, who ſent him his Son Caſſumes. He commanded alſo the Prince Germean Ogli, to make proviſion for the Victualling of his Camp, as he ſhould paſs by his Country; which was accordingly done. And ſo provided of all things neceſſary, he with his Army entred into the Caramanian Country; where he took the Cities Aſpropolis, Deſpotopolis, Hierapolis, and beſieged Iconium; but by reaſon of the immoderate rain which at that time fell, he was glad to make Peace with the Caramanian King, called alſo Mahomet. And ſo raiſing his Siege, departed towards Pontus, where he had not long ſtayed, but that News was brought unto him, That the Caramanian King renouncing his League, was again up in Arms. Wherefore returning into Caramania, and ſo to Iconium, he there overthrew the King in battel, and took both him and his Son Muſtapha Priſoners; who redeemed themſelves by delivering many of their ſtrong Cities and Caſtles into his hands; and afterward concluded a Peace, they receiving from him an Enſign (as the Turkiſh manner is) in token they were now become his Vaſſals.

1417. Valachia Tributary to the Turk.

The Caramanian War thus happily ended, he went over into Europe, and paſſing over Danubius, foraged the Country of Valachia Tranſalpina, making there great ſpoil; for redreſs whereof, the Valachian Prince by his Embaſſadors ſent him ſuch Tribute as he demanded, and his Son alſo to ſerve him in his Court. About which time hapned a great Earthquake in Pruſa, and other places of Aſia; whereby many Houſes and Towns were overthrown; after which, enſued great troubles in moſt parts of Aſia; howbeit Mahomet going thither, by his preſence kept all his Dominions in peace and quietneſs.

Iſfendiar Prince of Caſtamona and part of Pontus, reſerving unto himſelf Caſtamona, with a little part more of his Dominion, gave the reſt unto Mahomet, upon condition, that he ſhould reſtore no part thereof again unto his Son Caſſumes; who having long time ſerved in Mahomet his Court and Wars, could not be perſwaded to return again unto his Father; and therefore was by him thus diſinherited. Which great Gift, Mahomet thankfully accepted, and in lieu thereof aſſigned unto Caſſumes other great and large Poſſeſſions within his own Kingdom.

Mahomet, after the death of his Brother Muſa, had ſent Scheiohes Bedredin (his Brothers Cadeleſcher) to Nice in Aſia, as unto a place of exile, allowing him nevertheleſs a great Penſion whereon to live. This Bedredin had in his houſe one Burgluzes, Muſtapha his Steward; theſe two conſulted together, how to raiſe ſome Tumult or Rebellion to trouble the peaceable Government of Mahomet. For which purpoſe, Burgluzes (according to the Plot by them laid) took this way into Aidinia (ſometime called Caria) and there pretending great Zeal of Reformed Religion, with a wonderful Gravity began to broach divers new and ſtrange Opinions, far differing from the Turkiſh ancient Superſtition, yet very plauſible and well fitting the humour of the vulgar people. By which means he was in ſhort time reputed for a famous learned devout Man, and had many Followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin ſome great Innovation. Bedredin glad of his mans ſucceſs, fled from Nice into the Prince Iſfendiar his Country, from whence he took ſhipping over the Euxine into Valachia, and there withdrawing himſelf into a great Foreſt, as if he had been ſome devout and religious Man, allured unto him a great number of Outlaws and Theeves which there lived. Whom when he had ſufficiently inſtructed and framed to his purpoſe, he ſent them in the habit of Religious Men into the Country of Zagora, and other places in the Frontiers of Mahomet his Dominions, near unto him, as his Diſciples; who with great boldneſs and confidence, publiſhed Bedredin his Doctrine and Authority; and how that he was by God appointed to be the King of Juſtice, and Commander of all the World; whoſe Doctrine and manner of Government was (as they ſaid) already received (as they gave it out) in Aſia, being ſet forth but by one of his Scholars, Burgluzes; whoſe Fame was now diſperſed throughout all the Turks Dominion; and that therefore if any were deſirous of Preferment, they ſhould repair to Bedredin, who would in ſhort time ſhew himſelf to the World, and promote his Followers according to their Deſerts. Many of the Country people deluded with this phantaſie and practiſe of theſe ſeditious Seed-Men, reſorted to Bedredin in hope of Preferment, and with them ſome of good Calling alſo. At laſt, out of the Foreſt cometh this great Prophet with Banner diſplayed, attended upon with a great multitude of the ſeditious vulgar people, which daily reſorted unto him more and more. Mahomet for the repreſſing of theſe dangerous Tumults, ſent his Son Amurath, and Bajazet the great Baſſa, with two thouſand Men to apprehend Burgluzes in Aidinia; but when they came thither, they found him guarded with three thouſand Men well appointed, ready to adventure their Lives in defence of their fooliſh Prophet. Nevertheleſs, Amurath and Bajazet not diſmayed with the multitude of thoſe uplandiſh people, ſet upon them; where was fought a right bloody Battel, for the number, and many ſlain on both ſides; yet at laſt the Rebels fled; in which flight Burgluſes himſelf was ſlain, and hewen all to pieces. After which Victory Bajazet from thence haſted to Magneſia, and there executed Torlac Kemal, another ſeditious Turkiſh Monk, which with two thouſand, by him ſeduced, did much harm in the Country thereabout. At the ſame time alſo, Mahomet ſent another Power againſt Bedredin; but moſt of his Followers ſeeing in him no ſuch matter, as was by his Diſciples and himſelf promiſed, and as they hoped for, were already fallen from him, ſo that of that great multitude which before followed him, him, few or none were leſt with him, whereby he was eaſily apprehended by them that Mahomet had ſent againſt him; and ſo being brought to Mahomet to Serras, was there in the Market-place before a Tavern-door, fairly hanged, without any further harm.

Bedredin hanged.

Mahomet in the ſhort time of his Reign finiſhed the great Mahometan Temple at Hadrianople, before begun by his Brethren Solyman and Muſa. Where he alſo built a Princely Palace, the Seat of the Turkiſh Kings in Europe, until the taking of Conſtantinople. He alſo built another Temple, with a moſt ſumptuous Abbey, and a publick School thereto adjoyning; endowing the ſame with great Revenews, ſuch as had by him and thoſe his Brethren of late been taken from the Chriſtians. He gave alſo great Sums of Money, yearly to be paid at Medina and Mecha, for the relief of poor Pilgrims travelling from far to the Sepulchre of their great Prophet Mahomet, at Medina, or his Temple at Mecha.

Mahomet dieth at Hadrianople.

Shortly after Mahomet fell ſick at Hadrianople, and perceiving himſelf in danger of death, by his laſt Will appointed his eldeſt Son Amurath to Succeed him in his Kingdom, and ſent Elvan-Beg (a man in great Favour with him) in poſt to Amaſia, to will him with all ſpeed to repair to the Court at Hadrianople. But feeling death to approach, and that he could not poſſibly live until the coming of his Son, he ſtraightly charged his Baſſaes with all ſecrecy to conceal his death, until his coming, for fear leſt any Trouble ſhould riſe upon the bruit thereof, before his coming thither; and ſo having ſet all things in Oder, he departed out of this World unto his Prophet Mahomet, about the year of our Saviour Chriſt, 1422. when he had reigned Seventeen years; accounting in his Reign that troubleſome ten years next after the Captivity of Bajazet, in which time the Turks Kingdom was by his ambitious Sons rent in ſunder, (as is aforeſaid) until it was at length again by this Mahomet reſtored to the former Integrity, about ſeven years before his death, which the Turks account for the whole time of his Reign; and the other troubleſome ten years as a vacancy or Anarchy of their Kingdom, as is aforeſaid.

The death of Mahomet cunningly concealed from the Janizaries, by the three great Baſſaes.

Mahomet being dead, the three great Baſſaes, Eivaſes, Bajazet, and Ibrahim (to rid themſelves of the fear they had of the Janizaries, and other Souldiers of the Court) called a Divano or Council for the Wars, as if the King had been alive; wherein it was pretended, That Mahomet had determined to make War upon the Prince of Smyrna; and that for that Service, it was his pleaſure, That the Janizaries ſhould forthwith paſs over into Aſia, to the Caſtle of Baga. Whereupon Preſs-money was preſently given them, and they ſent over with Letters directed to the Vice-Roy of Anatolia, for the aſſembling of an Army for Baga. In the mean time, the great Baſſaes of the Court ſate daily in Council, placing and diſplacing, promoting and diſgracing whom they thought good, as if the King had ſo commanded; the Kings Phyſitians alſo, to countenance the matter, were commanded continually to go to and fro with their Potions and Receits, after their wonted manner, as if they had had the King ſtill in Cure; and Letters were ſent in poſt to Elvan Beg, for ſpeedy diſpatch of the buſineſs for which he was ſent into Aſia. Yet for all this cunning diſſimulation, the Pentioners and other Souldiers of the Court, wont to be near unto the Kings Perſon, and ſome of them always of the Privy-Chamber, began to ſuſpect the matter; and coming to the Baſſaes, ſaid they marvelled that the King in ſo long time did never ſhew himſelf, as he had always before done. Whereunto the Baſſaes anſwered, That he had been dangerouſly ſick, and was as yet but a little recovered, and that therefore the Phyſitians would not ſuffer him to look abroad, or take the Air, for fear of caſting him down again. Then will we our ſelves, ſaid the Pentioners, go and ſee his Majeſty; and with that were ready to force in upon the Baſſaes. Eivaſes ſeeing their importunity, deſired them to hold themſelves contented, and not as then to trouble the King, for that he had that day, as he ſaid, taken Phyſick; but to morrow (ſaid he) we will requeſt his Majeſty, if he ſo pleaſe to ſhew himſelf, that you may ſee him; wherewith they for that time held themſelves content. Now among the Kings Phyſitians there was one Geordiron, a Perſian, a man of a quick ſpirit and ſubtile device, which found means to deceive the Pentioners; he deviſed, that the dead body of the King being apparelled in Royal large Robes, ſhould be brought betwixt two, as if he had been led into an high open Gallery; and being there ſet, to have a Boy ſo neatly placed behind him under his large Robes, as that he unperceived, might move the Kings hand up to his head, as if he ſhould ſtroke his Face or Beard, as his manner was. The next day the dead King being accordingly brought forth by the Baſſaes in his rich Robes, and wrapped with Clothes about his Head, as if it had been for fear of the Air, or of taking cold, and ſo placed in an high open Gallery, as was before deviſed, ſuddenly the Phyſitian came running in, fuming and raging as if he had been half mad, ready to tear his Clothes for anger; and in great choler caſting his Cap againſt the ground, asked the Baſſaes if they meant to kill the King, by bringing him into the open Air? We (ſaid he) have with great pains, in long time, a little recovered him, and will you thus fooliſhly caſt him down again? Pardon us good Doctor (ſaid Eivaſes) for theſe Gentlemen (pointing to the Pentioners) were ſo importunate to ſee his Majeſty, that to ſatisfie their deſires, he was content to be led forth of his Chamber; whereof we hope ſhall enſue no harm. The Pentioners ſeeing the King many times moving his hand to his face, and as it were ſtroking his Beard, held themſelves well contented, ſuppoſing him to have been alive, although but weak, and therefore not willing to ſpeak unto them. The Phyſitians taking him up amongſt them, carried him into his Lodging again, which was but faſt by, making as if they had carried an extream ſick man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and forty days, until the coming of Amurath his Son.

This Mahomet was both wiſe and valiant, and withall exceeding bountiful, but Ambitious above meaſure; and may of right be accounted the Reſtorer of the Turks Kingdom; for he recovered again all thoſe Countries in Aſia, which Tamerlane had taken away and given unto other Mahometan Princes, after the Overthrow of Bajazet. And when as the Kingdom of the Turks was rent in pieces, and almoſt brought to nought by Civil Wars, and the Ambition of himſelf and his Brethren; he at length got poſſeſſion of the whole, and ſo left it to his Son Amurath an entire Kingdom, in the former greatneſs, although not ſo much by him augmented. His body lieth buried in a fair Tomb made of artificial ſtone, very beautiful to behold, in a Chappel at the Eaſt ſide of Pruſa, where we leave him at his reſt.

AMVRATHES PRIMVS TERTIVS TVRCARVM REX · 1350 ·

Sævus Amurathes, animo dum maxima versat:
Discordes Græcos sternere marte parat.
Totus et intentus fines extendere Regni:
Europam penitrans, obvia quæque rapit.
Attoniti trepidant, nimia formidine Thraces:
In medio quorum, Sceptra superba locat.
Hinc Mæsos premit ille feros, miserumq; Dynasten
Coſsovi in Campis, obruit atque necat.
Sed non longa fuit sceleris tam dira voluptas:
A Servo cæsus, condidit ense ferox.

Sterne Amurath new thoughts resolves upon,
With armes divided Greece to overrun;
And wholly bent to'enlarge his narrow bounds,
Europe invades, and all he meets confounds:
The too too timorous Thracians stand amaz'd,
To find his Scepter in their bowells plac'd.
The fierce Bulgarians, did his fury quell,
And at his feet their noble Despot fell:
At last the ponyard of a little Slave Taught him, what short liv'd pleasures Tyrants have

AMURATH,
The Second of that NAME,
Sixth King of the Turks,
And the great ESTABLISHER of their Kingdom.

Murat is the ſame that we call Deſiderius.

AFter that the death of Mahomet had been politickly concealed one and forty days, by the three great Baſſaes Bajazet, Eivaſes, and Ibrahim, Amurath, or Murat (as the Turks call him) his eldeſt Son, at that time coming to Pruſa, was by them placed in his Fathers Seat, and the death of Mahomet at the ſame time publiſhed; whereupon great Troubles began on every ſide to ariſe.

Muſtapha the ſuppoſed Son of Bajazet raiſeth Rebellion againſt Amurath.

The Princes of Smyrna and Menteſia roſe up in Arms; and at Theſſalonica, an obſcure Fellow crept as it were out of a Chimney-corner, took upon him the Name and Perſon of Muſtapha the Son of Bajazet, which was ſlain many years before, in the great battel againſt Tamerlane at Mount Stella, as is before declared in the life of the unfortunate Sultan Bajazet. This counterfeit Muſtapha animated by the Grecian Princes, and going from Theſſalonica to Vardarium, ſet ſo good a Countenance upon the matter, with ſuch a Grace and Majeſty, that not only the Country people (apt to believe any thing) but men of greater Place and Calling alſo, as Tzunites Beg the Prince of Smyrna his Son, with the Sons of old Eurenoſes Baſſa, perſwaded that he was the very Son of the great Bajazet, repaired unto him, as unto their natural Prince and Soveraign. From Vardarium he went to Serræ, and from thence to Hadrianople, (Amurath being as then at Pruſa) where he was received as if it had been that noble Prince Muſtapha, whom he feigned himſelf to be; ſo that in ſhort time he was honoured as a King in all parts of the Turkiſh Kingdom in Europe.

Amurath to repreſs this ſo great and dangerous a Rebellion, ſent Bajazet Baſſa a man of great Authority in his Court, with a ſtrong Army into Europe. This great Baſſa paſſing over Helleſpontus, found all the Country revolted unto their new found King Muſtapha; but marching towards Hadrianople, with purpoſe to have given him battel, he was firſt forſaken of the European Souldiers which he brought out of Aſia, and afterwards of all the reſt alſo; and being left alone, with his Brother Hamze Beg, was for ſafeguard of his life glad to yield himſelf to Muſtapha; of whom he was graciouſly entertained, and upon promiſe of his Loyalty, ſworn one of his Privy-Council.

Muſtapha thus now poſſeſſed of the Turkiſh Kingdom in Europe, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintain his credit, levied a great Army to make War upon Amurath in Aſia. And as he was upon his way, at a place which the Turks call Saſlidere, or the place of Willows, his other Counſellors repining at the great Honour he gave to Bajazet Baſſa, adviſed him to beware that he truſted him not too far, of whoſe ſmall Faith he had ſufficient trial already, and was like enough when occaſion ſhould ſerve, to revolt from him to Amurath, and to draw after him ſome great part of his Army, to the great peril both of himſelf and all them his faithful Servants and Followers. Upon which jealous conceit, this great Baſſa Bajazet was there forthwith as a Traytor apprehended, and without further trial executed; at which time his Brother Hamze was with much ado ſpared. This done, Muſtapha proceeded on his Journey, and paſſed over with his Army at Callipolis into Aſia. Amurath underſtanding of the proceedings of Muſtapha in Europe, and of his preparation made for his Invaſion of Aſia, created three new Baſſaes, Omer, Uruge, and Alis, all three the Sons of Temurtaſes; theſe he joyned with his old Baſſaes Ibrahim and Eivaſes. All theſe five he uſed as Counſellors for the Wars; by whoſe advice he ſent for Mahomet Beg, ſirnamed Michael Ogli, who in the time that Muſa reigned was Vice-Roy in Europe, and therefore a man well known to moſt principal men in Muſtapha his Army, but had been kept Priſoner in the Caſtle of Amaſia, from the time that Muſa was depoſed and put to death by his Brother Mahomet, until now that he was after eight years impriſonment, for this ſpecial purpoſe inlarged and received into Favour.

About the ſame time that Muſtapha ſet footing in Aſia, Amurath having gathered his Army, ſet forward from Pruſa to meet him; yet with ſuch diſtruſt in his Forces, which were thought to be much inferior to the European Souldiers that followed Muſtapha, that he was glad upon a ſuperſtitious opinion or zeal, to proſtrate himſelf at the feet of an Emir (one of the falſe Prophet Mahomets Poſterity) to receive at his hypocritical Hands a graceleſs Bleſſing for his better ſpeed; by whom he was made to believe, that after two Repulſes, he had with much ado at the third time obtained grant of the great Prophet Mahomet, that he ſhould prevail in that War; and thereupon had his Sword girt unto him with the Emir his holy hands, with many other vain and ſuperſtitious Ceremonies. Yet for all theſe Charms, he marched on with his Army in fear enough, until he came to the River of Ulibad (otherwiſe called Rindacus;) where having Intelligence of the approach of Muſtapha, he for fear cauſed the Bridge over the River there to be broken down, and incamped himſelf on that ſide the River. Not long after came Muſtapha,and finding the Bridge broken, incamped at the foot thereof on the other ſide; ſo that nothing parted the two Armies, but the breadth of the River only. Whilſt they lay thus near incamped together, that the Souldiers might on both ſides take the full view one of another, and alſo talk together; Mahomet Beg, ſirnamed Michael Ogli, but lately delivered out of his long Impriſonment (as is aforeſaid) came to the River ſide, and with a loud Voice called by name upon the great Captains and old Souldiers that were in Muſtapha his Army; aſking by name for many of his old Friends and Acquaintance; many of them being there preſent, rejoycing to ſee that honourable Man (whom they ſuppoſed to have been dead in priſon many years before) came gladly to the ſide of the River, to hear what he could ſay.

Then with a loud Voyce he began to perſwade them, that the man whom they followed was not the honourable Muſtapha, but ſome baſe high-minded fellow ſet up by the Grecians, abuſing the obſcurity of his Birth, as the Vail under the covert whereof he went craftily about to intrude himſelf into the honourable deſcent of Bajazet; and ſo masking in the counterfeit Titles of ſtoln Honour, had miſled them from their Duty to their natural King and Soveraign, to follow him a meer Deceiver. And further aſſured them, that Muſtapha, Bajazet his Son, was dead and buried in the Bed of Fame 22 years before; honourably ending his days in defence of his Country, in the great battel of Mount Stella againſt Tamerlane; wherefore they ſhould do well to forſake that ſuppoſed Muſtapha, and again to yield their dutiful Obedience unto their undoubted Soveraign Amurath. Theſe words delivered unto them by Mahomet, whom they generally both reverenced and truſted, wrought ſuch effect in their minds, that ſome preſently adventured to ſwim over the River, and joyned themſelves unto him; and many others that ſtayed ſtill, began now to doubt leſt they had worſhipped a wrong Saint. At the ſame time alſo, Eivaſes Baſſa, to terrifie Muſtapha, ſent unto him Letters as in great ſecret, advertiſing him, that Amurath had the next night purpoſed with his Army to paſs over the River above the broken Bridge; at which time the chief Captains of his Army being (as he ſaid) corrupted, had promiſed to deliver Muſtapha into his hands, and with his Head to pay the Ranſom of them all. This he coloured with ſuch fair gloſſes, that Muſtapha partly believed the ſame. So when the dead time of the night was come, Eivaſes with certain Troops of Horſemen paſſed over the River, at the very ſame place he had in his Letters named; and that with ſuch a noiſe and tumult, as if Amurath with his whole Army had been coming. Muſtapha ſeeing things begin thus to work according as Eivaſes Baſſa had before written; and with this, doubting alſo to be preſently betrayed, and carrying about him a guilty Conſcience (the Mother of Fear and Diſtruſt) took Horſe, (ſlenderly accompanied but with ten perſons of his whole Army) and fled in haſt, no man purſuing them, until he came to the River of Boga, and there with a great Sum of Money obtained paſſage, by corrupting the Captain that dwelt in the Caſtle upon the paſſage of the River; and the third day after paſſing over the Strait of Helleſpontus, landed at Callipolis. The flight of Muſtapha once known in his Army, they all yielded themſelves unto Eivaſes Baſſa; who taking poſſeſſion of Muſtapha his Tent, cauſed the broken Bridge to be repaired; whereby Amurath paſſing with his Army, joyned himſelf with Eivaſes. The other Baſſa Ibrahim, counſelled Amurath to put to the Sword all thoſe Rebels that had followed Muſtapha; but by the mediation of Eivaſes (to whom they had yielded themſelves) they were generally pardoned.

Muſtapha flieth.

Amurath departing from Ulibad or Lopadium, came to Boga, and there hanged up the Captain that had given Muſtapha paſſage. From thence he held on his way to Lampſacum, intending to purſue Muſtapha into Europe; but being come to the Sea ſide he could find no paſſage, for that Muſtapha had cauſed all the ſhipping on that ſide, to be brought over into Europe. Yet at laſt Amurath by good fortune chanced upon a great Genoway Ship, which he hired for four thouſand Ducats to tranſport his Army, and ſo with much ado at length landed in Europe. Muſtapha ſeeing that Amurath was now come over, fled to Hadrianople, where he found ſuch cold Entertainment, that fearing to be betrayed, he was glad to ſpeed himſelf thence, thinking all the World too little to hide himſelf in; and ſo came to an obſcure place in the Country of the Turks, called Kiſul-Agatze-Genitze; where the Souldiers ſent to purſue him, overtook him,and brought him bound to Amurath, then being at Hadrianople; by whoſe Commandment he was ſhamefully hanged from the Battlements of one of the higheſt Towers of the City, and there left to the Worlds Wonder.

Muſtapha hanged.

This Muſtapha is of ſome Writers reported to have been in deed the Son of the great Sultan Bajazet, and that he was kept in priſon all that long time, and thus at length ſet up by the Greeks to trouble the State of the Turkiſh Kingdom; but the Turkiſh Hiſtories report as before, calling him Duſme or counterfeit Muſtapha. And it is very likely, that if he had been one of the Sons of Bajazet, he would have found ſome means to have made ſome great ſtir long before that, as all the reſt of the unquiet Brood of Bajazet did, which never reſted until they had, like the Earth-born Brethren, one deſtroyed the other; beſides that, their bloody Natures conſidered, it is very like, that Mahomet his younger Brother, who reigned in Hadrianople almoſt eight years, and was in League all that time with the Emperor of Conſtantinople, would for his more ſafety have got him into his own Power, if he had been in priſon with the Emperor; or elſe have diſpatched him, if he had been in priſon with himſelf. All which I am the rather perſwaded to think, for that Orchanes a Child, the Son of Solyman, could find no ſafe place of abode at Conſtantinople in the Reign of Mahomet, but flying, was apprehended, and his eyes put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet; much leſs is it like, that Muſtapha, being a Warlike Prince, and his elder Brother, could have been ſo long preſerved and kept in priſon from his fury.

Two Aſap: ſold by a Janizary for a ſheeps head.

It fortuned in theſe late Broils (as oftentimes it doth with others in like caſe) divers of the Rebels Aſapi, or Common Souldiers (whom he for his greater Countenance had apparelled and armed like Janizaries) to fall into the hands of the true Janizaries. Amurath his faithful Guard; whoſe lives indeed they ſpared, but uſing them with all the Deſpight and Indignities poſſible: Amongſt the reſt, one of the Janizaries being an hungred, brought two of theſe Aſapi his priſoners unto a Cooks Shop, offering to ſell them unto him for a little Victual; which the Cook refuſed to give him, as having no uſe for ſuch unneceſſary Servants. Wherewith the proud Janizary inraged, ſwore many a great Oath, preſently to cut off their Heads, and to give them him for nought, if he would not for a thing of nought redeem them. And like enough he was to have ſo done, had not the Cook, moved with pity, offered him for them both a ſheeps head; which the Janizary took for them, ſwearing that the Cook had given for them more than indeed they were worth. Which diſgrace ſo long ſince done unto theſe Aſapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproach in great contempt, by the maſterful and inſolent Janizaries, objected unto the whole body of the Aſapi, the greateſt part of the Turks huge Armies; of whom for all that the proud Janizaries make ſmall reckoning, accounting them ſcarcely for Men, and in their rage oftentimes telling them, That two of them are not worth a ſodden ſheeps head.

Conſtantinople in vain beſieged by Amurath.

Amurath having at length with much ado thus pacified the dangerous Rebellion raiſed by the counterfeit Muſtapha both in Europe and Aſia, was yet not a little grieved, to think how the ſame had, to the great hazard of his Eſtate, been firſt plotted by the Greeks, and afterwards countenanced by the Greek Emperor, of whom he thought now to be revenged. And therefore ſending before him Michael Ogli, his Lieutenant General in Europe, with his Europeian Souldiers to invade the Country about Conſtantinople, followed himſelf after with the Janizaries and his Aſian Forces; and incamping before the City, filled all that neck of land which lieth before it, from Sea to Sea. And ſo incamped, began right furiouſly to batter the Walls, in hope ſo to have made a breach, and by the ſame to have entred the City; but finding the Walls of greater ſtrength than he had before ſuppoſed, and the Defendants ſtill repairing whatſoever the fury of his Artillery had beaten down or ſhaken, he ceaſed his Battery, and coming on with all his Forces, deſperately attempted by Aſſault to have gained the City; wherein his Fortune was not anſwerable to his Deſire; for approaching the City, with Arrows as ſhowers falling upon the Defendants, and ſcaling-Ladders in the mean time clapt up to the Walls, and the Janizaries with other of his beſt Souldiers valiantly mounting the ſame, they were by the Defendants notably repulſed and beaten down, loſing ſome their hands, ſome their Arms, ſome their Heads, but moſt their Lives, no Shot falling in vain from the Walls. Which Amurath beholding, and grieved to ſee (though unwilling) commanded a Retreat to be ſounded, and the Aſſault given over; and ſhortly after ſeeing no hope to prevail, in great rage raiſed his Siege and departed. Unto whom for all that the Greek Emperor not long after ſent his Embaſſadors to intreat with him for Peace; whereof he would by no means hear, but proudly threatned to be ere long of all his Wrongs revenged; which cauſed the Greek Emperor to deviſe what he might for the troubling of his Eſtate, ſo to keep him otherwiſe buſied; as he did ſhortly after with the Caramanian King, by countenancing another Muſtapha (ſirnamed Cutzug or the Little) Amuraths younger Brother, againſt him, to the raiſing of new Stirs, and Amurath his no ſmall trouble.

Mahomet the late King had five Sons and ſeven Daughters, whereof Amurath was the eldeſt, and ſucceeded in his Fathers Kingdom; Muſtapha the ſecond, ſirnamed the Little; Achmetes the third, who died before his Father; the other two, Joſephus and Machmutes, both died of the Plague, being but Children, after the death of their Father. Three of their Siſters were married to the three Sons of the King of Caramania, Ibrahim, Aladin, and Iſa; other two were beſtowed upon the Sons of the Prince Iſfendiar, Ibrahim, and Caſimes; the ſixth was given in marriage to Cozza-Beg Vice-Roy of Anatolia; and the ſeventh, to the Son of Ibrahim Baſſa, who died at Mecha, whither ſhe went upon Superſtitious Devotion on Pilgrimage.

At ſuch time as Amurath was buſied in his Wars in Europe, againſt Muſtapha the ſuppoſed Son of Bajazet; the younger Son of Mahomet (called alſo Muſtapha) being but thirteen years old, and Amurath his Brother indeed, was ſet up to raiſe new Troubles, by the King of Caramania and other Princes, as well Mahometans, as the Chriſtian Princes of Grecia; who thought it good policy, by that means to impeach the greatneſs of Amurath. This young Prince Muſtapha ſtrengthned with the Forces of his Friends, entred into his Brothers Dominions in Aſia, and beſieged Nice, which was at length yielded unto him. Amurath advertiſed of this new Rebellion, by great Gifts and large Promiſes corrupted Ilias Beg, the young Princes Tutor, to betray the Prince into his hands. Whereupon Amurath with great celerity ſet forward with his Army from Hadrianople, and in nine days came to Nice, where he entred the City with ſmall reſiſtance, as was to him before promiſed, where Muſtapha was by his falſe Tutor to him preſented; who becauſe he would not ſpill one drop of the ſacred Othoman blood, (as the Turks call it) commanded the Executioner preſently to ſtrangle him with a Bow-ſtring; which was done accordingly, and his body afterwards buried by his Father at Pruſa.

Muſtapha betrayed and ſtrangled.

Amurath having ſuppreſſed theſe two Rebellions, and now out of all fear of any Competitor, thought his five Counſellors too many by three, and therefore removed the three Baſſaes, Omure, Urutzi, and Alis (the Sons of Temurtaſes) into honourable Places, retaining of his Council, only the two old Baſſaes, Ibrahim and Eivaſes. But ſhortly after, Eivaſes was ſecretly accuſed to Amurath, that he ſought by his Favorites, the Souldiers of the Court, to aſpire unto the Kingdom himſelf, and to depoſe the King; and that intending ſome ſuch matter, he did uſually wear a Privy-Coat. This ſuſpitious Report troubled the jealous Tyrant; wherefore on a time as he rid accompanied with Eivaſes, he caſt his Arm about him, as if it had been in kindneſs; but finding him ſecretly armed, would needs know the cauſe thereof; whereunto Eivaſes anſwered, That it was for fear of ſome Enemies he had in the Court; but this Excuſe could by no means ſerve his turn; wherefore he was forthwith apprehended by the Commandment of Amurath, and both his Eyes burnt out with a hot Steel glaſs.

Eivaſes Baſſa his Eyes put out.

Whilſt Amurath was thus buſied in ſubduing Rebellions at home, Muhamethes, the Caramanian King beſieged Attalia, a great City in Pamphilia, by the ſpace of ſix months, which was valiantly defended by Hamza-beg, Amurath his Lieutenant there; at which Siege the unfortunate King himſelf, as he was taking view of the City, was ſlain with a great ſhot out of the City; whereupon Ibrahim, which ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, brake up the Siege, and returned home to bury his Father. At this time alſo, Dracula Prince of Valachia, paſſing over Danubius, did the Turks much harm about Siliſtra, but was afterwards enforced to ſubmit himſelf to Amurath, and become his Tributary.

The King of Caramania ſlain.

About this time alſo Tzunites, the Prince of Smyrna, which had before aided the Rebel Muſtapha, did by all means he could vex and moleſt Jaxis-beg, (Amurath his Lieutenant in Aidinia) and having by chance taken his Brother Priſoner, put him to death. This Prince of Smyrna was deſcended of the ancient Princes of Aidinia, and therefore pretended an intereſt in that Seigniory; which his Claim the people of the Country ſecretly favoured, ſo far as they durſt for fear of the Turks. Amurath hearing of the harms that this Prince of Smyrna did, commanded Hamze-beg, Vice-Roy of Anatolia, with all his Power to make War upon him. The Vice-Roy without delay aſſembled a great Army, and invaded the Princes Country; and the Prince being well provided for his coming, meeting him upon the way, gave him battel; wherein Haſan the Princes Son, leading a great part of his Fathers Army, had put one part of the Turks Army to flight; and purſuing them with too much fury, left his Father at the ſame time ſo hardly beſet by the Vice-Roy, that he was glad to fly to his Caſtle of Hipſily faſt by. Haſan returning from the chace of the Enemy, not knowing what had happened to his Father, was by the Turks in his return overcome and taken Priſoner. After which Victory the Vice-Roy preſently laid Siege to the Caſtle wherein the Prince was. This Siege continued a great while; at length the Prince brought to extremity, was content to yield himſelf unto the Vice-Roy, upon condition he ſhould uſe no violence againſt the Perſon of himſelf or his Son, but to ſend them Priſoners unto Amurath; which thing the Vice-Roy by ſolemn Oath promiſed, whereupon the Prince came out of the Caſtle, and yielded himſelf Priſoner to the Vice-Roy. Jaxis-beg, whoſe Brother the Prince had before put to death, attended the going of Hamze the Vice-Roy to his Tent, where finding Haſan the Princes Son ſitting upon the ground, as the manner of the Turks is, took him by the choler with great fury, and drawing him along to the Feet of the Prince his Father, there moſt cruelly ſtruck off his head; and in the ſame rage laying his bloody hands upon the aged Prince, ſtruck off his head alſo; to the great diſhonour of the Vice-Roy, who had before given his Faith for their ſafety. The heads of the Prince and his Son were ſet upon two Launces, within the ſight of the Caſtle; which the Defendants ſeeing, and now deſpairing of all reſcue, yielded themſelves with the Caſtle. This infortunate Tzunites was the laſt Prince of Smyrna, after whoſe death all his Territory was united to the Othoman Kingdom. After all theſe Troubles, Amurath with great Triumph married the Daughter of the Prince Iſfendiar.

Amurath having laid up in the depth of his thoughts the remembrance of that the Grecian Princes had done, in giving Aid to the Rebels aforeſaid, thought it now high time to take revenge of that wrong; and for that purpoſe gathered a great Army, wherewith he ranged at his pleaſure through Macedonia, until he came to Theſſalonica, ſurpriſing by the way divers Cities and Caſtles, at that time belonging to the Conſtantinopolitan Empire. This famous City of Theſſalonica, now called Salonichi, for beauty and wealth ſometime not inferior to any of the greateſt and moſt renowned Cities of Græcia, is ſituate upon the Borders of Macedonia, cloſe unto a Bay of the Archipelago or the Sea Ægeum; which Bay was in ancient time called Thermaicus-Sinus, and now the Bay of Salonichi. To the Chriſtian Congregation there dwelling, St. Paul wrote two Epiſtles, in the latter whereof, he forewarneth them of a great Defection to come before the latter day. Before this Chriſtian City, then in the Protection of the Venetians, Amurath encamped his great Army of misbelieving Turks; and laid hard Siege to it with moſt terrible Battery; at which time he by ſecret means corrupted certain of the wicked Citizens, to have betrayed the City by a ſecret Mine, and to have let him in, which Treaſon was by the Venetian Governors perceived, and the Plotters thereof for ſafeguard of their lives glad to leap over the Walls, and to fly into the Turks Camp.

Amurath having greatly battered the Walls of the City, the more to encourage his Souldiers, promiſed to give them all the Spoil thereof, if they could by force win it. The greedy deſire of this rich Prey, wherein every common Souldier promiſed unto himſelf whatſoever his fooliſh fancy or unbrideled affection could deſire, ſo inflamed the minds of theſe barbarous Souldiers, and eſpecially of the Janizaries, that giving a moſt terrible Aſſault to the City, they by force entred the ſame, and won it. The Venetian Souldiers fled to their Gallies, lying at Anchor in the Haven, and ſo got to Sea; but the infinite miſeries which the poor Chriſtian Citizens endured in the fury of that barbarous Nation, no Tongue is able to expreſs, or Pen deſcribe; death was leſs pain than the ignominious Outrages and unſpeakable Villanies which many good Chriſtians there ſuffered, heartily wiſhing to die, and could not; and yet the furious Enemies Sword devoured all the people, without reſpect of Age or Sex, except ſuch as for ſtrength of body, or comelineſs of perſon, were reſerved for painful labour, or beaſtly luſt; which poor Souls were afterwards diſperſed into moſt miſerable ſervitude and ſlavery, through all parts of the Turkiſh Kingdom. The infinite Riches of that famous City, became a ſpoil unto the barbarous Souldiers; the goodly Houſes were left deſolate, void of Inhabitants. Thus the beautiful City of Theſſalonica, ſometime one of the moſt glorious Ornaments of Græcia, the late pleaſant dwelling-place of many rich Chriſtians, was by the Tyrant given for an habitation to ſuch baſe Turks, as at their pleaſure repaired thither to ſeat themſelves, and ſo is by them at this day poſſeſſed. This Calamity happened to Theſſalonica, in the year of our Lord, 1432.

Theſſalonica taken by Amurath.

Theſſalonica being thus taken, Amurath returned to Hadrianople himſelf, and at the ſame time ſent Caratze with the greateſt part of his Army into Ætolia. Charles Prince of that Country dying a little before the coming of Amurath to Theſſalonica, and having no lawful Iſſue, had divided the Country of Acharnania amongſt his three baſe Sons, Memnon, Turnus, and Hercules, leaving all the reſt of his Dominion to his Brothers Son, called alſo Charles. But ſhortly after, ſuch diſcord fell among theſe Brethren, that Amurath ſending his Turks to Aid one of them againſt the other, as he was by them requeſted, in fine brought all that Country of Ætolia into Subjection to Himſelf, leaving nothing for the fooliſh Brethren to ſtrive for, more than the bare titles of imaginative Honour. The other Grecian Princes of Athens, Phocis, Boetia, and all the reſt of Græcia, unto the ſtrait of Corinth, terrified by their Neighbours harms, were glad to ſubmit themſelves to the barbarian Yoke, and to become Tributaries unto the Turkiſh Tyrant; under which ſlavery they of long time moſt miſerably lived, if intollerable ſlavery joyned with Infidelity may be accounted a life. Thus the Grecians loſt their Liberty, which their Anceſtors had many times before, to their immortal Praiſe, worthily defended againſt the greateſt Monarchs of the World, and are now ſo degenerate, by the means of the Turkiſh Oppreſſion, that in all Græcia is hardly to be found any ſmall remembrance of the ancient Glory thereof; inſomuch that whereas they were wont to account all other Nations barbarous in compariſon of themſelves, they are now become no leſs barbarous, than thoſe rude Nations whom they before ſcorn'd. Which miſery with a thouſand more, they may juſtly impute to their own Ambition and Diſcord.

At this time, amongſt the diſtreſſed Princes of Macedonia and Græcia, one John Caſtriot reigned in Epirus; who ſeeing how mightily the Turk prevailed againſt the Princes his Neighbours, and conſidering that he was not able by any means to withſtand ſo puiſſant an Enemy; to obtain Peace, he was glad to deliver into Amurath his Poſſeſſion, his four Sons, Staniſius, Repoſius, Conſtantine, and George, for Hoſtages; whom Amurath faithfully promiſed, well and honourably to entreat. But aſſoon as he had got them within his reach, he falſified his Faith, and cauſed them to be circumciſed after the Turkiſh manner, and to be inſtructed in the Turkiſh Superſtition, to the great grief of their Chriſtian Parents; and afterwards, when he underſtood of the death of John Caſtriot their Father, he poiſoned all the three elder Brethren; and by Sebaly (one of his great Captains) ſeiſed upon Croia, his chief City, and all the reſt of his Territories, as if they had by good right devolved unto him. But George the youngeſt, whom the Turks named Scander-beg, or Lord Alexander, for his excellent Feature, and pregnant Wit, he always entirely loved, as ſome thought, more paſſionately than he ſhould have loved a Boy. Him he cauſed to be diligently inſtructed in all kind of activity and feats of War, wherein he excelled all other his Equals in Amurath his Court; and riſing by many degrees of Honour, came at laſt (being yet but very young) to be a great Sanzack or Governor of a Province, and was many times appointed by Amurath to be General of his Armies; in which Service he ſo behaved himſelf, that he got the love of all that knew him, and increaſed his credit with Amurath; until at laſt he found opportunity by great policy and courage, to deliver both himſelf and his native Country from the horrible ſlavery of the Turkiſh Tyranny, as ſhall be afterwards declared.

Shortly after that Amurath had thus danted the Princes of Græcia, he turned his Forces into Servia; but the Prince of Servia unable to withſtand ſo mighty an Enemy, to procure his Favour, ſent Embaſſadors, offering to pay him a yearly Tribute, and to do further what he ſhould reaſonably demand. Amurath beſide the yearly Tribute, required to have Mary (this Princes fair Daughter) in marriage; and that he ſhould not ſuffer the Hungarians to paſs through his Country to invade him; and further, not at any time to deny paſſage unto the Turkiſh Army, when he ſhould ſend forth the ſame for the Invaſion of the Kingdom of Boſna. All which unreaſonable conditions the Prince was glad to agree unto, and ſent his fair Daughter by Saratze, who was afterwards married to Amurath.

A Plague among the Turks.

About this time, Joſephus and Machmutes, Amurath his Brethren, and Orchanes the Son of Solyman, who had his Eyes put out by his Uncle Mahomet, with many other Men of great account among the Turks, died of the Plague at Pruſa.

Whilſt Amurath was thus buſied in his Wars in Europe, the King of Caramania his Brother in law, invaded his Dominions in Aſia; for ſo it was agreed between the Chriſtian Princes of Europe, and the Mahometan Princes of Aſia, to whom the greatneſs of the Othoman Kingdom was now become dreadful, That whenſoever he invaded the Chriſtians in Europe, the Mahometan Princes ſhould invade his Countries in Aſia; and that whenſoever he ſhould turn his Forces into Aſia, the Chriſtian Princes ſhould ſpoil his Countries in Europe. Againſt this Caramanian King, Amurath tranſported his Army into Aſia; and as he went, ſeiſed upon the Countries of Sarucania, Menteſia, and other Provinces, which were before but Tributaries unto him, driving out the poor Princes before him; and ſo entred into Caramania, and inforced the King ſo far, that he was glad to agree to ſuch conditions of Peace as it pleaſed him to propound unto him, and to ſend his Son to wait at his Court. And at the ſame time picking a Quarrel with Iſfendiar Prince of Caſtamona, cauſed him to become his Tributary, and to ſend his Son to his Court alſo. By which means the name of Amurath became terrible to all the Mahometan Princes.

When Amurath had thus quieted all his Troubles in Aſia, he returned to Hadrianople; and underſtanding that the Hungarians paſſing over Danubius, had in his abſence made divers Incurſions into his Dominions, he was therewith greatly offended; and in Revenge thereof firſt ſent Alis Baſſa the Son of Eurenoſes, with an Army to invade Hungaria, which he performed accordingly by the ſpace of a month, and returned from thence with rich Booty. Not long after, he himſelf in Perſon made another Road into Hungary, commanding the Prince of Servia his Father in law, to give his Army free paſſage through his Country; and charging Dracula Prince of Valachia to aid him with his Forces in that Expedition; which his Commandment both the Chriſtian Princes (more for fear, than of good will) diligently performed. So Amurath having inriched his Souldiers with the ſpoil taken in Hungary, returned home and wintred at his Court at Hadrianople.

Hungary ſpoiled by Amurath.

The ſecret Confederation between the Hungarians and the Mahometan King of Caramania, was not unſuſpected of Amurath, which he was the rather induced to believe, for that whenſoever he invaded the one, he was preſently ſet upon by the other, either in Europe or in Aſia; of which Plot he doubted not but that George Prince of Servia (his Father in law) was chief Author, although in ſhew he was therein the leaſt Actor. Wherefore Amurath intending to ſpoil the Play, ſent for the Prince his Father in law to come to the Court of Hadrianople; but he doubting ſome Turkiſh Tragedy, pretended great occaſions that he could not come; and fearing that which afterwards fell out, fortified and manned all his ſtrong Cities and Caſtles by all means he could poſſibly, eſpecially his chief City Semendre (otherwiſe called Spenderovia) and left therein his Son Gregory (or as ſome call him, George) as Governor; for his other Son Stephen was long before in Amurath his Court, with the Queen his Siſter. The Prince of Servia himſelf went into Hungary to procure from thence ſome Aid, having there alſo himſelf certain Territories, which he had in exchange of Sigiſmundus (late Emperor and King of Hungary) for the City of Belgrade. It was not long after, but Amurath forgetting both the Affinity and League he had with the Prince his Father in law, entred with a great Army into Servia, deſtroying all before him, and hardly beſieged Semendre; where, after long Siege the young Governor (the Princes Son) doubting to fall into his Enemies hands by ſudden Aſſault, yielded himſelf, with the City; which thing ſo diſcouraged the reſt of the Servians, that in ſhort time, Sophia, Novomont, with all the reſt of the Cities of Servia, were yielded into the Power of Amurath. After which Conqueſt he returned to Hadrianople, and hearing that the Prince of Servia with the Hungarians, were making head againſt him, and that the two young Servian Princes, Gregory and Stephen, his Wives Brethren, had Intelligence with their Father, he commanded them both to be caſt in priſon at Dydimoticum, and their Eyes cruelly to be burnt out with a brazen Baſon made red hot; a common unmerciful practiſe among the Turks.

About this time, Albertus Duke of Auſtria, having before married Elizabeth the only Daughter of Sigiſmund the Emperor, and ſucceeding his Father in law both in the Empire and Kingdom of Hungary (unto which Type of higheſt Honour nothing more furthered him than the remembrance of Sigiſmund) in the ſecond year of his Reign, before he was well ſetled in thoſe new atchieved Honours, died of the Flux, as he was making great preparation againſt Amurath the Turkiſh King; who having lately driven George Prince of Servia and Raſcia out of his Dominions, had now extended the Turkiſh Kingdom even unto the borders of Hungary. This Albertus dying, left his Wife great with child. The Hungarians, in whoſe minds the remembrance of Sigiſmund was yet freſh, could have been contented to have lived under the Government of the Queen his Daughter, the Widow of Albertus (then great with child;) but that Turkiſh King was now grown ſo great, and come ſo nigh, that it was thought more than needful by John Huniades, and other of the Hungarian Nobility, for the defence of that Kingdom, not wholly to reſt upon the devotion of the people toward the Queen, and the expectation of her Iſſue, whereby they ſhould be nothing ſtrengthned; but to make choice of ſome great Prince, by whoſe Power they might the better defend themſelves and the Kingdom againſt their dangerous Enemies. Whereupon with conſent of the Queen, it was reſolved upon, to make choice of Uladiſlaus, the young King of Polonia, then a Prince of great Power, but of far greater Fame and Expectation; and by Embaſſadors to offer unto him the marriage of the Queen, and with her, the Kingdom alſo. This Embaſſage being ſent unto Uladiſlaus, the matter was to and fro debated in the Polonian Court, Whether it were to be accepted of or not? Some began to ſpeak of the inequality of the Match, conſidering that the King was but in the prime of his Youth, and the Queen well ſtept into years, urging farther, that nothing was offered in that Match but Wars; and that the Hungarians therein ſought for nothing more, than by the Polonian Forces to defend themſelves againſt the Turks. Others of the contrary opinion, ſaid, That the uniting of thoſe two mighty Kingdoms would be to the great good of them both, and to the great Honour of the King, whoſe very name would thereby become terrible unto the Turks; and that it were greater policy, by the Forces of both the Kingdoms, to keep the Turkiſh King from entring into Hungary, than to leave that Kingdom to him for a prey, and afterward be inforc'd to fight with the ſame Enemy in the heart of Polonia. And as for inequality of years betwixt the King and the Queen, it was not ſo great a matter, that in regard thereof ſo honourable and commodious Alliance ſhould be rejected; for as much as Princes do more regard the Vertues of their Choice, with the increaſe of their Honour and Wealth of their Kingdoms, than the Summer-Fruit of Youth and Beauty, which of it ſelf in ſhort time doth rot and periſh, although it be never ſo carefully kept and preſerved; and that for as much as there can be but one King in a Kingdom, ſuch choice was to be preferred of Kings as had not therein the greateſt hope of many Children. After long deliberation, Uladiſlaus gave anſwer to the Embaſſadors, That he would accept of the Offers by them made, whereupon ſome of them returned to make Relation to the Queen, and ſome of them ſtayed behind to haſten the King forward. But whilſt theſe things were a doing, the Queen in the mean time was delivered of a fair Son, whom ſhe cauſed to be baptized and named Ladiſlaus. After the birth of this Child, the Queen moved with a Motherly affection, began to repent her ſelf, that ſhe had given her conſent for the calling in of the Polonian King, to the prejudice of her. And being animated by ſome of the Hungarian Nobility (who preſuming of the good Grace they were in with the Queen, hoped to grow great themſelves, if they might firſt draw the Government of that Kingdom to the Queen and her young Son) determined now by all means to exclude the Polonian King; but the greater part of the Nobility better conſidering what was moſt expedient for the preſent Eſtate, and that they could neither with Honour or Safety fly from that which was before (for the common good) by the Embaſſadors concluded; continued firm in their former Reſolution for the bringing in of Uladiſlaus; ſo that by this means, ſome taking part with the Queen and her young Son, and others ſtanding faſt for Uladiſlaus, the Kingdom of Hungary was divided into two Factions, and as it were rent in pieces, and ſo grew to Civil Wars. The Queen with ſuch as favoured her Claim, the more to gain the minds of the common people (which are many times no leſs carried away with ſhews than matter) cauſed her Son Ladiſlaus (being then but three months old) ſolemnly to be Crowned King at Alba-Regalis, the uſual place for the Coronation of the Hungarian Kings. But after that the Polonian King had entred into Hungary with a goodly Army, and joyned his Forces with his Friends, moſt part of them which before followed the Queen and her Son, revolted unto Uladiſlaus. So that when ſhe had done what ſhe could, ſhe was glad at laſt to commit the tuition of her Son, together with the Crown of Hungary, unto Frederick the Third, then Emperor; never ceaſing for all that, to the uttermoſt of her Power, to trouble the Government of Uladiſlaus, continually ſtirring up great Wars againſt him both at home and abroad, until that at the laſt by her death her quarrel took end, together with her life.

Uladiſlaus accepteth of the Kingdom offered.

In the midſt of theſe Civil Wars, Amurath thought a fair opportunity preſented unto him, to make an Entrance unto the Conqueſt of Hungary, which Kingdom he had in his ambitious mind already devoured. And therefore gathering a great Army, he marched along the River Danubius, until he came to the ſtrong City of Belgrade, called in ancient time Taurunum, and of ſome Alba Græca, but now commonly Grecis Weiſenburg. This City is invironed on the Eaſt ſide with the famous River Danubius, and on the South with the great River of Savus or Save, which there falleth into Danubius; and on the other two ſides is defended with ſtrong Walls, with deep deep and large Ditches; and was then accounted the Gate or Entrance into Hungary. Unto this City Amurath at his firſt coming gave two terrible Aſſaults, and was in good hope ſo to have won the ſame, but yet was both times valiantly repulſed, with great ſlaughter of his men. Wherefore finding it to be a matter of more difficulty than was by him at the firſt ſuppoſed, he began to raiſe Mounts againſt the City, and high Towers of Wood to annoy the Defendants, and furiouſly battered the Walls. At this time alſo he cauſed great numbers of Gallies and ſmall Pinnaces to be brought into both the Rivers of Danubius and Save, to aſſault the City on thoſe parts where was leaſt feared, and by that means alſo to keep them of the City from all Succors to be ſent that way out of Hungary. Yet for all he could do or deviſe, the City was ſtill valiantly defended by the Chriſtian Souldiers, which under the leading and conduct of Johannes Uranus a Florentine, Governor thereof, with often Sallies and continual Shot ſlew great numbers of the Turks. At the time of this Siege, Uladiſlaus King of Polonia, and lately Elect King of Hungary, was ſore troubled by the Queen and her Faction in Hungary; which thing the Turkiſh King knew right well, and thereupon continued his Siege, although Famine began greatly to increaſe in his Camp; hoping in nothing more, than that the Defendants deſpairing of help from the King, would in ſhort time yield up the City. Uladiſlaus being ſo intangled with Civil Wars, as is aforeſaid, that he could not poſſibly prepare ſuch Force as might relieve the beſieged City; yet foraſmuch as the Turkiſh King had not long before by his Embaſſador required to joyn with him in League and Amity, he thought good now to aſſay if he could raiſe the Siege, by ſending unto him the like Embaſſage. Whereupon he ſent Dobrogoſius, Oſtrorogenus, and Lucas Gorſenſis, three of the Polonian Nobility, Embaſſadors unto Amurath; declaring unto him, That for ſo much as he had offered by his Embaſſadors, to joyn with him in League before he came out of Polonia, the remembrance thereof had taken ſuch deep impreſſion in his mind, that he would not take up Arms againſt him, although it were in his own juſt defence, before he had offered him reaſonable Conditions of Peace; wherefore if he would deſiſt from invading of Hungary (whereof Uladiſlaus was now by God his permiſſion, and conſent of the people, choſen King) and ſo raiſe his Siege, that then they ſhould afterwards eaſily agree upon the deſired Peace; in concluding whereof, he ſhould not find Uladiſlaus inferior to himſelf in any manner of Princely courteſie; but if he had rather proceed in Arms, and to make proof of his ſtrength, he would then do the beſt that he could, to make him know that he was of ſufficient Power, in ſo juſt a quarrel to withſtand his greateſt Forces, and to revenge the Wrongs to him done. When Amurath had received this Embaſſage, he appointed the Embaſſadors to withdraw themſelves for a while to Synderovia (a City of Servia, not far off) until he might better conſider of their Demands; pretending, that he did it for their ſafety; but as appeared afterward, ſecretly reſolving with himſelf, preſently to do his uttermoſt devoir, for the gaining of the City, and upon the Succeſs thereof to ſhape them anſwer accordingly. Wherefore ſo ſoon as the Embaſſadors were departed to Synderovia, he firſt by his Meſſengers aſſayed the minds of the Citizens and Souldiers with magnifical Promiſes of large Liberties, and infinite Rewards and Preferments, if they would yield up the City; and many Arrows with Letters made faſt unto them, full of like Promiſes, were at the ſame time ſhot into the City. But when he ſaw no hope to prevail by that means, he called together the Captains and Commanders of his Army, and there in the preſence of them all, ſpake unto them as followeth:

The notable Speech of Amurath to encourage his Souldiers to the aſſault of Belgrade.

Although I know it is in mine own Power, to grant, or not to grant, the Peace whereof our Enemies have made a motion; yet it is my pleaſure (worthy Souldiers) to know your minds alſo. For ſo much as we have that War in hand, wherein with worldly Felicity, (whereof amongſt you I hold the chief Place) is alſo endangered our Religion, and purity of Life; the defence and care whereof equally belongeth unto us all; for although we differ much one from another in the manner of our Vocation, and living here, yet after death we all hope for one and the ſelf ſame Felicity. And therefore I would have you to underſtand all that I ſhall ſay, as proceeding not of any regard of mine own Private, but upon the conſideration of the Common Good of you all. For as concerning mine own Eſtate, I poſſeſs ſo large Countries in Aſia, ſuch great Dominions in Europe, that either part thereof (in good time be it ſaid) might ſeem a ſufficient Kingdom; ſo that perhaps it might better ſtand with my Eſtate, to take more care, for keeping of that I have, than to travel for the gaining of more; but you are to conſider with your ſelves, whether you have every man ſufficient to ſuffice himſelf or not, and how long you think your ſelves aſſured of the ſame; and moreover, that together with theſe worldly things, we ſhall be driven at length to forſake our Profeſſion and Religion, if we ſhall now lay down Arms. For our Enemies require, that we ſhould firſt ceaſe from War, and then afterwards they think it meet to talk of Peace. I will not ſpeak of the Indignity, that men beſieged, and in evil plight, ſhould propound conditions of Peace to them that beſiege them, and are well furniſhed of all things; that feeble and cowardly men ſhould promiſe peace unto couragious and expert Souldiers; I omit what labour and pains we have taken in laying our Siege, in raiſing of Mounts, in making of Shipping; all which our Enemies command us to forſake, as if they had us already bound or couped up in hold, as we have them. All Bulgaria, and the greater part of Raſcia is now by us conquered, and moſt part of Servia is at our Command, all which places are by us either to be kept, or elſe all the reſt of that we poſſeſs in Europe, is with them to be quite loſt and forſaken. Whoſoever ſhall have in their Power this City which we beſiege (and that our Enemies know right well) ſhall have not only as it were a Fortreſs and Bulwark of defence for his own, but alſo a Caſtle and Entrance for the ſubduing of others. The Kingdom of Hungary is now divided in it ſelf, and full of domiſtical Sedition; neither is it ſo much ſtrengthned by the uniting of the Kingdom of Polonia, as it is by civil diſſention weakned. And in this motion of Peace nothing is ſought for, but to gain time for the pacifying of their private Quarrels, that they may afterward with their double Forces ſet upon us. For if we ſhall break up our Siege before we have won the City, they will eaſily find delays ſo long to protract the concluſion of Peace, until that either Uladiſlaus his good Fortune, or elſe the Hungarians being of themſelves better adviſed, ſhall make an end of their Civil Wars. What manner and conditions of Peace will they then require of us, when they are at Unity amongſt themſelves, and in Arms againſt us; ſeeing that now being in danger with mutual Diſcord, and almoſt by us vanquiſhed, they think it reaſonable (as if they had won the Field) that we ſhould firſt raiſe our Siege, and then intreat of Peace? Their proud Demands for the Reſtitution of Bulgaria and Raſcia, with other Countries and Cities won by our travel and danger, already ſound in mine ears; which if we ſhall refuſe to grant, not only the Hungarians being then at Unity among themſelves, but alſo the Polonians, joyned unto them, will bring thoſe Wars home to our doors, which we now at great advantage make upon them, troubled with diſcord and civil broils. And if for deſire of Peace we could be content to yield unto ſuch ſhameful and miſerable Conditions, and reſtore unto them all they ſhould or in reaſon could deſire; do you think the Prince of Servia would reſt contented with his own, whoſe haughty mind (I am ſure) being inflate with the combining of two ſuch mighty Kingdoms, thinketh not only of the recovery of that he hath loſt, but even now gapeth at all that is Ours in Europe. He will not think himſelf ſatisfied, before he (having brought the Hungarian and Polonian Forces againſt us) ſhall ſee the ſame havock and ſpoil made in our Kingdom with Fire and Sword, which he hath before ſeen made by us in his own. Where if his Fortune ſhould anſwer his Deſigns (which God forbid, but yet it may chance) deſire all the miſerable and intolerable Outrages, which are to be feared of an angry Conqueror, it is accounted with them for a godly and religious Work, to uſe all cruel and unſpeakable Villanies againſt our Nation, except we will forſake the Faith and Religion delivered unto us by our Anceſtors, and follow their new and incredible Ceremonies. Neither do they think they can more eaſily and effectually procure the Favor of God with any kind of Sacrifice or Service, than by overthrowing and prophaning our Temples, by ſcoffing at our moſt ſacred and ſecret Rites and Ceremonies, by ſcorning our Religion and Prieſts; and that you may know all the Fury wherewith they rage againſt us and our Religion, they account all them for holy Saints which die in fight againſt us. There is no cauſe (valiant Souldiers) that upon the vain hope of Peace, we ſhould expect whilſt the Enemy doth gather and unite his Forces and Arms againſt us, eſpecially ſuch an Enemy as propoundeth not ſpoil and worldly Honours, but Immortality it ſelf, as a reward of his Victory. We have already taken much more labour than we have to take, we have filled the Ditches with reſtleſs labour, we have caſt up Bulwarks equal with the Walls, and part of the Walls we have beaten even with the ground, ſo that you ſee the Town half opened; and that Town, by gaining whereof, all that Ours is, may be made ſafe and quiet; and that which our Enemy poſſeſſeth, ſubject to our ſpoil and prey. If you will but a little enforce your ſelves, as men mindful of our good Fortune and forwardneſs, you ſhall find our Temples, our Sacrifices, our Religion, all worldly and heavenly felicity to be then aſſured unto us, when as you ſhall to morrow overthrow the very Foundation of the Enemies Wall. Then (couragious Souldiers) we may cry, Victory, not for the preſent, but for ever. If this War ſhould bring unto us nothing elſe but an aſſured ſecurity of our Eſtate, it were ſufficient reward; for which we ought chearfully to adventure our ſelves to all dangers, and to challenge in Combate even death it ſelf. But as this Victory doth defend all our things as with a deep Trench, or ſure Wall, ſo doth it lay open and expoſe all our Enemies Dominions unto danger and ſpoil. Hitherto we have ſtriven with Nature her ſelf in the rough and abrupt Mountains of Bulgaria and Raſcia, where we were to ſtrive with Hunger, Thirſt, Labour, and Deſperation; all them we have overcome, allured with no other reward, but that at length we might attain unto the Wealth of fruitful Hungary, from whence we muſt fetch the guerdon of our Victory, and the ground of our Glory. We are come to the Gates, which being laid open, we are not to paſs over inacceſſible Rocks, or uncoth Deſarts, but we ſhall go through moſt pleaſant places, decked both by Nature her ſelf, and the induſtry of man; where the temperateneſs of the Air, and lively Springs, with the fruitfulneſs of the Soil, doth every where yield plenty of all manner of food both for Man and Beaſt, not only to ſerve for Natures neceſſity, but even to glut our wanton deſires. What thing ſoever curious endeavour hardly bringeth forth in other places, that the fertility of the Soil yieldeth plentifully of it ſelf; ſo that it is to be thought, that Nature adorned Hungary with a certain extraordinary Care, when as ſhe would ſet forth a pattern of good Husbandry for other Countries to imitate. Neither hath ſhe in any place been more bountiful in beſtowing her rich Gifts; for Gold, which other men moſt painfully dig up, and that in few places, the Hungarians gather at their eaſe, as if it were a growing Plant. It is in your power (worthy Souldiers) whether you will to morrow open a way to all theſe good things for your ſelves for ever, or elſe leave the way open for your Enemies unto all that you hold. I would that you would remember when you go unto the Breach, that all the ſtore of happy Fortune is laid open unto you for a Prey, without any other defence, without any other Garriſon, without any other Keeper; and that behind you are your Wives, Children, your Houſes, your Temples, and Religion, together with the rewards of all your former Victories; over whom, except you win this City, the fury and inſolency of the victorious Enemy will moſt cruelly and ſhamefully inſult. I, according as I ſhall ſee you fight at the Breach to morrow, ſhall eaſily perceive how you are ſet down to Command as Conquerors, or elſe as Slaves to be commanded; and alſo what to anſwer to the moſt inſolent Demands of the proud Embaſſadors. In the mean time make much of your ſelves, and together with your Armor have all things in readineſs, that to morrow with the dawning of the day we may aſſault the Breach.

The Turkiſh Captains for that time joyfully departed, as if they had been already aſſured of the Victory, and of all thoſe good things which Amurath had ſo lively ſet before their eyes. The next morning very early, Amurath commanded the Aſſault to be given to a great Breach which he had made in the Wall with continual Battery; the Souldiers with great courage aſſailed the Breach, eſpecially the Janizaries, who under the leading of Haly Baſſa valiantly won the ſame, and were entring the City with aſſured hope of Victory. The Chriſtians ſeeing all in danger to be loſt, running to the Breach from all parts of the City, ſo forcibly charged the proud Janizaries on every ſide, that they were glad to retire with more haſt than they before entred; in which Retreat many of them were ſlain, and the reſt flying out at the Breach, were either ſlain, or burnt to death in the Town-Ditch with Wild-fire; whereof the Defendants had caſt great ſtore upon the Turks at the Breach, which having taken hold upon the Faggots, Hurdles, and other light matter, wherewith the Turks had upon the ſudden made their way over the Town-Ditch, did ſo terribly burn, that the Janizaries which had entred the Breach, being again repulſed, were in that fiery Lake conſumed, or elſe with ſmoke ſtrangled. In this Aſſault Amurath is reported to have loſt 8000 of his beſt Men, beſide 7000 others overwhelmed or ſtrangled in the Mines, by the Countermines of the Chriſtians. The other part of the Turks, which at the ſame time aſſaulted the City by Water, out of their Gallies and ſmall Ships, had as evil or rather worſe Succeſs; many of them were ſunk with great Shot, and ſome burnt by the fire caſt from the Walls, and ſo fired one another; and divers of them in that ſudden fear, for avoiding of that preſent danger, ran aground upon the ſhelfs in the River, and ſo ſplit. Amurath wonderfully diſcouraged with the ſlaughter ſlaughter of his men, and ſhamefully beaten from the Aſſault, returned to his Camp with his Turks, much like men which had lately eſcaped from ſome great ſhipwrack. And thus partly by Famine, and partly by the Defendants force, having loſt the greateſt part of his Army, he determined now after ſeven months Siege to return home. Yet becauſe he would not encourage his Enemies by ſhewing his fear, he ſent for the Embaſſadors into the Camp, and with ſtern Countenance anſwered them in this ſort:

Amurath his anſwer to the Embaſſadors.

We will (ſaid he) then talk of Peace, when Uladiſlaus ſhall deliver unto us all that part of Raſcia which he yet holdeth, and alſo this City of Belgrade as a pledge of the League. And for this time I will raiſe my Siege, to give Uladiſlaus time to adviſe himſelf; yet I would wiſh him rather to accept of my friendſhip upon theſe Conditions, than by denying that little which is demanded, to hazard the State of both his Kingdoms. I ask but that which is mine own by Law of Arms, before Uladiſlaus was called into Hungary; and the Hungarians cannot transfer unto him that Right which they had not themſelves. Wherefore if he will proceed rather to ſtrive for that which is other mens, than quietly to poſſeſs his own, I will in good time repair hither again, with my God the Beholder and Revenger of Wrong.

With this Anſwer he diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors, and forthwith roſe with his Army, ſore repenting his coming thither; yet becauſe he would take ſomething in his way, he left his Nephew Iſa-Beg with certain Troops of Horſemen at Scopia in Servia, who ſo troubled the King of Boſna, that he was glad to require Peace of Amurath, and to promiſe unto him a yearly Tribute of five and twenty thouſand Ducats.

Uladiſlaus newly elected King of Hungary, ſeeing that part of his Kingdom which is called Tranſylvania or Pannodacia, to be much ſubject to the Incurſion of the Turks, (who having got into their poſſeſſion all the Country of Moldavia, and grown inſolent by continual Victories, ceaſed not to invade and ſpoil the Country of Tranſylvania) for remedy of that daily miſchief, created John Huniades Vayvod, or his Vice-Gerent in Tranſylvania. This Huniades (as ſome write) was Earl of Biſtrice, born in Valachia; others ſay, that he was born but of mean Parents, and called Huniades of the Village wherein he was born, and grew to be great by his Vertue and Proweſs. Whatſoever his Parents were, he himſelf was a politique, valiant, fortunate, and famous Captain, his Victories ſo great, as the like was never before by any Chriſtian Prince obtained againſt the Turks; ſo that his Name became unto them ſo dreadful, that they uſed the ſame to fear their crying Children withall. This worthy Captain, according to the truſt repoſed in him, began to keep the Turks ſhort, by cutting them off, whenſoever they preſumed to enter into his Country; and alſo by ſhutting up the Paſſages whereby they were wont to forrage the Country of Tranſylvania; and when he had put his own Charge into good ſafety, he entered into Moldavia, and never reſted until he had won it quite out of the Turks hands. And not contented with this, paſſed many times over Danubius into the Turks Dominions, making havock of the Turks, and carrying away with him great Booty, with many Captives.

Now were two great and worthy Captains met together, in places nigh one to another; Huniades in Tranſylvania and the next part of Hungary, and Iſa in Raſcia and the upper part of Servia; the one lying at Temeſwar, and the other at Sinderovia; both Men of great ſpirit, and deſirous of Honour. Of theſe two, Iſa in great favour with Amurath, and by him highly preferred, to increaſe his credit with the Sultan his Uncle, and to inlarge the Bounds of the Turkiſh Kingdom committed to his Charge, continually forraged the Country about Belgrade, to the intent that having wearied the Inhabitants with the harms he daily did them, and brought the City into great wants, he might ſo at length gain the ſame, for the moſt part abandoned then of Citizens, which Amurath could not by force obtain, and ſo to open a way into Hungary. Thus was the Country by him ſpoiled, the Villages rifled and burnt, and great numbers both of Men and Cattel daily carried away; yea ſometimes not contented to have ſpoiled the open Country, he aſſailed the very Suburbs of the City, and was thence hardly repulſed; and finding Huniades the only man that hindred his further proceedings, to requite him, and provoke him the more, brake ſometimes into his Country, laying in every corner as he went, ſtrong Ambuſhes, ſo to have circumvented that wary Captain, if it had been poſſible. But he grieved to ſee the Country thus ſpoiled, and purpoſing thereof to be revenged, ſecretly raiſed a ſtrong Power both of Horſe and Foot, and with his Companion Nicholas Vilach a right valiant Captain, paſſing over Danubius, came and incamped betwixt Belgrade and Sinderovia, being about twenty miles diſtant. Of whoſe coming Iſa-Beg underſtanding, forthwith ſet forward with a great Army againſt him, leſt he ſhould by longer delay ſeem to ſtand in doubt of his Enemy, whom he had by many Injuries ſo often provoked. So marching on with his Army ranged in order of battel, he found Huniades as ready for battel as himſelf; who in both wings had placed his light Horſemen, and behind them his men at Arms, with certain Companies of Croſs-bows on Horſe-back; in the midſt ſtood his armed Men, with his Archers, and other Souldiers more lightly armed, ready at all aſſays, all ſtrongly guarded with Men at Arms; after whom in the rereward followed alſo a ſtrong Squadron of valiant Footmen. The ſignal of battel being given, there began a great and cruel Fight, as amongſt men deſirous either to overcome, or there honourably to end their days. At the firſt incounter, the Wings of Huniades his battel were by the Turks inforced to retire; but coming to the Men at Arms, their fury was there ſtaid, and a cruel battel fought, wherein many fell on both ſides, but of the Turks more, who truſting to their agility and nimbleneſs of body, were not able long to endure the ſhock and ſtrength of the Men at Arms, but were there by heaps overthrown, and moſt miſerably ſlain. Which Iſa-Beg beholding, and perceiving the Hungarians couragiouſly to fight, as men almoſt in poſſeſſion of an aſſured Victory, to ſave himſelf, turned his back and fled to Sinderovia. The reſt beholding the flight of their General, betook themſelves to flight alſo; after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed, eſpecially Huniades himſelf, who by his example to animate the reſt, left not the chaſe until he was come almoſt to the Suburbs of Sinderovia; few of the Turks eſcaped, the reſt being either taken or ſlain. Huniades after ſo great a Victory, with a rich Prey and a multitude of Priſoners returned to Belgrade; having now ſufficiently revenged himſelf of the wrongs he had before received. After which time Iſa the Turk was more quiet, as having ſufficient proof of his valour. The ſame of this Victory increaſed not a little the fame of Huniades, the report whereof coming to Buda, filled the City with joy and gladneſs; but moſt of all King Uladiſlaus, who thereupon cauſed publique Prayers, with Thankſgiving to be made in every Church; and by his Letters Gratulatory, with many rich Preſents incouraged Huniades to the proſecution of the Religious War; wherein was propounded unto him not only the increaſe of his Wealth (a baſe regard in the honourable) but the immortality of his name, and hope of eternal bliſs.

Tranſylvania invaded and ſpoiled by Meſites Baſſa.

Not long after this Victory, Huniades obtained a far greater in Tranſylvania. For Amurath much grieved with the loſs he had firſt by himſelf, and after by his Lieutenant Iſa, received at Belgrade, and in the Country thereabout; leſt he ſhould ſeem to yield unto the Hungarians, repaired his broken Forces with new Supplies, with purpoſe again to renew his Wars in Valachia. And ſo having put all things in a readineſs, ſent one of his Baſſaes called Meſites (his Vice-Roy in Aſia, a man of great Wiſdom, Experience, and Valour) with a puiſſant Army upon the ſudden by the way of Valachia Tranſalpina, to invade Tranſylvania. This worthy Captain according to his charge departing out of Servia, and paſſing from Danubius, ſuddenly entred into Huniades his Country, burning and ſpoiling whatſoever came in his way, and killing all that he light upon, Man, Woman, and Child, without reſpect of Age, Sex, or Condition, filling all the Country as he went with tumult and terror. Whereof Huniades (but lately come into the Country) underſtanding, and having as then no ſufficient Forces to oppoſe againſt the Fury of ſo puiſſant an Enemy, either means to raiſe any in ſo great a confuſion and fear, was wonderfully grieved thereat, and perplexed in mind, as not well knowing which way to turn himſelf. At length he took his flight into Alba Jula, unto his old Friend George Lepe Biſhop of that City, a man of great Vertue and Gravity; but whilſt he there ſtayeth with his Friend, about the raiſing of a tumultuary Army, the Enemy was now come near unto him; who having overrun the greateſt part of the Country, had ſcraped together ſuch a Booty, and taken ſuch a multitude of Priſoners, that ſurcharged as it were with the ſpoil, he was glad to march ſoftlier; yet ſtill burning the Country before him. Which Huniades and the good Biſhop beholding out of the City, ſo much grieved thereat, that albeit that they both well knew themſelves, with an handful of men taken up in haſt hand over head, too weak to encounter with their Enemies; yet thought it better, with ſuch Power as they had to go out, and ſo in defence of their Country honourably to die, than longer to behold the moſt miſerable deſtruction of the ſame. But whilſt they upon this Reſolution (carried forth with too hot a deſire of Revenge) march unadviſedly forward, without any Scouts or Eſpials ſent out before them, they fell before they were aware into ſuch ambuſhes both of Horſe and Foot, as the crafty Enemy had in the ſecret Woods and Vallies whereby they were to paſs, laid of purpoſe to intercept them; which now with great force and horrible Out-cries breaking out upon them on every ſide, diſmayed them with a great fear. Huniades and the Biſhop ſeeing themſelves ſo intrapped and beſet with the multitude of their Enemies, as that they muſt needs periſh if they ſhould longer ſtay, fled incontinently back again; after whom followed all the reſt of their Army, and at their heels the eager Turks, who ſpared none of the flying Chriſtians they could overtake, but put them all to the Sword; nevertheleſs moſt part of them eſcaped back again to Alba Jula. The Biſhop thinking to have ſaved himſelf by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe, coming to a River, in taking the ſame was overthrown, and there by the Enemy ſlain. With whoſe death the Baſſa incouraged, as alſo with the preſent Victory, began now more at liberty to range abroad, and at his pleaſure with Fire and Sword to waſt that part of the Country which yet remained unſpoiled; leaving in the mean time (as a man out of fear) the rich Prey he had taken, together with his Baggage and Carriages, to be carried all together, as a notable Teſtimony of his Victory, unto his great Lord and Maſter. Huniades in the mean time with wonderful celerity running about the borders of his Country, and out of every Town and Village taking ſuch Souldiers as he could, perſwaded alſo the Sicilians (or people commonly called Siculi) in defence of their Wives and Children to take up Arms; who all in reſpect of the preſent neceſſity, chearfully did whatſoever he commanded. With this tumultuary Army he followed the Baſſa (who then in great pride was returning, laded with the ſpoil of the whole Country) with purpoſe to ſet upon him as time or place ſhould give him occaſion. In the mean time Meſites being told, that Huniades with a great Power was coming after him, and now even at hand; is reported to have made no reckoning thereof, but to have proudly anſwered unto him that brought the News, Let him come, and with the ſpoil of himſelf inrich our Victory. There was preſent when he thus ſaid, one John, one of Huniades his Eſpials; who diſcovered unto him many of the Turks deſigns concerning the joyning of battel with him; but eſpecially, that the Baſſa had commanded through his Army, That above all things, they ſhould in the beginning of the battel aſſail the Perſon of Huniades himſelf, for that he being once ſlain, the reſt would eaſily be put to flight, as all depending on his direction; and that for the performance thereof, he had appointed certain Companies of his beſt Souldiers, giving them certain Tokens whereby they might know both him and his Horſe. There was then in the Army one Simon Kemene, a right valiant and couragious Gentleman, not much unlike to Huniades, with whom he changed both his Horſe and Armour, appointing unto him a ſtrong Troop of his choice Horſemen to attend upon him; neither was this counterfeit Huniades unwilling to expoſe himſelf unto the danger, accounting it honour enough, if by his death he might ſave the life of his Friend, and preſerve ſo worthy a Defender of the Commonweal. Huniades following faſt after, the Baſſa marching before him, ſought by light Skirmiſhes, ſometimes on the one ſide, ſometimes on the other, and ſometimes in the rereward, to ſtay him, and at ſome advantage, if any ſuch were given, to fight with him before he ſhould get out of the Country. At length finding ſuch an opportunity as he thought good to lay hold upon, he with all his Forces, as if it had been a violent Tempeſt, came upon the Turks ſo ſuddenly, as that they had not time to put themſelves in order of battel, but were glad confuſedly to fight as they might, and without order; in which diſordered fight many fell on both ſides, but far more of the Turks. But whilſt both Armies with like obſtinacy encounter together, certain Troops of the moſt valiant Turks deſcrying Simon the counterfeit Huniades, and by the ſigns before delivered unto them, both of his Horſe and Armor, ſuppoſing him to have been Huniades indeed; with all their Power

made

made towards him, to have ſlain him, according as they had in charge, where meeting with right valiant Men, of no leſs courage than themſelves, there was fought a moſt terrible and bloody battel, in ſuch ſort, as if in that very place ſhould have been tried the whole fortune of the day. But the Turks ſtill bending their Forces more and more thither; for the killing of him of whom they ſtood in more dread than of all the reſt; at length by plain force made a way unto him, and having ſlain them that were about him, though not without their own great loſs, furiouſly aſſailing him, ſlew him, vainly ſuppoſing it to have been the very General himſelf; who had he there periſhed (as like enough it was he ſhould, had he not been before warned of the Baſſaes purpoſe) no doubt but that the whole Country had been with him, or ſhortly after quite loſt. But Huniades in the mean time riding to and fro in the Army, encouraged his Souldiers not to forſake the Victory they were now as it were in poſſeſſion of, nor leave unrevenged ſo many ſlaughters and harms ſo lately committed by their Enemies, but to remember as they were fighting, that they carried in their hands their Wives and Children, and were in that one battel to revenge the wrong by them done both to God and Man. Sometime he with new Supplies encouraged ſuch as were overcharged, and even now ready to fly; otherſome he with chearful words ſtaid, that had already turned their backs; performing in every place all the parts both of a worthy Commander and valiant Souldier, as the neceſſity of the time and place required. In the heat of this battel (Fortune yet favouring neither part, but both fighting with all their Power) the Tranſylvanian Priſoners that in great number were kept in the Camp, wiſhing rather to die, than to be carried away into Captivity, and thinking it now or never, time for them to attempt their deliverance; with one conſent brake aſunder their Bonds, and with ſuch Weapons as firſt came to hand, ſet upon their Keepers, of whom they ſlew a great number, and ſo deſperately iſſuing out into the battel, incouraged their Country-men, and diſcouraged their Enemies. Yet was the battel hardly fought, though not altogether with like courage, or for like cauſe; for why, the Tranſylvanians fought for their Country, their Wives, their Children, their Lives, their Liberty, their Religion, and Altars; but the Turks, for the rich Prey they had before taken, and that they were by Victory in hope of. But at length the Turks by the breaking out of the Priſoners (who laid about them like deſperate men) out of hope of the Victory, began by little and little to retire; and the other on the contrary part by this unexpected Aid encouraged, and quickly finding the Enemies fainting, fought more fiercely than before. Meſites ſeeing his Army thus in every part wavering, was therewith exceedingly troubled; but preſently after, beholding ſome of his men retiring as if they had fled, and other ſome flying outright, and no means to ſtay them, for ſafeguard of his life turned his Horſe and fled alſo; after whom the Hungarians followed with moſt terrible execution, as men deſirous of the blood of them that had done them ſo great harm. In this chaſe Meſites himſelf with his Son were both ſlain; the report of whoſe death in the purſuit, added ſwiftneſs unto the Hungarians, to the encreaſing of the ſlaughter of the Turks, whom for the deſire of Revenge they ceaſed not for certain days to purſue, unto the top of the Alps. In this battel were ſlain of the Turks 20000, and of the Hungarians about 3000. Huniades with this Victory recovered all the Prey the Turks had taken of the ſpoil of the Country, together with their Tents and Baggage; unto whom at his return into the Camp, a wonderful number of the poor Captives came, and falling at his feet, and kiſſing them, gave God thanks for their deliverance by him; ſome called him the Father, ſome the Defender of his Country; the Souldiers, their invincible General; the Captives, their Deliverer; the Women, their Protector; the young Men and Children, their moſt loving Father. In all which joyful Acclamations, no honourable Additions were heard, which in the judgment of all men, worthily agreed not with his deſerts. He again with tears ſtanding in his eyes, courteouſly embraced them, rejoycing at the publique good; and himſelf giving moſt hearty thanks unto God, commanded the like to be done in all Churches of that Province. Sometime he commended the Souldiers Valour, and in general, the peoples Loyalty. The Nobility and worthy Captains he extolled by name, according as their deſerts had been in that notable Battel, not detracting any thing from any mans worthy praiſes; part of the ſpoil of the Turks he appointed unto devout Uſes, and the other part he divided amongſt the Souldiers; and willing as it were with the firſt Fruits thereof to gratifie King Uladiſlaus, and the Deſpot of Servia, then preſent with him, he ſent a great Waggon, with ten Horſes which they could ſcarce draw, laded with the Turks Enſigns and the chief of their Heads, where the Heads of the Baſſa and his Son ſtood formoſt, and above them was placed an old Turk, ſometime well known unto the Deſpot; who in this order preſented unto them, is ſaid to have thus delivered his Meſſage, as followeth:

Great rejoycing for the victory

The Speech of an old Turk, in delivering the Preſent unto the King.

Huniades your Majeſties moſt humble Servant, and the moſt honourable Deſpots Son, ſendeth unto you this part of the ſpoil gained by this late Victory, leſt he ſhould ſeem to defraud you of the honour of the battel, happily fought under your good Fortune. These heads of the Aſian Nobility he ſendeth you for a Preſent, that you ſhould not want the aſſured Teſtimony of ſo notable a Victory; theſe are two Princes heads, the one of Meſites Baſſa the General, and the other of his Son; the reſt are the heads of the other great Commanders and Sanzacks. All theſe witneſs the greatneſs of the late ſlaughter, and exhort you to greater Atchievements. What your Royal Majeſty for the natural inſtinct of Piety and Religion ingrafted into you, may hope for, and what an occaſion of Immortality and Glory is offered unto you, Huniades wiſheth you hereby to conſider; and humbly requeſteth, that general Supplications may be commanded, and a great Army provided, foraſmuch as all men ſuppoſe, that the Turk will gage his whole Forces, and leave nothing unattempted, in revenge of ſo great a ſlaughter of his people.

Having ended his Speech, he ſhewed unto them the griſely mortified heads; which the Nobility and others there preſent, earneſtly beheld, and wondred at, eſpecially the King and the Deſpot; who by Letters further underſtanding the whole proceeding of the War, and fortune of the Battel, highly commended the diſcreet valour of Huniades, together with the glorious Victory, worthy (as they ſaid) of a Roman Triumph; for which, Uladiſlaus commanded publick Supplications to be made in all Churches through Hungary, and by honourable Meſſengers ſent of purpoſe to Huniades, gave him great thanks, according to his Deſerts, with many rich Preſents alſo, commending his faithful and worthy Service; and requeſting him, with like courage and care, to proſecute the War, ſo happily begun; promiſing him, That he ſhould neither want Men nor Money, or any thing elſe needful thereunto. Upon this Victory, the Countries of Moldavia and Valachia, before Tributaries unto the Turks, now revolted again unto the Hungarians, to the great grief of Amurath; and the fame of Huniades was in ſhort time diſperſed through all Europe, and a general hope conceived of him, as of one moſt like to be one of the greateſt Champions of the Chriſtian Commonweal, as in his time undoubtedly he was.

The report of this late Overthrow, with the death of the Baſſa Meſites, and the loſs of his Army, being brought to Hadrianople, much troubled the Turiſh Tyrant; but moſt of all, the Revolt of the two Countries, Moldavia and Valachia. So that full of wrathful Indignation, and deſire of Revenge, he commanded a great Army to be raiſed againſt the next Spring, with intent to have gone therewith himſelf; but afterward upon better advice changing his purpoſe, he committed the leading thereof unto one Shech Abedin Baſſa (corruptly called Sciabedin Baſſa) an Eunuch, and yet nevertheleſs a right valiant and expert Captain, and his Vice-Roy in Europe; with Charge firſt to enter into Valachia, and there having done what harm he could with Fire and Sword, to do the like in Moldavia; and after that, with all his Power to break into Tranſylvania, there to Revenge unto the full, the Loſſes before received, and with the ſlaughter of the Hungarians to Sacrifice unto the Ghoſts of their dead Friends and Companions. The Baſſa according to his Charge, departing out of Macedonia, and marching through Myſia, and ſo paſſing over Danubius, with an Army of fourſcore thouſand fighting Men, whereof four thouſand were of the beſt Janizaries, entred into Valachia, filling the Country with fear and tumult; the Valachians now altogether in deſpair to be able to defend themſelves againſt the fury of the Turks, and ſore repenting them of their revolt from them, unto the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades comforted with chearful words, willing them betime to retire themſelves unto the ſafeſt places of the Country, and not to expoſe themſelves with their too weak Forces againſt the fury of the Barbarians; promiſing in good time to come himſelf to their Relief, not doubting by the Power of Jeſus Chriſt, to dare them battel in the plain Field, and to have of them a glorious Victory, although they were in number far more than they were reported to be. The Baſſa dividing his Army into two parts, forraged the Country far and near, burning the Country Towns and Villages before them, ſpoiling whatſoever came in their way, and killing whoſoever they light upon, Men, Women, or Children, without reſpect of Age, Sex, or Condition. But the Valachians for the moſt part had retired themſelves, ſome into the Mountains, ſome into the ſtrong Towns, and ſome into places further off, ſo that few fell into the Enemies hands, but ſuch as were not able to fly, or not regarding the danger, had negligently ſtaid the Enemies coming, and ſo periſhed. Valachia thus ſpoiled, the Turks paſſing over the Mountains, deſcended into Tranſylvania, as Amurath had commanded, with purpoſe there to have done the like or greater harm if poſſible it had been to have ſo done; but there was Huniades with 15000 choſen Souldiers ready to encounter them. A ſmall Power indeed, in compariſon of the multitude the Baſſa led; but all men of great Experience and Reſolution, in valour countervailing the great number of their Enemies; Men reſolved rather to die than to fly. Of whoſe approach the Baſſa (unto whom the name and fortune of the Man was dreadful) by his Eſpials underſtanding, ſtayed his intended fury, and as one well aware with whom he had to do, without farther proceeding, encamped himſelf with his Army, to ſee what power and courage the Enemy had. But certainly informed by his Scouts, for that purpoſe ſent out, That he was not in number a quarter ſo many as the Turks, but lay ſtrongly encamped with his Waggons and Carriages, as in a ſure Fort, in ſuch order, as that he could not without great danger be aſſailed, and yet might at his pleaſure come forth, and ſo if need were retire again, as into a ſtrong Hold; he wondred at his courage and skilful manner of encamping; yet preſuming of his own multitude and ſtrength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offer him battel. Being come within half a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither ſide unwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great Victory, they thought it not beſt to attempt any thing raſhly, but betook themſelves both unto the higheſt of their wits, as willing in ſo great a Conflict, as well to ſhew the utmoſt of their policy and skill, as of their courage and valour. The Turk thought it beſt not to joyn battel with his Enemies in one front, for fear of confounding ſo great a multitude, but to divide his Army into certain Battalions, and ſo to fight by degrees and in good order, whereby to make all his men profitable; or if he could not do ſo, then with his multitude to encloſe the Chriſtians round, and ſo to overwhelm them. On the other ſide, Huniades charged his Souldiers, above all things to keep their order, and in no caſe to ſuffer themſelves to be divided by their Enemies. The next day, being come unto a place which they call Vaſcape, both the Armies by the break of day began to diſlodge; at which time the Baſſa ſpent a good ſpace in the martialling of his great Army, as did alſo Huniades, ſeeking by provident foreſight and policy to match the multitude of his Enemies. And ſo having ſet all things in order, calling unto him the chief Captains and Commanders of his Army, with chearful countenance encouraged them as followeth:

Valachia grievouſly ſpoiled by the Turks.

No courage (believe me) worthy Companions, and Fellows in Arms, could have induced me to encounter ſo great a multitude, did not neceſſity it ſelf enforce me, your approved Valour perſwade, and the aſſured hope I have in Chriſt Jeſus above all things confirm me; having made choice of us to fight this his ſacred battel, and by our right hands to revenge the diſhonour of his holy Name. In which his eſpecial choice we are to conſider how much he hath loved us; and for the ſame to praiſe his infinite Goodneſs and Mercy. Three ſuch Commodities hath God thereby even this day propounded unto us, if we will be the ſame men we have been in times paſt, as that the leaſt thereof were ſufficient to encourage men of worth, for the ſame to lay down their Lives, held they them never ſo dear. Firſt, you are to fight for the health and welfare of your Children, Wives, and Country, joyned with your whole Eſtate; then, for eternal Glory and Renown in this World; and laſt of all, for Immortality and a Crown that ſhall never be taken from you, in the World to come. How many Miſeries and Calamities we have in former times, and of late received from the Turks, would to God you had rather heard thereof by report, than ſeen the ſame with your eyes, and indured them in your ſelves. You had long ſince been bereft of of your beloved Wives and Children, whom moſt miſerable Servitude had overwhelmed; you had had neither Houſe nor Church, wherein to dwell or to ſerve God, had not the Divine Power of God, and your rare Proweſs been at hand for preſent reſcue; your Country, your Goods, your Honour, your Liberty, you could not have kept, had not your Valour, confirmed by aſſured confidence in the Higheſt, preſerved all theſe things unto your ſelves; The horrible fury of the Turk had now brought all theſe things into the power of it ſelf, had they not been by your Arms defended, and he by ſo many bloody overthrows repreſſed. He could not before be ſtaied; the Grecians, the Macedonians (both ſometimes the greateſt Commanders) the old Thracians, the ſtrong Bulgarians, the valiant Epirots, and Dalmatians, could not abide their Force; The Athenians, the Thebans, the Lacedemonians, Authors and Maſters of the antient Diſcipline of War, willingly gave place unto theſe. Unto us, is the Praiſe and great Glory of this Victory by God aſſigned, who oftentimes with a ſmall Power, yea and that ſometime againſt all hope, have with a notable Slaughter overthrown them, vanquiſhed them, and put them to Flight. Neither is there any men in the World whom they more fear and ſtand in dread of, than you, whom though in number but few, they have by their dayly Slaughter and Loſſes, learned no leſs to fear, than if you were many. And now to trie the uttermoſt of their power, they are come with their innumerable Legions; but are not for that of you any thing the more to be feared than before; ſeeing that we all bear Arms under the conduct of the moſt mighty God; and are by dayly Victory, long Experience, and approved Valour taught, what we are to dare; beſides that the greateſt part of their Army is of common Souldiers, Slaves, or rude Country Peſants, or men by force by them compelled; more than the Janizaries, are no good Souldiers among them, the reſt as men enforced, ſerve them for fear, and againſt their Wills, and they by their Cowardiſe brought into that Bondage and Slavery. What Greeks, Macedonians, or Sclavonians ſoever are ſent to their Aid, for aſmuch as they are not yet revolted from the Chriſtian Faith, deem them not to ſtand for them, but for us; they long for us the Revengers of their Wrongs, and for you as victorious Conquerors; in this War they have given unto the Turks their Names, but unto us their Hearts and Power; and pray heartily for our Victory; wherefore you ought ſo much the more valiantly and couragiouſly to fight, by how much greater you ſee the Victory, the Honour, the Prey before your Eyes. We are not to fight for other Mens Houſes and Altars, but for our own; ſo our preſent neceſſity requireth, in ſuch ſort, that if we our ſelves deliver not our ſelves, and bear our ſelves upon our wonted hope and valour, we ſhall this day be enforced to endure the greateſt miſery that men may poſſibly. Firſt, the loſs of our Goods and Subſtance, the Captivity of our Children, the deflowring of our Daughters, the raviſhing of our Wives, the ſlaughter of our Parents, the burning of our Houſes and Churches; and that which worſe is than all this, the ſcorn of our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, and his Saints; whoſe images you ſhall ſee in deſpight broken, or dragged in the dirt, or moulten and converted into other prophane uſes; all Religion trodden down, and God himſelf (if it were poſſible) with violence and deſpair driven out of our Hearts, if we ſtand not manfully unto it as becometh worthy Champions. God is able with his little Finger, if he ſo will forthwith, to deſtroy all the Turks in the World; but ſeeing he hath committed unto our right Hands the defence of his name, he firſt maketh proof of our Courage and Valour, that finding the ſame faithful and ready, he may ſtrengthen and defend it with his own right Hand. He never yet forſook any faithful or devout man, neither will our Saviour Chriſt be wanting unto you, if you be not wanting to your ſelves; in the power of his Name which is above all Names, he ſhall tread down his rebellious Enemies, and exalt the Righteous that put their truſt in him. Moreover, the cauſes that they and we combat for, are divers, and our hopes much ſtronger; They fight for their Prophet, a moſt prophane man, Author of all Impiety, for Spoil and Prey, for the deſtruction of Nations and Countries, for other Mens Kingdoms, for the inlarging of their Dominions and Territories, for worldly Praiſe and Glory; But we contrariwiſe bear Arms for the Saviour of the World, for our Faith and Religion, for the Chriſtian Common-Wealth, for our Native Country, for our Wives and Children, for our Fortune and State; than which nothing can be more excellent, more commendable, or honourable. What reward is laid up for them in Heaven which have worthily protected or delivered their Country, or laid down their Lives in defence of their Faith and Religion? Neither, having often proved, are we ignorant, that God will never forſake them that honour, fear, and ſerve him. Whereby (fellow Souldiers) you may plainly perceive, how far your hopes are beyond theirs. Believe our Saviour, promiſing unto you an eternal reward; and ſhew your Fidelity and Valour unto God and your Country together. Wherefore, ſeeing without the power of God we can do nothing, before the ſignal of Battel be given, I beſeech you Collonels, Captains, and Lieutenants, by your effectual and Chriſtian Exhortations in your Regiments and Companies, to encourage your Souldiers, valiantly to fight the Lords Battel; and for the preſent, every man by taking a little Earth in his Mouth, to prepare himſelf according to the neceſſity of the time, as it were to the receiving of the Lords Supper; ſo having cleanſed your Souls, embrace you one another, plight your mutual Faith with your right Hand and a Kiſs; and make a perpetual Covenant among your ſelves, none of you to forſake one another in this holy Battel, but for your Religion and Country valiantly to fight it out, even to the laſt man. And a little refreſhing your ſelves with a ſhort repaſt as you ſtand, upon the ſignal given, thrice calling aloud upon the mighty name of Chriſt Jeſus, fight with the like Valour and Courage ſo near as you can, that he in the Agonie of Death fought for your Redemption and Liberty which that you will willingly do, I requeſt and charge you this for our Saviours ſake, for the Love of our Country, and for the Faith you owe both to God and Man. I alſo pray and beſeech you, ſo to fight, as men reſolved either to gain a moſt glorious Victory, (whereof I doubt not) or elſe if it ſhould otherwiſe chance, this day to purchaſe unto your ſelves a bleſſed life in the Kingdom of Heaven; not to ſup in Hell with the Turks, but with the bleſſed Wights in Heaven; for Chriſt Jeſus our Saviour will be alwaies preſent with us, who (believe me, and ſo hope) will this day not only deliver us out of the Hands of the Turks, but to our immortal Glory lode us with the rich Spoils of our Enemies, and ſo in ſafety bring all home again with much Joy and Triumph.

The Baſſa on the other ſide likewiſe encouraged his Souldiers, putting them in remembrance of their former Victories, exhorting them not to degenerate from their worthy Anceſtors and themſelves, by whoſe great Valor the Glory and Empire of the Turks had been ſo mightily increaſed; and unto whom their great Prophet Mahomet, the Interpreter of the gods, had foretold the Empire of the whole World to be by all the gods allotted; and had by divine inſpiration prophecied, that antient and ſtately Nation in time to become the terror of the World, the ſcourge of the Wicked, and Commander of all Nations. He farther declared unto them, what an increaſe of Kingdoms they had got in that ſhort time, ſince which they firſt paſſed over into Europe, and filled them with the hope of a great Spoil; promiſing unto them that ſhould in the Battel valiantly behave themſelves, not only the Spoil and Prey, but whole Villages, Towns, and Cities, and other great Preferments, according as they ſhould deſerve. As for the Victory, conſidering the weak Power of their Enemies, and the great number of themſelves, he aſſured them thereof, if they would but a while valiantly fight it out like men. In concluſion, he told them, that having overcome Huniades (whom only, as he confeſſed, he had found to be the moſt valiant and ſkilful Captain of the Chriſtians) nothing ſhould afterward be able to ſtand in their way, or to hinder their further Conqueſts; and that if this day they ſhould utterly overthrow him, they ſhould gain the moſt honourable Victory that was ever yet got in Europe. Wherefore he willed them above all things, in the Battel to ſeek after him; promiſing unto him that ſhould kill him, a great Reward, with moſt honourable Preferments. Having thus ſufficiently, as he thought encouraged his Turks, he ſet forward with his Army in order of Battel. His Horſemen and Footmen he divided into two great Wings, betwixt which marched the Janizaries in a ſquare Battel, all men of approved Valour; after whom followed the Rereward; unto the Wings he had alſo joyned certain looſe Companies of light Horſemen to begin the Battel, and to flie about the Enemies, and ſo as occaſion ſhould ſerve, either to charge or retire. Huniades likewiſe had placed in both Wings two ſquare Battalions of men at Arms, and with them certain Horſemen with Croſs-bows; before theſe Wings he had alſo placed certain Troops of light Horſemen, to encounter the Enemies; in the midſt ſtood two ſquare Battels of men at Arms; and betwixt them a ſtrong Squadron of armed men, guarded behind with a convenient number of Pikemen and Archers; both the Wings he had compaſſed about with a multitude of Carts and Waggons, and they alſo well manned. So marching forward, and both Armies being come within a quarter of a mile together, the ſignal of Battel was on both ſides given, and the Battel begun.

Huniades ſeeing the multitude of his Enemies, caſt his firſt Battel into the form of a Wedge, the more eaſily to divide them; and they on the other ſide in the form of a pair of Shears, were ready to receive him; where on both ſides they encountred together with ſuch Fury and Outcry, as never was thing more terrible to be heard or ſeen. The Turks truſting unto the multitude of their nimble light Horſemen, firſt with their light Staves, and afterwards with their crooked Scimeters fiercely aſſaulted the Chriſtians light Horſemen, in which firſt incounter many fell on both ſides: But the Wedge Battel of the Chriſtians could not of the Turks be broken, as conſiſting all of valiant expert Souldiers, and they alſo ſtrongly armed; who, do the Turks what they could, with a great Slaughter cut their Army in ſunder, but not without a great Fight, and ſome loſs alſo unto themſelves. In the Wings alſo the light Horſemen for a while fought couragiouſly and with like hope; but the Turks with that kind of Fight better acquainted than the Chriſtians, and better appointed for that purpoſe, and exceeding in number alſo, put the Chriſtian light Horſemen to the worſt, and enforced them to retire to the men at Arms. Here began the Fortune of the Turks to ſtay, where both parts deſperately aſſailing the one the other, was made a moſt terrible Fight, wherein moſt part of the Turks light Horſemen were ſlain; for why, they were not able to abide the force of the men at Arms, although in compariſon of them, but few; but with their Lances and arming Swords overthrown and ſlain, no otherwiſe than if they had been naked men; ſo that in both Wings the Turks began now to faint. But the Battel in both the Wings yet wavering, and the Victory doubtful, in the main Battel was fought a moſt cruel Fight; the Janizaries with a ſtrong power of men at Arms, and certain Troops of light Horſemen, compaſſed about the men at Arms that ſtood (as we ſaid) in the main Battel of the Chriſtians, were the old Janizaries with their crooked Scimeters, with great Courage cut in ſunder the Legs of the Horſes of the Men at Arms; of whom many fell down, and lying along upon the ground, were made ſhorter by the Head; as likewiſe on the other ſide, the Janizaries whilſt they ſeek the deſtruction of the Men at Arms, were themſelves overborn and troden under Foot. Whereupon ſuch a Slaughter was made, that the blood ran like Rivers, whilſt they deſperately fight with furious rage both on the one ſide and the other. In this cruel Fight moſt part of the Janizaries were ſlain, and many of the Chriſtian Men at Arms alſo. The Baſſa now perceiving the Hungarians to have the better, both in the Wings, and in the main Battel, and yet in hope that with long Fight they would faint (although he ſaw great Slaughter of his Men in every place) came on with the Rereward, and a number of other freſh Souldiers which he had left for guarding of the Baggage, all yet ſound Men, in good hope ſo to overwhelm the wearied Hungarians. It was now four hours that this cruel Fight had endured, when as the Baſſa began it afreſh; neither was this by him done without reaſon; for why, he was afraid leſt if his Men ſhould turn their Backs and flie, the whole Army ſhould follow after; and therefore to make uſe of all the Men he had, he brought on his Rereward, in hope that his Enemies, now ſpent with long Fight, would not longer endure a freſh Charge. And the more to encourage his Men, he commanded them to compaſs in the Hungarians round, and to diſpatch their wearied Enemies, vainly boaſting, That it would be the laſt Battel that ever the Hungarians would fight. On the other ſide, Huniades perceiving the Enemies purpoſe, ſuffered his Men to be in part invironed, and by and by cauſed the Waggoners with the armed Carts and Waggons to thruſt in behind them, and ſo to compaſs them in, divided in part from the reſt, and afterward with freſh ſupplies renewed the Battel with the Enemy. The Fight was great, and in every place right terrible; and albeit that the Slaughter of the Turks was in many places great, yet by reaſon of their multitude they felt it not much, but fought yet ſtill moſt deſperately; until that they in the right Wing ſeeing themſelves compaſſed in behind with the Waggons, and ſo from them charged with Shot, Darts, and other ſuch miſſive Weapons; ſtanding in doubt which way to turn themſelves, and beſet with danger on every ſide, began to faint, and fearing the danger behind them, ſhrunk from the Fight. On the other ſide, the Hungarians, now in good hope of Victory, with great and chearful Outcries, as Men inſpired with freſh Spirits, more furiouſly aſſailed their fainting Enemies afront, than before; encouraging them alſo that aſſailed them behind in the Waggons, to approach them nearer; with which double danger the Turks hardly beſet fought diſorderly, and doubting to be all incloſed round, firſt retired, and preſently after betook themſelves to plain Fight.

The Turks flie.

But they which were already ſhut in betwixt the Waggons and them that fought before them, periſhed every Mothers Son. They which fought in the left Wing alſo, diſcouraged with the Flight of their Fellows, fled likewiſe; after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed. The Baſſa himſelf ſeeing both the Wings of his Battel put to Flight, and his own Battel ſore broken alſo, ſtrucken with deſpair fled, with certain Companies of the Janizaries, which he had ſtill kept about him againſt all Events, for the ſafeguard of his Perſon; after whom followed alſo ſo many other of the Turks as could; the reſt diſperſedly flying through the Woods, Foreſts and Mountains, either there periſhed with Hunger, or falling into the Hands of the Valachians, were by them ſlain. Of ſo great an Army as the Baſſa brought into Tranſilvania, ſcarce the one half returned again over Danubius. It is reported by ſome that were in that Battel, that if Huniades having them in chace, had purſued them to Danubius, ſcarcely one of them had eſcaped over the River. But he contented with ſo great a Victory, and to have driven his Enemies out of the Field, purſued them not far; but entring into their Camp, with the Spoil thereof greatly inricht both himſelf and his Souldiers. Beſide the great multitude of the Turks here ſlain, five thouſand more were taken Priſoners, and an hundred of their Enſigns. Long it were to rehearſe and reckon up the rich Spoil there taken, the gilt Armor, and goodly Furniture, both of Men and Horſes, beſides the rich Pavilions and Tents there ſtanding. In brief, the Wealth there found, was ſo great, as that there was no man in Huniades Army, which was not thereby for ever enriched. Huniades for this ſo great a Victory, and for his Country, delivered from ſo great a fear, cauſed general Prayers with Thankſgiving, for the ſpace of three days, to be made in all Churches of thoſe three Provinces, unto whom that danger was threatned; and at Vaſcape, where the Battel was fought, hanged up certain of the Turks Enſigns, as Trophies of the Victory there gotten. This was the famous Battel of Vaſcape, wherein Huniades got the greateſt Victory that ever any Chriſtian Prince before that time obtained againſt the Turkiſh Kings. The Fields thereabouts lay covered with the dead bodies of the ſlain Turks, whoſe Carrion Carkaſſes ſo infected the Air, that many of the better ſort of the Inhabitants of the Country were glad for a ſeaſon to leave their Dwellings, and to get them further off, for fear of infection. Afterwards he in great Triumph came to Buda, and there preſented to King Uladiſlaus the Enemies Enſigns, with ſuch a part of the Spoil, as might both well declare the greatneſs of the Victory, and beſeem the greatneſs of ſo great a Prince; which the King thankfully received, highly commending his great Valour, the fame whereof had in ſhort time filled every corner of Europe.

Amurath, a little before this great overthrow of his Army in Tranſilvania, aſſuring himſelf of the Victory, had ſent a proud Embaſſage to King Uladiſlaus into Hungary, offering him Peace upon condition, That he ſhould deliver unto him the ſtrong City of Belgrade, or elſe yield to pay him a yearly Tribute; to which, upon the firſt report of the Victory, anſwer was given by the King, anſwerable to the proud demand, That according to the iſſue of matters in Tranſilvania, he would ſhortly in perſon himſelf come and give him farther anſwer. With which ſhort anſwer, the proud Embaſſadors were diſmiſſed and gone, a little before the coming of Huniades to Buda.

How much this late overthrow grieved the great King Amurath, Uladiſlaus was not ignorant; either of his power and deſire of revenge, as ſufficiently warned thereof by the worthy Huniades; for the withſtanding whereof, he thought it good not to be unprovided. Wherefore calling together the States of his Kingdom, and with them Julian the Cardinal of S. Angel, the Popes Legate; at ſuch time as they were all aſſembled, he propounded unto them the greatneſs of the danger threatned by the angry Turk, leaving unto their grave conſideration, to determin how the ſame were by ſtrong hand and plain force, or otherwiſe to be averted. In which moſt honourable Aſſembly, Julian the Cardinal, on purpoſe ſent thither by Pope Urban to ſtir up the Hungarians againſt the Turks, being requeſted by the King to deliver his opinion firſt, ſpake unto them as followeth:

The effectual Speech of Julian the Popes Legate in the Parliament to perſwade the War.

Since the time that the Turkiſh Peſtilence began to rage in Europe, no news was ever more welcome unto the great Biſhop, unto the Apoſtolical Senate, and other Princes of Italy (moſt mighty King, and you other moſt worthy Princes) than when it was told them, That Uladiſlaus, King of Polonia, was by you alſo choſen King of Hungary. For a fitter Governor of the Hungarian State, and Leader of their Power, could not the Hungarians any where have found; As he in whom Juſtice, Religion, Wiſedom, Valour, and Martial Skill doth ſo abound, that he ſeemeth rather for the good of this Kingdom by God ſent from Heaven, than here in Earth choſen by Men. By this happy and fortunate choice, the minds alſo of all the Italians, which before lay heavy and diſcouraged, were lightned and revived; and therefore that this choice might be unto the Chriſtian Common-weal both glorious and fortunate, they made their ſolemn Vows and Prayers. At ſuch time as the moſt holy Senate underſtood of the civil Diſcord of this Kingdom, and the danger of the Turks faſt by, it ſent me hither to deal with you for the appeaſing of thoſe troubles, and repreſſing of that miſchief (as you have oftentimes heard me ſay.) The Kingdom is by your Force and Valour, by my Mediation, and the Death of the Queen, well pacified; but yet the other remaineth full of Honour, full of Profit, full of Safety, Glory, and Immortality, beſt fitting Uladiſlaus Conduct and Fortune, and the Valour of the Hungarians. The Turkiſh Tyranny and their proud Command (worthy Princes) is to be repreſſed; yea their ſervile yoke, hanging even now over our Necks, is to be ſhaken off, and to be driven away. What you are to dare to do, the Valour and Fortune of Huniades, foretelleth you; the Fortune ſaid I of Huniades, nay the Fortune of the Chriſtian Common-weal, and preſent Mercy of our Bleſſed Saviour, which ſuffereth his People to be up and down toſſed, but not quite drowned. If ſo great an Army of the Enemies was vanquiſhed and put to Flight by the power of one of thy Captains, and that but ſmall; what is to be hoped of thee (moſt mighty King) if thou ſhalt lead forth thine Armies thy ſelf in Perſon, under thine own Conduct, and the Protection of Chriſt Jeſus? The Eyes of all Chriſtian Princes are caſt upon thee, upon the Hungarian and Polonian Forces; upon thee have they repoſed all their hopes, they all expect that thou ſhouldſt be the revenger of the Barbarian Cruelty, the Defender of the Faith, and Protector of Europe; and that is it, for which the Pope doth with his Letters dayly ſolicite and importune you. And albeit that the common cauſe and quarrel of the Chriſtian Religion require it, yet doth the neceſſity of Hungary and Polonia no leſs enforce it; of which, the one is moſt miſerably and dayly vexed with the Turks Forces and Fury out of Servia and Dalmatia; and the other out of Moldavia and Valachia. Now if any there be, whom neither the zeal of Religion, the neceſſity of the cauſe, the hope of immortal Fame and Glory, can move, let their own Safety, the preſent Servitude of their Wives and Children, the Safeguard of their Wealth and Subſtance, the lawful Revenge of the Wrongs done them, ſtir them up to take in hand this ſacred Expedition. So fit an opportunity is now given unto you, that at one and the ſelf-ſame time you may ſet your bodies in perpetual Safety and Happineſs; your Souls in Quietneſs and Reſt, and unto both give Eternal Glory and Happineſs. You lack not (worthy Captains) Mony, the Sinews of the War, which ſhall be brought unto you from all parts of the Chriſtian Common-wealth, not luſty and couragious Souldiers, not Policy, not Fortune, not the propitious Hevenly Powers, which have made choice of you for the defence of the true Faith and Religion; you want nothing (worthy Princes) but Will. It is an Expedition neceſſary, religious, profitable and honourable; wherein are propounded moſt ample Rewards both in this Life, and in the Life to come. Wherefore (moſt mighty Prince, and you right worthy Princes all) I pray and beſeech you by the Faith of Chriſt Jeſus, by the Love of your Children, by the Health of your Kingdom, and deliverance from your preſent deſtruction, with valiant Courage, and one Conſent to take this ſacred War in hand, and ſo thereby to enrol your Names in the Eternal Book of Fame. And ſith that you are to go, not ſo much to a Worldly as a Spiritual War againſt the Enemies of Chriſt and his Truth, take up your Arms with ſuch Zeal, Courage, and Chearfulneſs, as the Expectation and Hope of Men, as your Valour, the preſent Danger, and the Mercies of God towards you, ſeem of right to require.

The pitiful complaint of the Deſpot, of the cruelty of the Turks, perſwading the Hungarians to take the War againſt them in hand.

This Legate having made an end, forthwith enſued the miſerable Supplication and Tears of the Deſpot; perſwading them of the neceſſity of that Expedition to be taken in hand, declaring unto them the Cruelty of the Turks, their Torments and ſtrange Tortures, his Sons deprived of their Sight, and ſpoiled of their Genitories, many half mangled, and more cut in ſunder with Saws; ſome ſlain quick, and others buried alive, with many other ſtrange kinds of death, ſuch as would abhor any Chriſtian Ears to hear. And warning the Hungarians, by his example to beware how much they had need to look to themſelves, told them, That they were but by the River Savus divided from the Turks; which in Summer was oftentimes to be waded over, and in Winter hard frozen, and ſo to be paſſed; that the Country beyond Danubius lay all open upon them; and that he, ſometime the rich King of Servia, was now driven into exile by the power of the Turk, deprived of his Kingdom, of his Children, ſhamefully diſgraced, ſpoiled of his Wealth and Fortune, glad to flie from place to place, and yet not able to find any ſafe place to reſt in. Firſt he fled (as he ſaid) to Raguſium, where by and by he was ſought after, and endangered by the Turks; then into Hungary, which was alſo forthwith by them on every ſide infeſted; and whereof the Barbarian King now asked Tribute, to have ſome colour for the invaſion thereof; which dreadful Enemy was not far off from it, but ſtill hovered even over it; as well witneſſeth Valachia and Tranſylvania, two of the greateſt and richeſt Provinces of the Hungarian Kingdom; which had not the Valour of Huniades, the Fortune of the Common-Weal, and above all, the Mercy of God, delivered out of the Hands of this filthy Nation, the State of Hungary had now been utterly forlorn. The Events of War (he ſaid) were divers, Fortune uncertain, and that God would not every day be tempted. Wherefore with many Tears abundantly running down his aged Face, he beſought King Uladiſlaus and the reſt, not to let ſlip this fair occaſion, neither by Cowardiſe or Negligence to break off the courſe of their good Fortune and Victory; but to make choice rather to become Revengers of other mens harms, than of their own, and to ſatisfie the good opinion the World had conceived of them. He was (as he ſaid) a ſufficient Example to all Men. Beſides that, he offered a great ſum of Mony himſelf towards the defraying of the Charges of the War, aſſuring them alſo of great ſupplies both of Men and Mony from divers other Chriſtian Princes. Which opinion of the Legate and Deſpots being generally liked and approved, a Decree was made by a whole Court of Parliament there aſſembled, That the King ſhould himſelf in perſon, with all ſpeed poſſible entertain that honourable War. So that though it were now upon the approach of Winter, yet were Men taken up in every place, and Embaſſadors ſent unto the Emperor and the other Neighbour Princes, to pray of them Aid againſt the common Enemy. Who for the moſt part excuſed themſelves by their own particular Affairs, but ſent no Aid at all. Nevertheleſs many devout Chriſtians both out of France and Germany, for the Zeal they bare unto Chriſt and the Chriſtian Religion, forſaking Wife and Children, and whatſoever they had elſe, came and worthily ſerved upon their own Charge. The Spring being come, and Supplications made in all places, for the proſperous ſucceſs of this Religious War, King Uladiſlaus the firſt of May ſet forward from Buda; where paſſing the River Danubius, and marching fair and ſoftly, and coming to the River Tibiſcus, he there ſtaied three days for the coming of his Army. Departing thence, and marching on alongſt the ſide of Danubius, until he came within the ſight of Bulgaria, he there at a place called Cobis, over againſt Sinderovia, paſſed over Danubius with his Army, which was now grown very great; and ſo marched directly to Sophia, ſituate about ſix days march from Danubius, in the Frontiers of Bulgaria, ſo called of a moſt ſumptuous and magnificent Temple there built by Juſtinian the great Emperor. Which City being then old and ruinous, and but badly fortified, was eaſily taken; and afterward for that it was not well to be holden, was by the Kings commandment burnt, as were all the other Country Towns and Villages thereabouts, to the terror of the reſt. Marching thence, he came unto the River Morava, and there incamped; where the plain Country eaſily riſeth and falleth in manner of the Sea, when it is moved with a little Wind. Here five hundred Horſemen being ſent over the River, not ſo much to ſeek after Prey, as to view the Country, which way the Army might moſt ſafely and eaſily paſs, happened upon the Turks Scouts, of whom they took four; and underſtanding by them, that two thouſand of the Turks were coming at hand, knowing themſelves too weak to encounter them, they retired back again with all ſpeed they could, unto the River; where many of them for fear leapt headlong from the high and broken Banks, and ſo periſhed in the deep; the reſt terrified with the miſfortune of their Fellows, ſtood ſtill, doubtfully expecting what ſhould become of themſelves. Beyond the River was another Hill, upon the top whereof the King with a great number of Horſemen were hunting; whom the Turks a far off deſcrying, and doubtful to fall into ſome ambuſh, of purpoſe laid for them betwixt them and the River, without coming on further, retired. Which they that before fearfully ſtaid on the further ſide of the River, perceiving, and now encouraged by the coming of the King down to the River, followed a while after, ſo to increaſe their fear; and ſo having well feared one another, retired on both ſides worſe afraid than than hurt. The next day the King paſſed over the River, ſending out his Scouts to ſee if all were clear before him; by whom he was advertiſed, that the Turks were at hand, having placed certain Ambuſhes faſt by, expecting but a fit time to ſet upon him. Whereupon entring into Council with his beſt and moſt expert Captains, what were beſt to be done, it was reſolved upon, That Huniades the next night with ten thouſand choice Horſemen, ſhould upon the ſuddain ſet upon the Enemy, then fearing nothing leſs. Who conducted by the Eſpials, was in the firſt Watch of the Night brought very near unto them. The Moon by chance, as favouring his great attempt, did then ſhine out, ſo that he might well diſcern how the Enemy lay incamped, and which way for to charge them for his beſt advantage; which was by the ſame way they were moſt like to flie, if they ſhould be put to the worſt; unto which place he led his men, and there with a moſt hideous outcry entred the Camp, as then for moſt part buried in Sleep and Security; when as the Turks awaked with the ſuddain noiſe, as it were out of a dead ſleep, and diſmayed with the horror of the cry, began to betake them, ſome to their Weapons, ſome to their Heels. Of whom ſuch as fled, lighting upon the Enemies Troops ſtanding in their way, ran as faſt back again; the other ſcarce yet well awake, and overcome with fear, and now ſcarcely themſelves, had much ado to make themſelves ready to fight. Huniades in the mean time riding up and down amongſt his men, cheered them up, ſtill crying out and calling upon them, couragiouſly to aſſail their ſleepy, naked, and fearful Enemies, and not to let ſlip ſo fair an occaſion, and ſo notable a Victory now already in their hands. At the firſt encounter the Turks rather made a ſtir, than fought; but after that they heard that Huniades was there, as men diſmayed with his Name, they turned their Backs and fled, finding, which way ſoever they took, their Fellows half dead or wounded; yea, ſuch a confuſion was raiſed amongſt them with the greatneſs of the ſuddain fear, that thruſting together, with an inconſiderate deſire of Flight, they trod one another under foot, and thruſt themſelves one upon anothers Weapons; the greateſt part of them driven headlong, into the Thickets and other Straits, and not able in time to get out thence, were there by the victorious Enemy, fiercely purſuing of them, ſlain. All that night the fearful Turks were with great ſlaughter held in chaſe; but as ſoon as it was day, the reſt that remained of them, ran alſo the ſame fortune with their Fellows. A far greater Slaughter was there made, than a man would think that ſo few men could have made, when as but with ten thouſand Horſe, thirty thouſand Turks were in one night ſlain, and four thouſand taken, with a number of their Enſigns. Of Huniades his men were not many loſt, for the greatneſs of the Slaughter; moſt report not above five hundred, for few of them found any Enemy to reſiſt them. There was taken all the Spoil of a moſt rich Camp, the Enemy having carried with them nothing out of it. Huniades having in ſo ſhort time gained ſo notable a Victory, and inriched his Army, returned to the King in great Triumph; neither was that day more joyful unto theſe victorious Souldiers, than unto the reſt of the Army, who moſt joyfully expected their return. The King and the Deſpot hearing of the approach of Huniades from the Slaughter of the Turks, with the great applauſe and joyful acclamation of the other Legions, went to meet him three miles; and at ſuch time as at their firſt meeting Huniades was about to have lighted to have done him honour, he would in no caſe ſuffer him ſo to do, but taking him by the right Hand, joyed with him for the Victory, thanking God in the hearing of the whole Army, that he of his mercy had given him ſuch a Captain, as, without Envy, in all mens judgments was worthy to rule the Roman Empire. In brief, he ſhewed how much his Country, his Kingdom, yea the Chriſtian Common-Weal, was bound and indebted unto him, gave him his due Praiſes, exhorting all others to imitate his glory; the like honour did alſo all the reſt of the Nobility unto him. As for the Common Souldiers, they could not be ſatiſfied with beholding of him, but embracing one another, as if they would have died one in anothers Arms, welcomed their victorious Friends. So with Joy joyning their Forces together, and ſending the rich Spoil of the Enemy, with the Priſoners chained together in long ranks before them; the King and Huniades in great Triumph returned into the Camp, where they cauſed general Prayers, with Thankſgiving unto Almighty God for ſo great a Victory, to be made throughout the Army.

The Legate Julian, General of the voluntary Chriſtians, which for Devotion ſake ſerved of their own Charge, after ſo great a Victory moſt earneſtly perſwaded the King and the reſt of the great Commanders of the Army, to proſecute their good Fortune, and in God his ſo great Favour not to loiter, but dayly to march forward, and to take in the reſt of Bulgaria. Now had Huniades by his Eſpials learned, that from Sophia it was but three days journey to Philippolis, a great City of Thracia; and the like diſtance from thence to Hadrianople, the chief ſeat of the Turkiſh Tyrant, and as much more to Conſtantinople. The only difficulty was how to paſs the great and rough Mountain Hemus, which running a marvellous way in length, even unto the Euxine Sea, and mating almoſt the Skie, divideth the Countries of Bulgaria and Servia, from Macedonia and Thrace; and for the great height and roughneſs thereof, is not to be paſſed over but in two places; the one made by the great Emperor Trajan and the Romans, where as yet is to be ſeen a mighty ſtrong Gate built of great ſquare Stone, whereby the paſſage that way was opened or ſhut at the pleaſure of them that had the keeping thereof; the other near unto a little River, which the Bulgarians now call Saltiza. By either of theſe ways, if he ſhould find them open, Huniades, unto whom the King had committed both the leading and conduct of the Army, purpoſed to enter. Wherefore marching forward, they took all ſuch Towns of Bulgaria as ſtood in their way; ſome by force, ſome by compoſition; wherein was no ſmall help, the conformity of the Chriſtian Religion, the horrible Cruelty of the Turks, the great Affinity of Language, the moſt effectual means to win the Love of Strangers; for the Polonians and the Bulgarians both deſcended of the Selavonians, and uſing the ſame Language, the Polonian Horſemen came to no Town, but it preſently yielded. But being come unto the Mountain Hemus, to have entred into Thracia, the Winter weather being now very cold, they learned by their Eſpials, that the aforeſaid paſſages were both faſt ſhut up with great Stones, Timber and ſuch other like matter, ſo ſtrongly, as that they were very hardly to be forced. Wherefore Huniades leaving the ſtraiter way made by the hand of man (which beſide the former fortification at the great Gate, the Turks had in many places, with abundance of water poured down the ſteep Hill in the night, and hard frozen with the coldneſs of the Weather, made ſo ſlippery, as that it was not poſſible either for Man or Beaſt there to ſtand, or to get up that way) upon Chriſtmas Even came to the other, by which the River Saltiza runs, the which he found likewiſe ſhut. Here they met with many inconveniences; firſt, the difficulty of the paſſage, which old Amurath had (not without great reaſon) ſhut up, and there placed ſtrong Garriſons, ſo at eaſe, and without danger of Battel (ſo often by his Baſſa's unfortunately proved) to defend his Kingdom in Macedonia and Thracia, from the invaſion of the Hungarians, who now of all Nations he moſt dreaded. Beſide that, in the Army was ſuch want of all things, as that the Souldiers were ready to forſake their Enſigns, and to riſe up in a general mutiny; for the Country near unto the Mountain Hemus, riſing high, with broken Rocks, and inacceſſible places, was altogether barren; and Victuals failing in the Camp, they were glad to live with a little Wheat and Fleſh boiled together, and that ſo ſparingly, as that the Souldiers began now generally to grow weak and faint. Beſides that, the Winter was exceeding cold, and the Froſt ſo great, that many times they could not go out of their Tents to ſeek for Forrage or Water.

The Hungarians inforced with the difficulty of the paſſage of the Mountain Hemus, retire.

So that the Army enforced with Hunger and Cold, and the difficulty of the paſſage, began to retire, and had undoubtedly been diſſolved, had it not been for the often and earneſt perſwaſions of Huniades; for he daily told them, that the greateſt difficulties were paſt, that that which remained, was with their wonted Valour and Courage to be indured, whereunto nothing was high or difficult; that they ſhould forthwith come into the borders of Thracia, where they ſhould find plenty of all things; that they were now come ſo far, that if they would go back again, they ſhould in thoſe waſt Countries through which they were to paſs, find greater difficulties and dangers, than in going forward; that theſe Straits once opened, remained no more travel, but chearfully to fall to the Spoil of a moſt rich and pleaſant Country. They were not (as he ſaid) to ſtay in the midſt of their Fortunes, for that it was not always permanent, and for that the contempt of Gods favors cauſed them to be oftentimes taken from us; all that was yet done (he ſaid) was nothing, if they proceeded not further; for that whatſoever they had already won, was eaſily by the Enemy to be recovered, except that thoſe which yet remained (for that moſt part of them, as he ſaid, were ſlain, with their Houſes burnt over their Heads) were driven out of Thracia and Macedonia, and ſo quite out of Europe. So whilſt the Souldiers heard Huniades ſpeak, every man was well incouraged; but when they remembred the miſeries wherewith they were invironed, they curſed all the raſh Attempts of ambitious Princes. In the mean time News was brought by the Scouts, that the Turks were coming after them; but then began they to rejoyce, as deeming it much more honour, manfully to die in Battel, than to ſtarve with Hunger and Cold. Againſt theſe Turks was Huniades ſent with certain Troops of Horſemen; who incountring with them, eaſily inforced them with loſs to retire. Eight times he incountred them (as the Souldiers there preſent reported) and as often put them to Flight. In retiring back from the impregnable Mountain, the King with the greateſt part of the Army went before; after whom followed Huniades and the Deſpot, a good days march; when the Turks that kept the paſſage upon the Mountain, underſtanding of their return, followed them down the Hill, in good hope to be of them well revenged, before they ſhould get out of Bulgaria. Carambey the Baſſa of Romania, and Brother to Caly-Baſſa (a man of all others in greateſt Favour with Amurath, and his Brother-in-Law, as having married his Siſter) was General of this Army, and by him appointed for the keeping of theſe Straits, with expreſs charge upon no occaſion whatſoever, although it made ſhew of never ſo aſſured a Victory, to fight with the Enemy; for he thought it Victory enough, without any loſs to have kept his Enemies out of Thracia. Which the old Kings Command, Carambey for all that neglected, in good hope by a notable Victory eaſily to anſwer the contempt of that he was commanded. The Chriſtian Army deſcending down the broken Mountains, was come to a great Mountain, which the Bulgarians call Cunobiza, and part of the Mountain Hemus; at whoſe Heels followed Carambey, with his Turks, ſtill hovering over their Heads, to take them at ſome advantage; whom the Chriſtians beholding, could not by their Captains be ſtayed, but that they would many times by Companies flie forth upon them, and deſperately fight with them in places of great advantage, ſaying, That they had rather die in fight like men, than to ſtarve with Hunger and Cold. Here Carambey, being himſelf a man of great Courage, and deſirous of Honour, and by the raſhneſs of his Enemies allured to fight; and withal, beſide the advantage of the ground, perceiving himſelf to exceed his Enemies both in Strength and Number of men, could not be ſtaied, but would needs give Battel, with ſuch a deſire, as if he had been already aſſured of the Victory. Huniades and the Deſpot had before perceived, that the Turks, provoked with the braving of their men, would aſſuredly fall upon them, and were therefore much troubled with the abſence of the King, who (as is before ſaid) was gone a days march before they ſaw they could neither ſhun Battel, neither if they could have ſo done, would their deſperate Souldiers be ſtaied, for the deſire they had to fight. Yet ſeeing Carambey coming down upon them, they put themſelves (though unwillingly) in beſt order they could to receive him; perſwading their Souldiers not raſhly in fury to run upon their Enemies, as deſperate men prodigal of their Lives, but to keep their ranks, and orderly to fight, and ſo like valiant men to carry away the Victory, or to leave unto their Enemies a bloody remembrance thereof.

A great Battel betwixt Huniades and the Baſſa Carambey

Now had Carambey ſent his Horſemen down the Hill, and the Battel was begun, where both the Armies met together with great fury, and a cruel Fight was made both at the foot of the Hill, and amongſt the Hills and Vallies alſo; in which hard incounter many were ſlain, as well on the one ſide as the other. The Polonian men at Arms (whom the King but a little before had left with Huniades againſt all Events) with the Hungarian light Horſemen (of whom the Deſpot had the leading) fought ſo that day, as if they had fought for nothing more, but how honourably to die; and the Turks for a ſpace ſtood hard to it, ſo that many were there ſlain; yet at length finding themſelves hardly laid to, as by deſperate men, reſolved to ſell their Lives dear, they began to faint and to give ground; when as Carambey coming in behind them with new ſupplies, rated the cowardly, ſtaid them that were flying, and ſometime with rough Speeches, ſometime with fair perſwaſion, incouraged the wavering, and reſtored the Battel, before almoſt quite loſt. Neither did Huniades and the Deſpot leſs beſtir them, but as ſoon as they perceived the Enemy a little to faint, by and by cried out, Victory; with chearful Speech incouraging their men, ſtill calling upon them, to keep their Ranks ſtrong, and to urge their preſent good Fortune, aſſuring themſelves, that they fought againſt thoſe Infidels under the favour and protection of the Almighty; and forthwith ſent certain Companies of Footmen, who climbing up the Hill among the Buſhes, with their half Pikes and Boar-Spears panched the Turks Horſes as they paſſed by them. Theſe looſe Companies did the Turks Horſemen much harm, and here began their Battel to decline; they which were coming down, for fear of the danger retiring back again unto them that were left above for the keeping of the Straits; and the bolder ſort of them, which were come down into the Vallies, compaſſed about with the Men at Arms, hardly recovered the riſing of the Hill. Carambey in the mean time crying out behind them, one while calling back them that fled, another while relieved them that fainted, and to the uttermoſt of his power reſtoring the Battel, performed all the parts both of a valiant Souldier and worthy Captain, couragiouſly fighting himſelf in the thickeſt of his Enemies, and by his own Valour ſtaied for a time the loſt Battel. At length performing his laſt indeavour, deceived by the Snow, he fell into a Bog, where ſticking faſt with his Horſe, and not able to help himſelf, he was taken Priſoner by a common Souldier. The reſt that eſcaped out of this bloody Battel, retired themſelves unto them that were left above upon the Mountain, for the defence of the paſſage. After whom the Chriſtians followed, through the untract and rough places, until that hindred of their further purſuit by the approach of the night, and the abruptneſs of the way, they were glad to ſound a Retreat, and ſo retired unto the Camp. Many other great men were taken beſide Carambey, but many more ſlain in the Battel, and moſt of all in the Flight; few eſcaped, but ſuch as fled back again up into the Mountains. In the Retreat, Huniades ſeeing ſo gallant a man as was Carambey (though to him altogether unknown) unworthily bound, and led Priſoner by a common Souldier, asked the Souldier, if he would ſell his Priſoner? who ſaid, he would; and asked for him ten Ducats, (a poor price for ſo great a man;) unto whom Huniades commanded to be given four hundred, and ſo ſent him to his Tent, comforting of him up with chearful words, and willing that he ſhould be well uſed. The Deſpot the ſame Night coming to Huniades his Tent, to confer with him about the remainder of the War, and ſeeing ſo brave a man ſtanding among the reſt by the fire ſide, began to talk with him in the Turkiſh Language, whereof he had ſome knowledge, by reaſon of the nearneſs of the Nation, and ſuch matters as he had ſometime to do with them; and having ſome gueſs by his talk, what he was, and pitying his Eſtate, asked Huniades, how he would ranſome him? who ſaid, that he coſt him four hundred Ducats but that he valued him at forty thouſand; which the Deſpot offered to pay him. Thus by the ſtrange change of Fortune, was Carambey, of late ſo great a Commander, and ſo near allied unto the great Turk, valued and prized twice in one day by his Enemies, as a mirror of the uncertainty of Worldly Bliſs and Felicity. The Polonians report ſomewhat otherwiſe of this Battel; as that Uladiſlaus ſhould himſelf therein be preſent, and the chief that therein commanded; howbeit the Hungarian Writers, whoſe credit herein we follow, report it as before, not to have been fought under the good Fortune of the King then abſent, but under the leading of Huniades and the Deſpot.

Out of this Battel (or as ſome others report, a little before, out of the Battel of Morava) fled the great Captain George Caſtriot, otherwiſe of the Turks called Scanderbeg, now ſeeking to deliver both himſelf, and his Native Country of Epirus, out of the Thraldom of the Turks, as preſently after he did; whoſe unwonted Flight not a little terrified the reſt of the Turks Army, and much furthered the Chriſtians Victory, whoſe proceedings he always ſecretly favoured; having (as it was thought) ſecret intelligence with the great Captain Huniades, who not without inſtructions from him (as ſome ſay) gave that great overthrow unto the Turks at Morava. But of him and his worthy Acts done for the deliverance and defence of his Country, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

Shortly after this great overthrow and diſcomfiture of the Turks, the two great Captains, Huniades and the Deſpot, together with the King, conſulted for the removing of the Turks Gariſons, left above for the keeping of the ſtrait paſſages of the Mountain, and the proſecution of the War. Which Uladiſlaus (conſidering the difficulty of the matter, and his Souldiers neceſſity) thought it not good further to proſecute, but forthwith to return. But Huniades and the Deſpot, the one thirſting after Honour, and the other in no leſs hope, by the good ſucceſs of this War, to recover again his loſt Kingdom, ſaid, That the Turks were in any caſe to be removed, the paſſage opened, and the ſparks that yet remained, for fear of raiſing a greater Fire, extinguiſhed; oppoſing againſt the difficulty by the King alledged, the invincible Courage of his Souldiers, whereunto (they ſaid) nothing was impoſſible or difficult. To which opinion the King alſo (leſt he ſhould ſeem to diſtruſt the Valour of his Captains or Souldiers) eaſily yielded, and ſo commanded on Gods name to ſet forward. The firſt that mounted the Hill was the Kings Battalion, which by the roughneſs and abruptneſs of the Mountain hindered, oftentimes ſtaid. But Huniades ſtill carried with an earneſt deſire to proſecute the Victory, and leaving nothing unattempted, in ſearching about found a crooked turning way, whereby he with his men, more eaſily and readily got up to the top of the Mountain, even with their Enemies, undeſcried or moleſted, by reaſon of the broken covert of the place; from whence they were in good hope eaſily to have come unto their Enemies. But being come up to the place they deſired, they found ſuch a deep and wide gaping of the Rock betwixt them and the Enemy, as was neither to be paſſed, or filled up; yet being come very near, they attempted by Croſs-Bow ſhot, and great Stones caſt out of Slings, and other ſuch Engins, to have removed the Turks from their places; who were therewith, and with their unexpected approach, at the firſt ſo greatly both anoyed and dicomfited, that they were almoſt at the point to have forſaken the paſſage, had not Alis Beg (but the night before choſen for their General inſtead of Carambey) incouraged them and taught them how by ſhrouding themſelves under the broken Rocks and Parapets with tumultuary labour caſt up, to ſave themſelves from the ſhot of their Enemies. In the mean time alſo Huniades, by another more high and ſteep way, whereby the Enemy was alſo to be approached, had ſent up other Companies of Souldiers, who fighting at too much diſadvantage, were by the Turks eaſily rejected. So at length, ſeeing the vain attempt given by himſelf upon the top of the Hill; and the deſperate danger of the others in climbing the inacceſſible Mountain, where one might keep down down an hundred, deſpairing to inforce the Enemy, he by the Kings Command cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, and ſo again retired down the Mountain, to the great rejoycing of the Turks. The next day the Winter cold raging, and wants in the Army ſtill more and more increaſing, the King with the reſt of the great Commanders entred into conſultation for the haſtening of their return out of that rough and barren Country, into places of greater plenty, before the Army were brought into any greater extremity. Whereunto Huniades (giving place unto neceſſity, which always ſuffereth not to be regarded that is ſeemly) now eaſily yielded; only the Deſpot ſpake againſt it, blaming them, that having taken the General, and put their Enemies to Flight, and Victory now as it were in their hands, they would not proſecute the ſmall remainder of the War, but cowardly turn their Backs unto their vanquiſhed Enemies; promiſing that he himſelf would find Mony enough for the providing of all things needful for the relief of the Army. So ſaid the Popes Legate alſo. But foraſmuch as the Wants in the Army were great, and the Souldiers preſently pinched with Hunger and Cold, they could with no hope of any profit, were it never ſo great, be perſwaded to ſtay; openly crying out, that it was not their Captains and Lieutenants, which wanted nothing, but them the poor Souldiers that ſtarved for hunger; as for the Deſpot, that he in hope of recovering his Kingdom, perſwaded things impoſſible, and no way to be performed; neither to be any thing moved with the death of their Men or Cattel. Need (they ſaid) could not be vanquiſhed; but that when Winter was paſt, they would willingly return again unto the ſacred War. In the mean time, Winter raging, and Hunger commanding, let us give over (ſaid they) and depart into more fruitful places, there to refreſh our Bodies, ſpent with Labour, Cold and Hunger. For which reaſons, the King ſending before his Baggage, retired again by the ſame way he came. Which the Turks from above beholding, and ſtrengthned with new Supplies, followed after them, as after men that had fled; oftentimes aſſailing them in the Rereward, and ſetting upon them ſometimes on the one ſide, ſometimes on the other, with often skirmiſhes both did and received much harm. Whoſe manner of Fight was, to retire when they were themſelves charged, and preſently by great Troops to charge again their Enemies, their Backs once turned to them, and ſo troubled the Army, that it was conſtrained oftentimes to ſtay; beſides that, loded with the rich Spoil of the Enemy, and much Baggage, it could not of it ſelf make any great haſt. Now was he by the way come into a great thick Wood, full of deep Bogs and Water-courſes, hard to be paſſed through; where the reſt of the Army going before, in the Rereward, at the entrance of the Wood were left certain ſtrong Companies of Men at Arms, as a Wall againſt the purſuing Enemy; whom the Turks with their ready light Horſemen fiercely charged; where betwixt them, in the Wood was fought a great Fight, and a great Tumult raiſed; unto the noiſe whereof, they which marched before haſtily returning, in skirmiſhing, many of them fell into thoſe deep Bogs and queachy Places, out of which they could hardly rid themſelves again. Beſides that, there were many crooked and troubleſome turnings and windings, with ſuddain deſcents, ſo ſteep, as that in going down the ſame, their Horſes came tumbling heels over head, and there lay overthrown together with their Riders in ſuch ſort, as that to avoid theſe difficulties, they were oftentimes inforced to fight on foot. In which troubleſome skirmiſh about fourſcore Men at Arms were loſt; but of the Turks, beſide them which were ſlain, were taken an hundred and ſeventy, all whom Huniades cauſed preſently to be ſlain. In this Wood the Chriſtians were more troubled with the difficulties of the place, than the Enemies Aſſaults. Wherefore Wants dayly more and more increaſing in the Army, which by reaſon of the multitude of their Carriages, abundance of their Baggage, and often Aſſaults of the Turks, was able to make no way; the King for fear his Army ſhould in ſo long and ſlow march through thoſe troubleſome and barren Countries, be conſumed with Hunger and other Wants, cauſed all the Carriages and Baggage to be brought into the midſt of the Army, and of it, all ſuch things as ſerved rather for burthen than uſe, to be there burnt; and the Arms as well of ſuch Souldiers as he had there loſt, as of the Enemy, to be buried in the ground; and all the weak Beaſts that ſerved for burthen, to be killed. So the Army well diſcharged of ſuch unprofitable burthens, marched much more ſpeedily, neither was ſo much ſubject unto the Aſſaults of the Turks, as before. And ſo at length by long Journies, Uladiſlaus with his Army arrived at Belgrade, where he was of his Subjects honourably received. And having there ſtaid certain days, and well refreſhed his Army, departing thence, and paſſing the River Savus, came to the Royal City Buda, where he was of all his Subjects joyfully received alſo; the Legate and Huniades going on his right Hand, and the Deſpot on the left; after whom followed other Colonels, Captains, and Lieutenants with their Companies; who at their firſt meeting with the Citizens, more than a mile out of the City, in token of their mutual Joy, gave together ſuch joyful acclamations and outcries, as that the Heavens ſeemed to reſound, and the Earth to ſhake with the noiſe thereof. Before the King, at his coming unto the City, went a long Company of the notable Turks Captives; and next before him, Carambey, bound in Chains; upon whom all mens Eyes were fixed. With them were alſo carried the Enemies Enſigns, and ſuch Spoils as had been ſaved. Behind the King came Huniades in a triumphant Robe, in the midſt betwixt the Legate on the right Hand, and the Deſpot on the left, as he that next unto the King had beſt deſerved the Honour of the Triumph. Next unto them followed the devout Chriſtians, that for the Zeal of Religion had moſt honourably of their own Charges voluntarily ſerved in thoſe Wars; and on both ſides of them the Civil Magiſtrates and beſt of the Citizens; behind them came the reſt of the Legions, and about them both upon the right Hand and the left, the promiſcuous common People, doubling and redoubling the Praiſes of the King, and Huniades. Before all theſe went the Prelates and Prieſts in ſolemn Proceſſion, ſinging Hymns and Pſalms of Thankſgiving unto Almighty God. Uladiſlaus coming to the Gate of the City, acknowledging God to have been the Author of ſo great a Victory, alighting from his Horſe, on foot went firſt unto the Cathedral Church of our Lady; and there giving moſt hearty Thanks unto Almighty God, hanged up the Enemies Enſigns, and part of the Spoil, in perpetual remembrance of ſo notable a Victory; which he afterward cauſed to be moſt lively depainted in a fair Table of moſt curious work, and there in the ſame Church to be hanged up; as were alſo the Arms of all the notable Chriſtians that ſerved in that moſt famous Expedition, which there long time after remained. Which Solemnities ended, he went went to his Palace in his Caſtle, and there having given to every man, but eſpecially to Huniades, his due Commendation, gave them leave to depart. Thus the Hungarians, with whom alſo the Polonians in moſt part agree, report of this notable Expedition of their King Uladiſlaus; howbeit the Turks (notable diſſemblers of their own Loſſes) confeſſing the great Overthrow, call the Baſſa ſo overthrown, not by the name of Carambey, but of Caſſanes; and the noble Priſoner that was taken, by the name of Mechmet Beg, Sanzack of Ancyra, Amurath his Son in law, and Brother to Cali-Baſſa, Amurath his great Counſellor, of ſome called Carambey after the name of his Father.

Scanderbeg wiſely diſſembleth his deſire for the delivery of himſelf and his Country.

Out of this late ſlaughter of the Turks, where Carambey was taken, ſcaped that valiant Prince and famous Warrior George Caſtriot (of the Turks called Scanderbeg) as is before declared; whoſe noble mind had long time deſired to break out of the golden Fetters of the Turkiſh Thraldom, and to be revenged of the intollerable Injury by Amurath done to his Country, his Parents, his Brethren, and himſelf. Although he had always moſt warily diſſembled the ſame, for fear of the old Tyrant; being oftentimes ſolicited and animated thereunto by ſecret Letters and Meſſengers from his Friends in Epirus, knowing right well that the leaſt fortune thereof had been unto him preſent death. But finding no fit means for the accompliſhment thereof, wiſely diſſembled the ſame, with all the ſhews of Love and Loyalty to Amurath that might be; until that now in this great Overthrow of the Turks Army, under the leading of Carambey, and in ſo great a confuſion, he took occaſion to put in practiſe what he had long before in his deep conceit plotted, for the delivery both of himſelf and his Country from the Turkiſh Bondage and Slavery. At which time Scanderbeg (for ſo from henceforth we call him) having a little before imparted the matter unto ſome of his truſty Friends and Country-men, no leſs deſirous of liberty than himſelf, but eſpecially unto his Nephew Ameſa, the Son of his Brother Repoſius, a young man of great courage (in great confuſion of the Turkiſh Army, when every man was glad to ſhift for himſelf) had ever in his flight a vigilant eye upon the Baſſaes Principal Secretary; whom accompanied with a few Turks, he with his Nephew Ameſa, and other of his faithful Friends cloſely followed, as he fled from the ſlaughter; but when he had got the Secretary with his few Followers in place moſt convenient for his purpoſe, he ſet upon the Turks and ſlew them every one; and carrying the Secretary away with him faſt bound, when he had brought him whither he thought good, with great Threats compelled him (ſore againſt his will) to write counterfeit Letters, as from the Baſſa his Maſter, unto the Governor of Croia, commanding him in Amuraths name, Forthwith to deliver unto Scanderbeg, the new choſen Governor, the Charge of the City with the Garriſon there; cunningly enterlacing many other things in the ſame Letters, whereby the matter might ſeem more probable. Which Letters ſo extorted, he preſently ſlew the Secretary, and as many more of the Turks as came in his way, of purpoſe that his doings might be the longer kept from the knowledge of Amurath, who not hearing what was become of him, might reaſonably conjecture that he was ſlain by the Hungarians among the reſt of the Turks.

Whilſt the fame of this great Overthrow is going to Hadrianople, and there filleth the Turks Court with ſorrow and heavineſs, in the mean time Scanderbeg having with him three thouſand Epirot Souldiers which followed him out of the battel, as men deſirous rather to fight for the liberty of themſelves and of their Country, than in the quarrel of the Turk, was with incredible celerity come into the upper Country of Dibra, in the Borders of Epirus, about ſeventy miles from Croia; into which Country he was moſt joyfully received, where he ſtayed but one day, and choſe a few of thoſe three hundred which he brought with him, to wait upon him when he went to Croia, as if they had been his domeſtical Servants; the reſt, with other three hundred luſty Souldiers, which were then come unto him out of Dibra, he appointed to be led by ſecret by-ways through the Woods and Mountains by perfect Guids, until they came ſo nigh Croia as was poſſible for them to come, unperceived; and there to ſtay until he might find opportunity to convey them into the City to oppreſs the Turkiſh Garriſon. So he with a ſmall Company of his Followers, as if they had been his private Retinue, took the way towards Croia. But when he began to draw near to the City, he ſent Ameſa before with two Servitors attending upon him, as if he had been his Secretary, to certifie the Governor of his coming. This young Gentleman, as he was of a moſt ſharp wit, and well ſpoken, ſo had he framed his Countenance and Attire, that he ſeemed to be a natural Turk; who aſſoon as he was come into the City, he went unto the Governor, whom after he had ſaluted according to the Turkiſh manner, he delivered his Meſſage as from Scanderbeg his Maſter, with ſo good Grace, and words ſo well placed, that all he ſaid was verily believed for truth. But when Scanderbeg himſelf came, and had delivered the great Commanders Letters, the Governor made no further queſtion of the matter, but preſently delivered unto him the Government of the City, and the next day departed out of Croia with all his Houſhold towards Hadrianople. Scanderbeg having by this policy got the Government of the chief City of Epirus, the night following found means in the dead time of the night, to receive into the City the Souldiers of Dibra, who were by this time come, according as he had before appointed; moſt part of them he placed in moſt convenient places of the City, and for the ſpeedy ſuppreſſion of the Turkiſh Garriſon, he with the reſt, firſt ſet upon the Turks which kept the Watch upon the Wall, and ſlew them; and afterwards breaking into their private houſes, ſlew many of them in their Beds; the Chriſtian Citizens alſo taking up Arms at the ſame time, helped to increaſe the ſlaughter of the Turks, ſo that in the ſpace of a few hours, there was none of the Turkiſh Garriſon left alive, except ſome few, which were content to forſake their Mahometan Superſtition, and to become Chriſtians. Many of the Turks might ſo have ſaved their lives, and would not, chuſing rather to die, and (as it is reported) alſo to kill themſelves, than to forſake their damnable Superſtition; ſo ſmall is the regard of life unto reſolute Minds, in what quarrel ſoever.

The City of Croia being thus happily by Scanderbeg recovered, wherein appeared both the greateſt difficulty, and hope of his good or bad Succeſs in ſo great an Attempt, he preſently ſent Ameſa back again into Dibra, and other ſpeedy Meſſengers likewiſe into all the parts of Epirus, to diſperſe the News, and to ſtir up the people to take up Arms for the recovery of their loſt Liberty; but flying Fame, the ſpeedy Poſt, had prevented the Meſſengers by him ſent, and already filled every corner of Epirus with report of Scanderbeg his coming, and of all that was done at Croia. And the oppreſſed Epirots which had long wiſhed to ſee that happy day, were now up in Arms in every place, wanting nothing but Leaders, whoſe coming although they greatly deſired, yet they ſtayed not thereupon, but running together by heaps (as the manner of the common people is in all great Tumults) they ſet upon the Turks Garriſons which lay abroad in the Country, and ſlew moſt part of them; whereby it came to paſs, that no Turk could ſtir in the Country, but that he was ſnatched up and ſlain, ſo that in few days there was not a Turk to be found in Epirus, but ſuch as lay in Garriſons in ſtrong Towns. In this fury of the people, the Governor of Croia, with all his Retinue, was by the Country people by the way as he went, ſet upon and ſlain, and all his Goods taken as a Prey.

When Scanderbeg had thus recovered Croia, and ſcoured the Countrey, yet to remove the Garriſons, which Amurath had put in every ſtrong City, was thought to be a matter of great importance, and more difficulty. For which purpoſe he commanded thoſe whom he had appointed for Captains, ſpeedily to repair unto Croia with all the Power they could make. At which time alſo, divers Noblemen his nigh Kinſmen, reſorted to him with their Followers; ſo that within a few days, he had together at Croia twelve thouſand Souldiers well appointed. With this Army he marched from Croia to Petrella, a ſtrong City 25 miles diſtant from Croia, and encamped before it. This City is ſtrongly ſituate upon the top of a ſteep rocky Mountain, as all the reſt of the Cities of Epirus be, and was by the Turks well furniſhed with Men, Munition, and other things needful; yet Scanderbeg was in good hope that the Turkiſh Garriſon there, terrified with the fortune of the Garriſon of Croia, and the ſlaughter of the Turks in the Country round about, would be glad to hearken unto reaſonable Conditions. Which to make proof of, aſſoon as he was encamped, he ſent one of thoſe Souldiers which had followed him out of Hungary (a faithful and wiſe Fellow) unto Petrella, to offer unto the Souldiers, That if they would yield up the City, it ſhould be at their choice, either to continue in Service with Scanderbeg, with whom they ſhould find moſt bountiful Entertainment, or elſe to depart in ſafety with Bag and Baggage at their pleaſure, with an honourable Reward to be divided among them. The ſubtil Meſſenger coming thither, and framing his Tale according to the preſent occaſion, and neceſſity of the time, firſt declared unto them, how that Amurath of late vanquiſhed by the Hungarians in a great Battel, and looking every day to be ſet upon by divers other Chriſtian Princes, was ſo buſied that he had no leiſure to look into Epirus, or to ſend them any Relief; after that, he in the name of Scanderbeg offered them the Conditions before rehearſed, ſetting the ſame forth with many great words; willing them oftentimes by the way, to conſider the dreadful miſery that but the other day befel to the Garriſon at Croia, and other their Fellows abroad in the Country, whoſe dead bodies as then lay in every Corner of Epirus for a prey to the hungry Dogs and greedy Wolves; which thing was eaſily believed of them of the Garriſon, for that divers of the Turks lately fled out of the Country into the City, had themſelves ſeen the ſame to be true. The Governor having a little conſidered of the matter, was content to give up the City, upon condition that he with the Souldiers might in ſafety depart with ſuch things as they had; not covenanting upon any further Reward, becauſe it ſhould not be ſaid that he had ſold the City. Which when Scanderbeg had faithfully promiſed to perform, the Turkiſh Governor coming forth with all his Garriſon, yielded up the City; and Scanderbeg mindful of his promiſe, gave unto them both Meat and Money, and ſent them with a ſufficient Convoy of Horſemen in ſafety out of Epirus.

Petrella yielded unto Scanderbeg.

When Scanderbeg had thus gained Petrella, he placed therein a convenient Garriſon, and ſet all things in order as he thought good; but ſuffered none to enter into the City, more than the appointed Garriſon, although it was then very cold and froſty Weather. This done, he preſently raiſed his Camp, and following his good fortune, marched towards Petra-Alba in ſuch haſt, as if the City had been running away from him; well knowing, that though Time be evermore precious, yet never more than in martial affairs, wherein the leaſt moment is oftentimes of ſuch power as to effect or fruſtrate mens greateſt deſigns. Petra-Alba is a City in the Country of Æmathia, diſtant from Petrella three miles, ſtrongly ſituate upon the top of a Mountain, near unto the River Æmathus. Scanderbeg had ſcarcely well encamped himſelf before this City, but that the Governor thereof, terrified with the fortune of Croia, and Petrella, offered to deliver up the City, on the ſame Conditions that were granted at Petrella; which being agreed upon, the City was forthwith delivered, and the Conditions by Scanderbeg faithfully performed.

Petra-Alba yielded.

Petra-Alba being thus taken, and all things ſet in order, Scanderbeg carried with the courſe of his Victory, without delay came to Stelluſa, which is alſo a ſtrong City of Æmathia, fifty miles diſtant from Croia, pleaſantly (as it were of purpoſe) built upon the top of an high Hill, ſtanding in the midſt of a pleaſant and fruitful Valley, with great Plains round about it. There Scanderbeg encamped a little before the going down of the Sun, and reſted that night. In the morning he ſent a Meſſenger to the City, with like conditions as were accepted at Petrella and Petra-Alba; which moſt part of the Garriſon-Souldiers of the Turks would gladly have accepted, but that Deſdrot the Governor of the City, with ſome few others earneſtly withſtood the reſt; whereupon a great Contention aroſe amongſt the Garriſon Souldiers. But the greater part deſirous to yield up the City, when they could by no means perſwade the Governor and thoſe few which took his part, to yield to their deſires, they violently ſet upon him, and delivered him with the reſt to Scanderbeg, faſt bound, and ſo yielded up the City. For which Fact, fearing to return to Amurath, ſome of them remained with Scanderbeg, and afterwards became Chriſtians; the reſt were either honeſtly provided for, or elſe well rewarded and ſuffered to depart whether they would. All the other weaker places of Epirus wherein any of the Turkiſh Garriſons lay, hearing that the ſtrongeſt Cities were already delivered unto Scanderbeg, in ſhort time yielded themſelves upon like conditions; only Sfetigrade (otherwiſe called the holy City) remained in the poſſeſſion of the Turks; which City is placed in the upper Country of Dibra, in the Frontiers of Epirus, upon the top of an high and ſteep Hill, as if it were an Eagles neſt. Unto this City came Scanderbeg with all his Army; and having placed his Tents, he began firſt to aſſay if he could gain it by Compoſition, as he had done the reſt; and the rather to move them by the examples of others, he cauſed his Embaſſadors to declare unto them all that had happened at Croia, Petrella, Petra-Alba, and Stelluſa, ſpecially how he had uſed the Garriſon riſon of Stelluſa, which yielded unto him, with all bounty and courteſie; and how that on the contrary part he had the Governor in bands, with all his wilful Partakers, whom they ſhould preſently ſee executed before their faces, if they forthwith delivered not the City. This Meſſage troubled the minds of all the Garriſon, but eſpecially of the Governor, ſeeing before his eyes in the woful example of another man, what might by and by happen unto himſelf. Wherefore fearing to deliver his own opinion, and to give anſwer unto the Embaſſador, for offending the inconſtant multitude and unknown minds of the people, he firſt entertained the Embaſſadors honourably, and afterwards turning himſelf unto the Citizens and Souldiers, ſaid unto them, Worthy men and moſt faithful Souldiers, what is your pleaſure, or what ſhall we anſwer to theſe our Enemies demands? Then one of the Souldiers that ſtood by (a rough bold ſpirited Fellow) unwilling for his own part to give up the City, and deeming the Governor to be of the ſame mind, in that he had termed them worthy and faithful, and Scanderbeg by the name of an Enemy, drawing out his Sword, and with his right hand ſhaking it on high, anſwered:

A notable Speech of a common Souldier to the reſt of his fellows for the holding out of the City againſt Scanderbeg.

Moſt valiant Governor, this ſame and the like, ſhall make anſwer for us. Nothing was to leſs purpoſe, than with premeditated words to ſeek to terrifie valiant minds, firſt with the divers Fortune of Croia, and then of Stelluſa; for as the faces and countenances of men are divers, ſo alſo are their minds and diſpoſitions. Every man wiſely directeth his own actions, according to his own proper humor, and by the ſame plays the Fool or Bedlam. We preſcribe no Laws to them of Petrella, nor to them of Stelluſa, neither let them preſcribe any unto us. Let never ſo baſe examples of cowardly Slaves ever enter into the thoughts of courageous men; brave minds diſdain to imitate other men in their honeſt Actions, much leſs in their Cowardiſe. And why? for every man liveth after his own faſhion. Wherefore let Scanderbeg proceed, let him kill the Governor of Stelluſa before our faces, let him ſacrifice our fellow Souldiers, do you therefore think that we ſhall die in their Bodies? ſhall our living ſpirits be there extinguiſhed? ſhall our blood there be ſpilt? But O happy Bodies, O ghoſts of men ever to be revenced, which in worthy defence of your Liberty and Faith have indifferently contemned Gold, Silver, Death, and Torture, and whatſoever elſe miſerable Worldlings hold dear or diſmal! Wherefore carry thou back again unto thy Maſter this Anſwer from a Common Souldier, If he ſeek to impoſe theſe conditions upon us, let him once more bare that arm of his, which men of courage fear not ſo much as he thinketh. He may peradventure inforce us to theſe conditions of his, if God forſake us; but aſſuredly perſwade us unto them, ſhall be never. And yet for all that, your Maſter Scanderbeg is not the man we have long ſince heard him reported to be, of an honourable mind, eaſie to forgive, and ſuch a one as will indifferently judge betwixt the Enemy and himſelf; for why then doth he hold in bonds the Governor of Stelluſa, for that he freely, juſtly, and honourably ſtood in defence of his King, his Faith and Liberty? Why doth he threaten him with death, whereas he hath not deſerved the ſame, although he hath reſolutely offered himſelf thereunto for defence of his liberty?

All they which were preſent, liſtned with great attention to the Souldiers Speech, neither was he interrupted by any, until he had ſaid what he would. Then the Souldiers thronging about him, and beating their Swords and Targets together, withall gave a great ſhout, in token that they all approved his Speech for anſwer. So the Governor encouraged with the chearfulneſs of his Souldiers, returned the Embaſſador without other Anſwer than that of the Common Souldiers, and preſently appointed every man to his Charge, and with great carefulneſs ordered all things for the better defence of the City. But when Scanderbeg had heard the Anſwer that was ſent him from the City, delivered by the mouth of a Common Souldier, he ſmiled thereat, and ſaid, He is undoubtedly a valiant Souldier; if his Deeds be anſwerable to his Speeches; but if my force fail me not, I will make him happy amongſt the happy ghoſts of them of Stelluſa; and by and by commanded the Governor of Stelluſa, with the other Captives, to be brought before him, and there cauſed ſome of them which were content voluntarily to forſake their Mahometan Superſtition, to be preſently baptized, to the great grief of the other Turks. Deſdrot the Governor with the reſt, to the terrour of the Defendants, were in their ſight put to death; whereupon the Garriſon-Souldiers with great Indignation gave a ſhout from the Wall, and bitterly railed upon the Chriſtians.

Scanderbeg conſidering the ſtrength of the City, with the time of the year, unfit for Souldiers to keep the Field, for Winter was now grown on, left Moſes Golemus, a moſt valiant Captain, with a Garriſon of three thouſand Souldiers, to keep in the Turks Garriſon at Sfetigrade, and to defend the Borders of Epirus, until he might at more convenient time himſelf return again to the Siege; and ſo with the reſt of his Army repaired to Croia, when he had in the ſpace of little more than one month, to his immortal Praiſe, recovered his Kingdom, and driven the Turks out of every corner of Epirus, excepting only Sfetigrade; which City alſo not long after was by compoſition delivered unto him. During all this time, from his firſt coming into Epirus, he never ſlept above two hours in a night, but with reſtleſs labour proſecuted his affairs. He ever fought againſt the Turks with his Arm bare, and that with ſuch fierceneſs, that the blood did oftentimes burſt out of his lips. It is written, that he with his own hand ſlew three thouſand Turks in the time of his Wars againſt them. But of his great and worthy Victories obtained againſt the two mighty Turkiſh Kings, Amurath, and Mahomet his Son, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in due time and place.

After that Scanderbeg had thus by great force and policy wrung his Inheritance out of Amuraths hands, and ſcoured the Turks out of every corner of Epirus; he proceeded further, and overran part of Macedonia, making ſundry Incurſions into the heart of that Country, being then in the Turks poſſeſſion; whereby he ſo enriched his Souldiers, that they deſired of him no better pay. Which was ſo uſual a thing with this reſtleſs Prince, as that it began to grow into a Proverb in moſt Princes Courts, That the ſpoil of Amurath his Dominions, was Scanderbegs Revenues. Complaint hereof came daily to Amuraths Court, which the crafty aged Sire (being then troubled with the Hungarian Wars) ſeemed at the firſt to make no great account of, but as of that he could eaſily and at his pleaſure remedy; although he was therewith inwardly grieved at the heart. But when the certain report of one miſchief as it were in the neck of another, continually ſounded in his ears, and that he ſaw no end to be expected of theſe miſeries, he ſent Alis Baſſa, one of his greateſt men of War, with an Army of forty thouſand ſelect Souldiers, at once to ſubdue the Country of Epirus, and to bring it again under his Obeiſance. The ſetting forth of this great Army, under the Conduct of ſo famous a Captain, repleniſhed the minds of the Turks with ſuch an aſſured hope of Victory, that a man would have thought Scanderbeg had been already taken, and now brought to execution; yea the Common Souldiers before their ſetting forth, were oftentimes at vain contention for the diviſion of the ſpoil they were never like to have: So ready are men to promiſe Wonders to themſelves, whilſt they confer but with their own deſires. And on the other ſide, Fame, the forerunner of great attempts, had filled all the ſmall Country of Epirus, with great terror and fear of Alis Baſſaes coming. The Country-men with their Familes fled into the ſtrong Cities, and the Citizens within their Walls fell to fortifying the ſame, and kept continual Watch and Ward, as if the Enemy had even then lien faſt by them; the aged Men and Women commended themſelves and all theirs firſt to God by prayers, and then to the courage of the luſty Souldiers with tears, as in caſe of extream peril and danger. Only Scanderbeg was nothing moved either with the terrible report of the Baſſaes coming, or the vain fear of his Subjects; but always kept the ſame chearfulneſs both of countenance and ſpeech, as he was wont, being well acquainted with the tumult of the Turkiſh Wars, and having (as was ſuppoſed) certain Intelligence before from his ſecret Friends in the Turks Court, of all Amuraths deſigns. So that having ſet all things in order for the ſafety of his Country, he began to levy an Army at Croia; at which time moſt part of his Subjects of Epirus, which were able to bear Arms, repaired unto him; the Confederate Chriſtian Princes alſo, his Neighbours, and for moſt part his Kinſmen, ſent to him great Supplies; beſide other devout and War-like minded Chriſtians, which voluntarily reſorted unto him from far, in great numbers. Out of which multitude of people he choſe only 8000 Horſemen and ſeven thouſand Foot, when as he might have raiſed a far greater Army; and placing ſome few in Garriſons in the frontier Cities where he thought moſt convenient, all the reſt he ſent home again to their dwellings. At which his confidence, his Friends, yea and his Enemies alſo much marvelled, that when he might have had ſo many, he would take the field with ſo few; with which ſmall Army of fifteen thouſand, he marched from Croia, fourſcore miles to Dibra; where hearing by his Eſpials, of the approach of his Enemies, after he had with chearful Speech encouraged his Souldiers, he encamped with his Army in the lower Country of Dibra, near unto a Wood ſide, right in the way where the Baſſa muſt needs paſs. In which Wood, he placed Gnee Muſachee, and Ameſa in ambuſh with three thouſand men; commanding them to ſtand cloſe, until they ſaw he had throughly joyned battel with the Baſſa, and then with all their Force to break forth upon his rereward. The Baſſa marching forward, came and encamped near unto Scanderbeg, a little before the going down of the Sun, and there reſted that night, making great ſhew of mirth and joy, with great fires in every corner of the Camp, as the Turkiſh manner of encamping is. Whereas in Scanderbegs Camp, all things were ſilent, and no ſhew of any fire at all; for ſo Scanderbeg had commanded; which made the Turks the more careleſs, deeming thereby the Chriſtians as good as already diſcouraged. The next morning Scanderbeg ranged his Army in order of battel, placing Tanuſius in the left Wing, with fifteen hundred Horſemen, and as many Foot; and Moſes in the right with like number; and leading the main battel himſelf, the rereward was committed to Uranacontes a man renowned in thoſe days, both for his gravity in Counſel, and for his valour in Arms, fit to command or be commanded; but afterwards, amongſt the reſt moſt famous, for the worthy defending of Croia againſt Amurath, being then there himſelf in Perſon. Alis Baſſa contemning the ſmall number of Scanderbegs Army, ſeeing nothing therein to be feared more than the good order thereof, gave the firſt charge with a ſmall Troop of Horſemen; who at the firſt encounter retired, as if they had fled, of purpoſe that the Chriſtians haſtily purſuing their untimely hope, might diſorder their battel, and ſo give occaſion to their own overthrow. But by the commandment of Scanderbeg (who eaſily perceived the Baſſaes meaning) their dangerous forwardneſs was warily wayed, and all with ſafety kept in good order. So both Armies coming on, the Wings began the battel afreſh, and Scanderbeg with great courage bringing on his main Battel in the face of the Baſſa, valiantly charged him. But by that time that the Battels were throughly joyned, Muſachee and Ameſa ſuddenly iſſued out of the Wood, and fiercely ſet upon the rereward of the Turks Army, where they made great ſlaughter, and forced many of the Turks for fear to fly. Thus was the Baſſaes great Army driven to fight both before and behind, being hardly beſet and laid unto with a ſmall number. The Baſſa had placed his beſt Souldiers neareſt unto himſelf in the main Battel, as his moſt aſſured ſtrength and laſt refuge; theſe valiant men ſtood faſt, and renewed the battel, before almoſt loſt. And here Scanderbegs fortune was even at a ſtand; until that the well adviſed and valiant Captain Uranacontes having received the wearied Souldiers into the rereward, and ſetting all things there in ſafety, accompanied with certain Troops of freſh Souldiers which he brought out of the rereward, brake through the Baſſaes Army with ſuch ſlaughter of the Turks, that he made way for Scanderbeg and all the reſt of his Army. The Turks diſcomfited with the invincible courage of theſe old Souldiers, and the ſlaughter of their Fellows, which lay by heaps wallowing in their own blood, betook themſelves to flight; whom the Chriſtians fiercely purſued, and ſlew of them two and twenty thouſand; at which time were alſo two thouſand others taken Priſoners, with four and twenty of the Turks Enſigns; whereas of the Chriſtians were ſlain not paſt an hundred and twenty. The Enemies Tents with all their Carriages, were at the ſame time taken alſo. After this great Victory, when Scanderbeg had made all his ſeven thouſand Footmen, Horſemen, by giving unto them the Horſes of the ſlain Turks, he brake into the Enemies Country, and entred far into Macedonia, where he filled the deſires of his Souldiers with the wealth and ſpoil thereof, ſparing nothing that Fire and Sword could devour; and ſo with Victory returned to Croia, where he was of his Subjects joyfully received. Alis Baſſa with the remainder of his diſcomfited Army, returned to Hadrianople, and there by Amurath was hardly charged of cowardiſe and want of diſcretion, for that he had loſt ſo puiſſant an Army to ſo weak an Enemy. Whereof when he had cleared himſelf by the modeſt rehearſal of his former Victories, and the teſtimony of all the other Captains preſent with him in that battel, he was pardoned, and ſo again received into favour, and that great Overthrow imputed to the chance of War.

and now from Scanderbeg, and ſeeing himſelf elſewhere beſet with ſo many Miſchiefs, as that he could not tell which way to turn himſelf; tormented with Deſpair, and deſire of Revenge, whereof he ſaw ſmall poſſibility, fell into ſuch a Melancholy Paſſion, that overcome with the dark conceits thereof, he was about to have become the bloody Executioner of himſelf, had not Caly Baſſa by his grave advice comforted up his dying ſpirits; by whoſe perſwaſion (contrary to his haughty nature) he yielded by his Embaſſadors ſent for the ſame purpoſe, to deſire Peace of Uladiſlaus King of Hungary; uſing the exiled Deſpot of Servia (his Father in law) then preſent with the King, as a mean therein. Who at the firſt gave ſmall credit unto the Embaſſadors, or unto ſuch things as they told him, until that at length better perſwaded of the true meaning of the Turk, he ſo wrought the matter both with the King and the reſt of the Nobility, and eſpecially with Huniades, that there was an honourable Peace concluded. The Capitulations whereof were, firſt, That Amurath withdrawing all his Forces and Garriſons, ſhould clearly depart out of Servia, and reſtore the ſame unto the poſſeſſion of George the Deſpot, the right Lord and Owner thereof; delivering alſo freely unto him his two Sons, Stephen and George, who bereft of their ſight, he had long time kept in ſtrait priſon. Alſo, That from thenceforth he ſhould make no Claim unto the Kingdom of Moldavia, nor to that part of Bulgaria which he had in the laſt Wars loſt. And finally, That he ſhould not invade or moleſt the Hungarians, or any part of their Kingdom, during the whole time of that Peace; and to pay 40000 Ducats for the ranſom of Carambey. Unto which hard conditions, when the Turkiſh Tyrant had full ſore againſt his will condeſcended, a Peace for ten years was forthwith on both parts concluded, and the ſame by ſolemn Oath confirmed; King Uladiſlaus taking his Oath upon the holy Evangeliſts, and Amurath (by his Embaſſadors) upon their Turkiſh Alcoran. This was the moſt honourable Peace that ever Chriſtian Prince had before that time made with any of the Turkiſh Kings, and moſt profitable alſo, had it been with like ſincerity kept, as it was with Solemnity confirmed.

Amurath with this Peace delivered of his greateſt fear, converted all his Forces againſt the Caramanian King, in revenge of the Injuries by him done whilſt he was occupied in the Hungarian Wars. This King of Caramania knowing himſelf unable to withſtand ſo great an Enemy, durſt neither meet him in the field, nor truſt himſelf to the ſtrength of any his Cities or ſtrong Caſtles, but fled into the Mountains, there fortifying himſelf more ſure than in any other his ſtrong Holds. Amurath entring into Caramania, made great ſpoil in the Country as he went, and took great Booties. At laſt coming to Iconium, he laid hard ſiege to the ſame. The poor King ſeeing his Kingdom thus ſpoiled, and his chief City in danger to be loſt, ſent Embaſſadors, and with them his Wife alſo, which was Amuraths Siſter, to intreat for Peace; offering to pay unto him yearly the double Tribute which he before paid, and for the Performance thereof to give his Son in Hoſtage. Upon which conditions Amurath granted him Peace, and ſo returned. In this War, Aladin, Amuraths eldeſt Son, died, to the great grief of his aged Father, being ſlain with a fall from his Horſe as he was hunting.

Old Amurath throughly wearied with continual Wars and other Troubles incident unto reſtleſs rooms, reſolved now to retire himſelf to a more private and quiet kind of life; and therefore ſent for his Son, Mahomet, being then but fifteen years old, to whom he voluntarily reſigned his Kingdom, appointing Caly Baſſa his Tutor, with one Choſroe a learned Doctor of their Law, to be his truſty Counſellors and chief Directors. And ſo taking with him Hamze-Beg one of his Noblemen in whom he took greateſt pleaſure, departed to Magneſia, and there as a man weary of the World, gave himſelf to a ſolitary and monaſtical kind of life, in the company of certain religious Turkiſh Monks, as they accounted of them.

Many great Kings and Princes, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, glad before of the Hungarian Victory, were now no leſs ſorry to hear of the late concluded Peace betwixt King Uladiſlaus and the old Sultan Amurath; as being of opinion, that the proſecution of this War ſo happily begun, would have been the utter ruine and deſtruction of the Turkiſh Kingdom. Wherefore they ſought by all poſſible means to induce the young King Uladiſlaus to break the League he had ſo lately and ſo ſolemnly made with the Turk; eſpecially John Palæologus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, did by Letters importune the King to remember the Confederation he had made with the other Chriſtian Princes, for the maintenance of the Wars againſt the common Enemy of Chriſtianity; which Princes were now preſt, and ready (as he ſaid) to aſſiſt him with their promiſed Aid; adding moreover, That whereas Amurath had divers times ſought to joyn with him in Amity and Friendſhip, he had utterly rejected that Offer of Peace, preferring the Univerſal profit (like to inſue to all Chriſtendom by that Religious War) before his own proper Security and Profit, being for his part in readineſs to joyn his Forces with the Kings, if he would preſently enter into Arms; which he could never do in better time than now, whilſt Amurath, terrified with his late Overthrow, and ſtill beſet with doubtful War, had drawn his greateſt Forces out of Europe into Aſia, in ſuch diſordered haſt, as that it ſhould ſeem he rather fled for fear of his Enemies in Europe, than marched to incounter his Enemies in Aſia, and now being weary of all, had betaken himſelf to a private kind of life. To conclude, he requeſted the King, not to leave him and the other Chriſtian Princes of ſmall Power, as a Prey to the Turk, who would aſſuredly with all Hoſtility invade them, ſo ſoon as he thought himſelf ſafe from the danger of the Hungarians. At the ſame time alſo, and upon the departure of the Turks Embaſſadors, for the performance of ſuch things as they had promiſed, Letters came from Francis the Cardinal of Florence, General of the Chriſtian Fleet, declaring how that Amurath having left almoſt none in Europe, was with all the Power he could make, gone over into Aſia againſt the Caramanian King, leaving a moſt fair occaſion for the Chriſtians, eaſily to recover whatſoever they had before loſt in Europe; and that he was in good time come with his Fleet unto the Straits of Helleſpontus, according to promiſe, and there lay ready to imbar the Turks paſſage back again out of Aſia. Both theſe Letters being read in the Council, ſo much moved the King, with all the reſt of the Nobility of Hungary there preſent, as that they were never more ſorry or aſhamed for any thing they had done in their lives, than for the League ſo lately with Amurath concluded; for why, they ſaw that all the Plot they had laid for their Immortal Glory, was now by this haſty Peace that they had made with the Turk, without the good liking and knowledge of their Confederates, brought to nought, and that they had thereby moſt ſhamefully deceived the general expectation that the Chriſtian Commonweal had conceived of them; and that they, of long time called the Protectors of the Chriſtian Faith, the Defenders of true Religion, the Revengers of Chriſts name, and Deliverers of the faithful Nations; ſhould now be accounted the Breakers of the Chriſtian League, men forgetful of their Confederation both with the Latines and the Greeks, Contemners of Immortality, and Lovers of their own profit only. In this doubtfulneſs of mind whilſt they ſtood yet thus wavering, Julian the Cardinal and Legate, always an Enemy to the Peace, and by reaſon of his place, a man in greateſt Authority next to the King, took occaſion to diſſwade the ſame as followeth:

The cunning Speech wherewith Julian the Cardinal perſwadeth King Uladiſlaus to break the League he had before made with Amurath.

If any of you, right Worthy (ſaid he) ſhall haply marvel that I ſhould ſpeak of breaking the League, and violating our Faith, let him firſt underſtand, That I at this preſent am to perſwade you to nothing elſe but the faithful obſerving both of the one and the other; led with like repentance with you; repentance, I ſay, not ſorrow, when as I, as from a Watch-Tower foreſeeing all theſe things which were decreed againſt my will, to ſort alſo contrary to your expectation, am now for the duty of my Legation, and the zeal unto the Chriſtian Religion, inforced with you to doubt; and ſo much the rather, for that at this preſent the queſtion is of the loſs and hazard of all our Honours and Credit in common; which except we by common conſent, and wonted valour, endeavour to amend, O how much is it to be feared, leſt for ſhame neither may you go out of Hungary, or I return to Rome, where all things are with moſt deep judgment cenſured. Conſider, I pray you, into what miſeries this haſty Reſolution hath caſt us. We have entred into League with the Turk, an Infidel, to violate our Faith with the Chriſtians, and to break the holy League before made with the great Biſhop and the other Chriſtian Princes our Confederates. And that for what, for what profit I ſay? Forſooth, that ſo we might again recover Servia, long before deſtroyed. Verily a ſmall and woful profit, which may again in ſhort time be cut off, and depriveth us of others far greater, and of much longer continuance. For, what can be more fond and inconſiderate, than in our Conſultations to have regard to our private profit only, and not to the Publick, without reſpect of Religion, Honeſty, or Conſcience? It is not demanded of you at this preſent, (Right Honourable) what you owe unto the perjured Turk; but you are by me Julian, the great Biſhops and the Confederate Chriſtian Princes Legate, and Agent, before the Tribunal Seat of your own Conſciences, accuſed of breach of Faith, breach of League, and breach of Promiſe; and thereof even by your own judgment, rather than by the judgment of God, or other men, I will condemn you. Anſwer me, you noble Worthies: After you had happily ſix months made Wars againſt the Turks in Bulgaria and the Borders of Thracia; and after that, triumphantly returning into Hungary, received you not honourable Embaſſages from almoſt all Italy, and from the great Emperor, with common rejoycing for your ſo glorious a Victory, and Exhortations to continue the War? We received them. Did not you in my preſence, and I the Author thereof, willingly make a moſt holy League with the Italians and Greeks; That the one ſhould with their Aid and Power meet you out of Thracia; and the other with a great Fleet ſhould come into the Helleſpontus? We made it. If you made it, why breaking this, made you another with the Turks? or by what right can you keep the ſame, being made? Wherefore if the laſt year you made a League with the great Biſhop, (God his Vicar here on Earth) if you be men, if you be in your wits, if you be Chriſtians, this ſecond League is to be broken, leſt you ſhould violate the firſt, and that a moſt Chriſtian League; which except you do, I fear leſt that as Judas betrayed Chriſt, ſo you may ſeem to betray his Vicar; or that God, whom hitherto you have always found preſent, propitious, and favourable, you ſhall hereafter find him angry, and an Enemy to your proceedings. And now I pray you tell me, What will you anſwer unto the Conſtantinopolitan Emperor; who according to your appointment, hath now with the firſt taken the field, and in ſo great an opportunity expecteth but your coming? What will you anſwer the great Biſhop? What the Venetians and Genoways, who have their great Fleet ready, as was appointed? What the Burgundians, who for their zeal unto the Chriſtian Faith and Religion, have long ſince paſſed the Ocean, and ſo by many dangers of the Sea now flote in the Helleſpont? Deviſe (I pray you) if you can, ſome excuſe and colour, that we may not ſeem altogether unlike our ſelves; if out of your hidden skill you can coin any thing, ſhew it. You promiſed with the firſt of the Spring, that you would be in the Field; and now your Souldiers both the Spring and Summer, play; ſo great and ſo wholſome occaſion paſſing away, through your woful ſloth and negligence. O the great blindneſs of mens minds! O groſs cowardiſe! O deteſtable League, made to the deſtruction of the Commonweal! Some man happily will blame me, and ask, why I ſuffered it with the reſt? I was preſent, I muſt confeſs; but as much as in me was I intreated it might not be, I diſliked it; and (as many of you here preſent can teſtifie) I utterly condemned it. I was overcome by the Wiſdom and Authority of Huniades, and the compaſſion of the Deſpot, leſt (unhappy man) he ſhould by my Interceſſion ſeem longer to want his Kingdom; and leſt any man ſhould call me a Contemner or impugner of your good; I full of ſorrow, and unwillingly, gave way; not ignorant, the health of the Chriſtian Commonweal to be therein weakned, the hope of your Immortal Glory extinguiſhed, and us all (by your leave may I ſay it) accounted Breakers both of Divine and Humane Leagues, forſworn Men, and Traytors unto all good Chriſtians. Wherefore except before the report of our perfidiouſneſs be further bruted, we deliver our ſelves from this Infamy, nothing can be greater, or more miſerable, than our ſhame or villany. If we will ſo do, we may not ſo eaſily, as juſtly and religiouſly do it: Having made reſtitution of Servia and the Captives, what remaineth elſe for you to do, (Noble Worthies) but to repair your Army, to prepare what ſo is needful for War, and to keep your firſt League with the Chriſtian Princes? And to ſay, That King Uladiſlaus, after his League made with the Greek and Latine Princes, could not without the conſent of theſe his Confederates and Allies (under whoſe good fortune that common War was undertaken) conclude any thing, eſpecially with the Enemies of the Chriſtian Religion? And that therefore, if any thing were agreed upon betwixt him and the Turk, it was fruſtrate, and the firſt League to be ſtood upon. Who is ſo partial an eſteemer of mens actions, that would not eaſily judge, That in caſe Faith were given to both, it were rather to be kept with a Chriſtian, than with a Turk; with a Believer, than with an Infidel? Againſt a perfideous Enemy it is lawful (as they ſay) for a man to uſe all cunning, force, and deceit, deluding craft with craft, and fraud with fraud. By craft the Turk firſt paſſed over into Europe, by little and little he crept into that Kingdom, he never kept Faith with any, he grew to this height rather by cunning than by ſtrength; and are you become ſo blind, as to think it better to keep your Promiſe with the Turk, devoid of all Faith and Humanity, rather than with the faithful Chriſtians, and eſpecially the moſt holy Biſhop? All great things are done by device and policy; the Romans our Anceſtors uprightly and religiouſly always always kept their Leagues with their Confedetates, but deluded the deceitful with their cunning. Cæſar was of opinion, that for Soveraignty the Law was ſometimes to be broken. And Philip (the Father and Maſter of him that conquered Aſia*) oftentimes uſed cunning and deceit for the deſire of Rule; yet were not theſe men called Traytors. It is ſometime lawful for the Commonweal-ſake, neither to ſtand to our Leagues, neither to keep our Faith with them that be themſelves faithleſs. Lawful it is to break unlawful Oaths, and eſpecially ſuch as are thought to be againſt Right, Reaſon, and Equity. Was it lawful for* Diomedes, vowing for to ſacrifice unto the gods whomſoever he firſt met at his return into his Country, to kill his Son by that his Vow and Oath? Verily it was a great Impiety. Wherefore a juſt and lawful Oath is in the judgment of all men to be religiouſly kept; but ſuch an Oath as tendeth not only unto private, but publique deſtruction, that ought to be vain and fruſtrate. Wherefore before our faithleſs dealing be further ſpread abroad, I beſeech you, worthy men, and thee eſpecially, moſt glorious King, not in any point to violate your Faith, for the good of the Chriſtian Commonweal, given unto the moſt holy Father and the other Chriſtian Princes. The League you have made with the Greeks and the Latines, faithfully and religiouſly keep; the Expedition by common conſent taken in hand, by the example of your Confederates, proſecute; the foundation of Immortal Glory by you laid, build up. Deliver the Chriſtian Provinces, oppreſſed with the Turkiſh Servitude; ſatiſfie the Hope conceived of you, and deceive not the expectation the World hath now conceived of you, than which, nothing can be more diſhonourable; make no Conſcience of the League you have made with the Infidel, but think it a great Impiety and Wickedneſs, to violate the holy League made with the great Biſhop and the other Chriſtian Princes; thinking, that if you ſhould do otherwiſe, God (which he of his mercy forbid) would become of that your falſified Faith a moſt ſevere and ſharp Revenger; and that you can do nothing more acceptable unto our Saviour Chriſt, or more glorious to your ſelves, than to deliver the oppreſſed Chriſtian Countries, from the cruel Slavery and Bondage of the Turk. Suffer not this ſo fit an occaſion to ſlip away, than which, a fitter can never be given. Europe is unfurniſhed of the Turks, buſied in the Caramanian War; their return is imbarred by the Chriſtians Fleet, now in the Sea of Helleſpontus; you need but to go ſee, and as it were to take a view of Thracia, Macedonia, Grecia, and Epirus, there is no Enemy there left to oppoſe himſelf againſt you. Wherefore for God his Cauſe, I requeſt you above all things to continue the Chriſtian League, and with your happy and victorious Forces, to march forward into Macedonia and Thracia, as is before by you with the other Chriſtian Princes your Confederates agreed.

Julian the Cardinal abſolveth King Uladiſlaus and the reſt, from their Oath before given to Amurath.

In concluſion, having much ſpoken of the Authority and Power of the great Biſhop, he in his Name diſannulled the League whatſoever, by the King made with the Turk; and abſolved him, with the reſt whom it might concern, from the Oath they had given, and the Promiſe they had made. Which ſo well contented both the King and the reſt, that there was now no more queſtion of the Oath, or of the lawfulneſs of the War, but a Decree made for the continuation of the League with the other Chriſtian Princes their Confederates, and for the proſecution of the Wars againſt the Turks, as was with them before agreed; whom, they could now ſay, they were not to forſake, and to leave them as a Prey unto the Turk their greedy Enemy; now for nothing more in danger, than for that, at their requeſt they had taken up Arms in their quarrel. Unto which unfortunate Decree, both the Deſpot and Huniades (the chief Authors of the late Peace betwixt the King and Amurath) eaſily conſented; the Deſpot, induced with the great hope he had conceived of the good ſucceſs of the War; and Huniades, with the deſire of the Kingdom of Bulgaria, promiſed unto him by Uladiſlaus, and by fair Charter alſo (as ſome ſaid) aſſured unto him.

Of this the Kings Reſolution for the breach of the Peace with the Turks, notice was with all ſpeed given unto the Conſtantinopolitan Emperor, and Francis the Florentine Cardinal, then lying with a Fleet of ſeventy Gallies at the Straits of Helleſpontus; for fear leſt they hearing of the former concluded Peace, ſhould alter alſo, or elſe quite deſiſt from their former purpoſes. In the mean time, whilſt theſe things were yet in plotting, the Turk ignorant hereof, according to his promiſe had withdrawn all his Garriſons out of Servia, and other places before agreed upon in the late concluded Peace, reſtoring the ſame unto the Deſpot and others the lawful Owners, although it was not done at the very prefixed day at which it ſhould have been done. In which time alſo he ſet at liberty great numbers of Captives, and amongſt the reſt, the two blind Sons of the Prince of Servia; faithfully performing whatſoever he had before upon his Religion promiſed in the League with the Chriſtians before concluded, ſo deſirous he was of Peace with the Hungarians. Howbeit Uladiſlaus, by the Counſel of Huniades, detained to his own uſe certain of the ſtrong Holds in Servia; for which cauſe, George the Deſpot ever afterwards bore a ſecret grudge againſt Huniades.

Now as King Uladiſlaus (having by the perſwaſion of Julian the Cardinal, renounced the League betwixt him and Amurath) was preparing his Forces, the fame of the Epirot Prince Scanderbeg was alſo (by the recovery of his Fathers Kingdom of Epirus out of the Turks hands, and by the late Overthrow of Alis Baſſa) grown great, every one ſpeaking of him honour and praiſe. Wherewith Uladiſlaus moved, and reaſonably perſwaded what a furtherance it would be unto his haughty deſigns (aiming at no leſs than the utter overthrow of the Turks Kingdom in Europe) if he might unto his own great preparations joyn alſo the ſtrength of that ſo fortunate Prince, by the conſent of his Nobility, with all ſpeed diſpatched away his Embaſſadors with Letters unto him, certifying him of his honourable purpoſe for the rooting out of rhe Turks; and in that common cauſe praying his Aid againſt ſuch a dangerous and dreadful enemy. The purport whereof here followeth:

Uladiſlaus King of Hungary and Polonia, unto the noble Scanderbeg Prince of Epirus, greeting.

The Letters of King Uladiſlaus to Scanderbeg.

IT may be that ſome good hap hath deferred this our late Congratulation until this preſent, to the intent we might at this time, together with you, rejoyce in the double ſucceſs of your Proſperity; firſt, for the happy recovery of your Eſtate; and then, for that the ſame hath by your wiſdom and valour, of late been ſo notably defended. Wherefore in this we rejoyce, not only in your behalf, but in the behalf of all good Chriſtians, that it hath pleaſed God of his goodneſs, by your valour to have given ſo great an increaſe and comfort unto the Chriſtian Commonwealth; for as much as amongſt others our great Evils, the loſs of the Albanian people hath not been to be accounted the leaſt, at ſuch time as John Caſtriot, a worthy Prince, your Father, oppreſſed by Amurath, and by the ungrateful Deſtinies taken out of this world, had had neither the means to leave unto you his Kingdom and Scepter, (as unto his Son, then living in his Enemies Power) either was able yet otherwiſe to provide for his Affairs. And would to God this your Father, moſt happy in ſuch a Son, might have till now lived; whoſe felicity had in that ſurmounted all others, if he might have ſeen you before his death. For as you ſeem unto me above all other Princes in the World (without offence be it ſaid) moſt accompliſhed with all the good Graces and Perfections both of body and mind; ſo are you indowed alſo with a certain divine and wonderful Fortune; under the good Conduct whereof, not only the whole Kingdom of Epirus may think it ſelf in ſecurity, but all the reſt of the other Nations alſo, lately by the deteſtable fraud and violence of the Othoman Kings diſmembred from the Realm of Macedon, may alſo recover the former beauty of their ancient Laws and Liberties. For (to ſay nothing of thoſe things which even from your Childhood having continually made you envied, have heretofore purchaſed unto you an immortal Fame and Glory even amongſt the Barbarians themſelves) what can be more glorious than this Victory which (as we have heard, and believe) you, to your ſingular admiration, have obtained, by the overthrow and utter diſcomfiture of Alis Baſſa, with his ſo great and mighty a Power? But now O Scanderbeg (God ſo appointing it, who in his deep and ſecret Wiſdom hath reſerved you unto theſe ſo dangerous times, for the Publique Good, and Comfort of the Chriſtian Commonweal) there offers it ſelf unto you an object of far greater Glory, with a fair and fit occaſion for you to revenge your ſelf of all the Wrongs and Injuries both new and old, by Amurath the Turkiſh Sultan done, not in private to the perſon of your ſelf only, but unto the whole State and Kingdom of Epirus alſo; and not the domeſtical and civil Miſeries of your own Country only, but the Publique Calamities alſo, and thoſe opprobrious Diſgraces done againſt the Chriſtian Faith and Religion in general, now oppreſſed (I will not ſay extinguiſhed;) and that is, if you with your victorious Forces will ſuccour us in this extremity of our Affairs, not yet altogether deſperate. Hereunto do all the Princes of Hungary and Polonia, and all other men of courage invite you, Julian the Cardinal of S. Angel intreateth you; with all thoſe devout and couragious Chriſtians, which long ſince here with us, and ready in Arms, wiſh for nothing more than the preſence of your Victorious Enſigns. Which ſo fair an occaſion (by God himſelf now offered) if you refuſe not, will in all mens judgment be a ſure mean to vanquiſh and overthrow our Common Enemy the Turk, and to drive him quite out of Europe, wrongfully by him of ſo long time poſſeſſed. I need not therefore (as I ſuppoſe) to uſe any kind of perſwaſion unto you in this Cauſe and Quarrel, the defence whereof doth purchaſe unto us health, light, and liberty; but being neglected, I fear and abhor to forbode what may enſue thereof. We Chriſtians have been too too ſlack and backward in helping one another; the flame hath now well near conſumed us all, whilſt no man thought it would have come near himſelf. What do we ſee of the Greek Empire? What of the Bulgarians and Servians? yea, mine own Loſſes, and many Calamities already, and yet alſo to be endured, who is able to recount? The brave and moſt valiant Princes, the ſureſt Bulwarks and Defences of the Kingdom of Hungary, from time to time loſt; and the puiſſant Armies with one and the ſame fatal chance of War conſumed and brought to nothing, who is able to reckon up? Inſomuch that there is no Houſe, Wife, nor Matron, in all Hungary, which is not in ſome meaſure partaker of this heavineſs. All this do the Chriſtian Princes hear of, and yet the miſerable eſtate and condition of their Allies can nothing move any one of them, but ſuffer us thus as a Sacrifice for the reſt, to be on all parts expoſed to the rage and fury of the common and mercileſs Enemy. Only Eugenius the moſt holy Biſhop of Rome, and Philip Duke of Burgundy, have not refuſed to bear a part of the burthen of this our afflicted Fortune; the one hath ſent hither his Legate Julian the Cardinal, with notable and puiſſant Succours; and the other with his Fleet at Sea, and come as far as Helleſpontus, ſo much as in him lieth, doth notably hinder the Turks paſſage into Europe. And one other hope there is, not now far from us, and that is your help, whereof we are ſo deſirous; which we require of you, moved thereunto partly by your valour ſo well known, and partly in regard of the imminent peril and common danger of us all. And albeit we are not ignorant, how evil you may be at leiſure to take ſuch an Expedition in hand, for the late troubled eſtate of your Affairs, and your new recovered Kingdom, as yet ſcarcely well eſtabliſhed; yet notwithſtanding, let it not with-hold you, or keep you back; aſſuring you, that as this Expedition cannot be but unto you moſt honourable, even ſo this your preſent deſert ſhall not be beſtowed upon ungrateful and thankleſs men; but that which you ſhall now firſt begin and undertake for our Preſervation and Dignity, we will from henceforth and ever continue for your glory, and for the increaſe of your greatneſs. Fare you well. From our Regal City of Buda the fourth of July, 1444.

Of this the Kings motion Scanderbeg liking well, and thinking it far better now in ſo fit a time, with his own Forces joyned unto the Hungarians his Friends, throughly to buſie Amurath, than in ſhort time after, himſelf alone to ſuſtain his whole Power; by the general conſent of the Albanian Princes his Confederates and Allies; yielded unto his requeſt; in liberal terms promiſing him by his Letters, in good time to be preſent with him with thirty thouſand good Souldiers. The Copy of which Letters I thought it not amiſs here to ſet down alſo.

Scanderbeg his Anſwer by Letters unto King Uladiſlaus.

Your Letters, moſt invincible King, I have with like joy and contentment received; which I in the General Aſſembly of my Chieftanes having cauſed publiquely to be read, there was not any one of them which was not of opinion, but that ſo juſt an occaſion of War by you offered, was forthwith to be joyfully on our behalf alſo embraced. And ſo every man doth both publickly and privately affirm, That nothing could have hapned unto them more acceptable from God, than that they might by ſome notable Service teſtifie their grateful Minds, and bind unto them ſo excellent a Prince; as alſo to give ſo fit Succours unto the Chriſtian Commonweal. In which forwardneſs of my people I my ſelf took great contentment and pleaſure, both in regard of your ſelf, and in the behalf of the Publick and Common Cauſe; ſeeing my men of War, and all other my Subjects, of what ſtate or degree ſoever (without any perſwaſion uſed on my part) to be ſo chearfully and couragiouſly minded in defence of the Faith, and of the Chriſtian Religion; and ſo well affectioned towards your moſt Royal Majeſty. And to ſay the truth, Who is he (if he be not hateful unto God and man) albeit there were no queſtion of Religion, or of the common danger, that would refuſe ſo juſt and lawful a War? for ſuch a King, as unto whom alone we may and ought to attribute, That we Chriſtians do not only reign, but even live, breath, and enjoy the liberty of our Speech. Who would not willingly take up Arms, and adventure himſelf into moſt manifeſt and certain danger for the People of Hungary; by whom in all Ages the Chriſtian Common-weal hath with their ſo many Travels, and ſo much of their Blood, been ſo mightily ſupported and defended? who even from the very cradle have been continual Enemies unto our Enemies, and have as it were even vowed themſelves for the Honour of the Chriſtian Religion and Name. Would God (moſt mighty and redoubted Uladiſlaus) it had been in my power to have brought unto you ſuch Forces to this honourable War, as were anſwerable to my Courage and Deſire; then happily Europe ſhould not longer lie in this ignominious Eſtate, oppreſſed by Amurath; neither ſhould the Fields of Varna or Baſilia ſo often ſmoke with the Blood of the Hungarians; nor every Corner of Macedonia with the Blood of the Epirots; both Nations being as it were become the Expiatorie Sacrifices of others Sins and Offences; we all now by turns periſh, whilſt every man thinketh himſelf born but for himſelf alone. But why do I unto my ſelf pour forth theſe vain Complaints? Truly, it neither repenteth me of my Forces, neither (as I ſuppoſe, if it ſhall pleaſe God that our Forces may once meet and joyn together in ſo happy a War) ſhall the Chriſtian Common-weal have any cauſe to ſorrow or be agrieved with the iſſue and event of our Fortune. For unto thoſe fifteen thouſand good Souldiers which lately diſcomfited Alis Baſſa on the Borders of Macedonia, my purpoſe is to joyn as many more unto them; with all which Strength as ſoon as conveniently they may, I will begin to ſet forward, ready to follow your Enſigns to all Events whatſoever. And ſo fare you well, From Croia the third of Auguſt, 1444.

Theſe Letters being diſpatched away unto the King, Scanderbeg forthwith began to levy his Forces. And firſt of all he cauſed with new Supplies to be made ſtrong, all thoſe Companies wherewith he had overthrown Alis Baſſa; not ſuffering any one of them to abſent himſelf from this Expedition. Unto whom being in number fifteen thouſand, all men of approved Valour, he joyned other fifteen thouſand more, no leſs valiant than they; ſuch a Power as he never either before or after raiſed for the Recovery or Defence of his Kingdom. And ſo furniſhed with all things neceſſary for ſo honourable a War, chearfully ſet forward, accompanied with the Vows and Hope of all his moſt faithful and loving Subjects. But being come to the Borders of Servia, he found the ſtrait and difficult paſſages of that rough Country ſhut up by George the Deſpot, (Lord thereof, a man adorned with all the Graces of Nature, but otherwiſe a wicked damned Atheiſt, and a Chriſtian but in name only) who but lately before reſtored unto his Kingdom by the help of King Uladiſlaus, having changed his mind, did now mightily cleave unto the Turk his Son-in-Law (by whom he had been before himſelf exiled) and in favour of his quarrel, and deſpight of the Hungarians, but eſpecially of Huniades, had ſtopped up the waies and paſſages whereby Scanderbeg was with his Army to paſs; who by his Embaſſador ſent of purpoſe unto the Deſpot, complained to him of that wrong, putting him in mind of the perjurious dealing of Amurath with him, notwithſtanding he had married his Daughter; and of the great Pleaſures the Hungarians had done him; of both which he had good proof; requeſting him if it were but in regard of the common cauſe of Chriſtianity to give unto him (as unto his Friend by whom he was never in any thing wronged) paſſage; and not to ſtain himſelf with the perpetual note of Infamy, That he being a Chriſtian Prince, and of late ſo mightily oppreſſed by the Turk, ſhould now to the great hinderance of the Chriſtian Common-Weal take part with him, againſt his Friends and Deliverers. But what availeth Prayers or Requeſts, be they never ſo reaſonable, with a man ſet down to miſchief? Scanderbeg out of hope by any other means to open his way, but by plain force, reſolved ſo to do; although it much grieved him to ſpend thoſe Forces upon a Chriſtian Prince, which he had prepared againſt the capital Enemy both of himſelf and all good Chriſtians, old Amurath the Turkiſh Sultan.

King Uladiſlaus ſetteth forward againſt the Turks.

But whilſt he thus diſcontented, ſpendeth his time with his Army upon the Borders of Servia, beſet with many difficulties; Uladiſlaus prickt forward by the continual ſolicitation of Julian the Cardinal, or elſe drawn on by his own inevitable Deſtiny, having aſſembled a great Army of valiant and couragious Souldiers out of Hungary and Polonia (yet in number far inferior to that he had the year before, for that moſt of the voluntary Souldiers were returned home) ſet forward from Segedinum; and in the beginning of November (a time unfit for Wars) paſſed over Danubius, and entring into Bulgaria, came to Nicopolis, the Metropolitical City of that Kingdom (but then in poſſeſſion of the Turks) where he burnt the Suburbs thereof, and in that fruitful Country thereabouts refreſhed his People three or four days, where he alſo muſtered his Army, and took a view thereof; At which time Dracula Vayvod of Valachia, a man of great experience in Martial Affairs, being then preſent, and conſidering the ſmall number of the Kings Army, began to perſwade him to retire; ſaying, He had ſufficiently learned by his own harms, to deem aright of the Power of the Turkiſh Sultan; who (as he ſaid) was wont many times to carry more men with him into the Fields into his Diſport of Hawking and Hunting, than was there in the Kings Camp; wherefore he ſhould do well, not to expoſe thoſe his ſmall Forces unto ſo manifeſt peril, in ſuch unſeaſonable time of the year, but to reſerve them to a more fit opportunity, when he might with greater Power encounter his puiſſant Enemy. This his Counſel moſt men of greateſt Experience, and not carried away with other private reſpects, thought wholeſom; but the Cardinal, Author of this fatal War, extolling with great words the laſt years Victory obtained agaiſt the Turk, with glorious promiſes of great Aid, as well by Sea from the Pope, and the Venetians, as by Land from the Emperor of Conſtantinople and other Chriſtian Princes; augmenting alſo the great Troubles in Aſia, and promiſing an eaſie and happy ſucceſs unto theſe Wars in Europe; perſwaded the King that Dracula his ſpeech proceeded either of ignorance, upon a ſuperficial Judgment which he made of the Kings Power there preſent, without regard of further Strength from his Friends; or elſe of the private reſpect of his own ſecurity, in regard of a commodious League made a little before betwixt him and the Turk. So that the poor Prince ſeeing his Counſel mightily impugned by the Cardinal, and not ſo well taken, as it was meant by him, ſtood in doubt whether to leave him to his own Fortune, and himſelf to his quiet Peace, or caſting off the Turkiſh League, to joyn with the King in this chance of War; but at length reſolved as a Martial minded Man, preferring the uncertain Glory of the Field before his own aſſured reſt, ſaid unto the King;

Seeing that either your Princely Fortune, which hath ever hitherto favoured your high Attempts; or elſe the hope of Friends help, which I pray God fail you not at your need; or the ſecret deſignment of your Deſtiny, unable to be avoyded, draws your Majeſty into a different opinion from me; that your reſolution, which I cannot by reaſonable perſwaſion alter, I will as the ſuddenneſs of time, and my ſmall ability will permit, moſt gladly further.

Dracula aideth Uladiſlaus with his Son and four thouſand Horſe.

And therewith preſented unto the King, his Son, with four thouſand Horſemen well appointed, to ſerve him in thoſe Wars; wiſhing unto him ſuch good ſucceſs as he himſelf deſired. Afterward when he was about to take his leave of the King, he preferred unto him two luſty young men, perfect Guides for that Country, with two Horſes of incredible ſwitneſs, and with tears ſtanding in his Eyes ſaid unto him:

His laſt farewel unto the King.

Take thus ſmall Gift in good part, as a poor refuge to flie unto, if your Fortune hap to fail you, which I tremble to think upon; I pray God they be given in vain, and ſo they ſhall, if my Prayers may prevail. Yet if neceſſity ſhall inforce you to uſe them, you ſhall find them ſerviceable at your need.

And ſo taking his laſt Farewel of the King, returned into Valachia. Uladiſlaus marching on from Nicopolis toward Thracia, took many Towns and Forts by the way, which the Turks for fear yielded unto him; at laſt he came to Sumium and Pezechium, where the Turkiſh Garriſons truſting as much to the Strength of the places, as to their own Valour, ſtood upon their Guard; but the King laid Siege to both the ſaid places, and took them by aſſault; where he put to the Sword five thouſand of the Turks.

The Turks Baſſa's terrified with thoſe unexpected troubles, advertiſed Amurath thereof, requeſting him to leave his obſcure Life, and to levy the greateſt Power he could in Aſia, for the defence of the Turkiſh Kingdom in Europe, which otherwiſe was in ſhort time like to be loſt; blaming alſo his diſcretion, for committing the Government of ſo great a Kingdom to ſo young a Prince as was Mahomet his Son, unto whom many of the great Captains did half ſcorn to yield their due obedience. Amurath herewith awaked, as it had been out of a dead ſleep, left his Cloiſter, and with great ſpeed gathered a ſtrong Army in Aſia, and came to the Straits of Helleſpontus, where he found the paſſage ſtopped by the Venetian and Popes Gallies, and was therefore at his Wits end. But marching alongſt the Sea ſide unto the Straits of Boſphorus, he there found means to convey over his whole Army; uſing therein (as ſome write) the help of the Genoway Merchants Ships, paying unto the Genowayes for the paſſage of every Turk a Ducat, which amounted to the ſum of an hundred thouſand Ducats; or as ſome others affirm, corrupting with great Bribes them that were left for the defence of this paſſage. And being now got over, joyned his Aſian Army with ſuch other Forces as his Baſſaes had in readineſs in Europe; and ſo marching on ſeven days, encamped within four miles of Varna, a City pleaſantly ſtanding upon the Euxine Sea ſide in Bulgaria, where the Chriſtian Army lay; for Uladiſlaus hearing of Amurath his coming with ſo great an Army, had retired thither, having but a little before taken the ſame City of Varna from the Turks, with Calachrium, Galata, Macropolis, and others upon the Sea Coaſt.

Upon the firſt report that Amurath was with ſuch a mighty Army come over the Strait of Boſphorus, Uladiſlaus who before was in good hope that he could not poſſibly have found any paſſage, entred into Counſel with the Commanders of his Army, what courſe he was now beſt to take; where many which before had been moſt forward in that action (preſuming that Amurath could by no means have tranſported his Army) were now ſo diſcouraged with the fame of his coming, that they adviſed the King in time to retire home, and not to oppoſe ſo ſmall an Army againſt ſuch a world of People as was reported to follow the Turk. But other Captains of greater Courage, and eſpecially Huniades, ſaid, It was not for the Kings honour firſt to invade his Enemies Dominions, and preſently to turn his Back upon the firſt report of their coming; wiſhing him rather to remember the good Fortune of his former Wars, and that he was to fight againſt the ſame Enemy whom he had victoriouſly overthrown the year before; as for the multitude of his Enemies, he had learned by experience (as he ſaid) not to be moved therewith, for that it was the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, more to terrifie their Enemies with the ſhew of a huge Army, than with the Valour of their Souldiers, which were nothing to be accounted of, but as effeminate, in compariſon of the Hungarians. Whereupon the King reſolved to trie the fortune of the Field.

Uladiſlaus underſtanding by his Eſpials, that Amurath the night before encamped within four miles, was now putting his Army in order of Battel; committed the ordering of all his Forces unto the valiant Captain Huniades; who with great care and induſtry diſpoſed the ſame, garding the one ſide of the Battel with a Fen or Mariſh, and the other ſide with Carriages, and the Rereward of his Army with a ſteep Hill. Therein politickly providing, that the Chriſtian Army being far leſs than the Turks in number, could not be compaſſed about with the multitude of their Enemies, neither any way charged but afront. The Turks Army approaching, began to skirmiſh with the Chriſtians, which manner of Fight was long time with great courage maintained and that with diverſe Fortune, ſometime one party prevailing, and ſometime the other; but with ſuch Slaughter on both ſides, that the ground was covered and ſtained with the dead Bodies and Blood of the ſlain. At length the Battel being more cloſely joyned, the Victory began to incline to the Chriſtians, for Huniades had moſt valiantly with his Tranſilvanian and Valachian Horſemen, put to Flight both the Wings of the Turkiſh Army, and made great Slaughter whereſoever he came. Inſomuch that Amurath diſmaied with the Flight of his Souldiers, was about to have fled himſelf out of the main Battel, had he not been ſtaied by a common Souldier, who laying Hands upon the Rains of his Bridle, ſtaid him by force, and ſharply reproved him of Cowardiſe. The Captains and Prelates about the King (whom it had better beſeemed to have been at devout Prayers in their Oratories, than in Arms at that bloody Battel) encouraged by the proſperous ſucceſs of Huniades, and deſirous to be Partakers of that Victory, fooliſhly left their ſafe Stations, where they were appointed by him to ſtand faſt, and diſorderly purſued the chaſe, leaving that ſide of the Battel where they ſtood, open unto the Turks; but they were not gon far, before they were hardly encountred by a great part of the Turks Army, for ſuch purpoſe placed in a Vally faſt by. In which Fight Leſco one of the moſt valiant Captains of the Hungarians was ſlain; and the Biſhop of Veradium, a better Church-man than Souldier, and the firſt man that diſordered the Battel, ſeeking to ſave himſelf by Flight through the Fen, was there ſtrangled in the deep Mud, after he had with his Horſe therein ſtrugled a great while. The Biſhop of Agria, a man of greateſt Authority with the King, was at the ſame time alſo loſt, with many other Church-men more. The Cardinal with ſome other of the expert Captains retiring toward their former ſtandings, were hardly aſſailed by the Turks, who by the coming in of the King and Huniades, were with great ſlaughter forced to retire, and even ready to flie. Amurath ſeeing the great ſlaughter of his men, and all brought into extream danger, beholding the picture of the Crucifix in the diſplaied Enſigns of the voluntary Chriſtians, pluckt the Writing out of his Boſome, wherein the late League was compriſed, and holding it up in his Hand with his Eyes caſt up to Heaven, ſaid:

Amurath prayeth unto Chriſt.

Behold thou crucified Chriſt, this is the League thy Chriſtians in thy name made with me; which they have without cauſe violated. Now if thou be a God, as they ſay thou art, and as we dream, revenge the wrong now done unto thy Name, and me, and ſhew thy Power upon thy perjured People, who in their deeds deny thee their God.

A cruel Fight.

The great Battel of Varna, fought between Uladiſlaus and Amurath.

Amurath in danger.

The King with Huniades furiouſly purſued the chaſed Turks, with bloody execution a great ſpace; when as the King in his heat hardly perſwaded by Huniades to return again unto his Camp, at his coming thither found the Cardinal Julian, with Frank, one of his chief Captains, and others overcharged with the Turks, which had again made head againſt that part of the Chriſtian Army; and there yet fought couragiouſly, by reaſon of their multitude, being alſo backt by the Janizaries, which all this while had ſtood faſt with their old King, as his laſt and moſt aſſured refuge, but were now come in. There began a moſt cruel and fierce Fight; in the ſucceſs whereof, the Turks well ſaw the whole ſtate of their Kingdom in Europe to conſiſt, many were there ſlain on both ſides; the Turks feeling their loſs leſs than indeed it was, by reaſon of their Multitude; and the Chriſtians, by reaſon of their Courage. A great while the Victory ſtood doubtful, inſomuch, that at length the Turks began to ſhrink back, in that part of the Battel where the King and Huniades fought. But in the left ſide they prevailed ſo upon the Chriſtians, that they were even ready to have fled. Which when Huniades (having a vigilant Eye unto every part of the Army) perceived, he with ſpeed made thither, and there again with his preſence reſtored the Battel almoſt before loſt. Which done, he returned again towards the King, who in the mean time had moſt valiantly repulſed a great number of the Turks, and now was come unto the Janizaries, Amurath his laſt hope. There was to be ſeen a thouſand manners of death, whilſt both the Armies fought more like wild Beaſts in their rage and fury, than wary and politick Souldiers. In this confuſed medly the young King Uladiſlaus with greater Courage than Care of himſelf, brake into the Battel of the Janizaries; at which time, Amurath himſelf was by a valiant Frenchman a Knight of the Rhodes, firſt wounded with a Pike, and after aſſailed with his Sword, and had there ended his days, but that he was ſpeedily reſcued by his Guard, by whom this worthy Knight after great proof of his Valour was there ſlain in the midſt of his Enemies. Uladiſlaus being got alſo in among them valiantly performed all the parts of a worthy Souldier, till ſuch time as his Horſe being ſlain under him, he was forthwith oppreſſed by the multitude of his Enemies and ſlain; his Head being ſtruck off by Ferizes, one of the old Janizaries, was by him preſented unto Amurath, who commanded it preſently to be put upon the point of a Launce, and Proclamation to be made, that it was the Head of the Chriſtian King; which was afterwards ſo carried through the principal Cities of Macedonia and Grecia, as a Trophy of the Turks Victory. Huniades after he had in vain given divers brave attempts, to have reſcued the Kings Body, retired with a few Valachian Horſemen, and ſeeing no hope of better hap (for all the Chriſtians being diſcouraged with the death of the King, had now taken themſelves to flight) gave place to neceſſity, and reſerving himſelf to his future Fortune, fled over the Mountains, into the thick Woods, from whence with much difficulty he got over Danubius into Valachia, and was there (as ſome write) by Dracula Prince of that Country taken Priſoner; In revenge whereof, after he was inlarged by the Hungarians, he ſo aided Danus againſt Dracula, that in fine, Dracula and his Son were both ſlain, and Danus placed in his room. Julian the Cardinal flying out of the Battel, was found by that worthy man Gregory Sanoſe, lying in the deſart Forreſt by the way ſide, mortally wounded, and half ſtripped, by whom he was in few words ſharply reproved, as the wicked Author of that perfidious War, and there left giving up the Ghoſt. Many of the Chriſtians which fled out of that Battel, fell into the Enemies hands, and ſo were ſlain; but greater was the number of them which were drowned in the Fens, or that by Hunger and Cold periſhed in the Woods, or elſe after long and miſerable travel, finding no paſſage over Danubius, fell at length into the Turkiſh Slavery. This great and mortal Battel, as it was with diverſe fortune fought, ſo was alſo the preſent report thereof moſt uncertain; for the Turks that were at the firſt put to flight, reported in the Towns there by as they fled, that the Battel was loſt; and they which had all the day endured the Fight, not altogether aſſured of the Victory, and not knowing whether the Hungarians had retired themſelves, whilſt they ſuſpected ſome deceit in the Kings Camp, by reaſon of the great ſilence therein, ſtaid two days before they durſt adventure to take the Spoil thereof. The number of them that were ſlain in this Battel, as well on the one ſide as th'other, was great; as the Mounts and little Hills, raiſed of the Bones and Bodies of thoſe that were there buried, do yet at this day declare. Howbeit, the certain number was not known, ſome reporting more, ſome fewer. Yet in this moſt agree, that of the Chriſtian Army, being not great, ſcarce the third part eſcaped; and that the Turks bought this Victory with a far greater loſs, although it was of them leſs felt, by reaſon of their multitude; made leſs by that ſlaughter, as they that report leaſt thereof affirm, by thirty thouſand. Which may well ſeem rather to be ſo, for that Amurath after this Victory, neither farther proſecuted the ſame, nor ſhewed any tokens of Joy at all, but became very melancholy and ſad, and being of them about him demanded, Why after ſo great a Victory, he was no merrier; anſwered, That he wiſhed not at ſo great price, to gain many ſuch Victories. Yet in memorial thereof he erected a great Pillar, in the ſame place where the King was ſlain, with an inſcription of all that was then done; which, as they ſay, is yet there to be ſeen at this day. This bloody Battel was fought near unto Varna (in antient time called Dioniſiopolis (a place fatal unto many great Warriors, and therefore of them even yet abhorred) the tenth day of November, in the year of our Lord Chriſt, 1444.

Some maliciouſly impute the loſs of the Battel of Varna, and the death of the King, to Huniades, who (as they ſaid) fled out of this Battel with ten thouſand Horſemen; but this report agreeth not with the noble diſpoſition of that couragious and valiant Captain, but ſeemeth rather to have been deviſed, to excuſe the foul dealing of the Clergy; who as moſt Hiſtories bear witneſs, were the chief Authors both of the War, and of the lamentable calamity enſuing thereof.

Amurath to perform his vow, reſigneth his Kingdom to his Son Mahomet, which he in ſhort time after taketh again upon him.

From the Battel of Varna Amurath returned to Hadrianople, having loſt the greateſt part of his beſt Souldiers, and there with great Solemnity buried the body of Carazia, Vice-Roy of Europe, ſlain in that Battel; and then calling together all his Nobility, again reſigned up his Kingdom unto his Son Mahomet, retiring himſelf unto Magneſia, where he lived a ſolitary and private life, having before vowed ſo to do, in the great fear he was in, in the Battel againſt Uladiſlaus; but after he had a ſhort time performed theſe his Vows in that obſcure and melancholy Life, he weary thereof, as ſome ſuppoſe, as not a little revived with the late Victory, or elſe ſolicited by Cali Baſſa and other great Counſellors, returned again to Hadrianople, reſuming unto himſelf the Government of the Kingdom, to the great diſcontentment of his ambitious Son Mahomet.

Scanderbeg yet ſticking in the borders of Servia, and hearing what had happened unto King Uladiſlaus with the Hungarians, was therewith exceedingly grieved; and having now loſt the hope whereupon he had undertaken that ſo great an expedition, reſolved to return home again into Epirus. Nevertheleſs, to be in ſome part revenged of the wicked Deſpot, he with his Army forcibly brake into his Country, and there did exceeding great harm. In his returning homewards, great numbers of Hungarians and Polonians, lately eſcaped from the ſlaughter at Varna, repaired unto him, whom he (according to the extremity of their Fortune) courteouſly relieved; and furniſhing them with ſuch things as they wanted, provided them ſhipping to Raguſa, from whence they might in ſafety return into their own Countries. Thus by the Diſloyalty and Treachery of the faithleſs Deſpot of Servia, was Scanderbeg ſtaid from being preſent at the bloody Battel of Varna, to the unſpeakable loſs of the Chriſtian Common-weal; for it could not be, but that ſo many thouſands of moſt reſolute and expert Souldiers, under the leading of ſo worthy a Chieftain, muſt needs have done much for the gaining of the Victory. And what more glorious ſight could a man have wiſhed for, than to have ſeen ſo puiſſant an Army in the Field againſt the ſworn Enemy of Chriſtendom, directed by two ſuch valiant and renowned Chieftains, as never, either before or ſince their time, was ſeen the like in one Battel againſt the Enemy of Chriſt and the Chriſtian Religion? They were both men of invincible Courage, of exceeding Strength and Agility of Body, wiſe, prudent and ſubtil; both of long time exerciſed in the Turks Wars, the greateſt terror of that Nation, and moſt worthy Champions of the Chriſtian Religion, being therein both very zealous. Of the two, Huniades was at that time accounted the better Commander, and the more politick, as a man in greater experience in Martial Affairs, by reaſon of his greater years; which was well countervailed by Scanderbeg his perpetual good Fortune, ſtill as it were attending upon him, and by his experience afterwards gotten, as in the courſe of his Hiſtory well appeareth.

The compariſon betwixt Huniades and Scanderbeg.

Amurath advertiſed of theſe proceedings of Scanderbeg, as alſo of the great harms by him done in Macedonia, and that the Frontiers of his Dominions bordering upon Epirus, were by his Fury utterly waſted and ſpoiled, and his People there for moſt part ſlain, and that the reſt had for fear forſaken their Dwellings, and left the Country deſolate and unpeopled; was therewith exceedingly moved. Yet for ſo much as he ſtill ſtood in dread of the Hungarians, and was now himſelf clogged with years, and therefore more deſirous of reſt; conſidering alſo the young years of his Eldeſt Son Mahomet, as yet unfit for the Government of ſo great and troubleſome a Kingdom; with the perpetual good Fortune of Scanderbeg, and Malice of Huniades; he thought it not beſt to convert all his Forces upon him, but to prove if he could cunningly draw him into ſome diſhonourable Peace for a time, that ſo he might afterwards at leiſure be the better revenged of him. For which cauſe he writ unto him Letters, mixt with grievous Threats, and ſome feigned Courteſies, as followeth:

Amurath Othoman King of the Turks, and Emperor of the Eaſt, to the moſt ingrateful Scanderbeg, wiſheth neither Health nor Welfare.

The ſullen and crafty Letters of Amurath to Scanderbeg.

I Never wanted honourable Preferments to beſtow upon thee all the while thou didſt live in my Court, of all others moſt unkind Scanderbeg, but now I want Words wherewith to ſpeak unto thee; thou haſt ſo highly offended my Mind, and touched mine Honour, that I know not in diſcretion what Words to uſe unto thee, but of late one of my Domeſtical Servants. For neither will hard ſpeech mollifie the natural fierceneſs of thy proud diſpoſition, neither art thou worthy of better, which haſt far exceeded all Hoſtility. And becauſe thou wouldeſt omit no occaſion to provoke me, haſt of late proceeded to that point of Folly, that thou haſt had thine own Affairs, and the Welfare of thine own Subjects, in ſmall regard, by confederating thy ſelf in Arms with the Hungarians againſt me. It grieveth me to rehearſe other thy unkindneſs, and as it were to touch thoſe ſores, if my mind would ever ſuffer me to forget the ſame, or that thine ſo manifold and horrible Treaſons, and ſtrange examples of a moſt unthankful mind, were to be covered with ſilence. Yet I thought good to advertiſe thee (although perhaps too late) leſt that thy unſtaid heat do untimely overthrow thee, with thy unlucky Kingdom; and then thou wouldſt make humble confeſſion of thy long tranſgreſſion, when thou haſt loſt thy ſelf, and left no hope of refuge in thy deſperate Eſtate. We have hitherto ſufficiently ſuffered thy manifold injuries; thou haſt ſufficiently provoked the Majeſty of the Othoman Empire, with wrong and contumelious deſpight; and I with patience have born all theſe thy contempts. Thinkeſt thou that my Army by thee betrayed unto the Hungarians ſhall be unrevenged? Thinkeſt thou that ſo many Cities and Towns in Epirus, by thee rent from the body of my Empire, with my Garriſons there ſlain, ſhall be forgotten? Or thinkeſt thou with thy late committed Outrages to eſcape my revenging Hand? Remember the deſtruction of mine Army under Alis Baſſa; the waſting and burning of my Dominions; and lately, the Hungarian Wars, by thee ſo far as in thee was, countenanced; with the Territories of George, the Deſpot of Servia, my Father-in-Law by thee ſpoiled. At length amend, thou graceleſs man, and expect not further, whether my indignation will break out. Let not theſe trifling allurements of thy good Fortune, ſo puff up thy fooliſh deſires, and ſharpen thy conceits, that thy miſerable Fortunes afterwards may move even thy greateſt Enemies, or my ſelf to compaſſion. I would thou ſhouldſt at length remember my Courteſies (if any ſpark of humanity remain in thy ſavage Nature) and make me not longer ſorry, that I have ſo evil beſtowed the ſame. And although it is not the part of an honourable mind, to rehearſe thoſe things which we have in bounty beſtowed upon any man; yet is it the token of a moſt unthankful Nature, ſo eaſily to forget all kindneſs paſt, as to need to be put in remembrance thereof. Wherefore Scanderbeg, I cannot bewail thy hap, and lament thine eſtate; For to let paſs the health of thy Soul (which thou a very Reprobate, eſteemeſt as nothing) not to ſpeak of the Laws of Mahomet by thee deſpiſed, and the holy Prophet by thee contemned, for the zeal thou haſt unto the Chriſtian Superſtition; what haſt thou (which now holdſt thy poor and baſe Kingdom in ſuch price) ever wanted at my hands of all thoſe things which moſt delight the deſires of men? Didſt thou ever want Armor, Horſes, a great Train of Followers and Servants, Mony, or other Superfluities, the allurements of all Ages? Or didſt thou want matter to exerciſe thy Valor, for increaſe of thine Honour? Waſt thou ever denied Preferments, Dignities, and Honours of all ſorts fit for thine Age, both at home and abroad? Was any man in my Court dearer unto me, than thy ſelf? what growing Wit, not of Strangers only, but of them that were neareſt unto my ſelf, was better welcome unto me than thine? With what careful inſtruction did I cauſe thee to be brought up? When thou waſt delivered unto me almoſt a Child, I dayly cheriſhed and increaſed thy hoped towardlyneſs, with Learning and Nurture; I have at all times honoured thee with rich Rewards, magnifical Praiſes, and Honours of the Field (which of all worthy things is moſt glorious) ſo that in all Feats of Arms no Souldier was to me better known, or Captain of me more honoured. For all theſe great benefits, Scanderbeg, thou now ſheweſt thy ſelf ſuch an one, that I may be thought not to have brought up ſuch a man as I hoped for, but a very Serpent in mine one Boſome. But the love of thy Country did move thee; which if thou hadſt asked of me, would I have denied the ſame unto thee? which (if thou doſt well remember) I ſo oftentimes voluntarily profered unto thee? But thou hadſt rather to gain the ſame by Treachery, than to receive it at my Hands of Courteſie. So thine be it therefore on God his name, and that with my very good Will. And verily, according to my accuſtomed Clemency towards all them whom I have once well known, and been familiarly acquainted with, I now pardon thee all thou haſt offended me; not for any thy preſent deſerts, which are none, but becauſe in this publique enmity it pleaſeth me to remember my former kindneſs in private towards thee, and thy faithfulneſs ſometimes in my Affairs; eſpecially for that the time was much longer wherein thou ſerveſt me, than the time wherein thou haſt offended me. Croia and thy Fathers Kingdom (although thou haſt gained the ſame by foul Treachery) I give unto thee, upon condition thou willingly reſtore unto me the other Towns of Epirus, which by no right belong unto thee, but are mine by Law of Arms, by my ſelf honourably won. Whatſoever thou haſt taken from my Father-in-Law the Prince of Servia, thou ſhalt forthwith reſtore, and make him an honourable recompence for the other harms thou haſt done unto him; and for ever hereafter, thou ſhalt as well forbear to offer violence to any our Friends, as to aid any our Enemies. So ſhalt thou for ever avoid the diſpleaſure of the Turks, and ſtand in my good grace and favour, as thou haſt done before; except thou hadſt rather (being taught by thine own harms) than in vain cry for mercy, when thy furious outrage ſhall have me in Perſon an implacable Revenger. Thou knoweſt thy Forces, thou knoweſt the Strength of mine Arms; thou haſt before thine Eeys the freſh example of the Hungarian Fortune, ſo that thou needeſt no further admonitions. Yet I would thou ſhouldeſt write at large, what thou intendeſt to do. Thou maiſt alſo confer with Ayradin our Servant, our truſty and faithful Meſſenger, of whom thou ſhalt underſtand more than are in theſe Letters compriſed. Farewel if thou be wiſe. From Hadrianople.

To theſe Letters Scanderbeg gave ſmall credit, and leſs to the Meſſenger, but leaſt of all to the old Fox himſelf, whom he well knew to have written nothing ſimply of good meaning, but only to gain a ceſſation from Wars, until he might at better leiſure ſet upon him with all his Forces. Wherefore calling Ayradin the Meſſenger unto him, whom he rather held for a crafty Spy, than an honourable Embaſſador, after he had many times both publiquely and privately diſcourſed with him, ſo far forth as was poſſible to ſound the depth of his coming, and had alſo further entertained him with all honourable Courteſies, he ſhewed him all his Camp, with the ſtrength thereof; which he did, becauſe he would not have the crafty Meſſenger to think, that he was any thing afraid of his Maſters greatneſs. And at laſt, greatly complaining of Amurath his cruel and perfideous dealing againſt his Father, his Brethren, and himſelf, he ſent him away with ſuch anſwer in writing, as followeth:

The Souldier of Chriſt Jeſus, George Caſtriot, ſirnamed Scanderbeg, Prince of Epirus, to Amurath Othoman King of the Turks, ſendeth greeting.

The reſolute anſwer of Scanderbeg to Amurath his Letters

Thou haſt in times paſt, as thou writeſt, exceeded me in many kinds of Courteſies; and at this preſent I will exceed thee in modeſt and temperate Speech; for I think there is no greater token of a baſe mind, than not to be able to forbear to give railing and opprobrious words, even unto our moſt mortal Enemies. Wherefore we have with patience received and ſeen both thy Letters and Meſſenger; and to confeſs a truth, they have miniſtred unto me greater occaſion of Smile than Choler; whilſt at the firſt thou ſhameſt not to accuſe me of much Ingratitude and Treaſon; and preſently following a milder paſſion, ſeemeſt careful of my Souls health, being ignorant of thine own Eſtate, as a ſtudious Defender of a moſt damnable error. And at laſt, keeping neither Law of Arms, nor orderly courſe anſwering to our Affairs, doſt moſt inſolently and unadviſedly, as a valiant Conqueror to his vanquiſhed Enemy, propound many Conditions of Peace, of ſuch quality and condition, that mine Ears ſcorn to hear the ſame. Truly Amurath, although thy immoderate railing might move a man of greateſt patience to intemperate Speech; yet I impue the ſame partly to thy great Age, and partly to the waiwardneſs of thy Nature; and the reſt, to thy conceived grief, which I know thou canſt hardly moderate; and the rather, for that I have not ſet down my ſelf to contend with thee in foul and unſeemly Language, but with Arms, and the juſt Fury of War. Yet I pray thee, wherefore do'ſt thou ſo exclaim againſt me before God and Man? as though thou hadſt firſt ſuffered wrong and injury from me and that thou hadſt not in truth firſt done the ſame. Doſt thou call my neceſſary departing, a perfideous Treachery? my native Country by my Policy and Valour recovered, doſt thou object to me as a Villany?

object the ſame ſtill and ſpare not; charge me with ſuch crimes for ever, I care not. The long Catalogue of thy kindneſs towards me, which thou rehearſeſt, I could willingly remember, if it drew not with it the woful remembrance of my greater miſeries; which if they were to be compared together, the greatneſs of thy good deſerts would be overwhelmed with the multitude of thy greater Tyrannies; which I had rather thou ſhouldſt count with thy ſelf, than bluſh whilſt I repeat them. Every man that knoweth them, may marvel how I had power to endure them, or that thou waſt not weary at laſt of thy Cruelty and ſecret Hatred. Thou tookeſt away my Fathers Kingdom by force; thou didſt murther my Brethren, and my ſelf thou didſt moſt wickedly vow to death, when I little feared any ſuch Cruelty; and doth it now ſeem ſtrange to thee, O Amurath, that an invincible mind, deſirous of Liberty, ſhould ſeek to break out of the bonds of ſo great and inſolent Slavery? How long at length didſt thou think I would endure thy proud Bondage? which for all that, I many years endured, and refuſed not thy command. I expoſed my ſelf to publique and private dangers, both voluntarily and by thy deſignment; ſpeeches were given out dayly by thy ſelf, and the admonition of my Friends concerning thy deep Treachery, was rife in mine Ears; Yet for all that, of long time I ſimply believed both thy words and deeds to have been devoid of all Fraud until thy cankered malice began too too apparently to ſhew it ſelf; then began I alſo to gloſe with thee, wholly metamorphoſed into thine own conceits, until I found occaſion to recover my Liberty. Wherefore there is no cauſe thou ſhouldſt now grieve, if thou be well beaten with thine own rod. But theſe are but Trifles, Amurath, in compariſon of thoſe things which I have laid up in hope and reſolution of mind. Therefore hereafter ſurceaſe thine angry threats, and tell not us of the Hungarian Fortune; every man hath his own reſolution, and every man a particular Governor of his actions; and ſo will we with patience endure ſuch Fortune as it ſhall pleaſe God to appoint us. In the mean time, for direction of our Affairs we will not requeſt Counſel of our Enemies, nor Peace of thee, but Victory by the help of God. Farewel. From our Camp.

When Amurath had read theſe Letters, and further conferred with Ayradin, he was filled with wrath and indignation, wondering at the great reſolution of ſo ſmall a Prince, preſently caſting in his mind (as was thought) the difficulty of that War. Yet becauſe he would give no token of Fear, oftentimes ſtroaking his white Beard, as his manner was when he was throughly angry, with a diſſembled chearfulneſs of countenance ſaid, Amurath his paſſionate ſpeech in his rage againſt Scanderbeg.

Thou deſireſt (wicked man) thou deſireſt the title of ſome honourable death; We will give it thee (believe us) we will give it thee; we our ſelves will be preſent at the burial of our foſter Child, and in perſon (though unbidden) honour the funeral Pomp of the great King of Epirus, that thou ſhalt never complain among the damned Ghoſts, that thou didſt die a baſe or obſcure kind of death.

And becauſe at that time, by reaſon of many great occurrents, he could not convert his whole Power into Epirus, he ſent Feriſes one of his beſt Captains, with nine thouſand choice Horſemen, to keep Scanderbeg in doing, and to ſpoil his Country ſo much as he could. Which was with ſuch ſpeed done, as it was thought Feriſes would have been in the heart of Epirus, before Scanderbeg could have had knowledge of his coming. But for all his haſt, he could not ſo prevent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing thereof, and having his men always in readineſs, placed fifteen hundred good Footmen in ambuſh upon the rough Mountains leading into the Valley of Movea, whereby the Turks muſt needs paſs into Epirus; placing alſo two thouſand Horſemen, as he thought moſt fit and convenient for his purpoſe. Feriſes deſcending from the high Mountains full of Woods and Buſhes, by the broken and ſtony ways leading into the Valley, was in that troubleſome and intricate paſſage fiercely ſet upon by Scanderbegs ready Footmen, ſuddenly ariſing out of ambuſh where the Turks having no uſe of their Horſes, but rather by them encumbred, were ſlain as Deer encloſed in a toyl. In this conflict ſeven hundred and ſixty Turks were taken Priſoners, and a great number ſlain, and Feriſes himſelf, with the reſt, enforced to flie, crying ſtill out as he fled, Better ſome ſaved, than all loſt. Scanderbeg having thus overthrown Feriſes, purſued him into Macedonia, and with the Spoil there taken, rewarded his Souldiers, as he had alſo many times before done.

Amurath grieved with the overthrow of Feriſes, preſently ſent Muſtapha a politick and hardy Captain with a new ſupply of ſix thouſand Souldiers, to take the charge from Feriſes; commanding him in no caſe, nor upon any occaſion to enter far into Epirus; but only to burn and ſpoil the frontiers thereof, ſaying, That he would account it for good ſervice, if he might but underſtand, that the Trees and Fruits of that Country had felt the force of his Anger. Muſtapha having received his Charge, when he began to draw near the Borders of Epirus, continually ſent out Scouts before his Army, to ſee if the paſſages were clear, and ſo warily entred the Vally of Movea, where Ferizes not long before was overthrown. In this fruitful Valley, being the Frontiers of Scanderbegs Dominion, Muſtapha intrenched his Army, upon the riſing of a Hill, and placed Eſpials upon the top of the high Mountains round about,by them to diſcover the coming of the Enemy, and to have notice thereof by ſigns into the Camp; then reſerving four thouſand Horſemen with himſelf, to keep his Camp, he ſent forth the reſt of his Army, about nine thouſand Horſemen, to forrage and ſpoil the Country; giving charge before, That every man upon pain of Death ſhould preſently retire to the Camp, upon ſign given from thence, as to a place of Safety and Refuge. The Turkiſh Army ranging over that rich and pleaſant Vally, burnt the Villages, cut down Trees, ſpoiled the Vineyards, and made havock of all things that Fire and Sword could deſtroy; in that point executing Amuraths command to the full. At length Scanderbeg drawing near to this Vally with four thouſand Horſemen and one thouſand Foot, was advertiſed of all the Enemies doings, by an Epirot Souldier, who grievouſly wounded, had hardly eſcaped from the Turks; of him he underſtood, what number of Turks were burning and deſtroying the Country, of the Camp alſo kept by Muſtapha, and how Eſpials were placed upon the Mountains. Scanderbeg having well conſidered Muſtapha his wary proceedings, and ſeeing no Policy to be uſed againſt ſo careful an Enemy, reſolved to vanquiſh him by plain force, by aſſaulting him ſuddainly in his Trenches, before his diſperſed Souldiers could repair to the Camp; and having to this purpoſe with effectual perſwaſions incouraged the minds of his valiant Souldiers, ready of themſelves to follow him through all dangers; when he had ſet all things in order for the aſſaulting of the Enemies Camp, ſpeedily entred the Vally, and was preſently preſently diſcovered by the Enemies Eſpials, from the tops of the high Hills, and a ſign given to the Camp, from whence alſo the appointed ſign was given for the diſperſed Souldiers to retire; but moſt of them being ſtraied from the Camp, and buſied in taking the Spoil of the Country, heard not or ſaw not the ſign given. Thoſe which were within the hearing thereof, retired to the Camp, and at their Heels followed Scanderbegs Souldiers, terrifying them with calling upon the Name of Scanderbeg. Many of the Turks were by the Chriſtians ſlain in the entrance of the Camp, with their Booties in their Hands, and preſently the Turks Trenches were now by Scanderbegs Souldiers couragiouſly aſſaulted, and the Turks beaten from the top of them. They having won the Trenches, prevailed ſtill upon the Turks, filling all their Camp with fear and ſlaughter. There was no uſe of Shot in that medly, by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs of the place, for they were now come to pell mell. Muſtapha ſeeing his Souldiers put to the worſt, and that the Camp was not long to be defended, took horſe and fled by the Port which was furtheſt from the Enemy. The reſt of the Souldiers fled alſo, making ſuch poor ſhift for themſelves as they could. In this Battel five thouſand Turks were ſlain, and but three hundred taken; for the Chriſtians inraged with the Spoil of the Country, revenged themſelves with the ſlaughter of the Turks. Scanderbeg loſt in this conflict but twenty Horſemen and fifty Footmen. The reſt of the Turks Army diſperſed in the Country, hearing the tumult in the Camp, miſdoubting the fortune of their Fellows, fled alſo; yet many of them were in that Flight purſued and ſlain.

After this overthrow, Muſtapha returning to Amurath, the better to excuſe the misfortune of himſelf and the other Captains before ſent, greatly commended the invincible Courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderful skill in feats of Arms; perſwading Amurath, either to ſend a greater Power againſt him, or elſe none at all; ſaying, That to ſend ſuch ſmall Armies, was but to miniſter matter to the increaſe of his Glory, and the Infamy of the Turks; and to uſe Policy againſt him, the Maſter of Policy, was but meer Folly. It grieved Amurath to hear the Praiſes of his Enemy, although he knew the ſame to be true, by the continual Fortune he had always againſt his great Captains, Alis Baſſa, Ferizes and Muſtapha; wherefore he determined for a time not to provoke him further, but to ſuffer him to live in Peace; yet commanded Muſtapha to renew his Army for defence of the borders of his Kingdom towards Epirus, againſt the innovation of Scanderbeg; but ſtraitly commanding him, in no caſe to invade any part of Epirus, neither upon any occaſion offered, or conceived hope of Victory, to join Battel with Scanderbeg; for fear of ſuch evil ſucceſs as before.

At this time alſo the Grecians of Peloponeſus, (now called Morea) having before fortified the Strait of Corinth from Sea to Sea, with a perpetual Wall which they called Hexamylum, and deep Trenches about ſix miles in length, had alſo built five ſtrong Caſtles in the ſame Wall, of purpoſe to take away all paſſage by Land into that rich Country, and began now not only to deny the yearly Tribute they were wont to pay unto the Turkiſh King, but alſo to invade ſuch Princes of Achaia their Neighbours, as were content to remain ſtill the Turks Tributaries; among whom Neceus Prince of Athens, and Turacan Governor of Theſſalia for Amurath, ceaſed not by continual Complaints to incenſe him againſt them of Peloponeſus. Who having his Army in readineſs, although it was now Winter, and he himſelf very aged, ſet forward from Hadrianople, and marching through Theſſalia, came into Achaia, where moſt of the Grecians were before fled for fear into Peloponeſus. So paſſing on with his Army, he came to the Strait commonly called Iſtmus, where the famous City of Corinth ſometime ſtood; and there incamped his Army near unto the ſtrong Wall and Caſtles, lately before built, hoping that the Grecians of Peloponeſus, terrified with the multitude of his Army, would without reſiſtance ſubmit themſelves; but when he perceived them to ſtand upon their guard, and to truſt to their Strength, he laid battery to the Wall four days, and having made it aſſaultable, brake through the ſame with his Army. The Grecians having loſt the Wall (their chief Strength) fled, ſome to one ſtrong Hold, and ſome to another, as their Fortune led them; the Turks at their pleaſure ſpoiling and deſtroying that rich and pleaſant Country, ſometime the Nurſe of worthy Wits, and famous Captains; where they found wonderful riches,and took Priſoners without number; in ſo much that they were ſold among the Turks at a moſt vile Price. There Amurath for his pleaſure cruelly ſacrificed ſix hundred Chriſtian Captives, to the helliſh Ghoſt of his dead Father Mahomet; and afterwards impoſing a yearly Tribute upon the Peloponeſians, and other Grecian Princes now yielding again unto him, as an induction to their further Slavery under the Turkiſh Tyranny, he returned, taking in his way the two famous Cities of Patras and Sicyone. Thus the rich Country of Peloponeſus, and all the reſt of Grecia,ſometime the Fountain of all Learning and Civility, became tributary to the barbarous and cruel Turks, in the year of our Lord 1445.

Peloponeſus made tributary unto the Turks.

Old Amurath now clogged with years,and wearied with long Wars, was content to take his reſt at Hadrianople; during which time, Bajazet the Son of Mahomet was born in the year 1446. who afterwards of long time with great Glory governed the Turkiſh Empire at Conſtantinople, as in his place ſhall appear.

The Hungarians after the Calamity of Varna (wherein they had together with Uladiſlaus their King, loſt moſt part of their Nobility alſo) in a general Aſſembly of their States, made choice of Ladiſlaus the Poſthumous Son of Albertus (and then in keeping of Frederick the Emperor) for their King. But foraſmuch as he being then but a Child of five years old, and choſen King more for the remembrance of the Emperor Sigiſmund his Grandfather, and Albertus his Father, and the good hope conceived of him, than for any other thing preſently to be expected; from him; it was thought more than neceſſary, to make choice of ſome notable and worthy man, unto whom they might, during the time of the Kings Minority, commit the Government and Protection of that ſo great and turbulent a Kingdom. Many there were in that honourable Aſſembly well thought of, both of themſelves and others; but ſuch was the Glory and Valour of Huniades, and ſo great the remembrance of his worthy deſerts, both of the Kingdom of Hungary, and of the Chriſtian Common-weal in general, as without his ſeeking, procured unto him the general Favour and Suffrages of all; yea ſo far, that even they which moſt envied at his Honour (as overſhadowing their own) were glad to hold their Peace, for that without him, it was commonly thought the ſtate of that ſhaken Kingdom could not long ſtand; So by the general conſent of all the States there aſſembled, he was with the great applauſe of the People choſen and proclaimed Governor, as of all others moſt fit for ſo great and heavy a charge; wherein he quietly ſpent ſome few years in deciding of civil Controverſies, in compoſing the quarrels of the Nobility; not forgetting in the mean time the indifferent adminiſtration of Juſtice to all men, ending many controverſies far from the place of Judgment, and that without all ſuſpition of corruption; uſing therein ſuch expedition and never wearied patience in hearing every mans cauſe, that ſitting, going, ſtanding, riding, he diſpatched many great and weighty matters; always ſhewing himſelf affable and courteous, as well unto them of poorer ſort, as others of greater calling, that had any ſuits to him. So that it was of him truly ſaid, That no man was than he unto his Friends more friendly, or unto his Enemies more croſs and contrary. In time of Peace he was always providing for War, heaping up great Treaſure, and ſuch other things, as without which the Wars could not be maintained. But above all things, he was careful of the good agreement of the Nobility, taking great pains in reconciling their diſpleaſures conceived one againſt another, and that with ſuch dexterity, as that he was both of them and others generally both beloved and feared.

1448. Huniades goeth againſt the Turks.

In the mean time, whilſt he was thus buſied in diſpoſing of the Civil Affairs of the Common-Weal, and the Adminiſtration of Juſtice, he was advertiſed by his Eſpials, how that the old Sultan Amurath was raiſing great Forces both in Aſia and Europe, and that as the common fame went, for the invaſion of Hungary. For the withſtanding whereof, Huniades not unprovided, as never unmindful of ſo dangerous an Enemy, or of any thing more deſirous, than in ſome ſort to be revenged of the great loſs received at Varna; in the fourth year of his Government, and in the year of our Lord 1448. accompanied with moſt part of the Nobility of Hungary, and the Vayvod of Valachia his Friend and Confederate, ſet forward againſt the Turk with an Army of two and twenty thouſand choice Souldiers. So having paſſed the River Tibiſcus, or Teiſe, and travelling through Valachia, a little beneath where the River Morava running through Servia, falleth into Danubius, he with moſt part of his Army paſſed that great River; the reſt in the mean time taking paſſage over at a Town called Severin. Huniades with his Army being thus gotten over into Servia, by his Embaſſadors requeſted the Deſpot, as he had oftentimes before, to put himſelf into that moſt Chriſtian War, and remembring the great benefits he had received from the Hungarians, not to ſhew himſelf therefore ungrateful, than which nothing could be more diſhonourable; and to encourage him the more, certified him both of his own Strength, and of the Aid brought unto him by the Vayvod; and that for the good ſucceſs of the War there wanted nothing but his preſence and direction, with ſuch Troops of light Horſemen as he knew he had always in readineſs; wherewith he requeſted him with all ſpeed to follow him. But he being a man of no Religion, and better affected unto the Turk than Huniades, the more cleanly to withdraw himſelf from this War, pretended many excuſes; firſt, The League he had with Amurath his Son-in-Law, which he ſaid he might not break, for fear that if things chanced not well he might ſo fall again headlong into his old miſery; then, The unſeaſonableneſs of the time, Autumn being now paſt; which difficulties in thoſe cold Countries they had to their coſt too much felt in the late War: Theſe with many other ſuch like he alledged in excuſe that he came not; but the truth was, the malice of the man, grieved to ſee Huniades preferred before him in the Government of the Kingdom, and diſdaining to ſerve under his Enſigns, being himſelf Deſpot and King of Servia, deſcended of the Royal Race, was the cauſe of his backwardneſs; ſo that blinded with Envy, he could not there rightly judge of himſelf, or what was fit for him in this caſe to have done. But Huniades angry with his unkind anſwer, threatned him with his own hands to be revenged upon him, and to give away his Kingdom to one more worthy thereof than he, if he ſhould with Victory return. So paſſing through Servia, as through the Enemies Country, he came into Bulgaria. After whoſe departure, the falſe Deſpot by ſpeedy Meſſengers advertiſed Amurath both of the coming of the Hungarians, and of their Strength; yea he certified him of every days march, and how that Huniades was but with a ſmall Company of his own, and ſome weak ſupplies of the Vayvods, come over Danubius; whom if he ſhould not preſently meet, but ſuffer him to come on further, and ſo with his Army to get betwixt him and home, he might ſo ſhut him in, as that he ſhould be hardly able to eſcape his Hands. All which he did, partly for Envy, partly to gratifie the Turk, and the better to keep Friendſhip with him. So Amurath not contemning the Deſpots Counſel, ſuffered Huniades without reſiſtance to enter a great way into his Country, and coming two or three days march behind him, ſo ſtopped the paſſage, as that he could not poſſibly retire, but that he muſt needs fight. And now they were both come unto a great Plain in Bulgaria, which the Hungarians call Rigomezu; and the Raſcians, the Plain of Coſſova; through the midſt whereof the River Schichniza riſing out of the Mountains of Illyria, running, at length falleth into Morava, and ſo into Danubius. This Plain is about twenty miles in length, and in breadth five, environed on each ſide with pleaſant Mountains in manner of a Theatre, the River and low Vallies at the foot of the Mountains being garniſhed with many Country Villages and Towns. Into this fatal Plain, when as the Hungarians firſt, and after them the Turks, were as into a place of Combat deſcended; an old Woman dwelling in one of the Villages upon the River ſide faſt by, where both Armies of late paſſed, with a loud voice cried out, O, how much I now fear the hard Fortune of the Hungarians. When as their paſſage over by the Foord troubled the River but one day, and the Turks three; by the ſmall number of their Army, divining their enſuing overthrow. In the midſt almoſt of this Plain ariſeth a ſmall Hill, by the foot whereof the River Schichniza runneth; not far beyond which, toward the Head of the Plain, was a certain Tower built like a Pyramid, in memorial of Amurath, the firſt of that name, and third King of the Turks, there ſlain; which Tower Amurath fearing leſt Huniades marching before him, ſhould take, and ſo become unto him ominous, (for in ſuch matters the Turks are very ſuperſtitious) he made haſt, of purpoſe to joyn Battel with him before he ſhould come to the foreſaid Tower. Huniades being come unto the Hill, eaſily ariſing in the midſt of the Plain, there incamped, expecting the coming of Scanderbg; who was ſaid (according to appointment made betwixt him and Huniades) to be every hour coming. Wherefore Amurath fearing leſt the Tower faſt by ſhould be taken, and and the Enemies Power ſtrengthned by the coming of the Albanois, provoked Huniades to battel; who ſtill refuſed the ſame in hope of his Friends coming; which made the Turk more fierce upon him, ſeeking by all means he could to draw him to battel, but eſpecially by cutting him off from Water and Forrage; for why, he much preſumed upon his multitude, having in his Army about fourſcore thouſand fighting men. At length Huniades, for want of Water and other neceſſaries enforced to fight, upon S. Lukes-day, being then Thurſday, commanded his Souldiers to make themſelves ready; and dividing his Army into two and thirty Battalions, in ſuch order as he meant to give battel, the more to encourage them, ſpake unto them as followeth:

The notable Speech of Huniades to encourage his Souldiers against the Turks.

At length (valiant Souldiers, and fellows in Arms) the day is come, wherein you may revenge that Diſhonour or Diſgrace, you received in the battel of Varna; and recover your former Credit of Conſtancy and Praiſe, if you will play the Men. The Enemy oppoſeth againſt you but theſe Reliques of his Armies, by you ſo often broken and diſcomfited; who although they be in number more than you, yet are they in hope, Quarrel and Strength, far inferior. For what can they hope for, which fight not for their own, but for another mans Kingdom? and in conquering, procure unto themſelves nothing but bondage in this life, and torment in the life to come, and in both, perpetual and endleſs Miſery? Whereas you on the other ſide, howſoever the matter fall out, fighting for your own Kingdom, your Children, your Country, your Houſes, your Altars, may aſſuredly hope for in both, eternal and undoubted Bliſs. You have alſo far greater cauſe to fight, as they which if they do not valiantly overcome their Enemies, are in danger, with themſelves, to loſe alſo all that theirs is. The ſtrength of both is ſufficiently tried. Once we unfortunately joyned battel at Varna, where if we might make exchange of our Fortunes there found, haply the Turk would make choice of our flight, rather than of the great ſlaughter of his own men; who being not able to overtake us, was there notably beaten, with the loſs of a great part of his Army; whoſe great loſs there received, might countervail our Diſhonour; although the loſs, he ſuffered perforce, but we our flight by choice. But of that our Overthrow, the angry Powers from above (willing to revenge our breach of Faith) were, as I verily believe, the cauſe, rather than our Cowardiſe; for even there, all the Authors of that perfideous dealing, even there I ſay, every one received the juſt guerdon of their Treachery. Whereas we, againſt our wills drawn into that woful War, by the mercy of God yet live with you, preſerved for the defence of the Chriſtian Commonweal, and eſpecially of Hungary, that it ſhould not be over-run with the Turkiſh Power and Rage. The number of your Enemies is not of you to be feared, when as you with few, have oftentimes learned to fight with their multitudes, and carried away from them the Victory. Hitherto we have rather fought by the Power of God than man, and in the Name of Chriſt Jeſus our Saviour, have eaſily overthrown their prophane Battels. Which way ſoever we have turned our ſelves in his moſt mighty Name, we have with our victorious Arms opened our way, for that we fought under the Leading and Conduct of the Higheſt, whoſe help we have always felt at hand; neither ſhall we thereof this day fail, if we be mindful of his forepaſſed love towards us, and of our wonted valour. God is always preſent with them that in his juſt Quarrel fight couragiouſly. Hereunto is joyned the ſafe manner of our fight, by reaſon of our Men at Arms, and barbed Horſes, who like a ſtrong Caſtle cannot eaſily be overthrown. Our Battalions are ſuch as may eaſily be commanded, and yet ſtrong enough againſt our Enemies; whereas their great multitude breedeth but confuſion. We have many notable and forcible Engines of War, which they have not. Beſides that, every hour we look for the worthy Scanderbeg his coming. The danger is not ſo great, as that we ſhould fear it; or ſo little, as that we ſhould contemn it. Back again without Victory we may not go, for that our Army is hardly by the ſtraits of theſe Mountains to be led; and if the way were never ſo eaſie, yet without doing that we came for, and glory with Victory, we may not retire. Unto the Valiant, all difficulties are propounded. Wherefore ſith this your laſt Labour is at hand, wherein the whole ſtrength of the Turks may be for ever cut off, I pray and beſeech you (fellow Souldiers) by that God under whoſe Power and Protection we ſerve, and by the love you bear unto your Country, your Wives, your Children, and Wealth, upon the ſignal of battel given, ſo to ſhew your valour, as men reſolved to be fully revenged of the Injuries by that filthy and wicked Nation done both to God and man; and eſpecially of the loſs received at Varna. We loſt there a devout King, who for our ſafety, and for the breach of his Faith, ſacrificed himſelf; by which Royal Sacrifice, that Divine Anger is appeaſed; unto whoſe ghoſt I beſeech you, in this battel to make an honourable Sacrifice. Not forgetting withall, to revenge the death of other worthy Men in that battel ſlain. This fear of the Turks, is at once and even this day to be cut off; and ſo, as that it ſhould never grow again; and the Kingdom of Hungary, ſo to be delivered from the danger of moſt cruel ſlavery, as that it may by this days work gain perpetual Reſt and Glory, unto the enjoying of the pleaſures both of this life, and of the life to come. Wherefore (worthy Souldiers) we muſt fight with all our force, for that our Honour ſo requireth, our profit ſo perſwadeth, and neceſſity enforceth. As for our ſelves, howſoever the matter fall out, all ſhall be with us well: If Victory, perpetual Bliſs and Happineſs ſhall thereby be procured unto our Country, and Immortal Fame unto our ſelves; but if we ſhall be overcome, here we ſhall be moſt honourably buried in the bed of Fame, to live in Heaven with God and his Saints for ever. Wherefore I beſeech you ſo fight, as men reſolutely ſet down to overcome, or if it ſhould otherwiſe fall out, as Men reſolved honourably to die.

With this the Generals Speech, all the minds of the Hearers were greatly enflamed, and they all by his words, and their own hot deſires, ſufficiently encouraged; neither did old Amurath on the other ſide with leſs care or diligence marſhal his Army, and incourage his Turks, ſparing neither chearful Speech, glorious Promiſes, or ſevere Command; whoſe Army being brought into the Plain, and ranged in order of battel, filled the ſame from the one ſide to the other, even unto the very Mountains, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Chriſtians; and ſo about nine a clock in the morning ſet forward. Huniades had from the Hill where he lay, ſent down both the wings of his Army, and had afront on both ſides before them, ſtretched out certain long Troops of light Horſemen to begin the Skirmiſh. In the midſt betwixt both he had placed Zechel, his Siſters Son, with a ſtrong ſquare battel of Men at Arms; and ſuch as he had kept aloft upon the Hill for Reſcues, he had compaſſed about with his Waggons, as with Trenches. The ſignal of the battel being given, the fierce and couragious Souldiers on both ſides, with chearful minds, began at firſt to Skirmiſh a far off; but afterwards Fortune as it were fawning upon both ſides, and their courage thereupon increaſing, they began with greater force to fight foot to foot, and hand to hand. Which hot fight continued about three hours; at length the Turks battel was put to the worſt, by Benedict Loſonicus, who had the leading of the right Wing; and ſo likewiſe in the left alſo by Stephen Bamffi, who with great ſlaughter had notably foiled the great Baſſa of Europe, ſtill preſſing hard and deſperately upon him. Which diſcomfiture of his Men in both Wings Amurath beholding, preſently ſent in ſtrong Supplies, and in both places renewed the battel; whereby the Hungarian and Valachian light Horſemen, before wearied, were enforced to retire unto the Men at Arms; who ſerred together, and ſtanding as a ſtrong Wall, eaſily repulſed the greateſt Aſſaults of the Turks. In which manner of fight many were on both ſides ſlain, but far more of the Turks, by reaſon they were neither ſo well horſed nor armed as were the Chriſtians. Huniades in the mean time with the Artillery from the Hill, did the Turks great harm; which Amurath perceiving, drew as cloſe unto the Hill as he could, by that mean ſaving his people (ſo much as was poſſible) out of the danger of the Artillery, mounted on high above them in ſuch ſort, as that it could little or nothing now hurt them; which Huniades from the Hill beholding, came down to the relief of his Men, ſending new Supplies to both Wings; ſometime encouraging them with chearful Speech, and ſometime with his own moſt valiant hand; unto the weary he ſent Relief, the fearful he encouraged, them that were flying he ſtayed, and where he ſaw the Enemies faſteſt coming on, there was he himſelf preſent to meet them, omitting nothing that was of a good General or worthy Souldier to be done. The valiant he commended, the coward he reproved, and as a careful General, was himſelf in every place preſent. Whereby the battel became ſo fierce and terrible, that in every place a man might have ſeen all fouly foiled with blood and the quarry of the dead. Amurath in like manner ſtill ſent in new Supplies, nothing diſcouraged with the great loſs of his Men, preſuming upon his multitude, as fully reſolved orderly to fight, and to make uſe of all his Forces, in hope at length by continual ſending in of freſh Supplies,to weary his Enemies, whom he ſaw he could not by force overcome. Wherein he was not deceived, for one Battalion of the Hungarians was oftentimes enforced to weary four or five of the Turks before they could be relieved, they came on ſo faſt. That day they dined and ſupt in the battel, refreſhing themſelves with ſuch ſhort repaſt as they could eat ſtanding, going, or riding. The Turks Army was that day in every place put to the worſt, and oftentimes with great ſlaughter enforced by the Hungarians to retire almoſt unto their Trenches; yet was the battel ſtill again renewed, and ſo fought on both ſides, as well appeared they were reſolved either to overcome, or there to die. This cruel fight maintained all the day, was by the coming on of the night ended, both the Armies retiring into their own Trenches, but with purpoſe the next day to renew the battel, and not to give over or turn their backs, till the Victory were by dint of Sword determined. So with little reſt, was that night ſpent, both Armies keeping moſt diligent watch, all carefully expecting the next day, as by battel therein to try whether they ſhould live or die. It was yet ſcarce fair day, when both the Armies in good order ready ranged began again the battel; which at the firſt, was not by the Hungarians fought with ſuch force and courage as before, for there was none of them which had not the day before ſpent their whole ſtrength; whereas there was yet 40000 of the Turks which either had not fought at all, or but lightly ſkirmiſhed. Yet Huniades exhorted his Souldiers, not by faint-hearted cowardiſe to break off the courſe of the Victory by them the day before ſo well begun, but couragiouſly to proſecute the ſame; beſeeching them not to be now wanting unto themſelves and their Country, but to remember how they had fought the day before, how many thouſands of their Enemies they had ſlain, and not now at laſt to give over, and ſo ſhamefully to fruſtrate all the pains and dangers by them before endured; for that they (as he ſaid) were to be thought worthy of Honour, not which began, but which ended honourable actions. He wiſht them to ſet before their eyes the Calamities like to enſue, if they ſhould as Cowards be overcome; firſt, the divers kinds of death and torture; then, the ſlavery of their Wives and Children; the Raviſhment of their Virgins and Matrons; and laſt of all, the utter deſtruction of their Kingdom, with the horrible confuſion of all things, as well Sacred as Prophane; all which were by that one days labour (ſaid he) to be avoided. And therefore he beſought them for the love both of God and man, with their wonted Valour, that day to ſet at liberty for ever, themſelves, their Country, their Wives and Children, and whatſoever elſe they held dear. In like manner alſo did Amurath encourage his Souldiers,with great Promiſes and Threats, perſwading them rather to endure any thing, than by that days overthrow to be driven out of Europe. He carefully viewed his Army, ordered his Battels, and with many great Reaſons perſwaded them to play the men. But after that ſome light Skirmiſhes being paſt, both the Armies were fully joyned, the battel was fought with no leſs force and fury than the day before. Of the Chriſtians many then wounded, came now again into the battel, there either by ſpeedy death or ſpeedy victory to cure their Wounds before received, and there did right good Service. Great was the ſlaughter in every place, neither could the force of the Hungarians be withſtood; whoſe furious impreſſion, when the Turks could not by plain force endure, they began with their freſh Horſemen, cunningly to delude their deſperate fierceneſs; at ſuch time at the Hungarians began moſt hardly to charge them, they by and by turned their backs, ſuffering them a while to follow after them, far ſcattered and diſperſed; who allured as it were with the hope of preſent Victory, eagerly purſued them, and in the purſuit ſlew divers of them, and they again upon a ſignal given, cloſing together,and turning back upon the diſperſed Troops, well revenged the death of their Fellows; and with their often charges and retreats, wonderfully wearied the Hungarians, notably deluding their furious Attempts with that uncertain kind of fight, all the day long. Many of the Hungarians were ſlain, and the Turks had that day the better, and ſo both Armies being wearied, night and wearineſs ended the fight; both retiring into their Trenches, there keeping moſt careful Watch. The next morning by the dawning of the day, the battel was again begun. Huniades his Brother, General of the Valachians, with his light Horſemen ſetting firſt forward, after whom in ſeemly order followed the reſt of the Nobility,with their Companies. Where for certain hours, the battel was hardly fought with like hope on both ſides, and a great ſlaughter made, but eſpecially of the Hungarians; who wearied with the long fight, and moſt part of them wounded, were now all to endure this third days labour. Zechel (Huniades his Siſters Son) valiantly fighting fighting in the front of the Battel, was the firſt of the Leaders there ſlain in the thickeſt of the Turks. Emericus Marzalus and Stephen Bamffi, both great Commanders, encloſed by the Turks, there died alſo. Amurath ſeeing the formoſt Enſigns of the Chriſtians, which ſtood in Zechels Regiment, taken, and his Souldiers (diſcomfited with the death of their Colonel) turning their backs, preſently commanded all the Companies, which were many (yet left in the Trenches, for freſh Supplies) to iſſue forth, and at once to overwhelm the Chriſtians, being (as he ſaid) but few and overwearied with three days continual fight. Upon which the Kings Command, they fiercely breaking out, preſently overthrew both the Wings of the Chriſtians, before wavering; and in a great battel (wherein moſt of the chief Commanders were ſlain, and their Enſigns taken) diſcomfited the reſt, and with a great ſlaughter put them to flight. Huniades ſeeing his Brother now ſlain, the Enſigns taken, and the Battel quite loſt, betook himſelf to flight alſo; leaving behind him his Tents and Baggage, all which ſhortly after became a Prey to the Turks; who from noon until night furiouſly followed the chace, with moſt cruel execution; but at length ſtaid by the coming on of the darkneſs, they returned again unto their Trenches. The reſt of the Turks Army that followed not the chace, compaſſing in the Hungarian Camp, were there by the wounded Souldiers, the Waggoners, and other Drudges of the Army, kept out ſo long as they had any ſhot left; but yet were in the end every Mothers Son ſlain, though not altogether unrevenged, two or three of the Turks in many places lying dead by the body of one Hungarian. Amurath to cover the greatneſs of the loſs he there received, commanded the bodies of his Captains there ſlain, to be forthwith buried; and the bodies of his common Souldiers, to be for the moſt part caſt into the River Schichniza; for which cauſe the Inhabitants of the Country there by, of long time after abſtained from eating of any Fiſh taken in that River. The Plain by this great battel made once again famous, lay nevertheleſs many years after covered with dead mens bones, as if it had been with ſtones; neither could be ploughed by the Country-people, but that long time after Armor and Weapons were there ſtill in many places turned up and found. Thus albeit that this bloody Victory fell unto the Turks, yet was their loſs far greater than the Hungarians; having loſt (as was reported by them that ſay leaſt) four and thirty thouſand of themſelves, for eight thouſand of their Enemies. Howbeit they themſelves report the loſs to have been on both ſides far greater; as that of the Chriſtians were ſlain ſeventeen thouſand, and of themſelves forty thouſand; which in ſo long and mortal a fight, is not unlike to have been true. In this unfortunate battel, fell moſt part of the Hungarian Nobility; all men worthy eternal Fame and Memory, whoſe Names we for brevity will paſs over. Many in the chace taken, and the next day brought to Amurath, were by the commandment of the angry Tyrant ſlain. Such as eſcaped out of the ſlaughter by the way of Illyria, returned in ſafety; but ſuch as thought to ſave themſelves by returning back again through Servia, the Deſpots Country, found the ſame ſo troubleſome as that few of them eſcaped, but that they were by the way either ſlain, or quite ſtripped of all they had.

The number of the Turks and Chriſtians ſlain in the battel of Coſſova.

Neither was the Fortune of the Noble Huniades much better than the fortune of the reſt, who having on Horſeback all alone by uncouth and untract ways travelled three days without Meat or Drink; and the fourth day tired his Horſe and caſt him off, being on foot and diſarmed, fell into the hands of two notable Thieves, who in diſpoiling him of his Apparel, finding a fair Crucifix of Gold about his Neck, fell at ſtrife betwixt themſelves for the ſame; whereby he took occaſion to lay hand upon one of their Swords, and with the ſame preſently thruſt him through; and then ſuddenly aſſailing the other, put him to flight alſo. So delivered of this danger, travelling on, and almoſt ſpent with thirſt and hunger, the next day he light upon a Shepherd, a ſturdy rough Knave, who hearing of the Overthrow of the Hungarians, was (in hope of prey) roaming abroad in that deſolate Country; who at the firſt meeting, ſtrucken with the majeſty of the man, ſtood at gaze upon him; as alſo did Huniades, fearing in his ſo great weakneſs to have to do with him. Thus a while having the one well regarded the other, they began to enter talk, the Shepherd bluntly asking him of his Fortune; and he for God ſake craving of him ſomething to eat. When as the Shepherd hearing of his hard hap, moved with his eſtate, and hope of promiſed reward, brought him unto a poor Cottage not far off, cauſing to be ſet before him Bread and Water, with a few Onions. Who in the pleaſant remembrance of that paſſed miſery, would oftentimes after in his greateſt Banquets ſay, That he never in his life fared better, or more daintily, than when he ſupped with this Shepherd. So well can hunger ſeaſon homely Cates. Thus refreſhed, he was by the Shepherd conducted to Sinderovia; whereof the Deſpot having Intelligence (whoſe Country was all laid for the ſtaying of him) cauſed him by the Captain of the Caſtle to be apprehended, and impriſoned. But after certain days ſpent in talk about his deliverance, it was at length agreed, that all ſuch ſtrong Towns in Raſcia and Servia, as had by the Hungarians been detained from the Deſpot, at ſuch time as his Kingdom was by King Uladiſlaus reſtored unto him, ſhould now be again to him delivered; and that Matthias, Huniades his youngeſt Son, ſhould for the confirmation of further friendſhip, marry the Deſpots Daughter; with ſome other ſuch conditions as it pleaſed the ungrateful Prince for his own behoof to ſet down. For performance whereof, he required to have Ladiſlaus, Huniades his eldeſt Son, in Hoſtage. All which Huniades was glad forthwith to yield unto, for fear the falſe Deſpot ſhould have delivered him into the hands of Amurath his mortal Enemy. So the Hoſtage being given, Huniades was again ſet at liberty: Who upon Chriſtmas-day coming to Segedinum, was there by all the Nobility of Hungary, and great concourſe of the people, honourably received. This ingratitude of the Deſpots no leſs grieved this worthy man, than the diſhonour received from the Turk. Wherefore upon the ſudden raiſing a great Army, he invaded the Territory, long before given to the Deſpot by the Emperor Sigiſmund in Hungary, in exchange of the ſtrong Town of Belgrade, deſtroying the Country before him, and burning the Villages, never reſting, until he had got into his Power whatſoever the Deſpot had in Hungary; and not ſo contented, preſently entred into Raſcia, where the Deſpots Embaſſadors met him, bringing with them Ladiſlaus the Hoſtage, honourably rewarded, and humbly craving Peace at his hands; which he, at the requeſt of the Nobility eaſily granted, with forgiveneſs of all former Wrongs or Injuries; and ſo having with him concluded a Peace, returned back again into Hungary. But fortune never ſuffereth long the valiant man to reſt, but ſtill keepeth him buſied, leſt he ſhould at too much eaſe attain unto Honors glory.

1449. The Deſpot invaded by Amurath, craveth aid of Huniades.

The year following, Amurath certainly informed, That George the Deſpot having of late Huniades in his Power, had again ſet him at liberty; was therewith exceeding wroth, blaming him of great Ingratitude, That for a Kingdom which he had at his hands received, he had not delivered to him his Enemy, in full recompence thereof; whom of all others he moſt feared, and therefore likewiſe wiſht to have had him periſh. In revenge of which Injury (as he took it) the melancholy Tyrant, ſent Fritze-beg and Joſe-beg, two of his moſt expert Captains, with a ſtrong Power to invade Raſcia, the Deſpots Country; who accordingly entring thereinto, ſtrongly fortified Chryſonicum, a Town before ruinated, upon the ſide of the River Morava, and from thence with Fire and Sword deſtroyed the Country both far and near. The Deſpot diſmayed with this ſudden and unexpected Invaſion, wiſt not well which way to turn himſelf; the angry Turk he well knew, was not to be appeaſed without yielding unto ſome great inconvenience; and to pray Aid of Huniades, without which he was not able to withſtand the Turks, he thought but vain, for the wrong he had before done him. So that what to do he wiſt not; yet had he rather to endure any thing, than again to ſuffer the heavy Bondage of the Turk. In this extremity he thought beſt to make proof of Huniades, of whom he humbly, and not without great ſhame, craved Aid. Which the courteous Governor, according to his honourable Nature, forgetting all former Injuries, eaſily granted; and the rather, for that he deſired nothing more, than to be of the Turks in ſome part revenged of the Overthrow from them of late received in the Plains of Coſſova; as alſo for that he wiſely foreſaw, That the Deſpots Country being loſt, he ſhould have the Turks ſtill braving him even as it were in the Gates of Hungary. Wherefore having with great ſpeed raiſed a convenient Power, he forthwith in Perſon himſelf ſet forward, and at Synderovia paſſing over the River Danubius into Raſcia, there joyned his Power with the Deſpots, which he found there ready. And ſo marching forward with ſuch Expedition, that he prevented the fame of his coming; and the Weather alſo at the ſame time as it were favouring his purpoſe, and covering the Country with a thick miſt, he was the fourth day upon the Turks before they were aware of him. Who wonderfully diſmayed with the ſudden coming of the Chriſtians, and upon the breaking up of the miſt, diſcovering alſo Huniades his Enſigns (always unto them dreadful) thought now no more of reſiſtance, or of the ordering of their Battel, but as men diſcouraged, betook themſelves to ſpeedy flight. After whom followed the Hungarian and Servian light Horſemen, with moſt bloody Execution, having them in chaſe all that day; Huniades with his Men at Arms following ſtill after in good order, for fear the Turks ſhould again make head upon the light Horſemen that had them in chaſe. And had not the coming on of the night ended the ſlaughter, few of the Turks had there eſcaped; but by the approach thereof many of them got into the Woods, and ſo ſaved themſelves. Fritzebeg the General, with moſt part of the Turks beſt Commanders, were in that flight taken. Huniades after this Victory entring into Bulgaria, came to Budina, the Metropolitical City of that Country, which (as the cauſe oftentimes of great Wars) he burnt down to the ground. And ſo having well revenged himſelf, and cleared the Country of the Turks, he returned back again into Servia, and there gave to the Deſpot for a Preſent all the Priſoners he had taken, and contenting himſelf with the honour of the Victory, returned with Triumph to Buda, there to find no leſs trouble with the Bohemians, and ſome of the diſcontented Nobility of Hungary, than he had with the Turks, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian Commonweal.

All this while that Amurath was thus troubled with Huniades and the Hungarians, Muſtapha lying ſtill upon the borders of Macedonia, as Amurath had commanded; it chanced that a great quarrel grew betwixt the Venetians and Scanderbeg, about the Inheritance of Lech Zachary (a Noble man of Epirus) then ſhamefully murdered by his unnatural Kinſman Lech Duchagne; part of whoſe Inheritance lying in the Frontiers of Epirus, the Venetians claimed, as belonging to their Seigniory; and having got poſſeſſion of the City of Dayna, part thereof, by force held the ſame againſt Scanderbeg; upon which quarrel great Wars aroſe betwixt the Venetians and him, who had before been very great Friends; inſomuch that in the end they joyned in battel at the River of Drine, where the Venetians were by him in a great battel overthrown. Of which troubles Muſtapha daily underſtood, and how that Scanderbeg ſo buſied, had left but a ſmall Garriſon upon the Borders of Epirus. Wherefore being deſirous to redeem his former diſgrace with ſome better hap; he would fain have taken the opportunity now preſented, but that his great Maſters command lay ſo heavy upon him, as that he durſt not without his leave attempt the ſame; knowing that the danger of his evil fortune, if it ſhould ſo fall out, would far exceed the uncertain glory of his better ſucceſs. Yet ceaſed he not from time to time to give Amurath Intelligence of theſe Troubles and Wars in Epirus, earneſtly requeſting him not to let ſlip ſo fair an opportunity, but to give him leave to enter into the Country, in manner, aſſuring him before hand of the Victory. Yet the ſuſpitious old King was long in reſolving what to do, ſtill fearing the Fortune of his Enemy. At length diſcharged of the fear of the Hungarians, and commending Muſtapha his forwardneſs, he ſent unto him a Meſſenger with Letters of this purport, anſwerable to his deſire.

The Wars thou ſo greatly deſireſt, behold Muſtapha we grant unto thee; the glory thereof (if thoſe things be true which we hear of the Venetian War) thine own valour, and worthy right hand ſhall give thee; yet thou muſt warily deal with that Enemy, and not raſhly take up Arms, which thou mayſt be enforced ſhamefully to caſt away, when thou thinkeſt leaſt. Peradventure the counterfeit ſhew of War and feigned falling cut among the Chriſtians, do too much allure thee; for the commen ſaying is, There is no quarrel ſooner ended, than betwixt the Father and the Son; we in Perſon abſent, can neither adviſe thee as preſent, nor commend a fooliſh forwardneſs in Arms. Thou muſt before thou put on Arms, diſpoſe of all things, and conſider of every particular, which is to be put in execution when thou art in the field. Thou haſt a great Army of freſh and luſty Souldiers, thine Enemies are with continual Wars wearied and ſpent; in that remaineth, do as thou thinkeſt good; for I forbid thee the doing of nothing, which thou thinkeſt may be for the advancement of our Honour.

Muſtapha having thus obtained leave, and well appointed, with all his Forces entred into Epirus, hoping in one battel to end that War; which he (preſuming upon the ſtrength of his Army) many times offered in the plain field. News hereof was brought to Scanderbeg (then lying at the Siege of Dayna againſt the Venetians) from his Garriſons lying upon the Frontiers of Epirus, to whom he addreſſed a ſpeedy Meſſenger; commanding them in no wiſe to encounter with the Enemy, but to keep themſelves within the ſafeguard of their ſtrong Holds, and to protract the time until his coming. Afterwards ſelecting out of his Army 500 Horſemen, and 1500 choſen Footmen, all old beaten Souldiers, he with that ſmall number marched to the place where he knew lay his Garriſons intrenched, in the upper Country of Dibra; leaving Ameſa his Nephew at the Siege of Dayna. Muſtapha having many times in vain ſought to draw the Garriſon Souldiers out of their Trenches by offering them many fair opportunities of advantage, and now out of hope that way to circumvent them, began to ſpoil and burn the Country round about. But when he underſtood by his Scouts of Scanderbeg his coming, he ſpeedily called together his Army, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbegs Camp, at a place called Oronoche, in the upper Country of Dibra. Scanderbeg had there in his Camp, of his Garriſon Souldiers and thoſe he brought with him, four thouſand Horſemen, and two thouſand Foot, all old expert Souldiers, where, after he had made his Trenches ſtrong, he left therein three hundred of them, and brought the reſt into the field in order of battel. Muſtapha on the other ſide likewiſe brought on in good order his Army alſo. But whilſt both Armies thus ſtood ranged one within the view of the other, expecting nothing but the ſignal of battel, ſuddenly a man at Arms, in gallant and rich Furniture, iſſued out of the Turks Army into the midſt of the Plain betwixt both Armies, and from thence with a loud Voice challenged to fight hand to hand with any one of the Chriſtian Army. This Turk was called Caraguſa. At the firſt Scanderbeg Souldiers upon this Challenge ſtood ſtill, one looking upon another; for as they were all aſhamed to refuſe ſo brave an Offer, ſo the danger ſo ſuddenly offered, ſtaid every mans forwardneſs for a while; until that one Paul Maneſſi, accounted the beſt Man at Arms in Scanderbeg his Army (upon whom every mans eye was now caſt, as if he had been the Man by name called out by the proud Challenger) not able longer to endure the Turks pride, with great courage and chearful countenance came to Scanderbeg, requeſting him that he might be the Man to accept that Challenge. Who greatly commended him, and willed him on God his Name to ſet forward, firſt to win Honour to himſelf, and then to give example of his Valour for all the reſt of the Army to follow. Paul ſtaying a while, until he had for that purpoſe moſt bravely armed himſelf, mounted preſently to Horſe, and riding forth into the Plain, called aloud unto the Turk, that he ſhould make himſelf ready to fight. Whom Caraguſa required to ſtay a while, that he might ſpeak unto him a few words, indifferently concerning them both.

The Victory (ſaid he) our force and fortune ſhall determine; but the conditions of the Victory, we are now to appoint our ſelves. If the Deſtinies have aſſigned unto thee the Honour of this day, I refuſe not; but that thou mayſt by Law of Arms, when I am overcome, carry away with thee my rich Spoils, and at thy pleaſure diſpoſe of my dead body. But if thou ſhalt fall under my hand, I require that I may have the ſame right and power over thy captive Body; and that the Generals will grant that no man ſhall move out of either Army, to better the fortune of either of us in the time of the Combat, or after.

Maneſſi his ſtout Anſwer to Caraguſa.

Whereunto Maneſſi anſwered, That he agreed to thoſe conditions of the Combat, which he upon a needleſs fear had ſo required to be kept, ſaying, That where the fierce Soul had yielded, there of good right all the reſt ought to be the Conquerors; and that therefore he ſhould fight without fear of any more Enemies than himſelf; whom ſo ſoon as he had deprived of life, he ſhould have free power to do with his dead body what he would. Which if thou wouldſt give (ſaid he) unto the tears of my fellow Souldiers, yet would not worthy Scanderbeg ſuffer the Carkaſs of a vanquiſhed Coward to be brought back again into his Camp.

Caraguſa marvelled to hear his ſo brave Reſolution, and as it was thought, repented him of his Challenge. But after that both the Generals had upon their Honours confirmed the Laws of the Combat before rehearſed, both the Champions were left alone in the midſt of the Plain between both Armies, with all mens eyes fixed upon them. Now both the Armies betwixt fear and hope, ſtood in great expectation of the event of the Combat, preſaging their own Fortunes in the fortune of their Champions. In which time they both having withdrawn themſelves one from the other a convenient diſtance, for the making of their courſe, and after with great violence running together, Caraguſa was by Maneſſi, at the firſt encounter ſtruck through the Head and ſlain. Maneſſi alighting, diſarmed the dead Body, and ſtruck off his Head; and ſo loaded with the Armor and Head of the proud Challenger, rereturned with Victory to the Army, where he was joyfully received and brough to Scanderbeg, of whom he was there preſently honourably both commended and rewarded. Scanderbeg ſeeing his Men by this good fortune of Maneſſi, greatly encouraged, and the Turks as men diſmayed with the death of their Champion, hanging their heads, like an invincible Captain, himſelf ſet firſt forward toward the Enemy, as it were in contempt of their multitude; and had charged them as they ſtood, before they had ſet one foot forward, had not Muſtapha to incourage his Souldiers, with certain diſordered Troops oppoſed himſelf againſt him, which the whole Army ſeeing, faintly followed; but as they ſet forward with ſmall courage, ſo were they at the firſt Incounter eaſily driven to retire. Which when Muſtapha ſaw, he called earneſtly upon them to follow him, and the more to encourage them by his own example, put Spurs to his Horſe, and fiercely charged the Front of Scanderbegs Army, as one reſolved either to gain the Victory, or there to die; after whom followed moſt of the principal Captains of his Army, which would not for ſhame forſake their General; thus by his Valour the battel was for a while renewed. But Moſes prevailing with great ſlaughter in one part of the Army, the Turks began to fly; in which flight Muſtapha the General, with twelve others of the chief Men in that Army, were taken Priſoners, but of the common Souldiers few were ſaved. There was ſlain of the Turks Army ten thouſand, and fifteen Enſigns taken; whereas of the Chriſtians were ſlain but three hundred. The Turks Tents and Camp, with all the Wealth thereof, became a Prey to Scanderbegs Souldiers; wherewith although he had ſatisfied the deſires of them all, yet to keep his old cuſtom, he entred into the Confines of Macedonia, and there burnt and ſpoiled all that he could. And afterwards leaving a Garriſon of two thouſand Horſemen and a thouſand Foot for defence of his Frontiers, returned again

Muſtapha ranſomed.

Not long after, the Venetians made Peace with Scanderbeg; and Amurath deſirous to redeem his Captains, about the ſame time ſent great Preſents unto Scanderbeg, with five and twenty thouſand Ducats for the Ranſom of Muſtapha and the other Chieftains; whom Scanderbeg ſo honourably uſed, as if there had never been any Hoſtility betwixt him and them; and ſo with a ſafe Convoy ſent them out of his Country. The Ranſom of Muſtapha and the other Turks he divided amongſt his Souldiers. When Scanderbeg had thus made Peace with the Venetians, he forthwith led his Army again into Macedonia, with the ſpoil of that Country to make his Souldiers better pay, as his uſual manner was. And to do the greater harm, he divided his Army into three parts, wherewith he over-running the Country, waſted and deſtroyed all before him, putting to the Sword all the Turks that came in his way. As for the Chriſtians that there lived amongſt them, he ſpared, but left them nothing more than their lives; the Buildings of the Country he utterly conſumed with fire, ſo that in all that part of Macedonia which bordereth upon Epirus, nothing was to be ſeen more than the bare ground, and the ſhews of the ſpoil by him there made. Which unmerciful havock of all things he made, to the end that the Turks ſhould find no Relief in thoſe Quarters, whenſoever they ſhould come thither to lie in Garriſon in that Country, or to invade Epirus. The ſpoil he made was ſo great, that it was thought he left not in all that Country, ſo much as might relieve the Turks Army for one day.

Of all theſe great harms by Scanderbeg done in Macedonia, Amurath was with all ſpeed advertiſed, and therewith exceedingly vexed; howbeit he reſolved with his great Counſellors, no more to ſend any of his Baſſaes or Captains, but to go himſelf in Perſon, with ſuch a Royal Army as ſhould be ſufficient, not to Conquer Epirus, but if need were, to fill every corner thereof. Wherefore he commanded Commiſſions to be ſpeedily-directed into all parts of his Kingdoms and Provinces, for the levying of a great Army for Hadrianople; yet whither he intended to imploy the ſame, was not known to any in the Turks Court, more than to the Baſſaes of the Council. Which cauſed all the bordering Chriſtian Princes to make the beſt preparation they could for their own aſſurance, every one fearing leſt that growing Tempeſt ſhould break out againſt himſelf. But Scanderbeg of long acquainted with the Turkiſh policy, eaſily perceived all that great preparation to be made againſt him; which he was the rather induced to think, by reaſon of the unaccuſtomed quietneſs of Amurath, who all that while had neither ſent any Army to Revenge Muſtapha's Overthrow, nor ſo much as a Garriſon for the defence of the Borders of his Kingdom, but had let all things negligently paſs, as if he had been in a dead ſleep. Beſides that, it was alſo thought that he had ſecret Intelligence from ſome of his old Friends and Acquaintance in Amuraths Court, who probably ſuſpected the matter. Wherefore Scanderbeg ſetting all other things apart, gave himſelf wholly to the preparing of things neceſſary for the defence of his ſmall Kingdom againſt ſo mighty an Enemy. Firſt, he by Letters and Meſſengers advertiſed all the Chriſtian Princes his Neighbours and Friends, of the greatneſs of the danger of that War; wherein Amurath (as he ſaid) ſought not only his deſtruction, but the utter ruine of them all; exhorting them therefore to conſider, how far the danger of ſo great an Army might extend, and therefore to ſtand faſt upon their Guard. Then he ſent Moſes and other his expert Captains into all parts of Epirus, to take up Souldiers, and all the Proviſion of Corn and Victuals that was poſſible to be had. Wherein he himſelf alſo buſily travelled day and night, not reſting until he had left nothing in the Country, whereupon the Enemy might ſhew his cruelty. Moſt part of the common people, with their Subſtance, were received into the ſtrong Cities; the reſt took the refuge of the Venetian and other Chriſtian Princes Towns and Countries farther off, until this fury were overpaſt; all ſuch as were able to bear Arms, were commanded to repair to Croia; where when they were all aſſembled, they were enough to have made a right puiſſant Army. But out of all this multitude, Scanderbeg made choice only of 10000 old expert Souldiers, whom he purpoſed to lead himſelf, to incounter with the Turks great Army, as he ſhould ſee occaſion, and placed 1300 in Garriſon in Croia. The Citizens alſo themſelves were throughly furniſhed with all manner of Weapons and other Proviſion meet for the defence of their City. Then Proclamation was made, That all the aged men unfit for Wars, with the Women and Children, ſhould depart the City, and none to be therein left, but the Garriſon-Souldiers, and ſuch Citizens as were willing to tarry, and able to bear Arms. This City of Croia was the chief City of Epirus, and of the fortune thereof ſeemed to depend the ſtate of all the other ſtrong Towns and Cities, and ſo conſequently of the whole Kingdom; for which cauſe, Scanderbeg had the greater care for the defence thereof. It was a miſerable ſight, to ſee the lamentable departure of this weak Company out of Croia; all was full of weeping and wailing; no Houſe, no Street, no part of the City was without mourning; but eſpecially in the Churches was to be ſeen the very face of common ſorrow and heavineſs; where all ſorts of people in great numbers flocking together, poured forth their devout Prayers, with fountains of Tears, ringing their hands; yea, and ſome in the impatiency of their grief forgetting themſelves, ſeemed to expoſtulate their grief with God. But when their ſorrow was with tears aſſwaged, and their Hearts ſomewhat eaſed, the aged Mothers kiſſing their Sons, gave them many a fearful commandment; ſometime rehearſing, how lovingly and tenderly they had brought them up, and otherſome times ſhewing unto them their feeble Limbs and hoary Hairs, willing them to be mindful of them. The Wives preſented their Children unto their Husbands, bewailing to leave them as childleſs Widowers, and their Houſes deſolate. The old Men mute with ſorrow, and careful of their Children, durſt neither incourage them, for fear of making them too forward; neither diſſwade them from adventuring themſelves, leſt they ſhould ſeem to love them more than their native Country. In the midſt of theſe Paſſions Commandment came from Scanderbeg, that they muſt now depart, that the Souldiers might take their places and charge. Then began their ſorrows afreſh, with piteous ſcriching and Tears; a man would have thought the City had even then been preſently taken by the Turks. They could hardly be drawn from the imbracing of their Friends, all now deſiring to remain ſtill with them in the City, partakers of their common dangers. But when they ſaw the Officers begin to be earneſt upon them, and to haſten their departure, then with heavy Hearts they took as it were their laſt farewel, and departed out of the City, ſetting their feet

many times they wiſt not where, for deſire they had to look back again upon the City. This great multitude was conveyed alſo into the Venetian Cities, and other places free from danger; whither all the Country-people which were not before received into the ſtrong Cities, reſorted alſo, with all their Subjects and Cattel; leaving nothing in all the Country of Epirus, but the bare ground for the Turks to prey upon. After this multitude was departed, and all well quieted, and none left in the City but Men fit for Service, Scanderbeg throughly ſtored it with all things needful for the defence thereof, and for the induring of a long Siege; beſides that, he gave to every Souldier convenient Armor, with ſome ſmall reward. Then he placed Uranacontes (a valiant and famous Captain, honourably deſcended) Governor of the City. And ſo having ſet all things in order for the ſafeguard thereof, after he had in few words exhorted them couragiouſly to endure the Siege, and not to liſten to Amuraths flattering and deceitful Charms, he departed out of the City unto his Army, then lying within view, and began preſently to march towards Dybra. But he was not far gone, before he met Moſes with a gallant Troop of Horſemen coming from Sfetigrade, a ſtrong City of Dybra, ſituate in the Confines of Epirus, bordering upon Macedonia; which City was Scanderbeg his ſecond care, for that it was like to be the firſt that ſhould indure the angry Tyrants fury, ſtanding firſt in his way, as it were the Fortreſs of that Country. Moſes had there ſet all things in like order, as had Scanderbeg in Croia, and had there placed one Peter Perlat (a grave and politique Man) Governor, with a ſtrong Garriſon of Souldiers choſen out of all the Country of Dybra, which were always accounted the beſt Men of War in all Epirus, and was for ſo doing greatly commended of Scanderbeg. Who delivering unto him all the Forces he had prepared for the defence of the other Caſtles and Cities of Epirus, ſent him with divers other of his Nobility and Captains, to take order for the ſafety of thoſe places, appointing unto every man his charge. As for himſelf, he with a ſmall Troop of Horſemen went to Sfetigrade, careful of that City above meaſure, as it were before divining the inſuing danger. Being come thither, and all the Souldiers aſſembled by his commandment into the Market place, he there in open Audience ſpake unto them as followeth:

Scanderbeg com- th to Sfetigrade.

e effectu- l Speech f Scanderbeg nto the Souldiers and Citi- ens of Sfetigrade, to ncourage hem a- ainſt the oming of Amurath.

Almighty God could not this day offer unto you (worthy Souldiers of Sfetigrade*) better matter, neither could a fairer occaſion be preſented unto brave Minds and Souldiers deſirous of Honour, than that which now hath cauſed you to take up moſt juſt Arms. Wherein you may for ever, by worthy example, make known your conſtant Faith and worthy Valour, both towards me in private, and the people of* Epirus in general. Hitherto we have born Arms for the Honour of our Kingdom, but now we muſt fight for our Lives, our Liberty, and the Walls of our Country. You muſt now force your ſelves, that you do not by Reproach and Cowardiſe ſtain the worthy Praiſes you have already deſerved, by the great Victories by you obtained under my Conduct. The greateſt part of the fortune of this War dependeth upon you: For, the firſt paſſage of Amurath into Epirus (that I my ſelf may be unto you the firſt Meſſenger of that danger) will be this way; the firſt fury of the Turks will aſſail you, that having here as it were broken down the ſtrongeſt Fortreſs of Epirus, he may afterwards break into the Country, more ſubject to danger. The firſt fruits of this War is yours, you (if you bear the hearts of couragious Men, mindful of your Liberty) may beat down the proud ſtrength of the haughty Enemy, and diſcover his high Conceits. The Othoman King ſhall have the beginning both of his hope and fear, of you; if he ſhall find you ſo minded, as I now ſee you gallantly moved, and with joy hear your violent Indignation; he will in every place fear a great force of danger, and thereby learn to abſtain from the other Cities of Epirus. Neither will he lie here long at a vain Siege, except the wayward old man will fooliſhly hereupon gage all his whole Forces; for ſuch is the ſituation and ſtrength of this City, that it may eaſily ſet at nought an angry Enemy. Wherefore reſolve with your ſelves (worthy Souldiers and Citizens) only by conſtancy and faithfulneſs, without bloodſhed, to gain unto your ſelves an honourable Victory. Of your Valour (which I willingly ſpeak of) dependeth for the moſt part the faithfulneſs of all the reſt; they will look upon you, whom they may praiſe or accuſe, and whoſe Example they may follow in the fortune of theſe Wars. But to what purpoſe ſhould men of worth in their actions pretend the neceſſity of Faith, or chance of Fortune? whereas by reaſon things are both beſt begun and accompliſhed. It ſeldom chanceth, that Fortune faileth the ſecond advice, or is not obedient to Vertue; and you have all things which moſt politique Care could provide for your ſafety. You want not Armor, you want not plentiful Proviſion of Victuals, you want not valiant men; the ſuperfluous multitude of unneceſſary people, the pitiful lamentation of Women, and troubleſome crying of Children ſhall not withdraw you from your publique Charge, from your ſervice and defence of your Country; I have left you alone to your ſelves, for defence of your City, your Religion, and Dwellings, that you might be encouraged only with the provocations of Honour and Liberty, with the emulation of adventure and danger, and the very ſight one of another; and I my ſelf will not be far off with my couragious Souldiers, a ſilent Beholder and Encourager of your Vertue; where although I may not avert from you all the force of the cruel Enemy by raſh adventure, nor try the whole Fortune of this War in plain Field; yet will I turn a great part of your dangers upon my ſelf, and trouble the Enemies deſigns with many a hot Skirmiſh. For as much as there is no better manner of fight, nor ſafer kind of War for us, amongſt ſuch a multitude of men, and ſo many thouſands of Souldiers, than never to offer battel unto the Enemy in plain Field, neither to adventure all upon the Fortune of one Conflict, although a man did ſee apparent ſigns of Victory. He will of purpoſe at the firſt give us the opportunity of good hap; he will feed our hardineſs with the blood of his baſe Souldiers, the eaſilier to intrap and oppreſs our raſhneſs, allured with the ſweet baits of good Fortune; but the crafty Devices of the Othoman King are by great policy and conſideration to be fruſtrated; this mighty Enemy is by little and little to be cut off as time and place ſhall give occaſion. For truly that Victory ſhould be unto me lamentable, which I ſhould buy with the blood of my Souldiers; and believe me, it would be unto me a more ſorrowful than pleaſant ſight, to ſee eight or ten thouſand of my Enemies ſlain, with the loſs of a few of you. I praiſe and honour my Subjects of Epirus for valiant Conquerors, if they ſhall not ſuffer themſelves to be conquered of the Turkiſh King. The reſt I had rather you couragious Souldiers of Dybra ſhould conſider with your ſelves, than that I ſhould ſeem to diſtruſt of your aſſured Faith, by giving you a careful and tedious Admonition.

When Scanderbeg had with chearful perſwaſion thus encouraged the Minds of them of Sfetigrade, he departed thence, and viſited divers other Cities of Epirus; where finding all things politiquely ordered by Moſes and the other Captains, whom he had put in truſt, he returned to his Army, then lying near unto Croia.

Whilſt Scanderbeg was with great carefulneſs yet thus providing for the ſafeguard of his Kingdom, in the mean time Amurath his Army was aſſembled at Hadrianople, to the number of a hundred and fifty thouſand men, whereof many were Pioneers, and men appointed for other baſe Services neceſſary at the Siege of Towns. Of this great Army Amurath ſent forty thouſand light Horſemen before him to Sfetigrade; who according to his command came and incamped before the City. The news of their coming, with a great deal more than truth, was forthwith brought to Scanderbeg, then lying with his ſmall Army near Croia; whereupon he with four thouſand Horſe, and a thouſand Foot, took the way toward Sfetigrade, and ſtrongly incamped his Army within ſeven miles of the City. Where having ſet all things in good order, he, accompanied with Moſes and Tanuſius, went by certain blind ways through the Mountains and Woods, until he came ſo near unto the City, that from the place where he ſtood, he might eaſily diſcover in what ſort the Enemy lay incamped; and ſo returning back again to his Camp, roſe with his Army in the night following, and drawing as near unto the Turks Army as he could, undiſcovered, placed all his Army in the covert of the Woods and ſecret Vallies, unperceived of his Enemies. After that, he ſent forth Moſes and Muſachi his Nephew, with thirty of his beſt Horeſemen, apparelled as if they had been but Common Souldiers, but paſſing well mounted, driving before them certain Horſes laden with Corn, by a by-way, as if they had ſecretly purpoſed to have got into the City. The day then breaking, they were diſcovered by the Turks Scouts, and ſet upon; where at the firſt Moſes and the reſt began of purpoſe to fly; but when he ſaw that they were purſued but with like number to themſelves, he turned back upon the Turks, and ſlew five of them, and chaſed the reſt unto the Camp. The General ſeeing what had happened, ſent forth four thouſand Horſemen to purſue theſe ſuppoſed Victuallers; whom they quickly recovered the ſight of, for that Moſes of purpoſe had made ſmall haſt to fly; but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Moſes left the Horſes laden with Corn, and fled; yet ſo, that he ſtill drew on the Turks with hope to overtake him, until he had brought them where Scanderbeg with his Army lay in wait; by whom they were ſuddenly aſſailed on every ſide, and with great ſlaughter put to flight. In this Conflict two thouſand of the Turks were ſlain, and a thouſand of their Horſes taken; of the Chriſtians were loſt but two and twenty. This was the firſt welcome of the Turks Army to Sfetigrade.

About eight days after came Amurath with all his Army, in the beginning of May, Anno Dom. 1449. and having made the greateſt ſhew he could with his huge Army to terrifie the Defendants; he incamped the baſer ſort of his Footmen at the foot of the Hill whereon the City ſtood, and lay himſelf with his Janizaries, and other his moſt valiant Souldiers, about three quarters of a mile further off; where after he had lien ſtill one day, and well conſidered the ſtrength of the place, toward evening he ſent a Meſſenger to the City, who requeſted to ſpeak with the Governor Perlat. Whereof he hearing came to the Wall; of whom the Meſſenger requeſted, That he would command the Souldiers ſtanding by, to go further off, foraſmuch as he had ſomething in ſecret to ſay unto him from his Maſter. Unto whom Perlat merrily anſwered; It is like indeed to be ſome great ſecret, that you would have kept not only from the hearing of my Souldiers, but from the very light of the day, and therefore have choſen the night; but I have not learned of mine Elders, to hear any Meſſage from mine Enemies by night, neither at any time elſe out of the hearing of the Garriſon Souldiers, to whom Scanderbeg hath committed the defence of this City, and I the ſafeguard of my Perſon; you muſt therefore at this time pardon me, and to morrow if your Maſter ſo pleaſe, I will hear you at large. And therefore commanded him to depart from the Walls. So he returned for that time without Audience as he came. It grieved Amurath not a little, to ſee his Meſſenger ſo lightly regarded; yet for as much as he had more hope to gain the City by large Offers, or ſome reaſonable Compoſition, than by all his great force, he diſſembled his wrath, and the next day ſent the Meſſenger again, with one of his Baſſaes, a grave and well ſpoken man, himſelf born in Epirus. This Baſſa, with three Souldiers and two Servitors, was by the Governors commandment, by one of the Ports received into the City, and brought into Saint Maries Church. Where after he had with great Eloquence ſought to inſinuate himſelf into the minds of the Governor and the hearers, and afterwards augmented the terrour of Amuraths Power beyond all meaſure, laying before them the great Victories by him obtained againſt the Hungarians and the other Chriſtian Princes; in fine, he exhorted them to yield the City unto him; in whoſe name he promiſed firſt, That the Citizens ſhould in all reſpects under his Government live as they had before done under Scanderbeg; then, That the Governor ſhould receive at Amurath his hands moſt honourable Preferments, with many rich and Princely Gifts; and, That it ſhould be lawful for the Garriſon Souldiers to depart in ſafety wither they would, and to have three hundred thouſand Aſpers divided amongſt them in reward. But when the Baſſa had ended his Speech, the Governor in this ſort replied:

If you had not delivered this Speech unto reſolute men, devoted unto the defence of their Liberty, it might perhaps have wrought ſome effect; and we (ſaid he) might peradventure liſten unto your Offers, if we were either afraid of the Othoman King, and the vain Threats of our Enemies, or elſe were weary of the Government of the noble Scanderbeg. But foraſmuch as no evil deſert of his, nor good deſert of your Maſter, hath yet paſſed, for which we ſhould prefer a ſtranger before our natural Soveraign, an Enemy before a Friend, a Turk before a Chriſtian; let your Maſter proceed firſt in his action begun, let him prove his Fortune, let him by force terrifie us, beat down our Walls, make havock of our Men, and by ſtrong hand drive us to humble our ſelves at his Feet, and to ſue for Peace. But it were a great Diſhonour, yea a thing almoſt to be laughed at, if we ſhould cowardly accept of theſe Conditions by him offered, before any Aſſault given, before one drop of Blood ſpilt, before any Souldier did ſo much as once groan for any Wound received, before one Stone were ſhaken in the Wall, or any ſmall Breach made. But your Maſter ſhall do better to raiſe his Siege, and get him back again to Hadrianople, there to ſpend the ſmall remainder of his old years in quiet, and not to provoke us his fatal Enemies, whoſe courage in defence of our Liberties, and fidelity towards our Prince, he hath ſo oftentimes proved to his great Diſhonour, and loſs of his Armies. The Faith I have once given to my Soveraign, for the defence of this City, I will never forget, until the effuſion of the laſt drop of my blood. It ſhall be unto me Reward and Honour enough, if I either living defend this City, or with loſs of my life ſhall leave my guiltleſs Soul at liberty, and my Carkaſs amongſt the dead Bodies of worthy Souldiers, when I ſhall find a way into a far better place.

The General having given this reſolute Anſwer unto the Baſſa, bountifully feaſted him that day at dinner, and afterwards led him through the midſt of the City; where he ſaw great ſtore of Victuals, by the Governor commanded of purpoſe to be ſet in ſhew, to put Amurath out of hope of winning the City by long Siege. And ſo ſent the Baſſa out by the ſame Port whereby he came in, much diſcontented with the Anſwer he was to return to his Maſter.

Sfetigrade aſſaulted.

When Amurath underſtood by the Baſſa, of the Governors Reſolution, he was therewith exceeding wrath, and thereupon with his great Ordnance battered the City three days without intermiſſion. And having by the fury of his Artillery made a ſmall Breach, he forthwith gave thereunto a moſt terrible Aſſault, labouring firſt to win the ſame by the force and multitude of his common Souldiers, which the Turks call Aſapi, whom he forced by great numbers to that Service. Of theſe Souldiers the Turk in his Wars maketh no great reckoning, but to blunt the Swords of his Enemies, or to abate their firſt fury, thereby to give the eaſier Victory to his Janizaries and other his better Souldiers; which the Othoman Kings hold for good policy. Whilſt theſe forlorn Souldiers, without reſpect of danger preſſing forward, are ſlain by heaps at the Breach, the Janizaries at the ſame time in another place attempted to have ſcaled the Walls of the City; but whilſt they with much labour and difficulty firſt crawl up the ſteep Rock whereon the City was built, and afterward deſperately mount up their Scaling-Ladders, they were by the Defendants, with huge Stones and weighty pieces of Timber caſt upon them, beaten down, wherewith they were driven headlong to the bottom of the Rock, and ſo miſerably ſlain. Many of them together with their Scaling-Ladders, were by the Chriſtians thruſt from the Wall, and tumbling from the Rock, violently carried with them others coming up behind them. Some few got to the top of the Ladders, and taking hold of the Battlements of the Walls, loſt ſome their Fingers, ſome their Hands, but moſt their Lives, being beaten down as the other were. Many of them which ſtood farther off, were then wounded alſo, and with Shot from the Walls ſlain. With this miſerable ſlaughter, and no hope to prevail, the Turks diſcouraged, began to withdraw themſelves from the Aſſault; but the Baſſaes and Captains ſtanding behind them, forced them again forward, exhorting ſome, threatning others, and beating the reſt forward with their Trunchions. By which means the Aſſault was again renewed, but not with ſuch courage as before, though with no leſs ſlaughter; which the Defendants ſeeing, gave from the Walls great tokens of Joy and Triumph. Amurath perceiving his diſcouraged Souldiers ready of themſelves to forſake the Aſſault, preſently ſent Feri-Baſſa (one of his moſt valiant Captains) with a new Supply of 3000 choſen Souldiers to renew the fight. The Chriſtians well aware of their coming, ceaſed not with continual Shot to beat them from the Walls; but ſuch was the forwardneſs of that fierce Captain, that without regard of danger; he brought his Men to the Walls, where the Defendants from above overwhelmed them with Stones, Timber, Wild-fire, and ſuch other things as are uſually prepared for the defence of Towns beſieged. For all that, Feri-Baſſa gave ſo great an Aſſault, that he ſlew divers of the Defendants upon the Walls, and had there forcibly entred, had not the Govenor, perceiving the danger, with a Company of freſh Souldiers come with ſpeed to the defence of that place; whereby the Enemy was preſently repulſed, and driven again from the Walls. Amurath ſeeing the great ſlaughter of his Men, and no hope of ſucceſs, cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, and ſo leaving the Aſſault, retired again into his Camp. The great loſs and diſhonour at this Aſſault received, much troubled his wayward mind; who for all that yet ceaſed not to give the like vain Attempts. At length, the Captain of the Janizaries perceiving that part of the City which was fartheſt from the Camp, to be commonly but ſlenderly manned, by reaſon that it ſeemed a place impregnable, both for the height and ſteepneſs of the Rock; told Amurath, That he would aſſay (if it ſo pleaſed him) ſecretly in the night to attempt by that place to enter the City; whereas they thought nothing was more to be feared, than the height thereof, which they, ſupported with the wings of deſire, doubted not to mount unto. This his device exceedingly pleaſed the King, and was the next night with great ſilence put in execution. But ſuch was the carefulneſs of the Governor over every part of his charge, that nothing could be done againſt the ſame, but that it was forthwith by him diſcovered. The Governor advertiſed by the Watch, of the Turks Attempt, with great ſilence preſently repaired to the place with a great Company of the Garriſon Souldiers, and ſtanding cloſe, from the top of the Wall beheld the Turks, as it had been a ſwarm of Emmets, climing up the high Rocks, and one helping up another, by ſuch deſperate way, as was in reaſon to have been thought no man would have attempted. But when they were come to the top of the Rock, and now even ready to enter, they were from above ſuddenly overwhelmed, as it had been with a ſhower of Shot, and ſo violently forced down that high Rock, that moſt part of them which had got up to any height, were miſerably cruſhed to death, either with the weight of themſelves, or with others falling upon them, and many of the reſt ſlain with Shot from the top of the Rock; whereof Amurath preſently underſtanding, was therewith exceedingly grieved.

The Turks repulſed, retire.

The Janizaries repulſed.

During the time of this Siege Scanderbeg never lay long ſtill in one place, but removed continually from place to place, as beſt ſerved his purpoſe, breaking ſometimes into one quarter of the Turks Camp, and ſometime into another, and ſtraightway ſo ſuddenly gone again, and as it were vaniſhed out of ſight, that Amurath many times wondred what was become of him. At this time, being the later end of June, he was come with his Army within eight miles of Amuraths Camp; and from thence ſent Moſes his greateſt Captain, in the attire of a common Souldier, with two other, to take view how the Enemy lay incamped. By which truſty Eſpials he was informed, That the Turks lay in great ſecurity, as men without fear, keeping but negligent Watch. Of which opportunity, Scanderbeg rejoycing, the night following ſuddenly aſſaulted one quarter of the Turks Camp. Whoſe coming, although it was a little before by the Turks Scouts diſcovered, yet his furious Aſſault was ſo ſudden and ſo forcible, that he ſlew two thouſand of the Turks, and filled every corner of that great Camp with fear and tumult, before they could well arm themſelves or make reſiſtance. After which ſlaughter he ſafely retired, carrying away with him two hundred and thirty Horſe, with ſeven of the Turks Enſigns, having in this Skirmiſh loſt of his Men but two and forty; whoſe dead bodies the Turks the next morning in revenge of their ſlain Friends hewed into ſmall pieces.

Upon theſe great Diſgraces one following in the neck of another, Amurath having no other Object but the City to ſhew his fury upon, gave three fierce Aſſaults unto the ſame, one after another, and was always with loſs both of his Men and Honour repulſed. But the more he loſt, the more he burnt with deſire of Revenge, perſwading his Souldiers, That as the ſtrongeſt Cities and Fortreſſes were built by Mens hands, ſo were they to be overthrown and laid even with the ground by reſolute and valiant men; incouraging them to a freſh Aſſault, with greater promiſes of Reward than ever he had done before in all his Wars, from the firſt beginning of his Reign. And becauſe he would with more ſafety give this his laſt and greateſt Aſſault, he appointed Feri-Baſſa, with twelve thouſand Horſemen and ſix thouſand Foot to attend upon Scanderbeg, if he ſhould hap to come (as he thought he would) to trouble the Aſſault, by aſſailing of his Camp. Feri-Baſſa glad of this charge, well hoping now to redeem his former Overthrow with ſome great Victory, and leading forth his Army a little from the Camp, as he was commanded, ſo lay; wiſhing for nothing more than the coming of Scanderbeg; vainly boaſting, That he would ſeek him in the Field, and there try his Force and Fortune with him hand to hand; which he did ſhortly after to his coſt. When Amurath had thus ſet in order all things requiſite, as well for the Siege, as for the ſafeguard of his Camp, the next morning he compaſſed the City round about with his Army, and covered the ground with his Men of War, purpoſing at that time to gage his whole Forces upon the taking thereof. The Walls he had before in ſome places battered, ſo much as was poſſible; and yet but ſo, as that they were not without Scaling-Ladders to be aſſaulted; partly for the natural ſtrength of the place, and partly for that the Defendants had with great diligence continually repaired and filled up with earth what the fury of the Canon had thrown down. This Aſſault Amurath began firſt with his Archers and ſmall Shot, which delivered their Arrows and Bullets upon the top of the Wall, and into the City, as if it had been a ſhower of Hail, thereby to trouble the ſtationary Souldiers. In this heat, Ladders were clapped to the Walls in every place where any could be poſſibly reared, and the Turks began deſperately to ſcale the Walls; but the Chriſtians nothing diſmaid thereat, with great courage reſiſted them, and with Shot from their ſafe ſtandings wounded and ſlew many of them; yet others ſtill preſſed up in the places of them that were ſlain, ſo that the Aſſault began moſt terribly in many places at once, but eſpecially near to the great Gate of the City; where the Turks had upon the ſudden with Ladders, Timber, and Planks clapt together, raiſed cloſe unto that Tower, as it had been a wooden Tower, equal in height to the Wall; from whence the Turks greatly diſtreſſed the Chriſtians in that place, fighting with them as if it had been upon even ground, ſtill ſending up freſh Souldiers in ſtead of them that were ſlain; and thereby prevailed ſo far, that they had ſet up certain of Amuraths Enſigns upon the Wall, to the great comfort of the Turks, and aſtoniſhment of the beſieged Chriſtians. The Governor ſeeing the eminent danger, haſted to the place with a Company of freſh and valiant Souldiers, by whoſe force the Turks were quickly repulſed from the Wall, their Enſigns taken and ſent into the Market place; the Tower of wood with many Ladders and much Timber by the Turks brought to that place, was quickly conſumed with Wild-fire caſt upon the ſame from the Walls. Perlat having delivered the City of this fear, preſently placed freſh Souldiers in ſtead of them which were ſlain or hurt, and ſo worthily defended the City.

Whilſt Amurath was giving this great Aſſault to Sfetigrade, Scanderbeg to withdraw him from the ſame, came with nine thouſand Souldiers to aſſail the Turks Camp, as Amurath had before ſuſpected, and was now come very near the ſame. Feri-Baſſa glad of his coming, oppoſed his Army againſt him; which Scanderbeg ſeeing, retired a little of purpoſe to draw the Baſſa farther from the Camp, and then forthwith began to joyn battel with him. The Baſſa conſidering the ſmall number of his Enemies, and his own greater Power, withdrew four thouſand Horſemen out of his Army to fetch a compaſs about, and to ſet upon the rereward of Scanderbegs Army; hoping ſo to encloſe him, that he ſhould never eſcape thence, but there either to be ſlain or taken alive, and his Army utterly defeated. But the expert Captain perceiving his purpoſe, to meet therewith, left Moſes to lead the main Battel, and he himſelf with two thouſand Horſemen, ſo valiantly charged thoſe four thouſand of his Enemies before they were well departed from the reſt of the Baſſaes Army, that they had now more cauſe to look to their own ſafety, than how to circumvent others. In this Conflict Feri-Baſſa hand to hand, as he had oft times before deſired, encountring with Scanderbeg, was by him there ſlain. All this while that Scanderbeg was in fight with Feri-Baſſa in the right Wing of the Army, and Muſachy in the left, Moſes ſtood faſt, receiving the Aſſault of the Enemy without moving any thing forward, expecting the ſucceſs of the Wings. But Scanderbeg having diſcomfited the right Wing, and ſlain the General, coming now in, he ſet forward with ſuch force and courage, that the Turks not able longer to abide his force, turned their backs and fled; of whom many were ſlain in this chaſe, though Scanderbeg doubting the great Power of his Enemy ſo nigh at hand, durſt not follow them far; but ſounding a Retreat, put his Army again in good order, for fear of ſome ſudden Attempt from the Camp, and after appointed ſome of the meaneſt of his Souldiers to take the ſpoil of the ſlain Turks. When Amurath had underſtood what had hapned to Feri-Baſſa, he was ſo overcome with anger and melancholy, that for a while he could not ſpeak one word; but after the heat was a little paſt, he commanded certain ſmall pieces of Ordnance, which he had before uſed againſt the City, to be removed into the Camp, and there placed upon that ſide which was moſt in danger to the Enemy. He alſo preſently ſent thither four thouſand Souldiers to joyn with the remainder of Feri-Baſſaes Army, for defence of the Camp, with ſtrait charge that they ſhould not iſſue out of the Trenches. Nevertheleſs he himſelf continued the Aſſault of the City all that day; but when night drew on, and no hope appeared for him to prevail, he cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded; and leaving the Aſſault, he returned again into his Camp. At this Aſſault Amurath loſt ſeven thouſand Men, beſide many that died afterwards of their wounds; but of the Garriſon Souldiers were ſlain but ſeventy, and ninety more hurt.

The terrour of the Turkiſh Army began now to grow in contempt throughout Epirus; and Scanderbeg was in good hope, that Amurath after ſo many Overthrows and ſhameful Repulſes, would at length raiſe his Siege and be gone; yet he ſent Spies continually to diſcover what was done in the Turks Camp, and he himſelf with two thouſand Souldiers would oftentimes ſhew himſelf upon the ſides of the Mountains near unto Amurath his Camp, of purpoſe to draw the Turks out, that he might take them at ſome advantage. But the old King had given Commandment upon pain of death, That no man ſhould go out of the Trenches without leave, or once to ſpeak of giving Battel or Aſſault; ſo that he lay certain days in his Camp, not like a King beſieging of a City, but more like a man beſieged himſelf; the which his ſtill lying, Scanderbeg had the more in diſtruſt, fearing greatly that he was hatching ſome miſchief, which ſo ſoon as it was ripe would violently break out.

Amurath by great Promiſes ſeeketh to corrupt the Garriſon of Sfetigrade

The Carkaſs of a Dog caſt by the Traytor into the common Well that ſerved the City.

The Governor in vain ſeeketh to perſwade the Garriſon Souldiers to drink of the water of the well.

Amurath conſidering with what evil Succeſs he had many times aſſaulted the City, and holding it for a great diſhonour to raiſe his Siege and depart, having done nothing worth the remembrance; thought good once again to prove, if it were poſſible to overcome the minds of the Garriſon Souldiers with Gifts, whom he was not able to ſubdue by force. For which purpoſe he ſent an Embaſſador unto the City, offering unto the beſieged and Garriſon Souldiers eaſie Conditions of Peace, with ſuch large Gifts and Rewards as had not been heard offered to any Garriſon in former time. All which his magnifical Promiſes were lightly rejected by the common conſent of all the whole Garriſon, prefering their faithful Loyalty before all his golden Mountains. For all that, Amurath was in good hope, that amongſt ſo many, ſome would be found, into whoſe minds his large Offers might make ſome Impreſſion; wherein he was not deceived. For one baſe-minded Fellow amongſt the reſt, corrupted with the Turks great Promiſes, preferring his own private wealth, before the welfare of his Country, waiting his time had ſecret conference with the Turks Eſpials, promiſing upon aſſurance of ſuch Reward as was before by Amurath profered, to find means that in few days the City ſhould be yielded into his Power. This corrupted Traytor, had laid many miſchievous Plots for the effecting of this horrible Treaſon, but the firſt device he put in practiſe, which of all others a man would have thought to have been of leaſt moment, ſerved his wicked purpoſe in ſtead of all the reſt. All the Garriſon Souldiers of Sfetigrade were of the upper Country of Dibra, put into that City, by Moſes, for their approved Valour above all the other Souldiers of Epirus. But as they were men of great courage, ſo were they exceeding ſuperſtitious both in their Religion and manner of living, putting nice difference betwixt one kind of lawful Meat and other; accounting ſome clean, ſome unclean; abhorring from that, which they fondly deemed unclean, with more than a Jewiſh Superſtition, chooſing rather to die than to eat or drink thereof; ſuch is the ſtrong deluſion of blind Error, where it hath throughly poſſeſſed the minds of men. The City of Sfetigrade (as is aforeſaid) is ſituate upon the top of a great high Rock, as moſt of the Cities of Epirus now be, and was then watered but with one great Well in the midſt of the City, which ſunk deep into the Rock, plentifully ſerved both the publick and private uſe of the Inhabitants. Into this common Well the malicious Traytor in the night time caſt the foul ſtinking carrion Carkaſs of a dead Dog, knowing, that the conceited Garriſon Souldiers of Dibra, would rather indure the pains of death, and ſtarve, or elſe yield up the City, upon any condition, than to drink of that polluted water. In the morning when that ſtinking Carrion was eſpied, and drawn out of the Well, the report thereof was quickly bruted in every corner of the City, and that the Well was poyſoned; ſo that all the people were in manner in an uproar about the finding out of the Traytor. The Citizens were exceeding ſorry for that had hapned, but the Garriſon Souldiers deteſted that loathſome and unclean water (as they accounted it) more than the Turkiſh Servitude, proteſting, that they would rather periſh with thirſt, than drink thereof. Whereupon ſome of them deſired to ſet fire upon the City, and whilſt they had yet ſtrength, to break through the Enemies Camp or there manfully to die. And they which thought beſt of the matter, requeſted, that the City might be yielded up; for now, they diſcouraged with a Superſtitious Vanity, could be content to hearken to the former conditions of Peace, yea they were ready enough of themſelves to ſue to Amurath for Peace, though it had been upon harder terms. The Governor troubled with that had hapned, and aſtonied to ſee ſo great an alteration in the minds of his Souldiers upon ſo ſmall occaſion; could not tell whether he might think it to proceed of a ſuperſtitious conceit, or of ſome ſecret compact made with Amurath. But the better to pacifie the matter, he came into the Market place, and there in the hearing of all the Garriſon, with many effectual Reaſons, exhorted them to continue faithful unto their Prince and Country in that honourable Service; and in a matter of ſo great conſequence to make ſmall reckoning to uſe that water, which would eaſily in ſhort time be brought again to the wonted purity and cleanneſs; and to perſwade them the rather, he went preſently to the Well himſelf, and in the ſight of them all drunk a great Draught of the Water, whoſe example the Citizens following, drank likewiſe. But when it was offered to the Captains and Souldiers of the Garriſon, they all refuſed to taſt thereof, as if it had been a moſt loathſome thing, or rather ſome deadly poyſon, and with great inſtance cried unto the Governor, to give up the City; for which cauſe many thought they were corrupted by Amuraths great Promiſes. Howbeit none of the Garriſon (except that one Traytor) did ever afterwards revolt to the Turkiſh King, or yet appeared any thing the richer for any Gift received, whereby ſuch ſuſpition might be confirmed. When the Governor ſaw that the obſtinate minds of the Garriſon were not to be moved with any Perſwaſion or Reward (whereof he ſpared not to make large Promiſe) nor by any other means which he could deviſe; he called unto him his chief Captains, with the beſt ſort of the Citizens, and reſolved with them full ſore againſt his will to yield up the City to Amurath, on ſuch conditions as they themſelves there agreed upon; which were, That it ſhould be lawful for all the Captains and Souldiers to depart in ſafety with their Armor and all other things; and that ſo many of the Citizens as would ſtay, might there ſtill dwell in the City, in ſuch ſort, as they had done before, under the Government of Scanderbeg; the reſt that liſted not to remain there ſtill, might at their pleaſure with Bag and Baggage depart whether they would. Glad was Amurath when this Offer was made unto him, and granted them all that was deſired, ſaving that he would not conſent that the Citizens ſhould continue in the City, yet was he content that they ſhould live under him as they had done before, quietly enjoying all their Poſſeſſions, but to build their houſes without the Wall of the City; which condition ſome accepted, and ſome forſaking all, went to Scanderbeg. When all was throughly agreed upon, the Keys of the Gates were delivered to Amurath, and the Governor with the Captains, and all the Garriſon Souldiers ſuffered quietly to paſs through the Turkiſh Camp, as the King had promiſed. Howbeit, Mahomet the Son of Amurath, a Prince of a cruel diſpoſition, earneſtly perſwaded his Father, to have broken his Faith, and to have put them all to the Sword; ſaying, It was one of their Prophet Mahomets chief Commandments, to uſe all cruelty for the deſtruction of the Chriſtians. But the old King would not therein hearken unto his Son, ſaying, That he which was deſirous to be great among men, muſt either be indeed faithful of his Word and Promiſe, or at leaſtwiſe ſeem ſo to be, thereby to gain the minds of the people, who naturally abhor the Government of a faithleſs and cruel Prince. The Traytor which corrupted the Water, remained ſtill in the City, and was by Amurath rewarded with three rich Suits of Apparel, and fifty thouſand Aſpers, and had given unto him beſides a yearly Penſion of two thouſand Ducats. But ſhort was the joy the Traytor had of this evil gotten Goods; for after he had a few days vainly triumphed in the midſt of Amurath his Favours, he was ſuddenly gone, and never afterwards ſeen or heard of; being ſecretly made away (as was ſuppoſed) by the commandment of Amurath, whoſe noble heart could not but deteſt the Traytor, although the Treaſon ſerved well his purpoſe. Amurath entring into Sfetigrade, cauſed the Walls to be forthwith repaired, and placed one thouſand two hundred Janizaries in Garriſon there. And raiſing his Camp the firſt of September, departed out of Epirus, having loſt thirty thouſand of his Turks at the Siege of Sfetigrade; much grieved in mind for all that, that he could not vanquiſh the Enemy, whom he came of purpoſe to ſubdue. In his return, the Vice-Roy of Aſia marched before him with the Aſian Souldiers; in the rereward followed the Vice-Roy of Europe with his European Souldiers; in the midſt was Amurath himſelf, compaſſed about with his Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court. Scanderbeg underſtanding of Amurath his departure, followed ſpeedily with eight thouſand Horſemen, and three thouſand Foot, and taking the advantage of the thick Woods and Mountain ſtraits (to him well known) whereby that great Army was to paſs, oftentimes skirmiſhed with the Turks, charging them ſometime in the Vaward, and ſometime in the Rereward, ſometime on the one ſide, and ſometime on the other, and ſlew many of them; whereby he ſo troubled Amurath his paſſage, that he was glad to leave the Vice-Roy of Romania, with 30000 to attend upon Scanderbeg, that he himſelf might in the mean time with more ſafety march away with the reſt of his Army. Scanderbeg perceiving the ſtay of the Vice-Roy, ceaſed to follow Amurath further, fearing to be encloſed between thoſe two great Armies. The Vice-Roy ſeeing that Scanderbeg was retired, after he had ſtaid a few days, followed his Maſter to Hadrianople, and ſo Scanderbeg returned to Croia.

A Traytor worthily rewarded according to his Treaſon.

Shortly after the departure of Amurath out of Epirus, Scanderbeg left two thouſand Souldiers upon the Borders for defence of the Country againſt the Turks. Theſe Souldiers ſo ſtraightly kept in the Janizaries left in Garriſon at Sfetigrade that they could not look out of the City, but that they were intercepted and ſlain. And within a few days after came himſelf with an Army of eighteen thouſand, and laid ſiege to Sfetigrade the ſpace of a month, which was from the middle of September until the middle of October. In which time he gave two great Aſſaults to have recovered the City, but was both times repulſed, with the loſs of five hundred men. Amurath underſtanding that Scanderbeg lay at the ſiege of Sfetigrade, ſent with all ſpeed to recall his Army, but lately before diſperſed. Whereof Scanderbeg having Intelligence, conſidering alſo the difficulty of the Enterpriſe, with the approach of Winter, raiſed his Siege, and returned to Croia; where he ſet all things in the ſame order he had done before the coming of Amurath to the Siege of Sfetigrade, and put two thouſand of his beſt Souldiers there in Garriſon, under the charge of the famous Captain Uranacontes, and ſtored his City with ſufficient Victual for a years Siege, wherein he had great help from the Venetians and other Chriſtian Princes, for that there was then great ſcarcity of all things in Epirus, by reaſon of the late Wars. The like care he had alſo of all the reſt of his Cities, being continually advertiſed from his ſecret Friends in the Turks Court, of the great preparation intended againſt him by the Turkiſh King, againſt the beginning of the next Spring.

1450. Amurath aſſembleth again his Army at Hadrianople.

Amurath underſtanding that Scanderbeg was departed from Sfetigrade, changed his former determination for the calling back again of his Army, and appointed it to meet again at Hadrianople, in the beginning of March following; whether the Baſſaes, and other great Commanders, at the time appointed, aſſembled with their Companies, according as Amurath had before commanded. So that by the latter end of March, he had there in readineſs an Army of an hundred and threeſcore thouſand men ſtrong. Of which great multitude, he after the manner of the Turkiſh Wars, ſent forty thouſand Horſemen, under the leading of Sebalyas a politick Captain, as his Vauntcourriers into Epirus, in the beginning of April, in the year, 1450. The valiant Captain with great ſpeed and no reſiſtance entred into Epirus, as was given him in charge, and without let came to Croia; where, after he had adviſedly conſidered of the ſituation thereof, and of the places thereabouts, he ſtrongly encamped himſelf near thereunto in the pleaſant Plain called Tyranna; and there within his Trenches kept his Souldiers cloſe, attending nothing more, but that no new ſupply of Men, Munition, or Victuals, ſhould be conveyed into the City, more than was therein before his coming. For he was not able with his Horſemen to do any thing againſt the City; and Scanderbeg had left nothing abroad in the Country Subject to his fury. Beſides that, he was expreſly by Amurath forbidden to attempt any thing againſt Scanderbeg himſelf.

After Sebalyas had twenty days thus lien encamped before Croia, neither doing nor taking harm; Amurath by reaſon of his great age, having marched oftentimes but five miles a day, came thither alſo with his whole Army, wherewith he filled all the Country round about; the very ſight whereof, had been enough to have diſcouraged the ſame Garriſon in Croia, had they not been men both of great Experience and Reſolution. Where after he had ſpent four days in ſetling of his Camp, he ſent two Meſſengers unto the Governor (as the manner of the Turks is) offering him if he would yield up the City, that it ſhould be lawful for him with all his Souldiers in ſafety with Bag and Baggage to depart; part; and the Governor himſelf to receive in Reward two hundred thouſand Aſpers, with an honourable Place amongſt the great Baſſaes of his Court, if it would pleaſe him to accept thereof; and further, that the Citizens ſhould enjoy all their ancient Liberties as in former time, without any alteration; with promiſe alſo of greater. Theſe Meſſengers coming to the Gates of the City, could not be ſuffered to enter, but ſtanding without, were commanded there to deliver their Meſſage; which when the Governor had heard, he ſcornfully rejected their Offers, and returned the Meſſengers ſhamefully derided by the Souldiers which ſtood upon the Wall. Amurath more offended with this Contempt, than the refuſal of his Offers; and ſeeing no other means to gain the City, converted all his devices unto the Siege thereof. Wherefore he firſt commanded ten great pieces of Artillery to be forthwith caſt, for he had brought with him none ready made, becauſe of the difficult paſſage over the high Mountains into Epirus; whereby it ſeemed to be a matter of infinite trouble to have brought his great Ordnance; and therefore carried with him great ſtore of Metal in maſs, whereof at his pleaſure to make his great Artillery as he ſaw cauſe. In fifteen days this work was brought to perfection, and ten pieces of huge greatneſs were ready mounted upon Carriages. Six of them he placed againſt the Eaſt ſide of the City, towards the Plain of Tyranna, and the other four againſt the Gate; in which two places only, Croia, was ſubject to battery, being on all other parts naturally defended with impregnable Rocks, upon the tops whereof were built fair Battlements, more for beauty than needful defence. Theſe two places Amurath battered four days continually, and with the fury of his Artillery had in both places beaten down half the Wall, and ſore ſhaken the reſt. Wherewith the Turks were exceedingly encouraged, and with great chearfulneſs made all things ready to aſſault theſe Breaches, whenſoever Amurath ſhould command, ſtriving among themſelves who ſhould ſhew himſelf moſt forward in that dangerous Enterpriſe. And Mahomet the young Prince, the more to encourage the Souldiers, beſides the great Rewards by his Father propoſed; promiſed of himſelf to give an hundred thouſand Aſpers unto him that ſhould firſt ſet up an Enſign upon the Walls of the City. The Garriſon Souldiers on the other ſide, conſidering that the whole State and Welfare of Epirus was repoſed in their valour; and that the Eyes of moſt part of Chriſtendom were as it were fixed upon them, were nothing diſmayed with the Breaches made, but manfully comforted and encouraged one another to endure all manner of peril and danger that might poſſibly chance; but eſpecially the worthy Governor Uranacontes, who going through the midſt of his Souldiers, and ſhaking ſome of them by the hands, withall ſaid:

The chearful Speech of Uranacontes the Governor to encourage his Souldiers.

Theſe, theſe are the Fortreſſes of our City, theſe are the invincible Bulwarks, theſe are the irremovable Stones and ſureſt Cement. What Honour? what Praiſe? what Triumph ſhould we hope for? if theſe Walls ſtanding whole and ſtrong, we ſhould lie ſhrouded under the defence of them, and not they defended by us? So can Cowards defend Cities, and Sheep fear not the Wolves rage, when they are ſafely ſhut up within the Walls of their Sheep-coats: But that is the praiſe of the Walls, and not of the Men. Worthy Caſtriot our Prince hath commended this his City to be defended by us, and not us by it. Honour is attended upon with danger, and foſtered up amongſt perils; every baſe Mariner may be a Maſter in fair Weather; and firm things ſtand of themſelves, and need not our upholding. Wherefore, men of worth ſhun ſuch things, which being kept or loſt, yield like praiſe. Things ready to fall, need ſhoaring, and thither haſteth Honour, and there (worthy Souldiers) appeareth Courage and Valour. Wherefore let our valiant right hands defend theſe broken Breaches, and in ſtead of theſe dead Walls, couragiouſly oppoſe our luſty and lively armed Bodies againſt the Force of our Enemies. If theſe Walls ſtood ſtill firm, and unbattered, you ſhould then fight from the top of them like Women; but now that they are ſomething ſhaken, you ſhall as men ſtand upon ſomewhat more even ground, and encounter your Enemies hand to hand, the better to ſatisfie your furious deſire. Where I alſo in the thickeſt, ſhall eaſily view and judge of every mans private courage in particular, and of all your Valour in common. And yet if we well conſider of the matter, the place it ſelf doth yet notably make for us; and our former good hopes are little or nothing by theſe ſmall Breaches diminiſhed; for, this riſing of the Hill (not poſſible to be taken from us) although it be not ſo high as it is in other places, yet, doth it not ſerve us ſufficiently at great advantage to charge our Enemies, and hinder their Aſſault? The ſteepneſs whereof, as it will be troubleſome unto them, ſo will it keep us moſt freſh in ſtrength, and make our Shot more forcible. Wherefore this had been a thing of us to have been wiſhed for, if we deſire the ſlaughter of our Enemies at this Siege; or if we wiſh for perpetual Honour and Glory by this War. For this Breach of the Walls will encourage theſe Barbarians, and allure their armed men to clime up in greater multitude than if the Walls were whole; whereof ſo many ſhall on every ſide be eaſily ſlain, as we ſhall but aim at; except you had rather ſit ſtill, holding your hands together in your Boſomes as Cowards. Their dead bodies ſhall fill up the Breaches again, if you be men mindful of your Liberty. What is there (worthy Captains and Souldiers) that letteth our Victory? or memorable ſlaughter of our Enemies? by whom only theſe two places of the City can be aſſaulted; all the reſt is out of danger, and fears no Enemies force. Here only is the pains to be taken, this only is left for you to defend, and here ſhall you all be; the courage, force, and ſtrength of you all ſhall in this place appear. How will you ſo many worthy Captains, and valiant Souldiers, in ſo little room beſtow your ſelves? We are too many Defendants for ſo ſmall Breaches. Yet let us play the Men, and do our endeavour; let us in one Conflict weaken the Tyrants ſtrength; and burſt his proud heart; he will forſake this City, and raiſe his Siege unfortunately begun, ſo ſoon as he ſhall ſee his firſt Aſſault to coſt him the lives of ſo many thouſands of his Men.

Croia aſſaulted.

When Uranacontes had with this comfortable Speech thus encouraged his Souldiers, againſt the Aſſault which he expected the next day; and had with great care and diligence ſet all things in order for the ſame, and repaired the Breaches as well as was poſſible in that caſe, he gave them leave for that night to take their reſt. In the morning Amurath commanded the Aſſault to be given to both the Breaches, which was forthwith by the Turks chearfully begun, and every man buſie to perform the Service he was appointed unto. But by that time that the Aſſault was well begun, a ſudden Alarum was raiſed throughout all the Turks Camp; for Scanderbeg with five thouſand valiant Souldiers, had ſuddenly broken in upon one ſide of the Turks great Camp, and at the firſt Encounter had ſlain ſix hundred of the Turks, and was now ſpoiling their Tents. The rumour whereof, troubled the whole Camp, and made the Turks with leſs courage courage to aſſault the Breaches, for fear of the danger behind them. Amurath although he had great confidence in them whom he had before left for ſafeguard of his Tents, yet for more ſurety ſent Seremet one of his greateſt Captains, with four thouſand Souldiers back into the Camp, for more ſurety; ſaying, That nothing could be too ſure, againſt that wild Beaſt: meaning the fury of Scanderbeg. Mahomet alſo the young Prince, haſted thither in great choler with his Guard, much againſt his Fathers will. But Moſes, Scanderbegs Lieutenant, knowing himſelf too weak to withſtand the multitude that was ſwarming thither (contenting himſelf with that which was already done) had before Mahomets coming, ſpeedily retired with all his Army into the ſafeguard of the Mountains, from whence he came; having done great harm in the Turks Camp, with the loſs but of ten men. Scanderbeg in the heat of this Skirmiſh, forgetting himſelf, had ſo far engaged himſelf among the Turks, that he was by them on every ſide encloſed, and in great danger to have been ſlain or taken; yet valiantly breaking through them, he eſcaped the danger, and recovered the Mountains, and with much ado came at length to his Camp, to the great joy and comfort of them all, being before in great fear he had been loſt. This was accounted the greateſt overſight of Scanderbeg in all his Wars; for ſo much as the Office of a good General conſiſteth not in adventuring of his Perſon to manifeſt danger, but in the politick Government of his charge. During the time that Scanderbeg thus aſſailed the Turks Camp, Amurath but faintly aſſaulted the Breaches, expecting the ſucceſs in the Camp; but when he underſtood that Scanderbeg was retired, and all quieted, he brought all his Forces to the Walls, and firſt with the multitude of his Archers and ſmall Shot laboured to drive the Defendants from the Walls, overwhelming them with Arrows falling as thick as Hail. And likewiſe at the ſame time other common Souldiers of baſer account, brought Scaling-Ladders and other things needful for the ſcaling of the Walls. After whom alſo followed the Janizaries and other choſen Souldiers, ready to mount the Ladders ſo ſoon as they ſhould be ſet to the Walls. But whilſt they climb up the high Hills in this order, the Garriſon Souldiers made ſuch ſlaughter of them with Shot from the Walls and out of the City, that they would have preſently retired, had they not been forced forward by their Captains, who ſpared neither ſtripes nor wounds, when words would not ſerve. By this tyrannical means, the Scaling-Ladders were with great ſlaughter of the common Souldiers ſet up againſt the Walls, and the Turks climing up, came to handy-blows with the Defendants at the Breaches; nothing was to be heard but the crying of People, the clattering of Armor, and the Inſtruments of War, which was terribly redoubled with the Ecchoes from the Mountains round about. The Turks doing what they might to win the Breaches, were by the Chriſtians worthily repulſed, and with their Ladders tumbled headlong down the Mountain, with ſuch horrible ſlaughter and diſcomfiture, eſpecially of the common Souldiers, that none of them would ſet one foot forward again toward the Walls, although they had ſmall hope to ſave themſelves by retiring back; for the fierce young Prince Mahomet even then making ſhew of his cruel diſpoſition, cauſed them that returned, to be ſlain, by the terrour thereof to drive others forward. Theſe common Souldiers, whom the Turks make ſmall reckoning of, are for the moſt part miſerable Chriſtians, which live in ſuch Countries as had ſometimes received the Faith of Chriſt, but are now under the Turkiſh ſlavery; of which ſort of wretched people the Turkiſh Tyrants draw with them great multitudes in their Wars, moſt commonly unarmed, becauſe they dare not well truſt them in Wars againſt the Chriſtians; theſe carry all the Baggage of the Camp; theſe ſerve to fetch Wood and Water for other Souldiers of better account; theſe ſerve in ſtead of Pioneers, to caſt Trenches and raiſe Bulwarks; and when battel is to be given, if it be in plain field, theſe have then Weapons put into their hands, and thruſt into the fore-front of the battel, to blunt the Enemies Swords; but if a City be to be beſieged, theſe ſerve as fit matter to fill up the Breaches with their dead Bodies, or to make Bridges for other Souldiers to paſs over upon; and if they ſhrink to attempt any thing they are commanded, then are they more cruelly uſed by their Commanders than by their Enemies. When Amurath ſaw his Souldiers ſo diſcouraged, he ſtood in doubt whether it were better for that time to ſound a Retreat, or to ſend a new Supply; but being inraged with the loſs of his Men, and deſirous to be in ſome part revenged, he ſent divers Companies of his better Souldiers, for the incouragement of them which were before diſcouraged, and ſo gave a freſh Aſſault; but with as evil or worſe ſucceſs than before; for Uranacontes had withdrawn from the Breaches all thoſe Souldiers which had indured the former Aſſault, and placed other freſh and luſty Men in their ſtead; who incouraged with the former Victory, and loth to be accounted inferior to their Fellows, repulſed the Turks with double ſlaughter; until that the aged King, not able longer to behold the endleſs loſs of his Men, cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded; which all his Souldiers were glad to hear, and ſo returned into his Camp, having loſt in thoſe two Aſſaults eight thouſand Men, without any notable harm done unto the Defendants worth the remembrance.

Mahomet thinking to deceive Scanderbeg, is himſelf by him deceived.

This ſhameful Repulſe much grieved all the Captains and Commanders of Amuraths Army, but eſpecially Mahomet the young Prince, whoſe violent nature unacquainted with miſhap, burnt impatiently with Revenge. Wherefore underſtanding that Scanderbeg lay intrenched upon the Mountain of Tumeniſt, not far from his Fathers Army, he drew moſt of the beſt and readieſt Souldiers of all the whole Camp, into that quarter which was neareſt unto Scanderbeg; of purpoſe that if he ſhould again aſſail the Camp in that place (as it was moſt like he would) he ſhould be incountred with ſo many brave and valiant Men there in readineſs, as that it ſhould be hard for him either to do any great harm, or for himſelf to eſcape. Of all which, Scanderbeg by certain Fugitives had Intelligence, as alſo in what order the Camp lay; whereupon he left Moſes with five hundred Souldiers in the place where he lay; taking order with him before his departure, that he at a certain appointed hour in the night following, ſhould aſſail the Turks Camp in the quarter next unto him where Mahomet lay; and having there raiſed ſome tumult, ſpeedily to retire again to his aſſured ſtrength in the Mountain. Scanderbeg himſelf with the whole ſtrength of his Army, in number about 8000, in the mean time took a compaſs, and by certain ſecret by-ways through the Woods and Mountains, came unto the farther ſide of the Turks Camp, to a place called Mountecle. The night following, Moſes at the appointed hour with his 500 Souldiers aſſailed that part of the Turks Camp next unto him, with ſuch noiſe and tumult as if it had been ſome great Army. By occaſion whereof, all the Turks Camp was in alarm, and drew in haſt to that place where they heard that great tumult, as was before by Mahomet commanded. When at the ſame inſtant, Scanderbeg with all his Army brake into the other ſide of the Turks Camp, where he was leaſt feared or looked for, and from whence the beſt Souldiers were before drawn by Mahomet; and there made ſuch ſlaughter and havock of the reſt (not knowing which way to turn themſelves) that the loſs a little before received under the Walls of Croia, was now forgot, as a ſmall thing in compariſon of this. Moſes having raiſed a great fear, and done little harm, returned in ſafety to his well known ſtrength; and Scanderbeg having made great ſpoil in the Camp, fearing to be oppreſſed with the multitude of his Enemies, if he ſhould there longer ſtay, returned in good time, having ſcarce loſt one Man.

Amurath after this great loſs and trouble of his Camp, withdrew moſt of his ſmall Ordnance which he had before bent againſt the City, into his Trenches, placing it as commodiouſly as he might, for the defence thereof againſt the ſudden Attempts of Scanderbeg. Yet for as much as he could not in that hot ſeaſon of the year ſo cloſely incamp his great Army, but that ſome part thereof would ſtill be in like danger as before; he therefore appointed Sebalias with 16000 Souldiers to attend upon Scanderbeg, that he ſhould no more trouble the Camp. After which order taken, he battered the Walls of Croia afreſh, and with his great Ordnance overthrew whatſoever the Citizens had repaired, making the Breaches greater, and more aſſaultable than before, intending once again by a new Aſſault to prove his Fortune, and the force of his Souldiers; which he appointed to be the next day. But when he perceived no ſign of courage or good hope in the heavy Countenances of them diſcouraged, and that they yielded to him their conſents, rather for fear and ſhame, than for hope of Victory; he called them Cowards, diſcouraged with the leaſt frown of Fortune; and ſaid,

Every weak Caſtle is able to hold out one Aſſault; but if you will draw theſe wild Beaſts out of their Dens, you muſt arm your ſelves like reſolute Men of invincible Courage, to indure what thing ſoever ſhall happen. Great Captains with their puiſſant Armies have grown old under the Walls of their Enemies, upon light and ſmall diſpleaſures; and will you having received ſo many diſgraces of theſe perjured Epirots, leave them all unrevenged? What great Victory was ever yet by any man gained without bloodſhed? Remember the moſt glorious Victory of Varna. It is hard without bloody hands to put the yoke upon the fierce Enemies Neck. All honourable things are brought to paſs with adventure and labour; and the end of this War dependeth of the taking of Croia; if it were once won, all this War were at an end; which if Scanderbeg loſe (being the ſtrength of his Kingdom,) he will not tarry one day longer in Epirus. Wherefore be of good chear, and couragiouſly ſet upon it; there is not more uncertainty in any thing, than in matters of War: Fortune is to be proved, and oftentimes provoked of him that will Wed her. And yet I will not deny, but that we muſt go more warily to work againſt this Enemy, and hazard our ſelves with better adviſement, and not without reaſon like wild Beaſts to run headlong upon our own death. At length we ſhall wear them out, if we kill but ten of them at an Aſſault; yet are they daily to be aſſailed, that they may have no leiſure to refreſh themſelves, and to make up their Breaches; and peradventure if Force may not prevail, Fortune may find ſome mean that we look not for, as it fell out at the Siege of Sfetigrade, beyond all our expectation. Treaſon is ingenious, and mens deſires great, where great Rewards are propounded.

With theſe and like Speeches old Amurath encouraged his Captains and Souldiers, and the next day early in the morning began the Aſſault, which the Turks valiantly attempted; and without regard of danger came to the Gates of the City, aſſaying, but with vain and deſperate labour to have broken them open. In this Aſſault Wildfire was caſt into many places of the City, and the great Artillery oftentimes diſcharged into the Breaches; whereby many of the Turks themſelves were ſlain with their own great ſhot, together with the Chriſtians; for Amurath deſperately ſet, was content to buy the life of one Chriſtian with the loſs of twenty of his Turks. But the Chriſtians ſtill valiantly repulſed their Enemies, ſo that of them that came to the Gates, none eſcaped alive; and of them that aſſaulted the great Breach, they which were moſt forward, were firſt ſlain, and they which ſtood farther off, were ſore wounded with Shot. Yet for all that, Amurath ſtill maintained the Aſſault, by ſending in of new Supplies, delighting to ſee them go forward, but grieved at the heart to ſee them ſo ſlain; until at laſt weary with beholding the ſlaughter of his Men, he cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, and ſo ended the Aſſault; perſwaded by his Baſſaes, not wilfully to caſt away his valiant Souldiers where there was no hope to prevail, but to reſerve them for his better Service.

Amurath ſeeketh to undermine Croia.

Amurath now out of hope to win the City by Aſſault, thought good to prove what might be done by undermining of the ſame; during which work he cauſed ſmall Alarms daily to be given unto the City, to the intent that the Defendants buſied therewith, ſhould not perceive the ſecret work of the Mine. About which time his Proviſion of Corn began to fail in his Camp; for which cauſe he ſent his Purveyors for Corn to Liſia, a City of the Venetians, with whom he was at that time in League, and bought of them great ſtore of Corn. But as his Officers were conveying it to his Camp, Scanderbeg having Intelligence thereof, ſlew the Convoy, and carried away with him all that Proviſion, dividing it among his own Souldiers. Howbeit, not long after, Amurath received great abundance of Corn and other Proviſion out of Macedonia; beſide that, the Venetian Merchants afterward furniſhed him with plenty of Corn, Oil, Honey, and other neceſſaries; which Scanderbeg might well have hindered, but that he would not in ſo doing offend the Venetians, which were alſo his ſecret Friends, conſidering that Amurath might have had all the ſame Proviſion out of the further part of Macedonia, Thracia, Myſia, and ſuch other places, if he had not otherwiſe had it from the Venetians.

Whilſt Amurath thus lay expecting the ſucceſs of his Mine, four hundred of the Garriſon Souldiers of Croia ſallying out of the City, chaſed divers of the Turks that were come forth back again unto the Camp; whereof Amurath was glad, hoping, that they encouraged with that good hap, would to their further loſs give the like attempt afterwards. But the ſtaid diſcretion of the Governor deceived that his expectation; who conſidering the danger, would not ſuffer his Souldiers any more to ſally out of the City. Scanderbeg alſo at this time having encreaſed his Army with a new Supply of two thouſand Souldiers, divided the ſame into three parts; delivering one part to Moſes, another to Tanuſie; and reſerving the third unto himſelf. With this Army of nine thouſand thus divided, he determined by night at one inſtant to aſſail the Turks great Camp in three divers places, appointing in which quarter every one ſhould charge. But as Scanderbeg in the night appointed, was coming towards the Turks Camp, he was diſcovered by their Scouts; whereupon a ſudden Alarum was raiſed in the Camp, and all mens minds turned that way, and Souldiers appointed with all diligence to guard that ſide of the Camp. But whilſt the Turks were all at gaze this way for fear of Scanderbeg, Moſes and Tanuſie, in the dead of the night, at one time aſſailed the Turks Camp in two divers quarters, as they were appointed, where they ſlew a number of the Turks, and made great ſpoil. At which time Scanderbeg did alſo what he might; but by reaſon he was before diſcovered, did not much harm. Upon the approach of the day Scanderbeg retired again to the Hills, and by that time it was fair day light, ſate down upon the ſide of a great Mountain, about twenty Furlongs off; in the open ſight of all the Turks Camp; which he did of purpoſe, that Moſes and Tanuſie, which were by night retired into the Mountains, might ſee which way to hold, to meet with him again. But the Turks thinking that he ſtood there to brave their whole Camp, and as it were to deface them to the great encouragement of the Defendants; divers of them earneſtly craved leave of Amurath, that they might go up to him, and at leaſtwiſe beat him out of ſight; which he granting, 12000 of his beſt Souldiers, whereof 7000 were Horſemen, and the reſt Foot, preſently ſet forward to encounter him. Scanderbeg ſeeing them all the way they came, upon their approach ſoftly retired a little farther up into the Mountains, ſtill expecting the coming of Moſes and Tanuſie. The Turks unacquainted with ſuch difficult ways, marched up the ſteep Hills after Scanderbeg with much labour and pain, well wearied of themſelves; but when they were come a great way into the Mountains, they perceived by the riſing of the duſt, that ſome greater Force was coming croſs thoſe Mountains; and not long after they might plainly ſee the foremoſt of their Enemies. Wherefore fearing to be encloſed, they began to retire, in which Retreat Scanderbeg hardly purſued them, and having the advantage of the ground, ſlew many of them, but eſpecially with his Archers. Moſes alſo coming afreſh on another ſide, cauſed them to fly down the Hill amain, and beſide the ſlaughter that he made, took divers Priſoners. After which Victory by Scanderbeg obtained in the ſight of Amurath and his whole Army, he retired again into the Mountains.

The late ſpoil of the Turks Camp, with this Overthrow of the Souldiers but now ſent againſt Scanderbeg, much grieved the old Tyrant; but the work of the Mine, wherein he had of long laid up his greateſt hope, ſorting now to no good purpoſe, being deemed as well an endleſs piece of work, for the natural hardneſs of the Rock, as alſo of ſmall importance, for that it was by the Defendants diſcovered, drave him to his wits end. His Forces he had to his great loſs ſufficiently proved, and ſtill found them too weak; and policy prevailed not. Nothing now remained, but to prove if by great Gifts and glorious Promiſes he could firſt corrupt the Faith of the Governor, and afterwards the Garriſon; wherein he determined to ſpare no coſt. Upon which Reſolution he ſent one of his Baſſaes (a man of great authority and dexterity of wit) unto Uranacontes, with ſuch rich Gifts and Preſents as might have moved a right conſtant mind; commanding the Baſſa (if it were poſſible) firſt to faſten the ſame upon the Governor, as Preſents ſent from Amurath of meer bounty, in the honour of his valiant mind; and afterwards to deliver his Meſſage, not ſparing to promiſe any thing for the giving up of the City, yea more than ſhould be deſired. The Baſſa attended on but with two Servants, came with this rich Preſent near to the Gates of the City, and there ſtayed until the Governors pleaſure were known; by whoſe command he was received into the City, and brought to his Preſence. Then the Baſſa with much Reverence, and many magnifical words, preſented unto Uranacontes the rich Gifts ſent from Amurath, and would forthwith have delivered them unto him, as the Rewards of his Valour. But Uranacontes willed him firſt to declare his Meſſage from Amurath, upon the hearing whereof he would (as he ſaid) as he ſaw cauſe, either receive or refuſe them; before which time he would not be beholden to his Enemy, by receiving from him the leaſt courteſie. With which Anſwer the ſubtil Baſſa nothing diſmayed, with great conſtancy thus began to deliver his Meſſage:

The crafty Speech of the Baſſa ſent from Amurath to corrupt the Governor, and to perſwade the Souldiers to yield up the City

Howſoever we agree (ſaid he) upon other matters we come for, we brought not theſe Gifts of purpoſe to deceive any; for ſo men uſe to deal with their Children and Servants, and not with Men of Courage and Valour. And albeit that Enemies Gifts are ever to be ſuſpected, (as you have right wiſely ſaid, and we our ſelves know) yet we durſt not for ſhame come unto ſo worthy a Governor (as the common ſaying is) empty handed; neither ought you, if you be the man you ſeem to be, and whom men report your are, to refuſe our Courteſie. Take theſe Preſents in good part, which ſhall no way inforce or hinder you to determine or diſpoſe of your Affairs otherwiſe than ſhall ſeem unto you good; neither ſhall we once object unto you theſe Gifts, which we ſo frank and freely offer in the great Sultans Name, whether you reject or admit our Demands and Meſſage; wherein there is (perhaps) no leſs regard had of your good, than of ours. For there is no greater token of a baſe mind, than to give, in hope to receive again. We come unto you frankly, (worthy Governor) I ſpeak it from my heart; we go not about with filed Speech and rich Rewards to circumvent thee, whoſe invincible Mind we have ſo often in vain proved with our Forces and Power. That is it for which Amurath loveth thee; he doth wonderfully admire the Vertues of his Enemies, and if it were poſſible, deſireth to have them with himſelf. There verily with ſo mighty a Monarch might thy invincible Mind and pregnant find a better way unto the higheſt Type of Fortunes bliſs. Not that I condemn Scanderbeg, whom we his Enemies do highly commend, for his Country ſo well recovered, and ſo oftentimes worthily defended, yet chiefly by your help; but you are worthy of another manner of Soveraign, and of another manner of Calling, and not to ſpend all the days of your Life, and ſuch heroical Vertues, in obſcurity, and (without offence be it ſaid) in contemptible baſeneſs. Beſides that, Scanderbeg his Eſtate is but momentary, the Deſtinies have aſſigned unto him too too mighty an Enemy; his deſtruction may well be deferred, but not by any means avoided. Amurath hath conceived againſt him an implacable diſpleaſure, and prepared his Forces accordingly; he hath ſworn to ſpare no Coſt, no Labour, no Danger; and that he will never whilſt he liveth depart out of Epirus, before he have impoſed a deadly yoke on his Neck. And behold, the firſt of this miſery beginneth at this City, and upon your ſelves. We daily hear his Pavilions ſound with theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, That he will never depart out of this place before he have taken this City, and ſatisfied his angry mind with the torture of your bodies; no, not if he ſhould therefore loſe Hadrianople; yea, and that more is, his whole Kingdom. And verily he will do it, which I fear to divine or think upon; For although I with others bear againſt you the mind of an Enemy; yet I am a man, and moved with humane compaſſion; believe me (ye men of Croia) believe me, my Eyes would ſcarcely endure to behold the horrible ſpectacle of your miſerable Fortune. I tell you again, he will do it, except you change your purpoſe, and now receive Health, Life, Liberty and Peace, whilſt it is ſo freely offered. For albeit that this notable ſtrong place, theſe impregnable Walls, and eſpecially your own Valour, do yet defend you; how long will it hold out? Verily no longer than you have victual, no longer than you have meat to ſuſtain your bodies. Do you think that Amurath will raiſe his Siege in the middle of the heat of this War, and be gon? No, no, if force will not prevail, if all his attempts fail, yet ſhall you ſee and feel theſe Enemies continually to your hurt; you ſhall always have theſe Tents in your Eyes, and at your Gates, until long Famine, which maſtereth all things, tame your Courage alſo. I pray you, what hope have you left? from whence ariſeth in your reſolute minds ſuch deſperate contempt of danger? Can Scanderbeg victual you, being ſo ſtraitly beſieged? which hideth himſelf (poor man) in the Woods all the day, and flieth over the tops of the Mountains, loaden with travel and care, ſcarce able to relieve his own miſery. Or will the Venetians relieve you, which dayly bring unto us and ſtore us with too too great plenty of all things neceſſary for this War againſt you. Wherefore repent your too much hardineſs, and gather your Wits together; behold I your Enemie adviſe you; you long enough continued in your obſtinacy; your Country and Liberty is not ſo far to be defended, as that you ſhould therefore fight againſt God. But wherefore do I call this, Liberty? you muſt give place unto your Fortune, and learn to obey them that be too ſtrong for you. You ſhall find aſſured Liberty, rich Rewards, perpetual Reſt with Amurath. Provide for your ſelves, if you be wiſe, whilſt all things are yet whole for you to determin of; whilſt we your Enemies exhort and requeſt you, and had rather have you our voluntary Companions and Friends than our enforced Servants and Slaves.

This the Baſſa ſpake with great gravity, and no leſs vehemency, expecting ſome great motions to have riſen in the minds of the Souldiers. But when he perceived that his Speech had rather filled them with indignation, than with fear; and that it was but a vain thing to go about to terrifie them with Words, whom all the Power of Amurath could not make afraid with Weapons, he requeſted to talk alone with the Governor in ſecret; which was alſo granted. For all men had no leſs good opinion of the worthy Governors Fidelity, than of his great Wiſdom and Valour. The crafty Baſſa having him by himſelf, began with great cunning to deliver his more ſecret meſſage; when Uranacontes perceiving by a little, what the whole tale meant, interrupted him in the middle of his Speech, and without more ado commanded him to depart; ſtraitly charging him, That neither he nor any other ſhould after that time preſume to come from his Maſter to the City, to ſpeak with him about any ſuch diſhonourable matter; for if he did, he would in deteſtation thereof cauſe their Hands, their Noſe, their Ears to be cut off, and ſo return them diſmembred, inſtead of anſwer. And ſo the Baſſa was with his Preſents again returned out of the City, and no man ſuffered to receive any thing of him in reward, although the Souldiers could have been well content to have eaſed him and his Servants of that carriage, if the Governor would but have winked thereat.

Great was the expectation in the Turks Camp, of the Baſſa's return; but when they ſaw the Preſents were not received, they eaſily gueſſed that all went not as they wiſhed. But when Amurath himſelf underſtood the Governors reſolute anſwer, he in great rage commanded all things to be made ready for a freſh Aſſault; which he did rather to ſatisfie his anger, than upon any hope he had to prevail therein. The next day he cauſed a furious Aſſault to be given to the City, but with greater loſs to himſelf than before; the Chriſtians ſtill valiantly defending the City againſt the Turkiſh Fury. In this Aſſault many of the Turks were ſlain at the breach with their own great Shot; for whilſt Amurath ſought therewith to drive the Chriſtians from the defence of the Breach, he ſlew a great number more of the forwardeſt of his own men, than he did of the Defendants. But wearied at length to behold the endleſs ſlaughter of his men, he gave over the Aſſault, and returned into his Camp, as if he had been a man half frantick or diſtract of his Wits; and there ſate down in his Tent, all that day full of melancholy Paſſions, ſometimes violently pulling his hoary Beard and white Locks, complaining of his hard and diaſter Fortune, that he had lived ſo long to ſee thoſe days of diſgrace, wherein all his former Glory and triumphant Victories were obſcured, by one baſe Town of Epirus. His Baſſaes and grave Counſellors labouring in the mean time with long diſcourſes to comfort him up; ſometimes recounting unto him his many and glorious Victories, and other whiles producing antient examples of like event. But dark and heavy conceits had ſo overwhelmed the melancholy old Tyrant, that nothing could content his waiward Mind, or revive his dying Spirits; ſo that the little remainder of natural heat which was left in his aged Body now oppreſſed and almoſt extinguiſhed with melancholy conceits, and his aged body dried up with ſorrow, he became ſick for grief. Whereupon by the Counſel of ſome of his Baſſaes, he ſent an Embaſſador to Scanderbeg, offering him Peace, if he would yield to pay him a yearly Tribute of ten thouſand Ducats; thinking by that means his Honour to be well ſaved, if before his departure out of Epirus, he could but make Scanderbeg his Tributary. This Embaſſador was by Scanderbeg honourably entertained in his Camp, but the offered Peace at the ſame time utterly refuſed. The Embaſſador returning to Amurath, declared unto him the evil ſucceſs of his Embaſſage, which greatly increaſed his melancholy Sickneſs. And Scanderbeg to grieve him the more, underſtanding that he was dangerouſly ſick, and that the great Baſſaes were more careful of the Kings health, than of the ſucceſs of his Wars, divers times aſſailed the Turks Camp. Which thing though the Baſſaes kept from his knowledge with all carefulneſs; yet he oftentimes ſuſpected the matter, by the often Alarms and Tumults in the Camp, and with the grief thereof languiſhed. So feeling his ſickneſs dayly to encreaſe, and that he could not longer live, lying upon a Pallet in his Pavilion, grievoſly complained to his Baſſaes, That the Deſtinies had ſo blemiſhed all the former courſe of his Life, with ſuch an obſcure Death, that he which had ſo often repreſſed the fury of the Hungarians, and almoſt brought to nought the pride of the Grecians together with their name, ſhould now be enforced to give up the Ghoſt, under the Walls of an obſcure Caſtle (as e termed it) and that in the ſight of his contemptible Enemy. After that, turning himſelf to is Son Mahomet, he earneſtly commended him to the faithfulneſs of his Baſſaes, and gave him many grave advertiſements, ſometimes in ſecret betwixt themſelves, and ſometimes in the hearing of others; want of ſtrength, and abundance of tears running down his aged Face (upon the ſight of his Son) oftentimes interrupting his Speech. Yet ſick unto death as he was, and drawing faſt unto his end, he forced himſelf, to warn his Son of ſuch things as now at his death grieved him moſt.

The laſt Speech and admonition of Amurath to his Son Mahomet upon his death bed.

Let mine example (quoth he) be a warning unto thee my Son, never to contemn thine Enemy, be he never ſo weak; of which one thing above all others, I have repented my ſelf of long, and ſhall do after my death, if any feeling of humane things remain in the dead. And that I was ſo fooliſh, and inconſiderate, as to foſter as it were in my boſome this my domeſtical and neglected Enemy, whereby I have purchaſed unto my ſelf this calamity, and for ever blemiſhed the Honour of the Othoman Kings; whilſt I ſo baſely ending my days under the Walls of Croia, ſhall become a by-word unto the World, and all Poſterity for ever. This Traitor ſhould even then have been oppreſſed, when he by great Treachery, firſt recovered his wicked Kingdom; in that newneſs of his Eſtate, and before the minds of the People were aſſured unto him, then it had been an eaſie matter, without bloodſhed to have utterly extinguiſhed the wretch, together with his name. Alis Baſſa, whoſe evil Fortune was the firſt beginning of his good; Nor the other Generals, who by him ſlain or taken Priſoners, increaſed his ſtrength and credit unto his Subjects, ſhould not have been ſent againſt him; a thing which I have oftentimes thought upon, but could ſcarce have believed, that ever I ſhould have thereby received ſuch diſgrace, together with the ignominious renting of my Kingdom, if I had not been taught the ſame by mine own experience, to my great loſs and hearts grief. We entred into Epirus, and here encamped an hundred and threeſcore thouſand men ſtrong; now if leaſure ſerve you, take view of them, examine the matter, you ſhall find a great want of that number. The Fields could not contain our Regiments and the multitude of our men; but now, how many Tents ſtand empty? how many Horſes want Riders? You ſhall go to Hadrianople with our Forces much impaired. As for me, the Deſtinies have vowed my Spirits to this Country of Epirus, as unto me fatal. But wherefore do I impute unto my ſelf theſe impediments and chances of Fortune? For then firſt began this ſeed of miſchief in Epirus, when the Hungarians with other the Chriſtian Princes, roſe up in Arms againſt us; at which time we fought not with them for Soveraignty, but for the whole State of our Kingdom; as the bloody Battles of Varna and Coſſova ſtill witneſs unto the World. So whilſt I had neither leiſure nor ſufficient power to take order for all my important Affairs at once; in the mean time this Enemy grew as you ſee. But how, or in what order you are hereafter to wage War againſt him, you may not look for any directions from me, which have in all theſe matters ſo evil directed my ſelf; Fortune never deceived my endeavour more than in this. But happily thou Mahomet my Son, maiſt prove a more fortunate Warrior againſt him; and for ſo many Honours already given unto me, the Deſtinies have reſerved the triumph of Epirus for thee. Wherefore my Son, thou ſhalt receive from me this Scepter, and theſe Royal Enſigns; but above all things, I leave unto thee this Enemy; charging thee not to leave my death unrevenged. It is all I charge thee with, for ſo great and ſtately a Patrimony as thou art to receive from me; it is the only Sacrifice that my old departing Ghoſt deſireth of thee.

Amurath his death.

Shortly after he became ſpeechleſs, and ſtriving with the Pangs of Death half a day, he then breathed out his gaſtly Ghoſt, to the great joy and contentment of the poor oppreſſed Chriſtians. He died about the midle of Autumn, in the year of our Lord 1450, when he had lived eighty five years, as moſt write; and thereof reigned eight and twenty years (or as ſome others report thirty;) about five months after the Siege laid before Croia.

Amurath an example of the vanity of worldly honour.

Thus lieth great Amurath, erſt not inferior unto the greateſt Monarchs of that Age, dead almoſt in deſpair; a worthy mirror of Honours frailty; yeilding unto the worldly man in the end, neither comfort nor relief. Who had fought greater Battels? who had gained greater Victories, or obtained more glorious Triumphs than had Amurath? who by the Spoils of ſo many mighty Kings and Princes, and by the conqueſt of ſo many proud and warlike Nations, again reſtored and eſtabliſhed the Turks Kingdom, before by Tamerlane and the Tartars in a manner clean defaced. He it was that burſt the heart of the proud Grecians, eſtabliſhing his Empire at Hadrianople, even in the Center of their Bowels; from whence have proceeded ſo many miſeries and calamities into the greateſt part of Chriſtendom, as no Tongue is able to expreſs. He it was that firſt brake down the Hexamile or Wall of ſeparation on the Strait of Corinth, and conquered the greateſt part of Peloponeſus. He it was that ſubdued unto the Turks ſo many great Countries and Provinces in Aſia; that in plain Feild and ſet Battel overthrew many puiſſant Kings and Princes, and brought them under his Subjection; who having ſlain Uladiſlaus the King of Polonia and Hungary, and more than once chaſed out of the Field Huniades that famous and redoubted Warrior; had in his proud and ambitious Heart, promiſed unto himſelf the Conqueſt of a great part of Chriſtendom. But O how far was he now changed from the man he then was! how far did theſe his laſt Speeches differ from the courſe of his fore paſſed life? full of ſuch baſe paſſionate complaints and lamentations, as beſeemed not a man of his place and ſpirit, but ſome vile wretch overtaken with deſpair; and yet afraid to die. Where were now thoſe haughty Thoughts, thoſe lofty Looks, thoſe thundering and commanding Speeches; whereat ſo many great Commanders, ſo many Troops and Legions, ſo many thouſands of armed Souldiers were wont to tremble and quake? Where is that Head, before adorned with ſo many Trophies and Triumphs? Where is that victorious Hand that ſwaied ſo many Scepters? Where is the Majeſty of his Power and Strength, that commanded over ſo many Nations and Kingdoms? O how is the caſe now altered; he lieth now dead, a gaſtly filthy ſtinking Carcaſs, a Clod of Clay unregarded, his Hands cloſed, his Eyes ſhut, and his Feet ſtretched out, which erſt proudly traced the Countries by him ſubdued and conquered. And now of ſuch infinite Riches, ſuch unmeaſurable Wealth, ſuch huge Treaſures, ſuch ſtately Honours and vain glorious Praiſes, as he in his life time enjoyed; his frail Body enjoyeth nothing but left all behind it. O the weak condition of Mans Nature! O the vain glory of mortal Creatures! O the blind and perverſe thoughts of fooliſh men! Why do we ſo magnifie our ſelves? why are we ſo puft up with Pride? why do we ſo much ſet our minds upon Riches, Authority, and other vanities of this Life? whereof never man had yet one days aſſurance, and at our moſt need, and when we leaſt think, quite forſake us; leaving even them that moſt ſought after them, and moſt abounded in them, ſhrowded oftentimes in the Sheet of Diſhonour and Shame.

That his death is otherwiſe by ſome reported, I am not ignorant; The Turks ſaying, that he died miraculouſly forewarned of his death at Hadrianople; and ſome others, That he died in Aſia, ſtrucken with an Apoplexy proceeding of a Surfeit taken of the immoderate drinking of Wine. But Marinus Barleſius, who lived in his time in Scodra faſt by Epirus, whoſe Authority, in report of the Wars betwixt him and Scanderbeg we follow, ſetteth it down in ſuch manner as is aforeſaid.

Preſently after his death, Mahomet his Son, for fear of ſome innovation to be made at home, raiſed the Siege and returned to Hadrianople; and afterward with great Solemnity buried his dead body at the Weſt ſide of Pruſa, in the Suburbs of the City, where he now lieth in a Chappel without any roof, his Grave nothing differing from the manner of the common Turks; which (they ſay) he commanded to be done in his laſt Will; that the Mercy and Bleſſing of God (as he termed it) might come unto him by the ſhining of the Sun and Moon, and falling of the Rain and Dew of Heaven upon his Grave.

He whilſt he lived, mightily enlarged the Turkiſh Kingdom, and with greater Wiſdom and Policy than his Predeceſſors, eſtabliſhed the ſame; inſomuch that ſome attribute unto him the firſt inſtitution of the Janizaries, and other Souldiers of the Court (the greateſt Strength of the Turkiſh Empire) before indeed begun in the time of Amurath the firſt, his great Grandfather (as is before declared) but by him greatly augmented, and the policy of that State, whereby it hath ever ſince in his Poſterity flouriſhed, even by himſelf plotted. For the better eſtabliſhing whereof in his own Houſe, and to cut off all occaſion of fear, as alſo to leave all ſuch as might have the heart to ariſe againſt him, naked and bare of Forces to reſiſt; but eſpecially the other ancient and noble Families of the Turks; ſtill ſecretly repining at the great honour of the Othoman Kings; he as a man of great Wiſdom and Judgment, to keep them under in the beginning of his Reign, by manifold favours began to bind unto himſelf men of ſtrange and forreign Countries, his Servants, and by ordering of his moſt weighty Affairs by their Authority, ſo by little and little to caſt off the ſervice of his natural Turks; they in the mean time little or nothing at all looking into this his practice. And whereas the Othoman Kings his Predeceſſors, had for the moſt part, or rather altogether raiſed their Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court, of ſuch Children of the Chriſtians as were taken in the Wars; he, ſeeing by experience how ſerviceable thoſe new kind of Souldiers were, began forthwith to plot in his head, how to make himſelf an Army altogether of ſuch able perſons, his own Creatures, and ſo to bring in a new kind of Warfare, wholly depending of himſelf. And to that end, by his Officers appointed for that purpoſe, took from the Chriſtians throughout his Dominions, every fifth Child; the faireſt and apteſt of whom, he placed in his own Seraglio at Hadrianople, and the reſt in other like places by him built for ſuch purpoſe; where they were by ſufficient Teachers, firſt inſtructed in the Principles of the Mahometan Religion, and then in all manner of Activity and Feats of Arms. Of theſe, when they were grown to mans ſtate, he made Horſemen, gave them great Penſions, and ſorting them into divers orders, appointed them alſo to guard his Perſon; honouring the better ſort of them with the name of Spahi-Oglani, that is to ſay, his Sons the Knights; and of theſe he began to make his Baſſaes, his Generals of his Armies, and the Governors of his Provinces and Cities, with all the great Offices of the State. The reſt, and far the greateſt part of theſe Tribute Children, taken from their Chriſtian Parents, and not brought up in the Seraglios, he cauſed to be diſperſed into every City and Country of his Dominion in Aſia, there for certain years to be brought up in all hardneſs and painful labour, never taſting of eaſe or pleaſure; out of which hard brood ſo enured to pains, he made choice of ſo many of the moſt luſty and able bodies fitteſt for ſervice, as he thought good; who kept in continual exerciſe, and by skilful men taught to handle all manner of Weapons, but eſpecially the Bow, the Peece, and the Scimitar, were by him as occaſion ſerved added to the other Janizaries, and appointed for the guarding of his Perſon; calling them commonly by the names of his Sons. The remainder of theſe Tribute Children, as unfit for the Wars, he put unto other baſe Occupations and Miniſteries. But unto thoſe Martial Men of all ſorts, ſo by him ordained, he appointed a continual pay according, to their degrees and places; and by great benefits and liberties beſtowed upon them, bound them ſo faſt unto him, as that he might now account himſelf to have of them ſo many Sons, as he had Souldiers; For they together with the Chriſtian Religion, having forgot their Parents and Country, and knowing no other Lord and Maſter but him, and acknowledging all that they had to come and proceed of his free grace only, remained ever bound and faithful unto him; and ſo kept others alſo, as well the natural Turks themſelves, as the other oppreſſed Chriſtians within the bounds of Obedience and Loyalty. A great Policy proceeding from a deep Judgment, firſt to weaken the Chriſtians by taking from them their beſt Children, and of greateſt hope; and then by them depending wholly of himſelf, to keep in awe and dutiful Obedience his natural Subjects alſo; having them always as a ſcourge ready to chaſtiſe the Rebellious or Diſloyal. Now the other Othoman Kings and Emperors, the Succeſſors of Amurath, keeping this cuſtom, and alſo increaſing it one after another, have thereby not only kept the Empire ſtill in their Houſe and Family, where it was firſt gotten; but alſo ſo maintained the Majeſty of their State, as they are of their Subjects feared, obeyed, honoured, not as Kings, but as Gods. For the natural Turks their Subjects loſing courage continually, and daily growing more baſe and daſtardly, by reaſon they are not ſuffered to practiſe the knowledge of Arms; and the Souldiers in whoſe power all things are, knowing nothing of their own, but holding and acknowledging all that they have to come of their Lord, account them as Lords and Kings of all; ruling much after the manner of the Pharaohs the ancient Kings of Egypt; who were abſolute Lords and Maſters, both of the publick and private Wealth of their Subjects, whom they kept under as Slaves and Villains. And hereof cometh it to paſs, that the better part of them whom we call Turks, (but are indeed the Children of Chriſtians, and ſeduced by their falſe inſtructors) deſire to be called Muſulmans (that is to ſay, Right Believers) holding it a reproachful and diſhonourable thing to be called Turks, as it were peculiarly and above other People; For that they knowing right well, that there is not one natural Turk among all thoſe that bear Authority and Rule, and are had in greater Honour and Reputation than the reſt (ſuch as are the Men of War and Courtiers) but he is born a Chriſtian, either of Father, or at the leaſt of his Grandfather, avouch thoſe only to be Turks which live in Natolia, all of them either Merchants, or of baſe and mechanical Crafts, or poor Labourers with the Spade and Pickaxe, and ſuch like People unfit for the Wars, the reſt (as I ſay) holding it for a Title of Honour to be deſcended of Chriſtian Parents. Yea the Grand Seigniour himſelf, although by the Fathers ſide he be come of Progenitors ſuch as were natural Turks born, yet many of them had Chriſtian Mothers, which they accounted in the greateſt part of their Nobility and Honour. Thus by the Wiſdom of Amurath was the order of the Janizaries, and other Souldiers of the Court greatly advanced, though not by him begun, and the politick ſtate of the Turks Kingdom (to ſay the truth) quite altered; the natural Turks (more than the Sultan himſelf) now bearing therein no ſway; but only theſe new Souldiers, all of them deſcended from Chriſtian Parents and by adoption as it were become the Sons of the Turkiſh Sultans, and under them commanding all; by whom they have ever ſince managed their eſtate, and by their good ſervice wonderfully, even to the aſtoniſhment of the World, increaſed and extended their Empire. But of them more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

Amurath his diſpoſition.

The Sons of Amurath.

This great King was whilſt he lived, of his Subjects wonderfully beloved, and no leſs of them after his death lamented. He was more faithful of his word than any of the Turkiſh Kings either before or after him; by Nature melancholy and ſad, and accounted rather politick than valiant, yet was indeed both; a great diſſembler, and painful in travel, but wayward and teſty above meaſure, which many imputed unto his great Age. He had iſſue ſix Sons, Achmetes, Aladin, Mahomet, Haſan, (otherwiſe called Chaſan) Urchan, and Achmetes the younger, of ſome called Calepinus; three of whom died before; but the two youngeſt were by their unnatural Brother Mahomet, who ſucceeded him in the Turkiſh Kingdom, even in their infancy, in the beginning of his Reign moſt cruelly murthered.

MAHOMETHES MAGNVS, TVRCARVM IMPERATOR PRIMVS 1450

Solus et immensi qui timor orbis eram:
Me rapit quæcunque rapit mors improba, sed sum
Virtute excelsa, ductus ad aſtra tamen.
Major Alexander non me fuit; Anibal et non,
Fuderit Ausonios tot licet ille Duces.
Vici victores Danaos, domuique feroces
Caoniæ populos, Sauromatasque truces.
Pannonius Sensit, quantum surgebit in armis
Vis mea: quæ latio cognita nuper erat.
Arsacidæ sensere manus has, sensit Arabsque:
Et mea sunt Persæ cognita tela duci.
Mens fuerat bellare Rhodum, superare superbam
Italiam, sed non fata dedere modum.
Hei mihi, nam rapuit mors aspera, quæque sub alto
Pectore condideram, vertit et hora brevis.
Sic hominum fastus pereunt; sic Stemata, Sicque
Imperium, atque aurum, quicquid et Orbis habet.

I who to kingdomes, Cities, brought their fate,
The terrour of the trembling world, of late,
Yield to the greater Monarch Death, but am
Yet proud to think of my immortal fame.
Greater than Alexander, once was I,
Or him that Camps of Romans did destroy:
I vanquisht the victorious Greeks, and I
Destroyd Epyrus, and fierce Tartary.
From mighty Me th'Hungarians had their doome
And the report reacht ye proud walls of Rome.
Th'Aſsyrian, and Arabian felt my hand,
Nor could the Persian my dread power withstand.
Ore Rhodes, and Italy I designd to ride,
But fate the progreſs of my aimes denyd;
Ai me! grim Death, and one unlucky houre,
Has baffled all my thoughts, and boundleſs power.
So haughty man, and all his hopes decay,
And So all Sublunary gloryes paſs away.

The LIFE of
MAHOMET,
The Second of that NAME,
The Seventh KING and Firſt EMPEROR of the TURKS,
For his many VICTORIES ſirnamed The Great.

THE report of the death of old Amurath the late King, was in ſhort time blown through moſt part of Chriſtendom, to the great joy of many; but eſpecially of the Greeks and other poor Chriſtians which bordered upon the Tyrants Kingdom; who were now in hope, together with the change of the Turkiſh King, to make exchange alſo of their bad Eſtate and Fortune; and the rather, for that it was thought, that his eldeſt Son Mahomet, after the death of his Father, would have imbraced the Chriſtian Religion, being in his Childhood inſtructed therein (as was ſuppoſed) by his Mother the Daughter of the Prince of Servia, a Chriſtian. But vain was this hope, and the joy thereof but ſhort, as afterward by proof appeared; For Mahomet being about the Age of one and twenty years, ſucceeding his Father in the Kingdom in the year of our Lord 1450. embraced in ſhew the Mahometan Religion, abhorring the Chriſtian; but indeed making no great reckoning either of the one or of the other, but as a meer Atheiſt, devoid of all Religion, and worſhiping no other God but good Fortune, derided the ſimplicity of all ſuch as thought that God had any care or regard of worldly men, or of their actions; which graceleſs reſolution ſo wrought in him, that he thought all things lawful that agreed with his luſt, and making conſcience of nothing, kept no League, Promiſe, or Oath, longer than ſtood with his Profit or Pleaſure.

1450. Mahomet of no Religion.

Now in the Court men ſtood diverſly affected towards the preſent State; the mighty Baſſaes, and others of great Authority, unto whom the old Kings Government was never grievous, inwardly lamented his death; doubting leſt the fierce Nature of the young King ſhould turn to the hurt of ſome of them in particular, and the ſhortning of their Authority in general, as indeed it ſhortly after fell out. But the luſty Gallants of the Court weary of the old King, who in hope of preferment had long wiſhed for the Government of the young Prince, were glad to ſee him ſet upon his Fathers Seat. And the vulgar People (never conſtant but in unconſtancy, and alwaies fawning upon the preſent) exceedingly rejoyced in their young King. The Janizaries alſo at the ſame time (according to their accuſtomed manner) took the Spoil of the Chriſtians and Jews that dwelt amongſt them, and eaſily obtained pardon for the ſame; whereupon he was by the ſame Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court, with great Triumph ſaluted King. Which approbation of theſe men of War, is unto the Turkiſh Kings a greater aſſurance for the poſſeſſion of their Kingdom, than to be born the eldeſt Son of the King, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory ſhall appear; ſo great is the power of theſe maſterful Slaves, in promoting to the Kingdom whichſoever of the Kings Sons they moſt favour, without much regard whether they be the eldeſt or not.

Mahomet murdereth his Brethren.

This young Tyrant was no ſooner poſſeſſed of his Fathers Kingdom, but that he forgetting the Laws of Nature, was preſently in perſon himſelf about to have murthered with his own hands, his youngeſt Brother, then but eighteen Months old, begotten on the Daughter of Sponderbius. Which unnatural part, Moſes one of his Baſſaes, and a man greatly in his favour, perceiving, requeſted him, not to embrue his own hands in the blood of his Brother, but rather to commit the execution thereof to ſome other; which thing Mahomet commanded him the Author of that counſel forthwith to do. So Moſes taking the Child from the Nurſe, ſtrangled it, with pouring water down the throat thereof. The young Lady underſtanding of the death of her Child (as a Woman whom Fury had made paſt fear) came and in her rage reviled the Tyrant to his Face, ſhamefully upbraiding him for his inhumane cruelty. When Mahomet to appeaſe her Fury, requeſted her to be content, for that it ſtood with the Policy of his State; and willed her for her better contentment, to ask whatſoever ſhe pleaſed, and ſhe ſhould forthwith have it. But ſhe deſiring nothing more than in ſome ſort to be revenged, deſired to have Moſes (the Executioner of her Son) delivered unto her, bound; which when ſhe had obtained, ſhe preſently ſtruck him into the Breaſt with a knife (crying in vain upon his unthankful Maſter for help;) and proceeding in her cruel Execution, cut an hole in his right ſide, and by peecemeal cut out his Liver, and caſt it to the Dogs to eat. At the ſame time alſo he cauſed another of his Brethren, committed by his Father to the keeping of Caly Baſſa, and now by him betraied into his hands, to be likewiſe murthered.

A cruel revenge of an angry Woman.

Mahomet reformeth the Turkiſh Common-weal.

Thus beginning his tyrannous Reign with the bloody execution of them that were in Blood neareſt unto him, and whom of all others he ought to have defended, he preſently after began to frame a new form of a Common-Weal, by abrogating and altering the old Laws and Cuſtoms, and publiſhing of new, better fitting his own humor, and more commodious for himſelf;

impoſing alſo new Taxes and Subſidies upon his Subjects, never before heard of; thereby to increaſe his Treaſures, and ſatisfie his avaritious deſire; which amongſt many other his Vices, ſo much reigned in him, as that he was thought over-ſparing unto himſelf, as well in his Apparrel as in his Diet. And proceeding further, he called unto ſtrait account all the great Officers of his Kingdom; of whom ſome he put to death, and confiſcated their Goods; others he put to great Fines, or quite removed them from their Offices. In like manner he dealt alſo with his great Baſſaes, admitting many falſe and ſurmiſed accuſations againſt them; whereby to bring them within his danger, where little mercy was to be looked for. By which means he became no leſs terrible unto his Subjects, than he was afterwards to his Enemies; and ſo was of them exceedingly feared, but more hated. Among other things, he much miſliked in his Court the exceſſive number of Faulconers and Huntſmen; which was grown ſo great by the immoderate delight which his Predeceſſors took in the pleaſures of the Field, that there were continually maintained of the Kings Charge, ſeven thouſand Faulconers, and not many fewer Huntſmen; ſaying, That he would not be ſo much a Fool, as to maintain ſuch a multitude of men to attend upon ſo meer a vanity. And therefore took order, that from thenceforth there ſhould be allowance made for five hundred Falconers, and one hundred Huntſmen; the reſt he appointed to ſerve as Souldiers in his Wars. At the ſame time alſo he entred into League with Conſtantinus Palæologus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, and the other Princes of Grecia; as alſo with the Deſpot of Servia, his Grandfather by the Mothers ſide, as ſome will have it; howbeit ſome others write, that the Deſpot his Daughter, Amurath his Wife, was but his Mother-in-Law, whom he under the colour of Friendſhip ſent back again unto her Father, after the death of Amurath, ſtill allowing her a Princely Dowry. But if ſhe were not his Mother (as like enough it is that ſhe was not) much more happy was ſhe that ſhe never groaned for ſo graceleſs a Son.

1451. Mahomet goeth against the King of Caramania. Whilſt Mahomet was thus occupied about his civil Affairs, Ibrahim King of Caramania, who long before had married Amuraths Siſter, and yet for all that, had (as his Anceſtors had before him) alwaies envied the proſperous ſucceſs of the Othoman Kings, took occaſion in the firſt year of Mahomet his Reign, with Fire and Sword to invade his Dominions in Aſia. Which thing when Mahomet underſtood, he diſplaced Iſa his Lieutenant in Aſia, as a man not ſufficient to mannage ſo great Wars, and appointed Iſaac Baſſa in his room, a moſt valiant man of War, upon whom not long before he had upon ſpecial favour beſtowed in marriage the fair Daughter of Sponderbeius, one of his Fathers Wives, of whom we have ſpoken before. This great Baſſa paſſing over into Aſia, raiſed a great Army. After whom followed Mahomet in perſon himſelf with a greater out of Europe; and having all his Forces together, entred with great Hoſtility into Caramania. But the Caramanian King perceiving himſelf unable to withſtand ſo puiſſant an Enemy, fled into the ſtrength of the great Mountains, and by his Embaſſadors offered unto Mahomet ſuch reaſonable Conditions of Peace, as that he was content to accept thereof. Which after they had by ſolemn Oath on both parts confirmed, Mahomet returned with his Army to Pruſa; but when he was come thither, the Janizaries preſuming that they might be bold with the young King; putting themſelves in order of Battel, came and with great inſolency demanded of him a donative or larges, as a reward of their good ſervice done. With which ſo great preſumption, Mahomet was inwardly chafed; but for ſo much as they were his beſt Souldiers, and already in Arms, he wiſely diſſembled his anger for the preſent, having a little before had warning thereof by Abedin Baſſa, and Teurechan Beg, two of his great Captains, who had got ſome ſuſpition of the matter; wherefore to content them, he cauſed ten great Bags of Aſpers to be ſcattered among them, and ſo pacified the matter. But within fews days after, he cauſed Doganes (the Aga or chief Captain of the Janizaries) to be brought before him, and to be ſhamefully whipt; and ſo preſently diſcharging him of his office, placed one Muſtapha in the ſame. The like ſeverity he uſed againſt the reſt of the under-Captains, cauſing them to be cruelly ſcourged and beaten like Slaves; which in that tyrannical Government is an uſual puniſhment, upon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the King to be inflicted upon any man, without reſpect of degree or calling, if he be not a Natural Turk born. Preſently after he ſent Iſaac his Lieutenant againſt Elias Prince of Menteſia or Caria, by whom the poor Prince was driven out of his Country; ever ſince which time it hath remained in ſubjection to the Turkiſh Kings, as part of their Kingdom and Empire. Menteſia ſubdued by the Turks.

1452. When Mahomet had thus ended the Caramanian War, and was determined with his Army to return to Hadrianople, he was advertiſed, That the Straits of Helleſpontus were ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed by the Chriſtian Fleet, that he could not there poſſibly paſs over but with moſt manifeſt danger; wherefore he took his way through that part of Bithynia which lieth above Conſtantinople, and came to the Caſtle which the Turks call Acce-Chiſar, and the Grecians αϛπρόκαϛρον, or White Caſtle, ſtanding upon the narrow Strait of Boſphorus on Aſia ſide, and there paſſed over into Europe at the ſame place where his Father Amurath had not many years before in like manner found paſſage. Where when he was ſafely got over with his Army, he by the advice of his Baſſaes encamped faſt by the Seaſide, and there preſently began to build a great ſtrong Caſtle cloſe unto the Straits of Boſphorus, near unto Propontis, on Europe ſide, directly over againſt the other Caſtle in Aſia. For the ſpeedy accompliſhment of which work, he aſſembled thither all the workmen he could poſſibly get out of Europe and Aſia, apportioning unto his Captains and Souldiers of his Army part of the work alſo; by whoſe induſtry and labour, that great building was in ſhorter time brought to perfection, than was by any man at the firſt expected. This Caſtle which for the greatneſs thereof is of moſt Writers reputed for a City, was by the Turks named Genichiſar, and of the Grecians Neocaſtron or New Caſtle, and alſo Læmocaſtron, or Caſtle upon the Straits; and was there by the Turks built, as well for the ſafety of their own paſſage too and fro, as for to hinder the paſſage of the Chriſtians through thoſe narrow Straits, they now poſſeſſing the ſtrong Forts on both ſides; and thereby alſo to diſtreſs the City of Conſtantinople, from whence this Caſtle was not above five miles diſtant. When Mahomet in the ſecond year of his Reign had finiſht this great Caſtle, with ſome other ſmall Forts about the ſame, and alſo repaired the other Caſtle in Aſia over againſt it, he placed therein ſtrong Garriſons, and furniſhed the ſame with Attillery; in ſuch ſort that no Ship could paſs through the Strait of Boſphorus, into the great Euxine, or Black Sea, but ſhe was in danger to be ſunk; whereby the rich trade which the Marchants of Venice, Genoa, and Conſtantinople, had to Caſſa, and other places lying upon the Euxine, were almoſt quite cut off, to the great hinderance of thoſe Eſtates. Now Mahomet by Nature ambitious, and withal deſirous to do ſome ſuch thing as the glory whereof might far paſs the Fame of his Predeceſſors, thought nothing more anſwerable to his high conceipts, than to attempt the winning of Conſtantinople, and the utter ſubverſion of the Greek Empire, whereupon his Father Amurath, and his great Grandfather Bajazet, had before in vain ſpent their Forces. Beſides that, it grieved him to ſee that goodly City, the ancient Seat of the Chriſtian Empire, to be ſo commodiouſly ſituated, as it were in the midſt of his Kingdom, and not to be at his Command. Hereunto the ſmall power of the Greek Emperor himſelf, and the other Chriſtian Princes at the ſame time at mortal diſcord among themſelves, miniſtred unto his greedy deſire no ſmall hope of ſucceſs, and ſerved as Spurs to prick him forward unto ſo great an enterpriſe. Wherefore all the Winter he cauſed great preparation to be made of ſhipping and other warlike proviſion both for Sea and Land; and gave out Commiſſions for the levying of a mighty Army, to be in readineſs againſt the next Spring. But whither he would imploy the ſame, no man could certainly tell; ſome gueſſing one thing and ſome another, as the manner of men is, when ſuch extraordinary preparation is at hand. Conſtantinus the eighth of that name, then Emperor of Conſtantinople, a Prince of a mild and ſoft Spirit, fitter for the Church than for the Field, hearing of the great preparation made by the Turkiſh King, and fearing leſt that tempeſt then growing, ſhould upon the ſuddain break forth upon himſelf, firſt made ſuch preparation as his own ſmall ability would extend unto. And then ſent his Embaſſadors unto other Chriſtian Princes, earneſtly craving their Aid and Aſſiſtance in that his dangerous Eſtate. But that labour was loſt, and all his ſuit vain; for they being at variance one with another, and having more care of private revenge, than how to repulſe the common Enemy of Chriſtianity, could not, or would not afford him any help at all. Nicholas the fifth of that Name, then Biſhop of Rome, with Alphonſus King of Naples, and the State of Venice, promiſed to have ſent him thirty Gallies, but none for all that came.

There were by chance at Conſtantinople certain Ships and Gallies of Venice, Genoa, Crete and Chios, of whom the Emperor made ſtay; at which time alſo it chanced, that Johannes Juſtinianus, an Adventurer of Genoa, who had been ſcouring thoſe Seas, came to Conſtantinople with two tall Ships, and four hundred Souldiers; where he was entertained by the Emperor. And foraſmuch as he was a man honourably deſcended, and ſuppoſed to be both of great Courage and Direction, was by the Emperor appointed General of all his Forces next unto himſelf. He alſo entertained ſix thouſand Greeks; which, with three thouſand Venetians, Genowaies and others, whom he had made ſtay of, joyned unto the Citizens, was all the weak Strength he had to relie upon, for the defence of his State and Empire.

Mitylen. hiſt. de captivitate Conſtantinopolitana.

Againſt the beginning of the Spring, the Turkiſh King had in readineſs a great and puiſſant Army of three hundred thouſand men, of whom, the greateſt part were taken out of Bulgaria, Servia, Raſcia, Theſſalia, Macedonia, and Grecia, which as yet were called the Chriſtian Countries, and were themſelves either indeed Chriſtians, or elſe ſuch Renegates as had not long before forſaken the Chriſtian Faith; unto theſe alſo were joyned divers other Chriſtians which came out of Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, to ſerve the Turk in his Wars. This hath been none of the leaſt means, whereby the Turkiſh Kings have grown ſo great, and their Kingdom ſo mightily inlarged, by inforcing and alluring Chriſtians to fight againſt Chriſtians, to the utter confuſion of themſelves. Among the great multitude of the Europeian Chriſtians, were mingled his effeminate Souldiers of Aſia, and his natural Turks and Janizaries, which were in number feweſt, and yet commanded all the reſt.

Mahomet encampeth before Conſtantinople.

With this great Army, well appointed with all warlike proviſion, came Mahomet the Turkiſh King from Hadrianople; and the ninth day of April, in the year 1453, encamped before Conſtantinople, and with the multitude of his Army filled all the main Land before the City, from the Sea ſide of Boſphorus, unto the place where the ſame Sea compaſſing in the City on two parts, and running far into the Land betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, maketh there a goodly Haven betwixt them.

The ſituation of Conſtantinople.

This City of Conſtantinople (called in ancient time Bizantium) is in form of a Triangle, ſituated in Europe in the pleaſant Country of Thracia, upon a point of the main Land ſhooting out towards Aſia, called of Pliny and Solinus, the Promontory Chryſoceras; where the Sea of Propontis joyneth unto that Strait of Sea, which divideth Aſia from Europe, called in ancient time Boſphorus Thracius; ſometime the Strait of Pontus; and the mouth of Pontus; and of the modern Writers, the Strait of Conſtantinople; and about two hundred years paſt, or more, S. George his Arm. This point of the main, whereon the City ſtandeth, lyeth about two Italian miles more Northward than doth the ancient City of Calcedon, on the other ſide of the Strait in Aſia; more than thirty miles diſtant from the Euxine or Black Sea, lying from it Northward; and two hundred miles from the Strait of Helleſpontus or Calipolis, from thence South. Which noble City (of all others moſt fitly ſeated for the Empire of the World, and with great Majeſty overlooking both Europe and Aſia) is by the Coſmographers accounted to ſtand in the height of 43 Degrees, upon ſeven little Hills, of no great, but eaſie aſcent; and was there firſt built by Pauſanias the Lacedemonian King, and called Bizantium, and ſo many years flouriſhed as a populous and rich City, until the civil Wars betwixt Severus the Emperor, and Niger; what time it indured the Siege of the Romans under Severus, three years, with ſuch obſtinacy, that it yielded not until it was brought to ſuch extremity, that the Citizens did eat one another; and then yielding, had the Walls overthrown by Severus, and the City it ſelf deſtroyed, and brought to the low eſtate of a poor Country Village, and ſo by him given to the Perinthians. In which baſe eſtate it continued until the time of Conſtantine the Great, the Son of Helena (whom ſome will needs have to have been an Engliſh Woman) by whom it was new built, and beautified with Buildings ſo ſtately and ſumptuous, that unto the ſtrange beholders it ſeemed a dwelling place for Heavenly Wights, rather than for Earthly Men. And to grace it the more, tranſlated his Imperial Seat thither, and called it Nova Roma, or New Rome; and all that pleaſant part of Thracia alongſt the Sea Coaſt of Helleſpontus, Propontis, and Boſphorus, by the name of

of Romania, of the fair Roman Colonies there by him planted; which name it at this day retaineth, and is of the Turks, called Rumilia and Rum-Ili, that is to ſay, the Roman Country. But as for the City it ſelf, the glorious name of the Founder ſo prevailed, that the City was and yet is of him called Conſtantinople, or Conſtantine his City; and now of the barbarous Turks commonly, but corruptly, Stamboli. It is (as we ſaid) built in the form of a Triangle, whereof the longeſt ſide, which runneth from North-Eaſt to South-Weſt, is on the South-ſide waſhed with the Propontis; and towards the ending of the point, which is about the ſeven Towers, is ſomewhat indented; being commonly reputed to be eight miles long. The other ſide lieth Eaſt and Weſt five miles in length, being waſhed with the Haven, which is ſomewhat more than eight miles long before it meet with the freſh water, and about a quarter of a mile broad; on the futher ſide whereof ſtandeth the City of Pera, commonly called Galata, ſometime a Colony of the Genowaies. This Haven is very deep, and by that reaſon as commodious as deep, bearing Ships full fraught cloſe to the Shoar, ſo that they may diſcharge their Burthens with the leaſt trouble that may be; and is of Strabo called Cornu Bizantij, or the Horn of Bizantium. The third ſide of this City towards the Continent, lieth almoſt North and South five miles alſo in length; thoſe two ſides that lie upon the Sea, and the Haven, are environed and girt with a ſingle Wall, built after the antique manner, with many high Towers, which ſtrongly defend and flank the ſame. Without which Walls (eſpecially towards the Haven) there lieth a Street between them and the Shoar. But the other ſide, which is the third, and regardeth the main Land (beſide the Ditch, which is alſo fenced) is defended with three Walls; the firſt Wall ſtanding upon the Ditch being but low; and the ſecond not far diſtant from the firſt, raiſed ſomewhat higher; but the third overlooketh and commandeth both the other; from whence as from an high fortreſs both the other Walls and all the Ditch without may eaſily be defended. But the two utter Walls, with the whole ſpace betwixt them, are now by the Turks but ſlenderly maintained, lying full of Earth and other Rubbiſh, even as they were in the time of the Grecians; ſome cauſe why they with leſs heart and courage defended the ſame againſt the barbarous Enemies. In the Eaſt part of the City, on that point which in the Reign of the Grecians was called the Cape of S. Demetria, diſtant from Aſia not much more than half a mile, ſtands the Seraglio or Palace of the great Turk, containing in it ſelf a great part of an Hill, encloſed round with a Wall, as if it were it ſelf a City, in circuit more than two miles; wherein amongſt other ſtately Buildings, near unto the Sea ſtandeth a very fair and ſumptuous Gallery, built for pleaſure, with a private Gate well fortified and planted with great Ordnance and other Munition, whereby the great Turk at certain times paſſeth, when he is diſpoſed in his Gally to take his pleaſure upon the Sea, or to paſs over the Strait unto his Houſes or Gardens of Delight, on the other ſide in Aſia. In this great City are alſo many other moſt ſtately and ſumptuous Buildings, as well of late erected by the Turkiſh Sultans, ſince they became Lords thereof, as before by the Greek Emperors; amongſt all which the Temple of S. Sophia ſtanding on the Eaſt ſide of the City, not far from the Seraglio (now reduced unto the form of a Mahometan Moſchie, and whither the great Turk goeth oftentimes to hear Service, being indeed but the Sanctuary or Chancel only of the great, ſtately, and wonderful Church built by Juſtinian the Emperor) is moſt beautiful and admirable. That which ſtandeth of it now, is both round and very high, built after the faſhion of the Pantheon in Rome, but much greater, fairer, and not open in the top, as is that; the Walls thereof being of the fineſt Marble, and the Floor all paved with fair Marble alſo. In the midſt there is a very great and large Circle, compaſſed in with high and huge Pillars of moſt excellent Marble of divers ſorts; and theſe ſupport a mighty Vault that beareth up as many more Pillars above, ſtanding after the very ſame order, and in a down right line, almoſt of the like greatneſs and goodneſs of the Marble with the other below; upon which, above the ſecond Vault in manner of a Loovar, reſteth the great round Roof which coverth all that ſpace of the Church which is compaſſed with the aforeſaid Pillars; being all enameled and fillited with the Pictures of Saints, after the antient manner of ſome great Churches in Chriſtendom; but that the Turks, who like not to have any Pictures in their Churches, have put out their Eyes only, as loath to ſpoil ſuch a rare peece of work, and utterly to deface it. In like manner the Walls of the upper Vault are wrought, painted, or portraied after the ſame order, though in ſome part decaied, by reaſon of their long continuance and ſtanding. About this Church are eighteen or twenty Doors of Braſs, right fair and coſtly, well declaring the magnificence and greatneſs thereof in more antient times; when as it had (as is reported) more than two hundred Doors of like making and greatneſs; and beſides the hugeneſs of the Frame and Building it ſelf, had alſo divers fair Monaſteries and Houſes of Religion joyned unto it; whereunto belonged ſix thouſand Prieſts, whoſe Houſes and Lodgings extended almoſt all over the place where now the Turks Palace ſtandeth, and the other places adjoining to this great Church, which is now their chief Moſchie, and called by them by the proper name of S. Sophia, becauſe they hold even as we do, the Wiſedom of God to be incomprehenſible and infinite. The next in magnificence unto this, is the Moſchie of Solyman, wherein he lieth buried, and his well beloved Wife the fair Roxolana; a work well beſeeming the Majeſty of ſo mighty a Monarch. There are beſide theſe alſo many other fair Moſchies, Seraglioes for the Turk his Wives and Concubines, Bezaſtanes or Burſes for Merchants, Obelisks, Bathes, and other publick Edifices and Buildings of great Majeſty and State, all well worth the beholding; wherein conſiſteth all the Beauty of this ſo ancient and renowned a City; far unlike to that it was in the time of the firſt Greek Emperors, and before it was ſpoiled by the Latines. For the Turks private Houſes in this ſo great and imperial a City, ſo much renowned through the World, are for the moſt part low and baſe, after the Turkiſh faſhion, built ſome of Wood, ſome of Stone, and ſome of unburnt Brick, laid with Clay and Dirt, which quickly decaieth again; they after their homely manner (by long cuſtom received) never building any thing ſumptuouſly for their own private uſe, but contenting themſelves with their ſimple Cottages, how mean ſoever, commonly ſaying them to be good enough for the ſhort time of their Pilgrimage; and yet not ſparing for any coſt upon the publick Buildings and Ornaments of the Common-Weal, which they built with great Majeſty and Pomp; but eſpecially their Moſchies, wherein they excel. Nevertheleſs, there yet are in Conſtantinople ſome other other Houſes alſo built high and comely enough; but theſe be few, and very old, all inhabited by the Chriſtians and Jews, and not by the Turks; but of this enough. And ſo again to our purpoſe.

he Turks leet.

Mahomet with his puiſſant Army thus encamped before the City, placing his Aſian Souldiers on the right hand towards the Boſphorus; his European Souldiers on the left hand, toward the Haven; lay himſelf with 15000 Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court, in the middle betwixt both, againſt the heart of the City. On the farther ſide of the Haven alſo by Pera, he placed Zoganus, one of his chief Counſellors, with another part of his Army. At which time alſo Pantologes his Admiral came to the Siege, with a Fleet of 30 Gallies, and 200 other ſmall Ships, and a number of other leſſer Veſſels, which were rowed with three, or five Oars apiece, full of Turkiſh Archers, fitter for ſhew than Service. But for defence of the Haven, and ſo of the City on that ſide, the Emperor had cauſed the Haven to be ſtrongly chain'd overthwart from the City to Pera; and within the Chain had orderly placed his ſtrong Fleet, the greateſt ſtrength whereof was ſeven great Ships of Genoa, with three Gallies, and two Galliots of Venice, three of Creet, and a few others of the Iſland of Chios; all which were there, rather by chance upon Merchants affairs, than that they were provided for any ſuch Service; yet by this means the Turks Fleet was ſhut out of the Haven, and ſo the City put in good ſafety on that ſide.

When Mahomet had thus conveniently encamped his Army, and ſurrounded the City both by Sea and Land; he firſt caſt up great Trenches as near as he poſſibly could unto the Walls of the City, and raiſed Mounts in divers places as high as the Walls themſelves, from whence the Turks with their Shot greatly annoyed the Defendants. After that, he placed his Battery againſt one of the Gates of the City called Calegaria, and terribly battered the ſame, ſpecially with one piece of Ordnance of a wonderful greatneſs, which with much difficulty was brought from Hadrianople with an hundred and fifty Yoke of Oxen, and carried a Bullet of an hundred pound weight, made (as his other ſhot was) of a kind of hard black Stone brought from the Euxin Sea; for as yet (as it ſeemeth) ſo ſoon after the invention of that fatal Engine, the uſe of Bullets of metal was unknown. There with continual Battery, he terribly ſhook the Walls, which although they were very ſtrong, yet were they not able to withſtand the fury of ſo great a Battery. The Chriſtians alſo out of the City diſcharged their great Artillery upon the Turks, but ſo ſparingly, as if they had been afraid to ſhake their own Walls, or loth for good Husbandry, to ſpend Shot and Powder, which was to the Canoneers very ſparingly allowed; yet that which was ſpent, was ſo well beſtowed, that the Turks were therewith grievouſly annoyed. The Breach alſo which they had made at the aforeſaid Gate, was by the Defendants with great and dangerous labour again repaired with Faggots and Earth, and ſuch like matter beſt ſerving for that purpoſe, and ſo made ſtronger than before. In which moſt dangerous work, they were altogether directed and greatly encouraged by Juſtinianus the Genoway, the Emperors Lieutenant-General for defence of the City.

Yet for all this diligence of the Chriſtians, Mahomet continued his Battery with no leſs fury than before; but repoſing greater hope to find a way into the City, by the Spade and Mattock, than by Battery; he employed his Pioneers, whereof he had great ſtore, to dig a Mine; being altogether directed by Chriſtians skilful in that kind of work, whom he had for that purpoſe entertained. By whoſe cunning direction, with the induſtrious labour of the poor Pioneers, the Mine was brought to ſuch perfection, that part of the Wall, with one of ſtrong Towers in the ſame, was quite undermined, and ſtood ſupported, but with ſuch untruſty ſtays as the Pioneers had left for the bearing up thereof till ſuch time as it ſhould be by the Tyrants appointment blown up. This dangerous work was neither perceived, neither yet feared by the Conſtantinopolitans, as a thing not poſſible to have been done; foraſmuch as Bajazet and Amurath had both with great labour before in vain attempted the ſame, at ſuch time as they hardly beſieged the City. But that which thoſe great Kings had with much vain labour by unskilful men made proof of, Mahomet had now by men of greater device, brought to paſs; although it took not ſuch effect as he wiſhed; for one Jo. Grandis, a German Captain, and a man of great experience, ſuſpecting the matter, had cauſed a Countermine to be made, whereby the labour of the Turks was in good time diſcovered, and they with Fire and Sword driven out of the Mine, and the ſame ſtrongly filled up again, and ſo the City for that time delivered of a great fear and danger. Mahomet perceiving that it availed him not to continue his Battery againſt that place, which was again ſo ſtrongly repaired, removed the ſame, and planted it againſt a Tower called Bactatina, near unto the Gate called Porta-Romana, or, the Roman-Gate. Which Tower ſhaken with continual Battery, at length fell down, and filled the Ditch before the utter Wall, even with the ground. But this Breach was alſo ſpeedily and with great courage made up again by the Defendants, although the Turks did what they could, with continual ſhot, to have driven them from the ſame. At which time they alſo erected certain high Towers of Timber, covered with raw Hides to defend the ſame from fire, out of which they with their Shot ſlew many of the Chriſtians upon the Walls, and in making good the aforeſaid Breach; but Mahomet ſeeing this valiantneſs of the Defendants, openly ſaid, That it was neither the Grecians skill nor courage, but the French-men that defended the City; for the Turks commonly call all the Chriſtians of the Weſt by the Name of Franks or French-men.

Seventy of the Turks Galliots brought eight miles over land (by the device of a Chriſtian) into the Haven of Conſtantinople.

The chearfulneſs and induſtry of the Chriſtians in defending and repairing the aforeſaid Breach, was ſo great, that the Turkiſh King began almoſt to deſpair of winning the City; which he could no way Aſſault but on one ſide. When as a bad Chriſtian in his Camp, put him again in good hope, by ſhewing unto him a device how to bring a great part of his Fleet over Land into the Haven, and thereby to aſſault that part of the City by water, which the Citizens leaſt feared; by which ingenious device, and by the great ſtrength of men, Zoganus Baſſa (to whom that charge was committed) brought ſeventy of the leſſer Ships and Galliots, with all their Sails abroad (to the great admiration of all that ſaw them) up a great Hill, and ſo by dry land, out of the Boſphorus behind Pera, the ſpace of eight miles, into the Haven of Conſtantinople, which running in between the City and Pera, runneth into the main Land, (as we have ſaid) about eight miles. The Chriſtian that diſcovered this device unto the King, is ſuppoſed to have learned it of the Venetians, who not long before had done the like at the Lake of Bennacus. Glad was Mahomet to ſee ſo many of his Ships and Gallies in the Haven, and the Chriſtians with the ſight thereof no leſs diſcouraged. Nevertheleſs,they attempted to have burnt thoſe Veſſels as they were in launching, but the Turks had ſo commodiouſly placed certain pieces of great Ordnance for their defence, that the formoſt of the Gallies of the Chriſtians, approaching the Turks Fleet, was preſently ſunk; wherewith the reſt diſmayed, returned back from whence they came. Certain of the Chriſtians of the loſt Gally, whom the Turks took up ſwimming in the Haven, were the next day cruelly ſlain in the ſight of the Chriſtians; in revenge whereof, certain Turks before taken Priſoners into Conſtantinople, were forthwith brought to the top of the Walls, and there in the ſight of the Camp with like cruelty put to death.

A wonderful Bridge made by the Turks over the Haven of Conſtantinople.

Mahomet thus poſſeſſed of the Haven, ſhortly after cauſed a wonderful Bridge to be made quite over the Haven, from Zoganus his Camp which lay by Pera,unto the Walls of Conſtantinople; which Bridge was built with Timber and Planks, born up with ſmall Boats and empty Cask, after a moſt ſtrange manner, and was in length more than half a mile; by which Bridge his Army came over the Haven, to aſſault the City on that ſide alſo.

A notable fight between four of the Chriſtians Ships, and the Turks Fleet.

In the mean time,three tall Genoway Ships laded with Men and Munition from the Iſland of Chios, with one of the Emperors laded with Corn from Sicilia, came with a fair Wind for Conſtantinople. The Turks great Fleet then lying not far off, within the ſight of the Camp, ſet upon them, and after a great fight, wherein an exceeding number of the Turks were ſlain with Shot, the Gallies boarded the Ships; but being much lower, were ſo far from doing any good, as that the Turks could not well look out, but they were from above ſlain or wounded. Mahomet from the ſhore beholding the unequal fight, and ſlaughter of his Men, cried out aloud, ſwearing and blaſpheming God, and in great rage rid into the Sea as far as he durſt; and coming back again rent his Clothes, faring with himſelf like a mad man. The whole Army of the Turks beholding the ſame fight at Sea, was filled with like Indignation alſo, but could nothing remedy the matter. The great Fleet aſhamed in the ſight of their King to be overcome of ſo few Ships, did what they might deſperately to enter; but all in vain, being continually overwhelmed with Shot and Stones from above, and valiantly beaten down by the Chriſtian Souldiers. At length weary of their loſs, they were glad with diſhonour to fall off again, and to get them farther off. The report of the loſs the Turks ſuſtained in this fight, is almoſt incredible; ſome of the Turks Fugitives reported, almoſt ten thouſand Turks to have there periſhed; but certain it is, that ſuch was the loſs, as filled the whole Army with Indignation and Sorrow, many having loſt their Kinſmen or Friends. Three of theſe Ships that had made this fight, arrived in ſafety at Conſtantinople, the other was loſt. Mahomet upon this Overthrow conceived ſuch diſpleaſure againſt Pantogles his Admiral, who in that fight had loſt one of his Eyes, that he nevertheleſs thruſt him out of his Office, confiſcated his Goods, and was hardly by the great Baſſaes intreated to ſpare his life.

Whilſt Mahomet thus lay at the Siege of Conſtantinople, and had thereunto given many great Attempts, with more loſs unto himſelf than to the Defendants, a rumor was raiſed in his Camp, of great Aid that was coming out of Italy by Sea, and out of Hungary by Land, for the relief of the beſieged. This report (although indeed it was not true) with the due conſideration of the danger of the Siege, filled the Turks Camp with fear; ſo that the Souldiers commonly murmured amongſt themſelves, ſaying, That to ſatisfie the ambitious humour of their young King, they were led to fight againſt impregnable Walls and Fortreſſes, yea againſt the Bars of Nature it ſelf, without all reaſon: Whereupon Mahomet entred into Conſultation with the three great Baſſaes his Counſellors, Whether it were beſt for him to continue the Siege or not. When Caly-Baſſa, ſometime his Tutor, a man of greateſt Authority among the Turks, both for his long experience and high place, and withall ſecretly favouring the diſtreſſed Emperor; after he had with long and grave Diſcourſe declared the difficulty or rather impoſſibility of the wiſhed Succeſs in that preſent War; and confirmed the ſame, by producing the examples of Bajazet his great Grandfather, and of Amurath his Father, who had both in vain made proof of their ſtrength againſt that City; at length concluded, that in his mind it were beſt for him to raiſe his Siege, and to depart before he had ſuſtained any further loſs or diſgrace; but Zoganus the ſecond Baſſa, in great Favour alſo with Mahomet, and ſecretly envying the Greatneſs of Caly-Baſſa, perſwaded the King to proceed in his honourable Enterpriſe; aſſuring him of the good Succeſs thereof, and with all the reaſons he could deviſe, impugned that which Caly-Baſſa had ſaid. And of the ſame opinion with Zoganus was alſo the third Baſſa, rather of purpoſe to croſs Caly-Baſſa, and withall to fit the Kings humor, than for any great hope he had in the good Succeſs of that he ſo much deſired. Howbeit the Speech he and Zoganus delivered, ſo well agreed with the Kings affection, that he reſolved to continue the Siege; and thereupon gave full Authority to Zoganus to appoint a day for a great and general Aſſault to be given, reſolving at once to engage all his Forces upon the winning of the City. Which charge Zoganus glady took upon him, and with his good liking, appointed the 29th day of May for the general Aſſault, being then the Tueſday next following. In the mean time he ſent one Iſmael, the Son of Alexander Prince of Sinope, Embaſſador unto the Emperor, to offer him Peace; but upon ſuch hard Conditions, as were no leſs to be refuſed than death it ſelf. Which thing he did, partly to ſatisfie the minds of his Turks (who are for moſt part of opinion, That God will not proſper them in their Aſſaults, except they firſt make unto their Enemies ſome offer of Peace, how unreaſonable ſoever it forceth not) and partly to make proof what confidence the Enemy yet had in himſelf, for the holding out of the Siege. But that diſhonourable Peace ſo offered, together with the intollerable Conditions, was by the Emperor honourably refuſed; who no leſs feared the Turks Faith (if he ſhould have accepted thereof) than he did the hardneſs of the Conditions. Three days before this fatal Aſſault was to be given, the Turks (according to their manner) kept their Solemn Faſt, eating nothing all the day until night; and then making the greateſt chear and joy they could deviſe, and in the winding up of the ſame, took their leave one of another, with ſuch kiſſing and imbracing as if they ſhould never have met again. At the ſame time Mahomet to encourage his Souldiers, cauſed Proclamation to be made through his Camp, That he would freely give all the ſpoil of the City for three days unto his Souldiers,if they could win it; and for confirmation thereof, ſolemnly ſwore the Turks great Oath, By the Immortal God, and by the four hundred Prophets, by Mahomet, by his Fathers Soul; by his own Children, and by the Sword wherewith he was girt, faithfully to perform whatſoever he had to them in his Proclamation promiſed.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Caly-Baſſa diſdaining that his counſel was rejected, and the Opinion of his Adverſaries followed; by ſecret Letters advertiſed the Emperor of the day appointed for the general Aſſault, together with all the preparation made againſt him; perſwading him not to be afraid of them, who were themſelves no leſs afraid of him; but carefully to provide to have all things in readineſs for the defence of his City, and valiantly to withſtand the raſh and laſt Attempt of his Enemies.

A bare ſhift for money.

This woful Emperor had already done what he could to the uttermoſt of his Power for defence of the City, all the time of the Siege; but ſuch was the diſloyalty of the Citizens his Subjects, that many times they could hardly be drawn from their private Trades and Occupations, unto the Walls to withſtand the Enemy; fooliſhly affirming, That it was to no purpoſe for them to fight againſt the Turks at the Breaches, and to ſtarve for Food at home in their houſes. For which cauſe, the Emperor commanded a View to be taken of all the Corn in the City (which then began to grow very ſcarce;) but upon diligent ſearch made, ſuch ſtore was found in many Mens hands, (which was by them either altogether kept in to ſell afterwards at unreaſonable prizes; or elſe ſo ſparingly uttered, as if they had none to ſpare) as that it appeared, the dearth and ſcarcity which then began to increaſe, to proceed rather of the covetouſneſs of men, than of any true want of Grain; this ſtore the Emperor cauſed to be proportionably divided unto every Family at reaſonable prizes, according to their ſpending; and ſo eaſed the great murmuring and grudging of the common people for Bread. The Grecian mercinary Souldiers alſo, regarding more their own private Profit than the Publick Service, refuſed any longer to go to the Walls, than they were ſure of their daily pay; which the poor Emperor, otherwiſe unable to give them, was glad to convert the Church-Plate and Jewels into Money, to content them. For he had many times before with tears, in vain requeſted to have borrowed money of his covetous Subjects, to have been employed in the defence of the City; but they would ſtill ſwear, that they had it not, as men grown poor for want of Trade; which in few days after, their Enemies found in ſuch abundance, that they wondred at their Wealth, and derided their folly, that poſſeſſing ſo much, they would beſtow ſo little in defence of themſelves and their Country. But this had been their uſual manner of dealing with their Emperors, in that declining State of the Empire; as well appeared in the time of the Emperor Baldwin, who for lack of money was glad firſt to ſell away many of the goodly Ornaments of the City, and afterwards to Pawn his own Son unto the Venetian Merchants, for Money to maintain his State, as in the former part of this Hiſtory is declared.

But to return again to the courſe of our Hiſtory. The Emperor certainly advertiſed of the Enemies purpoſe, for the general Aſſault ſhortly to be given, firſt commended the defence of himſelf and the City to the Protection of the Almighty, by general faſting and prayer; and afterwards appointed every Captain and Commander, to ſome certain place of the Wall for defence thereof; which was done by the direction of Jo. Juſtinianus his General, in whoſe valour the Conſtantinopolitans had repoſed their greateſt hope.

But the City being on every ſide now beſet with the Turks great Army, and the Defendants in number but few, for ſo great a City (in compaſs eight miles) the Walls could but ſlenderly in many places be manned, and eſpecially on both ſides toward the Sea, where indeed leaſt danger was. The greateſt ſtrength and beſt Souldiers, were placed for defence of the utter Wall, where the Breach was, and the Aſſault expected by Land. Juſtinianus the General himſelf, with three hundred Genoways well armed, and certain choſen Greeks undertook the defence of that part of the battered Wall, near unto the Roman Gate, where the fall the Tower Bactatina had filled the Ditch as is aforeſaid; againſt which place Mahomet himſelf lay encamped, with his Janizaries and beſt Men of War. Near unto Juſtinianus lay the Emperor himſelf, for defence of another part of the Wall; and ſo other Captains orderly with their Companies, all alongſt the utter Wall; and becauſe the Defendants ſhould have no hope to ſave their Lives, more than their own Valour, the Emperor cauſed all the Gates of the inner Wall to be faſt ſhut up; and in this ſort they lay all the night, expecting continually when the Aſſault ſhould be given; all which time they might hear great hurly burly and noiſe in the Turks Camp, as they were putting things in readineſs for the Aſſault.

Conſtantinople aſſaulted by the Turks.

A little before day, the Turks approached the Walls, and begun the Aſſault, where Shot and Stones were delivered upon them from the Walls, as thick as Hail; whereof little fell in vain, by reaſon of the multitude of the Turks, who preſſing faſt unto the Walls, could not ſee in the dark how to defend themſelves, but were without number wounded or ſlain; but theſe were of the common and worſt Souldiers, of whom the Turkiſh King made no more reckoning than to abate the firſt force of the Defendants. Upon the firſt appearance of the day, Mahomet gave the ſign appointed for the general Aſſault, whereupon the City was in a moment and at one inſtant on every ſide moſt furiouſly aſſaulted by the Turks; for Mahomet, the more to diſtreſs the Defendants, and the better to ſee the forwardneſs of the Souldiers, had before appointed which part of the City every Colonel with his Regiment ſhould aſſail. Which they valiantly performed, delivering their Arrows and Shot upon the Defendants, ſo thick, that the light of the day was therewith darkned; other in the mean time couragiouſly mounting the Scaling-Ladders, and coming even to handy-ſtrokes with the Defendants upon the Wall; where the formoſt were for moſt part violently born forward by them which followed after. On the other ſide, the Chriſtians with no leſs courage withſtood the Turkiſh fury, beating them down again with great Stones and weighty pieces of Timber, and ſo overwhelmed them with Shot, Darts, and Arrows, and other hurtful devices from above; that the Turks diſmayed with the terrour thereof, were ready to retire.

Mahomet reneweth the aſſault.

Mahomet ſeeing the great ſlaughter and diſcomfiture of his Men, ſent in freſh Supplies of his Janizaries and beſt Men of War, whom he had for that purpoſe reſerved as his laſt Hope and Refuge; by whoſe coming on his fainting Souldiers were again encouraged, and the terrible Aſſault begun afreſh. At which time the barbarous King ceaſed not to uſe all poſſible means to maintain the Aſſault; by Name calling upon this and that Captain, promiſing unto ſome whom he ſaw forward, golden Mountains; and unto others in whom he ſaw any ſign of Cowardiſe, threatning moſt terrible death; by which means the Aſſault became moſt dreadful, death there raging in the midſt of many thouſands. And albeit that the Turks lay dead by heaps upon the ground, yet other freſh men preſſed on ſtill in their places, over their dead bodies, and with divers event either ſlew, or were ſlain by their Enemies.

In this ſo terrible a Conflict, it chanced Juſtinianus the General to be wounded in the Arm, who loſing much blood, cowardly withdrew himſelf from the place of his Charge, not leaving any to ſupply his room, and ſo got into the City by the Gate called Romana, which he had cauſed to be opened in the inner Wall; pretending the cauſe of his departure to be for the binding up of his Wound, but being indeed a man now altogether diſcouraged.

The Chriſtians forſake the walls.

The Souldiers there preſent, diſmayed with the departure of their General, and ſore charged by the Janizaries, forſook their ſtations, and in haſt fled to the ſame Gate whereby Juſtinianus was entred; with the ſight whereof, the other Souldiers diſmayed, ran thither by heaps alſo. But whilſt they violently ſtrive, all together to get in at once, they ſo wedged one another in the entrance of the Gate, that few of ſo great a multitude got in; in which ſo great a preſs and confuſion of minds, 800 perſons were there by them that followed, trodden under foot, or thruſt to death. The Emperor himſelf, for ſafeguard of his life flying with the reſt, in that preſs as a man not regarded, miſerably ended his days, together with the Greek Empire. His dead body was ſhortly after found by the Turks among the ſlain, and known by his rich Apparel, whoſe Head being cut off, was forthwith preſented to the Turkiſh Tyrant; by whoſe Commandment it was afterward thruſt upon the point of a Launce, and in great deriſion carried about as a Trophy of his Victory, firſt in the Camp, and afterwards up and down the City.

Conſtantinople won by the Turks.

The Turks encouraged with the flight of the Chriſtians, preſently advanced their Enſigns upon the top of the uttermoſt Wall, crying Victory; and by the Breach entred as if it had been a great Flood, which having once found a Breach in the Bank, overfloweth, and beareth down all before it; ſo the Turks when they had won the utter Wall, entred the City by the ſame Gate that was opened for Juſtinianus, and by a Breach which they had before made with their great Artillery, and without mercy cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further reſiſtance became Lords of that moſt famous and Imperial City. Some few there were of the Chriſtians, who preferring death before the Turkiſh ſlavery, with their Swords in their hands ſold their lives dear unto their Enemies; amongſt whom, the two Brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi Italians, with Theophilus Palæologus a Greek, and Joannes Stiavus a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage, deſerve to be had in eternal Remembrance; who after they had like Lions made ſlaughter of their Enemies, died in the midſt of them, embrued with their blood, rather oppreſſed by multitude, than by true valour overcome. In this fury of the Barbarians, periſhed many thouſands of Men, Women, and Children, without reſpect of Age, Sex, or Condition. Many for ſafeguard of ther lives fled into the Temple of Sophia; where they were all without pity ſlain, except ſome few reſerved by the barbarous Victors, to purpoſes more grievous than death it ſelf. The rich and beautiful Ornaments and Jewels of that moſt ſumptuous and magnificent Church (the ſtately Building of Juſtinianus the Emperor) were in the turning of a hand, pluckt down and carried away by the Turks; and the Church it ſelf built for God to be honoured in, for the preſent converted into a Stable for their Horſes, or a place for the execution of their abominable and unſpeakable filthineſs; the Image of the Crucifix was alſo by them taken down, and a Turks Cap put upon the head thereof, and ſo ſet up and ſhot at with their Arrows, and afterwards in great deriſion carried about in their Camp, as it had been in Proceſſion, with Drums playing before it, railing and ſpitting at it, and calling it the God of the Chriſtians. Which I note not ſo much done in contempt of the Image, as in the deſpight of Chriſt and the Chriſtian Religion.

But whilſt ſome were thus ſpoiling of the Churches, others were as buſie in ranſacking of private houſes, where the miſerable Chriſtians were enforced to endure in their perſons whatſoever pleaſed the inſolent Victors; unto whom all things were now lawful that ſtood with their luſt, every common Souldier having power of Life and Death, at his pleaſure to ſpare or ſpill. At which time Riches were no better than Poverty; and Beauty worſe than Deformity. What Tongue were able to expreſs the miſery of that time? or the proud Inſolency of thoſe barbarous Conquerors? where of ſo many thouſands, every man with greedineſs fitted his own unreaſonable deſire; all which the poor Chriſtians were inforced to indure. But to ſpeak of the hidden Treaſure, Money, Plate, Jewels, and other Riches there found, paſſeth credit; the Turks themſelves wondred thereat, and were therewith enriched, that it is a Proverb amongſt them at this day, if any of them grow ſuddenly rich, to ſay, He hath been at the ſacking of Conſtantinople; whereof if ſome reaſonable part had in time been beſtowed upon the defence of the City, the Turkiſh King had not ſo eaſily taken both it and the City. But every man was careful how to encreaſe his own private Wealth, few or none regarding the Publick State; until in fine, every man with his private abundance was wrapped up together with his needy Neighbour in the ſelfſame common miſery. Yea the ſecurity of the Conſtantinopolitans was ſuch, that being always environed with their mortal Enemies, yet had they no care of fortifying of ſo much as the inner Wall of the City (which for beauty and ſtrength was comparable with the Walls of any City in the World, if it had been kept well repaired) but ſuffered the Officers which had the charge to ſee to the fortifying of the City, to convert the greateſt part of the money into their own Purſes; as appeared by Manuel Giagerus, a little before a very poor man; and likewiſe by Neophitus, who then having that Office to ſee unto the Fortification of the City, had in ſhort time gathered together ſeventy thouſand Florens, which became all a worthy Prey unto the greedy Turks.

After that the barbarous common Souldier had thus by the ſpace of three days without controulment taken his pleaſure in the City (as Mahomet had before promiſed) and throughly ranſackt every corner thereof, they then returned into the Camp, with their rich ſpoils, driving the poor Chriſtian Captives before them, as if they had been droves of Cattel, or flocks of Sheep; a Spectacle no leſs lamentable, than was the ſacking of the City. It would have grieved any ſtony heart to have ſeen the noble Gentlewomen and great Ladies, with their beautiful Children, and many other fair Perſonages, who lately flowed in all wordly Wealth and Pleaſure, to be now become the poor and miſerable Bondſlaves of moſt baſe and contemptible Raſcals; who were ſo far from ſhewing them any pity, as that they delighted in nothing more than to heap more and more miſery upon them, making no more reckoning of them than of Dogs. There might the Parents ſee the woful miſery of their beloved Children, and the Children of the Parents; the Husband might ſee the ſhameful abuſe of his Wife, and the Wife of her Husband, and generally one Friend of another; and yet not able to mourn together (the leaſt part of heavy comfort) being in the Thraldom of divers cruel Maſters, by whom they were kept aſunder, like in few days to be diſperſed into divers far Countries, without hope that they ſhould ever find Releaſe, or one ſee another again.

The Souldiers being all retired into the Camp, Mahomet as a proud Conqueror, with great Triumph entred into the City of Conſtantinople, then deſolate and void of all Chriſtian Inhabitants; and there after the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, made a ſumptuous and Royal Feaſt unto his Baſſaes and other great Captains; where after he had ſurcharged himſelf with exceſs of Meat and Drink, he cauſed divers of the chief Chriſtian Captives, both Men and Women (of whom many were of the late Emperors Line and Race) to be in his preſence put to death, as he with his Turks ſate Banquetting; deeming his Feaſt much more ſtately by ſuch effuſion of Chriſtian blood. Which manner of exceeding cruelty he daily uſed, until ſuch time as he had deſtroyed all the Grecian Nobility that was in his Power, with the chief of the late Conſtantinopolitan Citizens. At which time alſo divers of the Venetian Senators, with Bajulus their Governor, and many rich Merchants of Genoa, and other places of Italy, were in like manner murthered; ſo that of ſeven and forty Senators of Venice which were there taken (whereof moſt part came thither by chance, bound for other places, but there unluckily ſhut up) ſome few found the favour, with exceeding great Ranſoms to redeem themſelves.

Amongſt theſe Noblemen thus lamentably executed, was one Lucas Leontares, or Notaras, commonly called Kyr-Lucas, or Lord Lucas, but of late great Chancellor of Conſtantinople, a man of greateſt account next unto the Emperor himſelf; whom the Turkiſh Tyrant ſeemed greatly to blame, that he being a man in ſo great credit with the late Emperor, perſwaded him not in time to have ſought for Peace upon any condition, or elſe to have yielded up the City, rather than to have run that extream courſe of wilful miſery. He to excuſe the matter, ſaid, That the late Emperor his Maſter was encouraged to hold out the Seige, by the Venetians and Citizens of Pera, from whom he received Aid; as alſo by ſome of the greateſt Men about his own Perſon; for proof whereof, he drew out of his boſom the Letters which Caly-Baſſa had to that purpoſe written unto the Emperor, and delivered them to Mahomet, hoping thereby to have found ſome favour. But when he had ſaid what he could, the eldeſt of his Sons then living (for he had loſt two elder in the time of the Siege) was cruelly executed before his face, and the youngeſt reſerved for the Tyrants luſt; and after all this miſery, had his own head ſtruck off with the reſt appointed for that days Sacrifice. Out of this general Calamity eſcaped Jo. Juſtinianus the General, who with all ſpeed fled at firſt to Pera, and from thence to Chios, where in few days after he died, of grief of mind (as was thought) rather than of his Wound, being happy if he had honourably before ended his days upon the Walls of Conſtantinople. Iſidorus alſo the Cardinal and Legate from the Pope, diſguiſed in ſimple Apparel, and being of the Turks unknown, redeemed himſelf for a ſmall Ranſom, as if he had been a man of none account, and ſo eſcaped; whom if Mahomet had known, he had undoubtedly been made ſhorter by the head.

The glory of this famous City of Conſtantinople continued many hundred years, commanding a great part of the World, until that by civil diſcord and private gain, it was by little and little ſo weakned, that the Emperors of later times, for the maintenance of their Eſtate, were glad to rely ſometime upon one, and ſometime upon another, yet ſtill holding the Title and State of an Empire, by the ſpace of 1121 years, when as (God his judgment ſet apart, wonderful and ſhameful it is to conſider how) it was by this Turkiſh King Mahomet ſo quickly taken, and the Chriſtian Empire of the Eaſt there utterly overthrown; which happened on the nine and twentieth day of May, in the year of our Lord, 1453. Conſtantinus Palæologus, the Son of Helena, and laſt Chriſtian Emperor, being then ſlain, when he had reigned about eight years. Since which time it hath continued the Imperial Seat of the Turkiſh Emperors, and ſo remaineth at this day.

Pera yielded to the Turk.

The Poteſtates and Citizens of Pera, otherwiſe called Galata, a City ſtanding oppoſite againſt Conſtantinople, on the other ſide of the Haven, and then under the Government of the Genoways, doubting to run the ſame courſe of miſery with their Neighbours, ſent their Orators unto Mahomet (the ſame day that Conſtantinople was taken) offering to him the Keys of their Gates, and ſo to become his Subjects. Of which their Offer Mahomet accepted, and ſent Zoganus with his Regiment to take poſſeſſion of the City. Who coming thither, according to Mahomet his Commandment, there eſtabliſhed the Turkiſh Government, confiſcated the Goods of all ſuch as were fled, and uſed the reſt of the Citizens which ſtaid, with ſuch Inſolency and Oppreſſion, as that their miſery was not much leſs than theirs of Conſtantinople; and becauſe it was doubted, that the Genoways might by Sea give Aid unto the Citizens, if they ſhould at any time ſeek to revolt, he cauſed all the Walls and Forteſſes of the City which were toward the Land, to be caſt down and laid even with the ground. Thus is the fatal period of the Greek Empire run, and Mahomet in one day become Lord of the two famous Cities of Conſtantinople and Pera; the one taken by Force, the other by Compoſition. At which time the miſery of Pera was great, but that of Conſtantinople juſtly to be accounted amongſt the greateſt Calamities that ever happened to any Chriſtian City in the World.

Mahomet notably diſſembleth his hatred againſt Caly-Baſſa.

Mahomet had of long time born a ſecret grudge againſt Caly-Baſſa, ſometimes his Tutor, for that by his means Amurath his Father, in the dangerous time of the Hungarian Wars, had again reſumed unto himſelf the Government of the Turkiſh Kingdom, which he had before reſigned unto him, then but young. But foraſmuch as he was the chief Baſſa, and had for many years ruled all things at his pleaſure, to the general good liking of the people, during the Reign of old Amurath, and was thereby grown to be of ſuch Wealth, Credit, and Authority, as no man had at any time obtained greater under any of the Othoman Kings; Mahomet in the beginning of his Reign, before he was eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, durſt not take Revenge of that Injury (as he deemed it) but yet ſtill kept it in remembrance, warily diſſembling his deep conceived hatred, as if he had quite forgot it. Nevertheleſs ſometime (for all his warineſs) words fell from him, whereby the wary Courtiers (which as curiouſly weigh their Princes words, as the cunning Goldſmith doth his fineſt Gold) eaſily perceived the ſecret grudge that ſtuck in his ſtomach againſt the Baſſa; and thereby divined his fall to be at hand. So it hapned one day that as Mahomet was walking in the Court, he ſaw a Fox of the Baſſaes tied in a chain, which after he had a while earneſtly looked upon, he ſuddenly brake into this Speech; Alas poor Beaſt, haſt thou no money to give thy Maſter to ſet thee at liberty? Out of which words, curious heads gathered much matter concerning the Kings diſpoſition towards the Baſſa. This ominous ſurmiſing of the Courtiers (which oft-times proveth too true) was not unknown unto the Baſſa himſelf, but troubled him much; wherefore to get himſelf out of the way for a ſeaſon, more than for any devotion, he took upon him to go in Pilgrimage to viſit the Temple of the great Prophet (as they term him) at Mecha, which amongſt the Turks is holden for a right Religious and Meritorious Work; hoping, that the young Kings diſpleaſure might in time be mitigated, and his malice aſſwaged. But Mahomet perceiving the diſtruſt of the Baſſa, and whereof it proceeded, ſeemed to take knowledge thereof, and with good words comforted him up, willing him to be of good chear, and not to miſdoubt any thing; neither to regard the vain Speech of fooliſh people, aſſuring him of his undoubted Favour; and the more to put him out of all ſuſpition, continually ſent him rich Gifts, and heaped upon him new Honours, as if of all others he had eſteemed him moſt. Until that now at the taking of Conſtantinople, it was diſcovered by Lucas Leontares, that he had Intelligence with the late Emperor of Conſtantinople, and his Letters produced. For which cauſe, or as the common report went, for the old grudge that the Tyrant bare againſt him, as alſo for his great Wealth, he was by Mahomets commandment apprehended and carried in bonds to Hadrianople; where after he had with exquiſite torments been enforced to confeſs where all his Treaſures lay, he was moſt cruelly in his extream old age executed. After whoſe death, his Friends and Servants (which were many, for he was a man greatly beloved in Court) in token of their grief, put on Mourning Apparel; ſo that in the Court appeared a great ſhew of common ſorrow; wherewith Mahomet being offended, cauſed Proclamation to be made, That all ſuch as did wear ſuch Mourning Apparel, ſhould the next day appear before him; at which time there was not one to be ſeen about the Court in that heavy Attire, for fear of the Tyrants diſpleaſure.

After that Mahomet was thus become Lord of the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, as is aforeſaid, and had fully reſolved there to place his Imperial Seat, he firſt repaired the Walls and other Buildings ſpoiled in the late Siege, and by Proclamations ſent forth into all parts of his Dominions, gave great Priviledges and Immunities to all ſuch as ſhould come to dwell at Conſtantinople, with free liberty to exerciſe what Religion or Trade they pleaſed. Whereby in ſhort time that great and deſolate City was again well peopled, with ſuch as out of divers Countries reſorted thither; but ſpecially with the Jewiſh Nation, which driven out of other places, came thither in great numbers, and were of the Turks gladly received. So when he had there eſtabliſht all things according to his hearts deſire, he took upon him the Name and Title of an Emperor; and is from that time not unworthily reputed for the firſt Emperor of the Turks.

Now among many fair Virgins taken Priſoners by the Turks at the winning of Conſtantinople, was one Irene a Greek born of ſuch incomparable Beauty and rare Perfection, both of Body of Mind, as if Nature had in her, to the admiration of the World, laboured to have ſhewn her greateſt skill; ſo prodigally ſhe had beſtowed upon her, all the Graces that might beautifie or commend that her ſo curious a Work. This Paragon was by him that by chance had taken her, preſented unto the great Sultan Mahomet himſelf, as a Jewel ſo fit for no mans wearing as his own; by the Beauty and ſecret Vertues whereof, he found himſelf even upon the firſt View not a little moved. Nevertheleſs, having as then his head full of Troubles, and above all things careful for the aſſuring of the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, by him but even then won, he for the preſent committed her to the charge of his Eunuch, and ſent her away, ſo to be in ſafety kept until his better leiſure. But thoſe his Troubles overblown, and his new Conqueſts well aſſured, he then began forthwith to think of the fair Irene; and for his pleaſure ſending for her, took in her Perfections ſuch delight and contentment, as that in ſhort time he had changed ſtate with her, ſhe being become the Miſtreſs and Commander of him ſo great a Conqueror; and he in nothing more delighted, than in doing her the greateſt Honour and Service he could. All the day he ſpent with her in diſcourſe, and the night in dalliance; all time ſpent in her company, ſeemed to him ſhort; and without her nothing pleaſed; his fierce Nature was now by her well tamed, and his wonted care of Arms quite neglected: Mars ſlept in Venus lap, and now the Souldiers might go play. Yea the very Government of his Eſtate and Empire ſeemed to be of him, in compariſon of her, little or not at all regarded; the care whereof being by him careleſly committed to others, that ſo he might wholly himſelf attend upon her, in whom more than in himſelf the people ſaid he delighted. Such is the power of diſordered affections, where reaſon ruleth not therein. But whilſt he thus forgetful of himſelf, ſpends in pleaſure not ſome few days or months, but even one whole year or two, to the lighting of his Credit, and the great diſcontentment of his Subjects in general; the Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court (men deſirous of Employment, and grieved to ſee him ſo given to his Affections, and to make no end thereof) began at firſt in ſecret to murmur thereat, and to ſpeak hardly of him; and at length (after their inſolent manner) ſpared not openly to ſay, That it were well done to deprive him of his Government and State, as unworthy thereof, and to ſet up one of his Sons in his ſtead. Which Speeches were now grown ſo rife, and the diſcontentment of the Men of War ſo great, that it was not without cauſe by ſome of the great Baſſaes feared, whereunto this their ſo great Inſolency would grow. But who ſhould tell the Tyrant thereof; whoſe frown was in it ſelf death? or who durſt take in hand to cure that his ſick Mind? which diſtraught with the ſweet, but poyſoned potions of love, was not like to liſten to any good counſel, were it never ſo wiſely given; but as a man metamorphoſed, to turn his fury upon him which ſhould preſume ſo wholſomely (but contrary to his good liking) to adviſe him. Unhappy man, whoſe great Eſtate and fierce Nature was not without danger to be medled or tempered with, no, not by them who of all others ought in ſo great a peril to have been thereof moſt careful; but were now for fear of all become ſilent and dumb. Now amongſt other great Men in the Court, was one Muſtapha-Baſſa, a man for his good Service (for that he was of a Child brought up with him) of Mahomet greatly favoured, and by him alſo highly promoted; and he again by him as his Soveraign no leſs honoured than feared; who no leſs than the reſt, grieved to ſee ſo great a change in the great Sultan, of whom they had conceived no ſmall hope of greater matters than were by him as yet performed; and moved alſo with the danger threatned unto him, by the diſcontented Janizaries and Men of War; eſpying him at convenient leiſure to be ſpoken unto, and preſuming of the former credit he had with him, adventured thus to break with him, and to give him warning thereof.

How dangerous a thing it is for a Subject or Vaſſal, without leave, preſumptuouſly to enter into the ſecrets of his dread Lord and Soveraign, the woful Examples of others (moſt mighty Mahomet*) have ſo ſufficiently warned me, as that were it not for the dutiful Loyalty I owe unto your Greatneſs, far dearer unto me than mine own life, I would not at this time adventure my ſelf unto the hazard of your doubtful acceptance of my faithful Speech and meaning, but with others keep ſilence, and in ſecret mourn together with my heavy thoughts; which if I ſhould in ſo great a danger both of your Life and Empire now do, without warning you thereof, I were not to be accounted unworthy only thoſe your great Favours and Honours, moſt bountifully on me beſtowed; but as a moſt vile Traytor both unto your State and Perſon, to be of all men deteſted and abhorred. The life you have of late led, ever ſince the taking of* Conſtantinople, as a man careleſs of his Eſtate, and wholly wedded unto his own Pleaſure, hath given occaſion not unto the vulgar people only (always ready to ſay the worſt) and Souldiers of the Court, the Guarders of your Perſon, but even unto the greateſt Commanders of your Armies and Empire, to murmur and grudge, I dare not ſay, to Conſpire againſt you. Yet pardon me dread Soveraign, if I ſhould ſo ſay, for that there is no man which with great diſcontentment marvelleth not much to ſee ſo great an alteration in your Heroical Diſpoſition and Nature; whereby you are become far unlike that noble Mahomet, which having overthrown the Greek Empire, and taken the great City of Conſtantinople, promiſed both unto himſelf and others, the Conqueſt of Italy, and the ſacking of Rome, the ſtately Seat of the ancient Roman Conquerors. You have given your ſelf over (as they ſay) for a ſpoil and prey unto a poor ſimple Woman, your Slave and Vaſſal, who with her Beauty and Allurements hath ſo bewitched your Underſtanding and Reaſon, as that you can attend nothing but her Service, and the ſatisfying of your moſt paſſionate and inordinate deſires; which how much the more you cheriſh them, ſo much the more they torment and vex you. Enter but a little into your ſelf (I pray you) and compare the life you now lead with the like time heretofore by you ſpent in treading Honours ſteps, and you ſhall find a notable difference betwixt the one and the other. Had the noble Othoman, the firſt raiſer of your Houſe and Family ſo given himſelf over unto Pleaſure, you had not now inhabited the Countries of Bithynia and Galatia, with others more alongſt the Euxine, by him conquered. Neither had his Son Orchanes (the lively Image of his Father, and Follower of his Vertues) by leading this kind of life, triumphed over Licaonia, Phrygia, and Caria, or extended the bounds of his Empire ſo far as unto the Straits of Helleſpontus. What ſhould I ſpeak of Amurath his Son, and Succeſſor in the Empire? who in Perſon himſelf, firſt of the Othoman Kings, paſſed over into Europe, placed his Imperial Seat at Hadrianople, conquered Thracia, Bulgaria, and Raſcia. Yea Bajazet your great Grandfather is in his misfortune to be more than you commended, as vanquiſhed in field by the mighty Tamerlane with four hundred thouſand Horſemen and ſix hundred thouſand Foot, and not by a ſilly Woman; comforting his miſhap with the Honour and Greatneſs of him by whom he was ſo overcome. Neither may I with ſilence paſs over your worthy Grandfather the Noble Mahomet, who not contented to have reſtored the ſhaking Empire, conquered alſo a great part of Macedonia, even to the Iconian Sea, and carrying the terrour of his Arms over into Aſia, did great matters againſt the Caramanians and others. As for your Father Amurath (of worthy Memory) I cannot but to my great grief and ſorrow ſpeak of him, who by the ſpace of thirty years made both the Sea and Earth to quake under his Feet, and with ſtrong hand more than once vanquiſhed the Hungarians, and brought under his ſubjection the Countries of Phocis, Beotia, Ætolia, with a great part of Morea; and to ſpeak of him truly, brake even the very heart and ſtrength of the Grecians, and other his fierce Enemies. Let all theſe famous Conqueſts of your noble Progenitors, whoſe worthy Praiſes (as eternal Trophies of their Honour) are diſperſed into every corner of the World, awake you out of this heavy Lethargy wherein you have too long ſlept, yea, let the remembrance of the Conqueſt of this Imperial City by you to your Immortal Glory won, ſtir you up to greater things; and let it never be ſaid of you, That you were able with your Sword to overcome your greateſt Enemies, and not with reaſon to ſubdue your inordinate affections: Think that your greateſt Conqueſt, and ſuffer not your ſelf, ſo great a Conqueror, to be led in Triumph by your Slave. What availeth it you to have won Conſtantinople, and to have loſt your Self? Shake off theſe golden Fetters wherein the wily Greek hath ſo faſt bound you; which at the firſt though it ſeem unto you hard and painful, yet ſhall time diſgeſt it, and make you to think it both good and neceſſary for your State. Wean your ſelf from your deſires, and give reſt unto your troubled thoughts; which if you cannot do at once, ſtrive by little and little to do it; pleaſure groweth greater by the ſeldom uſe thereof, and ſatiety bringeth loathſomneſs. Moderate your ſelf therefore, and again take up Arms. Your Souldiers if they be not employed abroad, will to your farther trouble ſet themſelves to work at home: Idleneſs maketh them Inſolent, and want of Martial Diſcipline corrupteth their Manners. Hereof proceedeth their intemperate and diſloyal Speeches, That if you will not lead them forth for the Honour and Inlargement of the Othoman Empire, as did all your moſt noble Progenitors, they will ſet up another that ſhall, even one of your own Children. And what the common Souldiers fooliſhly ſay, their great Commanders maliciouſly purpoſe; which, what a confuſion it would bring unto the whole State of your Empire, together with the danger of your Royal Perſon, I abhor to think. Wherefore it is time, it is now high time for you to ſhew your ſelf, and with the Majeſty of your Preſence to repreſs their tumultuous Inſolency, before it break farther out. Rebellions are by far, more eaſily prevented, than in their heat appeaſed. The diſcontented multitude is a wild Beaſt with many heads, which once enraged, is not a little to be feared, or without danger to be tamed; yet do you but ſhew your ſelf Maſter of your own Affections, and you ſhall eaſily Maſter them alſo. But what is fit for you to do, beſeemeth me not for to ſay; yea, pardon me I beſeech you, that I have thus much (contrary perhaps to your good liking) already ſaid, provoked (by what divine Inſpiration I know not) even half againſt my will, to diſcover unto you the ſecret of my heart, and to lay open unto you thoſe things, which others knowing as well as I, do yet for fear keep the ſame from you. And if I have gone too far, or in any thing that I have ſaid forgot my ſelf, impute the ſame (my dread Soveraign) unto the zeal of my Love and Loyalty towards you, or unto my fidelity ſo often by you tried, or to our ancient Education (the ground of your affection towards me) or to what elſe ſhall pleaſe you, rather than to my preſumption; from which, how far I have always been, I appeal even to your Majeſties own knowledge.

Having thus ſaid, he fell down at his Feet, as there to receive his heavy doom of his ſo free Speech, if it ſhould be otherwiſe than well taken of the angry Sultan; who all this while with great attention and many a ſtern look had hearkned unto all that the Baſſa had ſaid; for well he knew it to be all true; and that in ſo ſaying, he had but diſcharged the part of a truſty and faithful Servant, careful of his Maſters Honour. But yet the beauty of the Greek was ſtill ſo fixed in his heart, and the pleaſure he took in her, ſo great, as that to think of the leaving of her, bred him many a troubled thought. He was at war with himſelf, as in his often changed countenance well appeared; Reaſon calling unto him, for his Honour; and his amarous affections, ſtill ſuggeſting unto him new delights. Thus toſſed to and fro (as a Ship with contrary winds) and withall conſidering the danger threatned to his Eſtate, if he ſhould longer follow thoſe his pleaſures, ſo much diſpleaſing to his Men of War, he reſolved upon a ſtrange point whereby at once to cut off all thoſe his troubled paſſions, and withall to ſtrike a terror even into the ſtouteſt of them that had before condemned him, as unable to govern his own ſo paſſionate affections. Whereupon with countenance well declaring his inward diſcontentment, he ſaid unto the Baſſa, yet proſtrate at his Feet.

Although thou haſt unreverently ſpoken, as a Slave preſuming to enter into the greateſt Secrets of thy Soveraign (not without offence to be of thee once thought upon) and therefore deſerveſt well to die; yet for that thou waſt a Child brought up together with me, and haſt ever been unto me faithful, I for this time pardon thee; and before to morrow the Sun go down, will make it known both to thee, and others of the ſame opinion with thee, whether I be able to bridle mine affections or not. Take order in the mean time that all the Baſſaes, and the chief Commanders of my Men of War be aſſembled together to morrow, there to know my farther pleaſure; whereof fail you not.

So the Baſſa being departed, he after his wonted manner went in unto the Greek, and ſolacing himſelf all that day and the night following with her, made more of her than ever before; and the more to pleaſe her, dined with her; commanding, that after dinner ſhe ſhould be attired with more ſumptuous Apparel than ever ſhe had before worn; and for the further gracing of her, to be deckt with many moſt precious Jewels of ineſtimable value. Whereunto the poor Soul gladly obeyed, little thinking that it was her Funeral Apparel. Now in the mean while, Muſtapha (altogether ignorant of the Sultans mind) had as he was commanded, cauſed all the Nobility, and Commanders of the Men of War, to be aſſembled into the great Hall; every man much marvelling, what ſhould be the Emperors meaning therein, who had not of long ſo publickly ſhewed himſelf. But being thus together aſſembled, and every man according as their minds gave them, talking diverſly of the matter; behold the Sultan entred into the Palace leading the fair Greek by the hand; who beſide her incomparable Beauty and other the greateſt graces of Nature, adorned alſo with all that curioſity could deviſe, ſeemed not now to the beholders a mortal Wight, but ſome of the ſtately Goddeſſes, whom Poets in their Extaſies deſcribe. Thus coming together into the midſt of the Hall, and due Reverence to them done by all them there preſent; he ſtood ſtill with the fair Lady in his left hand, and ſo furiouſly looking round about him, ſaid unto them; I underſtand of your great diſcontentment, and that you all murmur and grudge, for that I, overcome with mine affection toward this ſo fair a Paragon, cannot withdraw my ſelf from her preſence; but I would fain know which of you is ſo temperate, that if he had in his poſſeſſion a thing ſo rare and precious, ſo lovely and ſo fair, would not be thrice adviſed before he would forego the ſame? Say what you think; in the word of a Prince I give you free liberty ſo to do. But they all rapt with an incredible admiration to ſee ſo fair a thing, the like whereof they had never before beheld, ſaid all with one conſent, That he had with greater reaſon ſo paſſed the time with her, than any man had to find fault therewith; whereunto the barbarous Prince anſwered, Well, but now I will make you to underſtand how far you have been deceived in me, and that there is no earthly thing that can ſo much blind my ſenſes, or bereave me of reaſon, as not to ſee and underſtand what beſeemeth my high Place and Calling; yea, I would you ſhould all know, that the Honour and Conqueſts of the Othoman Kings my noble Progenitors, is ſo fixed in my Breaſt, with ſuch a deſire in my ſelf to exceed the ſame, as that nothing but death is able to put it out of my remembrance. And having ſo ſaid, preſently with one of his hands catching the fair Greek by the hair of her head, and drawing his Falchion with the other, at one blow ſtruck off her head, to the great terrour of them all; and having ſo done, ſaid unto them; Now by this judge whether your Emperor is able to bridle his affections or not. And within a while after, meaning to diſcharge the reſt of his choler, cauſed great preparation to be made for the Conqueſt of Peloponneſus, and the beſieging of Belgrade.

At the ſame time that the barbarous Turks took the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, Thomas and Demetrius Palæologi, Brethren to the late unfortunate Emperor Conſtantinus, governed a great part of Peloponneſus, one of the moſt famous Provinces of Grecia, which in form of a leafe of a Plane-Tree, is almoſt in manner of an Iſland, environed with the Seas Ionium and Ægeum, which running far into the Land on either ſide thereof, ſeparateth the ſame from the reſt of Grecia, by two great Bays, leaving but a ſtrait neck of Land, called of the Greeks Iſtmos, in breadth about five miles, which was ſometimes by the Grecians, and afterward by the Venetians, fortified by a ſtrong Wall, and five great Caſtles; near unto which place ſtood the great and famous City of Corinth. This Province is in length 175 miles, and almoſt as much in breadth; wherein are contained the Countries of Achaia, Meſſenia, Lacedemonia, Argolica, and Archadia; with many famous Cities and goodly Havens, wherein it far exceedeth all the other Provinces of Grecia. Theſe two Princes Thomas and Demetrius, diſmayed with their Brothers diſaſter Fortune, began now ſo far to deſpair of their own Eſtate, that upon the firſt bruit thereof, they were about preſently to have fled by Sea into Italy.

And as it commonly falleth out, That one evil happeneth not alone; ſo at the ſame time it fortuned, that the Albanians riſe in Arms againſt the ſaid two Princes their Soveraigns; and under the leading of their Rebellious Captain Emanuel Catecuzenus, grievouſly troubled both the poor Princes. Theſe Albanians were a rough and hardy kind of people, which living after the manner of the rude Scithian Herdſmen, by feeding of Cattel, had of long time planted themſelves in Peloponneſus; differing from the natural Greeks, both in their manner of living and Language; which diverſity was no ſmall cauſe that they oftentimes ſpurned, as now, againſt the Government of the Grecian Princes. In this extremity, the two diſtreſſed Princes (not well knowing 1454 which way to turn themſelves) ſought for Peace at Mahomets hands, offering to become his Tributaries. Of which their Offer he willingly accepted, as an induction to the full Conqueſt of that Country; and ſent Turachan Governor of Theſſalia, one of his greateſt Men of War, with an Army into Peloponneſus, to Aid thoſe Princes againſt the Albanians; by whoſe help the maſterful Rebels were in ſhort time diſcomfited, and the Country of Peloponneſus quieted; yet ſo, that it was now become Tributary to the Turkiſh King.

These two Princes Demetrius and Thomas, the laſt of all the Chriſtian Princes that reigned in Peloponneſus, having thus loſt their Liberty, lived for a few years as the Turks Vaſſals; paying ſuch yearly Tribute as they had before promiſed. During which time many Diſpleaſures aroſe betwixt the two Brothers, being both jealous of their Eſtate, and deſirous by all plauſible means to win the hearts of their Subjects one from another; whereby it came ſo to paſs, that whiles they both deſired to become popular, they weakned their own Credit, and had not their Subjects at ſuch command as beſt ſtood with the ſafety of their Eſtate. Nevertheleſs, as ſoon as they underſtood that the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt were making great preparation againſt the Turk; and that Calixtus the Third of that Name (then the Biſhop of Rome) had already put a Fleet of Gallies to Sea, which did great ſpoil upon the Borders of the Turks Dominions, they vainly perſwading themſelves that the Turks would in ſhort time be again driven out of Grecia, refuſed to pay any more Tribute to the Turkiſh King, or to keep League any longer with him. Upon which occaſion, Mahomet with a puiſſant Army came down and firſt beſieged Corinth, and afterwards entring into Peloponneſus, took divers ſtrong Towns, and deſtroyed the Country before him; and forced the two Princes for ſafeguard of their lives to fly, the one to Mantinia, and the other into the ſtrong City of Epidaurus, now called Raguſium. The poor Princes deſtitute of ſuch Aid as they expected, and altogether unable to withſtand the Power of the mighty Tyrant, began again to ſue for Peace; which he, having now ſpoiled their Country, granted upon condition, That all ſuch places as he had already taken, ſhould be ſtill his own; and alſo that the City of Patras with the Country adjoyning, ſhould be delivered unto him; and that for the reſt, the ſaid Princes ſhould pay unto him a yearly Tribute; which hard conditions the poor Princes, now in danger to loſe all, were glad to accept of; whereupon a Peace was for that time again concluded.

In his return he took the City of Athens in his way, which he not long before had taken from Francus Acciavol by Compoſition (by means of Omares the Son of Turachan, one of his great Captains) promiſing to give him the Country of Boetia with the City of Thebes, in lieu thereof. This Francus was Nephew to Nerius, ſometime Prince of Athens, and had of long time been brought up in the Turks Court, as one of Mahomet his Minions; and was of him (as was ſuppoſed) entirely beloved. But when he had received the Dukedom of Thebes, in exchange for his Princely State of Athens, he was ſhortly after, as if it had been in great Friendſhip ſent by Mahomet to Zoganus, his Lieutenant in Peloponneſus; by whom he was at firſt courteouſly entertained, but afterward being about to depart, he was (according as Mahomet had before commanded) ſuddenly ſtayed, and when he leaſt feared, cruelly murdered.

About three years after the Peace before concluded betwixt Mahomet and the two Brethren, Mahomet underſtanding that the Chriſtian Kings and Princes had combined themſelves againſt him, with a purpoſe to drive him again out of Grecia; thought it now high time, and much for the aſſurance of his Eſtate, to root out the ſmall Reliques of the Grecian Empire, which yet remained in Peloponneſus in the two Princes of the Imperial Blood, Thomas and Demetrius; whereunto he ſaw a fair occaſion preſented. Foraſmuch as thoſe two Brethren were at that time at great Variance betwixt themſelves, neither payed him ſuch Tribute as they had before promiſed; hereupon he with a ſtrong Army came to Corinth, where Arſanes a Nobleman of great Authority and Power in that Country, whoſe Siſter Demetrius had married, came to him from the Prince his Brother in law, attended upon with many gallant Gentlemen his Followers, of purpoſe to Aid him againſt the other Prince Thomas, nothing fearing any harm to have been by the Turk intended againſt himſelf or his Brother in law Demetrius, whom they both reckoned of as of a Friend. But when Mahomet was entred into Peloponneſus, and come to Tegea, he cauſed the ſame Arſanes, with all his chief Followers, to be laid hold upon, and caſt into bonds; knowing (as it ſhould ſeem) no man for Friend, which might any way hinder his ambitious Deſigns.

Mahomet cometh again into Peloponneſus.

Demetrius hearing what was hapned unto Arſanes, fled to Sparta, now called Mizithra; whither Mahomet in few days after came and laid Siege to the City. But the poor Prince conſidering, that he muſt needs at length fall into his hands, went out of the City, and humbly ſubmitted himſelf with all that he had into his Power. Which ſo well pleaſed the Turkiſh Tyrant, that he courteouſly received him, comforted him, and promiſed him in ſtead of Sparta to give him other Lands and Poſſeſſions of like value elſewhere; nevertheleſs he committed him to ſafe cuſtody, and carried him about with him as his Priſoner, until he had finiſhed thoſe Wars. After he had taken Sparta, he beſieged Caſtria, where he loſt divers of his Janizaries; for which cauſe, when he had taken the City, he put all the Souldiers therein to the Sword, and cut the Captains overthwart in two pieces. From thence he marched to Leontarium, called in ancient time Megalopolis, which he took; with another City called Cardicea, whither they of Leontarium had before conveyed their Wives and Children, as to a place of more ſafety: There he cruelly put to death all the Inhabitants of thoſe Cities, Men, Women, and Children, in number about ſix thouſand, of whom he left not one alive; and yet not ſo ſatisfied, commanded the very Beaſts and Cattel of thoſe places to be killed. Many Cities of Peloponneſus terrified with the dreadful Example of their Neighbours, forthwith yielded themſelves; and amongſt others, Saluarium, a great and ſtrong City of Arcadia; where he cauſed all the Inhabitants, Men, Women, and Children, to the number of ten thouſand to be caſt into bonds, looking for nothing but preſent death; all which afterwards he commanded to be ſent Captives to Conſtantinople, and with them peopled the Suburbs of that City. After that, he by the counſel of Demetrius, ſent one of his Captains called Joſua, with certain Companies of Greek Souldiers, unto the ſtrong City of Epidaurus, to command them in the Name of the Prince, to deliver unto him the City, with the Prince his Wife and Daughter, which lay there. But the Governor truſting unto the ſtrength of the City, refuſed to deliver the ſame; yet ſuffered the Princeſs with her Daughter to depart out of the City, being willing to go to her Husband; whom the Captain having received, returned, and preſented them to Mahomet. By whoſe Commandment they were preſently ſent into Beotia, there to attend his return to Conſtantinople, and an Eunuch appointed to take charge of the young Lady, who had ſo warmed Mahomets affection, that he took her afterwards to his Wife. At the ſame time he alſo ſubdued the moſt part of Achaia and Elis, by Zoganus Baſſa his Lieutenant; whither he came not long after himſelf, and laid Siege to the City of Salmenica, which for lack of Water was at length yielded unto him; but the Caſtle was by the ſpace of a whole year after valiantly defended againſt the Turks left to beſiege it, by Thomas the Prince; of whom Mahomet afterwards gave this commendation, That in the Country of Peloponneſus he had found many Slaves, but never a Man but him. This valiant Prince ſeeing the miſerable ruine of his Country, and the State thereof utterly forlorn, after he had moſt notably endured a years Siege in the Caſtle of Salmenica, got to Sea, and ſo arrived in Italy; where traveling to Rome, he was honourably received by Pius Secundus, then Biſhop there; who during his life, allowed him a large Penſion for the maintenance of his State. Thus Mahomet having thruſt both the Grecian Princes out of their Dominions, and ſubdued all Peloponneſus (excepting ſuch ſtrong Towns and Caſtles, as bordering upon the Sea coaſt were yet holden by the Venetians) left Zoganus Baſſa his Lieutenant to Govern that new conquered Province, and with great Triumph returned himſelf towards Conſtantinople, carrying away with him Demetrius the Prince, with his Wife and Daughter, and many other Noble Priſoners. But after he was come to Hadrianople, and placed in his Royal Seat, he removed the Eunuch from the fair young Lady, and took charge of her himſelf. As for Demetrius her Father, he gave to him the City Ænum, with the Cuſtom ariſing of the Salt there made, as a Penſion for him to live upon. Thus this moſt famous and populous Country of Peloponneſus fell into the Turkiſh Thraldom, about the year of our Lord, 1460. ſeven years after the taking of Conſtantinople. Which I have here together ſet down, as it is reported by them who lived in that time, and in the ſame Countries; omitting of purpoſe other great Occurrents of the ſame time (which ſhall in convenient place be hereafter declared) to the intent that the fall of that great Empire, with the common miſery of the delicate Grecians, might appear under one View; which otherwiſe being delivered by piece-meal, as it did concur with other great accidents according to the courſe of the time, would but breed confuſion, and require the Readers great attention.

Peloponneſus ſubdued by the Turks.

The Chriſtian Princes, eſpecially ſuch as bordered upon the Dominions of the Turkiſh Tyrant, were no leſs terrified than troubled with the ſubverſion of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire; for they ſaw by the continual preparation of the Turk, that his ambitious Deſires were rather increaſed than in any part ſatisfied with ſo great and late Victories. Wherefore they with all carefulneſs fortified their frontier Towns, and provided all things neceſſary for the defence of themſelves, and for the repulſing of ſo mighty an Enemy. Among the reſt, George the old Deſpot, or Prince of Servia (whoſe Dominions of all other lay moſt in danger of that Tempeſt) ſpeedily muſtred his Men of War, fortified his ſtrong Cities, placed his Garriſons, and left nothing undone that he thought needful for the defence of the Country; for he had many times before to his great loſs, indured the fury of the Turkiſh Kings, although he were joyned to them in the bonds of neareſt Alliance. And having thus politickly ſet all things in order at home, in Perſon himſelf took his Journey into Hungary, from thence to procure Aid againſt ſuch time as he ſhould have need. But the Hungarians, and eſpecially Huniades (who at that time bare greateſt ſway in that Kingdom) having before had ſufficient trial of the uncertainty and light Faith of that aged Prince, who had ſo often faſhioned himſelf according to the occurrents of the time, that he was counted neither right Turk nor good Chriſtian; refuſed to promiſe him any Aid, but left him to his own Fortunes; wherewith he returned diſcontented, and full of Indignation. But ſhortly after he was come home, he died of a hurt received in a Skirmiſh with Michael Zilugo, Governor of Belgrade; whoſe Brother Ladiſlaus he had but a little before treacherouſly murdered, as he was travelling by Waggon to Belgrade with his ſaid Brother Michael, who at the ſame time hardly eſcaped. This was the end of the Deſpot of Servia, when he had lived 90 years; in which time of his long life, he had plentifully taſted of both Fortunes. A man aſſuredly of great courage, but of a marvellous unquiet nature; by Profeſſion a Chriſtian, yet a great Friend unto the Turks, whom he many times ſtood in great ſtead; a deep diſſembler, and double in all his dealings; whereby he purchaſed unto himſelf that Credit, that he was not of any his Neighbour Princes whilſt he lived, either beloved or truſted; and after his death, of his Subjects ſo deteſted, that the people of that Country even at this day in their Country-Songs, ſtill term him the Faithleſs and Graceleſs Deſpot. Lazarus his youngeſt Son, after his death ſucceeded in his place (having deprived both his elder Brethren Stephen and George) of the Government; for Amurath the Turkiſh King had long time before put out their Eyes, of purpoſe to make them unfit for the Government of ſo great a Country; yet theſe blind Princes found means to fly away from him to Mahomet, carrying with them a great maſs of Money; and ſo incited him againſt Lazarus their younger Brother, that to keep Friendſhip with the Tyrant, he was glad to promiſe unto him a great yearly Tribute, and ſo to become his Tributary. But within few months after, Lazarus died, the laſt Chriſtian Prince that reigned in Servia; after whoſe death, great Troubles aroſe in Servia for the Soveraignty; the blind Brethren ſtill craving Aid of Mahomet, with whom they then lived; and the deſolate Widow of Lazarus, putting her ſelf with her three Sons, John, Peter, and Martin, into the Protection of the Hungarians; by which which means ſhe with much trouble, held her State for a ſeaſon. Until ſuch time as the Servians, ſeeing ſmall aſſurance in that manner of Government, and weary of the harms they daily received of the Turks, yielded themſelves with their Country, unto the Obedience of the Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet, who for ever united the ſame unto his Empire as a Province thereof, and ſo it remaineth at this day.

Servia yielded to the Turk.

Now was Mahomet by the continual courſe of his Victories, grown to that height of mind, that he thought no Prince able to abide his Force; neither any Enterpriſe ſo great, which he was not of Power to bring to paſs; wherefore he ceaſed not on every ſide continually to vex and trouble the Princes, whoſe Countries bordered upon his. But above others, his heart was greateſt againſt the Hungarians; for that by them the Turkiſh Kings his Anceſtors, had been more troubled, and their State more endangered, than by any or all other the Chriſtian Princes. Wherefore he reſolved now to take them in hand; which thing he had from the beginning of his Reign greatly deſired. And becauſe the City of Belgrade ſtanding upon the great River of Danubius, was accounted the Key of that Country, he determined there to begin his Wars, and by taking thereof to make an entrance into the heart of Hungary. Hereupon he levied a great Army of an hundred and fifty thouſand of his beſt Souldiers, in whom he repoſed ſuch an aſſured truſt and confidence, that he accounted the City already as good as taken, and a fair way made into Hungary; ſo ready are we to promiſe unto our ſelves, the things we earneſtly deſire. For the better accompliſhment of theſe his Deſigns, he had provided in readineſs a Fleet of 200 Ships and Gallies, which he ſent up the River of Danubius from Vidina to Belgrade, to the intent that no Relief or Aid ſhould be brought unto the City out of Hungary, by the great Rivers of Danubius and Savus, whereupon the City of Belgrade ſtandeth. With this Fleet he kept both thoſe Rivers ſo ſtraitly, that nothing could be poſſibly conveyed into the City by water; and not ſo contented, ſent part of his ſaid Fleet farther up the River of Danubius, and ſo landing his Souldiers in many places, ſpoiled the Countries all alongſt the River ſide. Shortly after he came with all his Forces by Land, and encamped before the City; whereunto at his firſt coming he gave a moſt fierce Aſſault, thinking to have taken them unprovided; but finding greater reſiſtance than he had before imagined, and that the Hungarians were ready to Skirmiſh with them without the Walls, he began to proceed more warily, and entrenched his Army; and to provide for the ſafety thereof, by caſting up of deep Trenches and ſtrong Rampiers againſt the ſudden Sallies of his Enemies; and after, planting his Battery, began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the Walls with his great Artillery. By the fury whereof, he overthrew a part thereof, and laid it flat with the ground; which the Defendants with great induſtry and labour ſpeedily repaired, by caſting up of new Fortifications and Rampiers, in ſuch ſort, that it was rather ſtronger than before.

Belgrade beſieged.

In the mean time Huniades (not to be named without the addition of a moſt worthy Captain) being then General for the Hungarians, ſent a Fleet of Ships and Gallies, well appointed with all War-like Proviſion, down the River of Danubius from Buda; which encountring with the Turks Fleet, took twenty Sail of them, and ſo diſcomfited the reſt, that they were glad to run themſelves on ground near unto the Kings Camp. All which were by Mahomets Commandment preſently ſet on Fire, becauſe they ſhould not come into the Power of the Hungarians. By this means the Chriſtians became Maſters both of the Rivers of Danubius and Savus; and ſo at their pleaſure, by water conveyed into the City all things needful for the defence thereof. Huniades alſo himſelf, with five thouſand valiant Souldiers, and Jo. Capiſtranus, a Minorite Frier (by whoſe perſwaſion forty thouſand voluntary Chriſtians out of Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary, were come to that War) entred into the City that way with their Souldiers and Followers.

The Turks Fleet overthrown by the Chriſtians.

Mahomet reſolutely ſet down for the winning of the City, had with continual Battery made the ſame at length aſſaultable; and ſo determined the next day to give a general Aſſault, appointing which part of the Wall every Colonel with his Regiment ſhould aſſail. But as they were with great diligence and greater ſtir, preparing all things needful for the next days Service, it fortuned, that Carazias Baſſa, Mahomets Lieutenant-General in Europe, and his beſt Man of War, was by chance ſlain with a great ſhot out of the Town. With whoſe death Mahomet was exceedingly troubled, as with an ominous token of the evil which afterwards enſued unto him and his whole Army. For all that, proſecuting his former determination, the next day early in the morning he commanded the Aſſault to be given; and with the dreadful ſound of Trumpets, Drums, Cornets, and other Inſtruments of War, brought on his Janizaries to the Breach; who as couragious Souldiers fiercely aſſailed the ſame, and without any great reſiſtance, entred both there and in divers others places of the City; reckoning the ſame to be now their own. For Huniades having before ſtored every corner of the City with his moſt valiant and expert Souldiers, had taken order that the Defendants, upon the firſt charge of the Janizaries, ſhould forſake their ſtations, and as men diſcouraged, retire towards the City, of purpoſe to draw the fierce Enemies faſter on, to their farther deſtruction; and upon a ſign given to ſet upon them on freſh, and to repair to their former places of defence; which was accordingly done; ſo that as ſoon as the Janizaries, with other of the Turks moſt forward Souldiers, were in great numbers entred, upon the retiring of the Defendants, and the ſign before appointed in the City given, the Defendants, as men quickly chang'd, turning again, fiercely charged the Turks which were entred, contrary to their expectation; and the valiant Huniades, at the ſame time iſſuing out on every ſide with his moſt reſolute Souldiers, ſo oppreſſed the Turks, that few of them that were entred eſcaped with life, but were there in the City either ſlain or taken Priſoners; and the reſt with exceeding ſlaughter beaten from the Walls. Preſently after, Huniades in this confuſion of the Turks, ſtrengthned with the Souldiers which came with Capiſtranus the Friar, made a Sally out of the Town, and ſet upon the Turks appointed for the defence of the great Ordnance; which was with ſuch reſolution performed, that the Turks were glad with great ſlaughter to forſake their charge, and to leave the Ordance to their Enemies.

Carazias Baſſa ſlain

The Turks notable repulſe.

The Turkiſh Tyrant ſore troubled and throughly chafed with the loſs of his great Ordnance, couragiouſly charged the Hungarians afreſh, to have recovered the ſame again; but was ſo valiantly repulſed by Huniades, and ſo beaten with the murthering ſhot out of the City, that he was glad when he had got him out the danger thereof into the Trenches. Huniades alſo retiring turned the Ordnance he had lately won, upon the Turks Camp, and with the ſame did them no ſmall harm.

In this hurle, a great part of the Chriſtian Army (which then lay on the other ſide of Danubius) was ſpeedily tranſported over the River; and making no ſtay in the City, joyned themſelves with Huniades, then lying without the Walls of the City. Who notably ſtrengthned with this new Supply, aſſailed the Turks Trenches, as if he would even preſently have entred their Camp; at which his preſumption, the proud Tyrant (never before ſo braved) diſdaining, went out of his Trenches, and valiantly encountring him, beat him back again to the great Ordnance; from whence he was again by the Chriſtians driven to his Trenches. Which manner of doubtful and dreadful fight, was on both ſides notably maintained, until the day was almoſt ſpent: Victory with indifferent Wings, hovering now over the one ſide, now over the other.

Mahomet wounded, and carried away for dead.

In theſe hot Skirmiſhes and Conflicts, Chaſanes Captain of the Janizaries, with many other valiant men were ſlain. And Mahomet himſelf performing the part as well of a couragious Souldier, as of a worthy Chieftain, was ſore wounded under his left Pap; ſo that he was taken up for dead, and ſo carried into his Pavillion, to the great diſcomfiture of his whole Army. But coming again unto himſelf, and conſidering that he had in that Siege loſt his whole Fleet, his great Ordnance, with moſt part of his beſt Souldiers, and yet in no poſſibility of the Town; ſecretly in the night aroſe with his Army, and with great ſilence ſhamefully departed; ſtill looking behind him when the Hungarians ſhould have purſued him into Servia, or have troubled him upon his way towards Conſtantinople. At this Siege (beſide many of his beſt Captains and chief Commanders) were ſlain forty thouſand of his beſt Souldiers. The loſs that he there ſuſtained was ſo great, and ſo ſtuck in his mind, that ever after during his life, when he had occaſion to ſpeak of that Siege, he would ſhake his head and ſigh deeply, and many times wiſh, That he had never ſeen that City, whereat both he and his Father had received ſo great diſhonour. Many were of opinion, that if Huniades had there had his Horſemen on that ſide of Danubius to have preſently purſued the fearful Enemy, that the whole Army of the Turks might have there been overthrown. This notable Victory was obtained againſt the Turk the ſixth of Auguſt, in the year of our Lord, 1456.

The death of the moſt famous Captain Huniades.

Shortly after, this moſt valiant and renowned Captain Huniades, worthy of Immortal Praiſe, died of a hurt taken in theſe Wars; or as ſome others write, of the Plague, which was then riſe in Hungary; who when he felt himſelf in danger of death, deſired to receive the Sacrament before his departure, and would in any caſe (ſick as he was) be carried to the Church to receive the ſame; ſaying, That it is not fit, that the Lord ſhould come to the houſe of his Servant, but the Servant rather to go to the Houſe of his Lord and Maſter. He was the firſt Chriſtian Captain that ſhewed the Turks were to be overcome; and obtained more great Victories againſt them than any one of the Chriſtian Princes before him. He was unto that barbarous people a great terror, and with the ſpoil of them beautified his Country; and now dying, was by the Hungarians honourably buried at Alba Julia, in St. Stephens Church; his death being greatly lamented of all good men of that Age.

Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor, no leſs deſirous to extend his Empire with the glory of his Name, by Sea than by Land; ſhortly after the taking of Conſtantinople, put a great Fleet to Sea, wherein he ſurpriſed divers Iſlands in the Ægeum, and hardly beſieged the City of the Rhodes. At which time, Calixtus the Third, then Biſhop of Rome, aided by the Genoways (for the grudge they bare againſt the Turks for the taking of Pera) put to Sea a Fleet of ſixteen tall Ships and Gallies well appointed, under the Conduct of Ludovicus, Patriarch of Aquilla; who with that Fleet ſcoured the Seas, and recovered again from the Turks the Iſland of Lemnos, with divers other ſmall Iſlands thereabout; and encountring with the Turks Fleet near unto the Iſland of the Rhodes, at a place called The Burrow of St. Paul, diſcomfited them, ſunk and took divers of their Gallies, and forced them to forſake the Rhodes. After which Victory at Sea, he for the ſpace of three years, with his Gallies, at his pleaſure ſpoiled the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions all alongſt the Sea coaſt of the leſſer Aſia, and wonderfully terrified the effeminate people of thoſe Countries; and ſo at length returned home, carrying away with him many Priſoners and much rich ſpoil.

1461. Uſun-Caſſan the Perſian King ſendeth Embaſſadors with Preſents to Mahomet.

After that Mahomet was thus ſhamefully driven from the Siege of Belgrade, and his Fleet at Sea diſcomfited (as is before declared) he began with great diligence to make new preparation againſt the next Spring to ſubdue the Iſles of the Ægeum, ſpecially thoſe which lay near unto Peloponneſus. But whilſt he was buſie in thoſe Cogitations, in the mean time Embaſſadors from Uſun-Caſſanes the great Perſian King, arrived at Conſtantinople, with divers rich Preſents ſent to him from the ſaid King. Where among other things, they preſented unto him a pair of Playing-Tables, wherein the men and dice were of great and rich precious Stones of ineſtimable worth, and the Workmanſhip nothing inferior to the matter; which the Embaſſadors for Oſtentation ſaid, That Uſun-Caſſanes found in the Treaſures of the Perſian King, whom he had but a little before ſlain and bereft of his Kingdom, and had there been left long before by the mighty Conqueror Tamerlane. Together with theſe Preſents, they delivered their Embaſſage; the effect whereof was, That thoſe two mighty Princes might joyn and live together in Amity; and that whereas David the Emperor of Trapezond, had promiſed to pay unto Mahomet a yearly Tribute, enforced thereunto by George his Lieutenant in Aſia, he ſhould not now look for any ſuch thing; foraſmuch as that Empire after the death of the Emperor then living, ſhould of right belong unto Uſun-Caſſanes, in right of his Wife, who was the Daughter of Calo-Joannes, the elder Brother of David the Emperor, then living; and further required him, from that time not to trouble or moleſt the ſaid Emperor his Friend and near Alliance, ſo ſhould he find him his faithful and kind Confederate; otherwiſe it was (as they ſaid) in his choice to draw upon himſelf the heavy diſpleaſure of a moſt mighty Enemy. Mahomet before envying at the riſing of the Perſian King, and now diſdaining ſuch peremptory Requeſts, little differing from proud Commands, in great choler diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors, with this ſhort anſwer, That he would ere long be in Aſia himſelf in Perſon, to teach Uſun-Caſſanes what to requeſt of a greater than himſelf. This unkindneſs was the beginning and ground of the mortal Wars which afterwards enſued betwixt theſe two, then the greateſt Princes of the Eaſt, as ſhall be hereafter more at large declared. The Embaſſadors being departed, and Mahomets Fleet of an hundred and fifty Sail ready to put to Sea, he altered his former determination for the Iſlands of the Ægeum (which after the loſs of Conſtantinople nople had for the moſt part put themſelves under the Protection of the Venetians) and commanded his Admiral with that Fleet to take his courſe through the Straits of Boſphorus into the great Euxin Sea, (now called the Black Sea) and ſo ſailing along the coaſt to come to Anchor before Sinope, the chief City of Paphlagonia, and there to expect his coming thither with his Army by Land.

Mahomet invadeth Iſmael, Prince of Sinope.

This great City of Sinope ſtands pleaſantly on a point of the Main which runs a great way into the Euxin, ſometime the Metrapolitical City of that Province; but as then, with Caſtamona and all the Country thereabout, was under the Government of Iſmael, a Mahometan Prince; upon whom Mahomet had now bent his Forces, for no other cauſe than that he was in League with Uſun-Caſſan, the Perſian King. Now with great Expedition had Mahomet levied a ſtrong Army; and paſſing therewith over into Aſia, was come before he was looked for, to Sinope. Iſmael ſeeing himſelf ſo ſuddenly beſet both by Sea and Land in his ſtrongeſt City, although he wanted nothing needful for his defence, having in the City four hundred pieces of great Artillery, and ten thouſand Souldiers; yet doubting to be able with that ſtrength to indure the Siege, offered to yield up the City to Mahomet, with all the reſt of his Dominion, upon condition, That he ſhould freely give him in lieu thereof the city of Philippopolis in Thracia, with the Country thereto adjoyning. Of which Offer Mahomet accepted; and ſo taking poſſeſſion of Sinope, with the ſtrong City of Caſtamona, and all the reſt of the Princes Territory, ſent him away with all his things to Philippopolis, as he had promiſed. This Iſmael was the laſt of the Honourable Houſe of the Iſfendiars, who had long time reigned at Heraclea and Caſtamona in Pontus. From Sinope he marched on forward with his Army to Trapezond. This famous City ſtandeth alſo upon the ſide of the Euxin or Black Sea in the Country of Pontus, where the Emperors of Conſtantinople had always their Deputies, whilſt that Empire flouriſhed and commanded the Eaſt part of the World, as far as Parthia; but after it began again to decline (as all worldly things have but their time) one Iſaac (whoſe Father, Emperor of Conſtantinople, the Conſtantinopolitans had for his evil Government ſlain) flying to Trapezond, took upon him the Government of that City, with the Countries of Pontus and Capadocia, and many other great Provinces, and was at firſt called the King of Trapezond; but after he was well eſtabliſhed in that Government, both he and his Succeſſors took upon them the Name and Title of Emperors; which they maintained equally, if not better, than the late Conſtantinopolitan Emperors, and therefore are of moſt accounted for Emperors. He that then reigned, was called David Commenus; which moſt Honourable Family of the Commeni had long time before reigned in Conſtantinople; and out of the ſame were many other great Princes deſcended, which ruled in divers places of Macedonia, Epirus, and Græcia.

Trapezond beſieged by Mahomet.

Mahomet coming to Trapezond, laid hard Siege unto the ſame by the ſpace of thirty days both by Sea and Land, and burnt the Suburbs thereof, as he had before at Sinope. The fearful Emperor diſmayed with the preſence of ſo mighty an Enemy, and the ſight of ſo puiſſant an Army, offered to yield unto him the City with his whole Empire, upon condition, That he ſhould take his Daughter to Wife, and deliver unto him ſome other Province, which might yield him ſuch yearly profit as might ſuffice for the honourable Maintenance of his State. Mahomet perceiving the weakneſs of his Enemy by his large Offers, refuſed to accept thereof, and attempted by force to have taken the City; which not ſorting to his deſire, the matter was again brought to parle; where after long debating to and fro, it was at laſt agreed upon, That the Emperor upon the Faith of the Turkiſh King for his ſafe return, ſhould in Perſon meet him without the City, if happily ſo ſome good Attonement might be made betwixt them. Whereupon the Emperor following the Turks Faith before ſolemnly given for his ſafe return, as was before agreed, went out of the City to meet him, in hope to have made ſome good agreement with him; but as ſoon as he was come out, Mahomet according to the damnable and Helliſh Doctrine of his falſe Prophet (That Faith is not to be kept with Chriſtians) preſently cauſed the Emperor to be caſt into bonds, and ſo to be detained as Priſoner.

Trapezond yielded unto the Turks.

Which when it was bruted in the City, the Citizens utterly diſcouraged, without farther reſiſtance yielded themſelves with the City into his Power.

Mahomet now Lord of Trapezond, entring the City, took Priſoners the Emperors Daughter, with all the reſt of his Children and Kindred, and all ſuch of the Nobility as he found in the City; whom he cauſed forthwith, together with the Emperor, to be ſent by Sea as it were in Triumph to Conſtantinople. Of the reſt of the Citizens he choſe out ſo many as he pleaſed for his own Service, and appointed eight hundred of the Chriſtian Children, in whom appeared moſt towardlineſs, to be brought up for Janizaries, many alſo of the other Citizens were ſent into Captivity to Conſtantinople; the beautiful Women and Virgins he divided amongſt his Friends and Men of War, certain choſen Paragons of whom, he ſent as Preſents to his Sons. After he had thus taken his pleaſure in the City, and left none there but the baſeſt of the people, he put a ſtrong Garriſon of his Janizaries into the Caſtle, and a great Garriſon of common Souldiers into the City, appointing his Admiral to Govern the ſame. The reſt of the Emperors ſtrong Towns, diſcouraged with the taking of Trapezond, and the miſeries thereof, in ſhort time ſubmitted themſelves unto the Turkiſh Thraldom, wherein they have ever ſince moſt miſerably lived. So Mahomet in the ſpace of few months having reduced that Empire into the form of a Province, returned in great Triumph to Conſtantinople; when he had in this Expedition ſubdued Paphlagonia, Pontus, and a great part of Capadocia, with ſome other Provinces near unto the Euxin Sea. When he was come to Conſtantinople, he ſent the Emperor with his Children Priſoners to Hadrianople. But afterwards, underſtanding that the Perſian Queen, the Wife of Uſun-Caſſan, ſought means to get ſome one of her Uncles Children, whom by the Power of her Husband ſhe might, if it were poſſible, advance unto her Fathers Empire; he ſent for David the woful Emperor to Conſtantinople, and there cruelly cauſed him, with all his Sons and Kinſmen, to be put to death; and to the uttermoſt of his Power rooted out all that moſt honourable Family of the Commeni, excepting George the Emperors youngeſt Son, who at his firſt coming to Hadrianople turned Turk; whoſe Siſter (the Emperors Daughter) Mahomet afterwards took to be one of his Concubins. This Chriſtian Empire was by the Turkiſh Tyrant Mahomet thus miſerably ſubverted and brought to nought in the year of our Lord, 1461.

The ruine of the Empire of Trapezond.

1462. Mahomet ſeeketh to entrap Wladus Prince of Valachia.

The year following, which was the year, 1462. Mahomet having Intelligence, that Wladus Dracula Prince of Valachia, his Tributary, was reſolved to caſt from him his Obedience, and to joyn himſelf unto the Hungarians, his mortal Enemies; thought it beſt to prove if he could by policy circumvent him, before he were altogether fallen from him. For which purpoſe he ſent Catabolinus his Principal Secretary unto him to bring him unto the Court, promiſing him greater Favours and Promotions from the Emperor, than he had as yet at any time injoyed. And by the ſame truſty Meſſenger, he commanded Chamuzes Baſſa, Governor of Bidina and the Country lying over againſt Valachia, on the other ſide of Danubius, to do their uttermoſt devoir for the entrapping of Wladus; promiſing him great Rewards if he could bring the matter to effect. Whereupon Chamuzes deviſed with the Secretary, that when he had done his Meſſage to the Prince, and with all his cunning perſwaded him to take that Journey upon him, he ſhould ſecretly before hand give notice unto him of the certain day of his return back again from the Prince; at which time it was like, that Wladus would in courteſie of himſelf bring the Secretary well on his way, being a man of ſo great Account in the Court, or at leaſtwiſe not refuſe ſo to do, being thereto requeſted by the Secretary; at which time the Baſſa ſecretly paſſing over Danubius with certain Troops of Horſemen, and lying cloſe in ambuſh upon the way, ſhould ſuddenly ſet upon the Prince, and ſo either take him, or elſe kill him. The Plot thus laid, and every circumſtance agreed upon, the Secretary held on his way; and coming to the Prince, forced his wit to perſwade him to go to the Court; ſometime cunningly extolling the great opinion that Mahomet had of his Fidelity and Valour; and otherwhiles feeding him with the hope of greater Honours and Princely Preferments he was to receive at the Emperors hands. But when he had ſaid what he could, he obtained no more of the wary Prince, but good words again, and that he would in courteſie conduct him on his way to the ſide of Danubius; whereof the Secretary by ſpeedy Meſſengers gave Chamuzes Intelligence; who ſecretly paſſing over Danubius with certain Troops of Horſemen, and riding a good way into the Country, lay in ambuſh upon the way whereby the Prince and the Secretary muſt needs paſs; according as was before appointed, the Secretary accompanied with the Prince, put himſelf upon the way, and at the very prefixed time came to the place where Chamuzes lay in ambuſh with his Horſemen; who ſuddenly ariſing, and on every ſide aſſailing the Prince, ſlew divers of his men before they were well aware of his coming. But Wladus being a man of great courage, and better appointed than the Baſſa had ſuppoſed (for he went always attended upon with a ſtrong Guard of valiant and ſtout men) ſo received Chamuzes and his Turks, that he ſlew many of them, and at length after a hard Conflict took him with the reſt Priſoners; whoſe Hands and Feet he cauſed to be cut off, and their Bodies afterwards to be thruſt upon ſharp Stakes ſet faſt in the ground, to the terror of all that ſaw them; and did the Baſſa ſo much honour, as to hang him and the Secretary upon a Gibbet a great deal higher than the other Turks. And not ſatisfied with this Revenge, preſently gathered his Forces, and paſſing over Danubius into the Turks Dominions, burnt all the Country before him along the Sea ſide, killing Man, Woman, and Child, without mercy; after which great ſpoil and ſlaughter made, he returned again to Valachia. The report of this News being brought to Mahomet, ſet him in ſuch a choler and rage, that he commanded the great Baſſa Mahometes, which firſt told him thereof, to be cruelly whipt; which ſervile puniſhment in that Tyrannical Government hath uſually been inflicted even upon the greateſt Princes of the Court, upon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the Tyrants, eſpecially if they be not natural Turks born; accounting the reſt in their anger but as their baſe and contemptible Slaves, as well appeareth by the woful end of many, even of the greateſt of them. But when he underſtood by moſt ſure advertiſements that all was as the Baſſa had before reported, or rather worſe, it is not to be in words expreſſed into what a rage he fell; the ſpoil of his Country grieved him much, but the ſhameful death of the Secretary his Embaſſador, and of Chamuzes the Baſſa, tormented his heart, and filled him with Indignation and deſire of Revenge. Wherefore with all ſpeed poſſible he aſſembled his Souldiers and Men of War, out of all parts of his Dominions to Philippopolis; and had in ſhort time raiſed ſuch an Army, as the like he had not at any time imployed ſince the winning of Conſtantinople. At the ſame time alſo, he ſent his Admiral with 25 Gallies, and 150 Sail of other ſmall Veſſels by the Euxin, to enter the River Danubius, and there landing his Men, to joyn his Forces with the Prince of Podolia; who for a grudge he bare againſt Wladus, had promiſed to Aid the Turk againſt him. When all things were now in readineſs, he marched with his Army from Philippopolis, and paſſing over Danubius, entred into Valachia; before which time, the Admiral had landed his Men, and with the help of the Podolian, had burnt the City of Prailaba, the greateſt Town of Trade in all Valachia; and was beſieging Cebium, called in ancient time Lycoſtomos; where after they had lien a while and received ſome loſs, they left the Siege and departed, the Podolian back again into his Country, and the Admiral to his Fleet.

Valachi

Mahomet being got over Danubius, burnt the Villages, drave away the Cattel, and made havock of all that came in his way. As for Priſoners, he took but few; for the Valachies before his coming, had retired their Wives and Children, and all that were unfit for Wars, either into their ſtrong Cities, or into the Refuge of great and thick Woods (whereof there is in that Country plenty) or elſe into the high and rough Mountains where they were in more ſafety than in any their ſtrongeſt Holds; and all ſuch as were able to bear Arms, followed the Prince, who ever kept the Woods and Mountains, ſtill following the Turks Army ſo near as he poſſibly could with ſafety; and many times cut off ſuch as ſtragled any thing far abroad from the Army, into the Country; yet never durſt ſhew himſelf in plain Field, being indeed but a handful, in compariſon of the Turks multitude. Mahomet to ſmall purpoſe roaming up and down the Country at his pleaſure, ſtaid never long in one place; and making no reckoning of ſuch a weak Enemy as durſt never ſhew himſelf, pitcht his Tents ſtill in the open Plains, and ſo lay with his Army in great ſecurity, not entrenched at all. Wladus by his Eſpials underſtanding of this the manner of Mahomets encamping, came in the dead time of the night, and with all his Power furiouſly aſſailed that quarter of the Turks Camp where the Aſian Souldiers lay, and ſlew many of them in their Tents; the reſt terrified with the ſuddenneſs of the Alarm, fled out of their Tents for Refuge unto the European Souldiers; the Prince following them at the heels, and entring into that quarter of the Camp alſo, did there great harm, and ſtruck ſuch a general terror and fear into all the Turks Army, that they were even upon the point to have wholly forſaken their Tents, and betaken themſelves to flight. Yea, Mahomet himſelf, diſmaid with the terror of the night and tumult of his Camp, and fearing leſt the Hungarians had joyned their Forces with the Prince, not knowing which way to turn himſelf, had undoubtedly fled, had not Mahomet Baſſa, a man of great experience in Martial Affairs, perſwaded him otherwiſe, and by general Proclamation made through the Camp, That no man ſhould upon pain of death, forſake the place wherein he was encamped, ſtaid the flight; and with much ado enforced them to make head againſt the Prince. Wladus perceiving the Turks now to begin to ſtand upon their guard, and to make reſiſtance; after great ſlaughter made, returning, took the ſpoil of the Tents forſaken by the Aſian Souldiers, and upon the approach of the day, again retired with Victory into the Woods. As ſoon as it was day, Mahomet appointed Haly-Beg with certain Companies of ſelect Souldiers, to purſue the Valachies; who overtaking part of the Princes Army, took a thouſand of them Priſoners, and put the reſt to flight; all which Priſoners were by the Tyrants Command, preſently put to the Sword. From that time Mahomet every night entrenched his Army, and cauſed better Watch and Ward to be kept in every quarter of his Camp, than before.

A moſt horrible Spectacle.

As he marched along the Country, he came to the place where the Baſſa and the Secretary were hanging upon two high Gibbets, and the diſmembred Turks impailed upon Stakes about them; with which ſight he was grievouſly offended. And paſſing on farther, came to a Plain containing in breadth almoſt a mile, and in length two miles, ſet full of Gallows, Gibbets, Wheels, Stakes, and other Inſtruments of Terror, Death, and Torture; all hanging full of the dead Carkaſes of Men, Women, and Children, thereupon executed, in number (as was deemed) about twenty thouſand. There was to be ſeen the Father, with his Wife, Children, and whole Family, hanging together upon one Gallows; and the Bodies of ſucking Babes, ſticking upon ſharp Stakes; others withall their Limbs broken upon Wheels, with many other ſtrange and horrible kinds of death; ſo that a man would have thought, that all the Torments the Poets feign to be in Hell had been there put in execution. All theſe were ſuch as the notable, but cruel Prince, jealous of his Eſtate, had either for juſt deſert, or ſome probable ſuſpition, put to death; and with their Goods rewarded his Souldiers; whoſe cruel manner was, together with the Offender to execute the whole Family, yea ſometimes the whole Kindred. Mahomet, although he was by Nature of a fierce and cruel Diſpoſition, wondred to ſee ſo ſtrange a Spectacle of extream cruelty; yet ſaid no more but that Wladus knew how to have his Subjects at Command. After that, Mahomet ſent Joſephus, one of his great Captains, to skirmiſh with the Valachies; who was by them put to the worſe; but by the coming in of Omares the Son of Turachan, they were again in a great Skirmiſh overthrown, and two thouſand of their heads brought by the Turks upon their Launces into the Kings Camp; for which good Service Omares was by the King preferred to be Governor of Theſſalia.

When Mahomet had thus traced Valachia, and having done what harm he could, ſaw it to be to no purpoſe, with ſuch a multitude of men to hunt after his flying Enemy, which ſtill kept the thick Woods or rough Mountains; he returned again to Conſtantinople, leaving behind him Haly-beg with part of his Army, to proſecute that War; and with him Dracula the younger Brother of Wladus, who was alſo called Wladus, as a Stale to draw the Valachies into Rebellion againſt the Prince. This Dracula the younger, was of a little Youth brought up in Mahomets Court, and for his comely Feature of him moſt paſſionately affected; which inordinate perturbation, ſo prevailed in the intemperate Nature of the laſcivious Prince, that he ſought firſt by fair words and great Gifts to corrupt the Youth, and not ſo prevailing, attempted at laſt to have forced him; wherewith the Noble Youth being enraged, drew his Rapier, and ſtriking at him to have ſlain him, grievouſly wounded him in the Thigh, and thereupon fled. Nevertheleſs being drawn back again to the Court, and pardoned, he was afterwards reconciled to the King, and ſo became his Ganimede; and was of him long time wonderfully both beloved and honoured, and now ſet up for a Stale (as is before ſaid) for the Valachies his Country-men to gaze upon.

It fortuned, that after the departure of the King, divers Valachies came to Haly-beg the Turkiſh General, to Ranſome ſuch Friends of theirs as had been taken Priſoners in thoſe Wars, and were yet by him detained; to whom the younger Dracula by way of diſcourſe declaring the great Power of the Turkiſh Emperor, and as it were lamenting the manifold and endleſs Miſeries of his Native Country; cunningly imputed the ſame unto the diſordered Government of his cruel Brother, as the ground of all their Woes; aſſuring them of moſt happy and ſpeedy Redreſs, if the Valachies, forſaking his fierce Brother, would cleave unto him as their Soveraign, in ſpecial Favour with the great Emperor. Which Speech he delivered unto them with ſuch lively Reaſons, and in ſuch effectual Terms, that they there preſent, perſwaded by him, and others by them, in ſhort time all, as if it had been by a ſecret conſent, forſook Wladus the elder Brother, and choſe Dracula the younger Brother to be their Prince and Soveraign. Who joyning unto him the Turks Forces, by the conſent of Mahomet took upon him the Government of that War-like Country and People; yet holding the ſame as the Turkiſh Tyrants Vaſſal, the readieſt way to Infidelity. Wladus ſeeing himſelf thus forſaken of all his Subjects, and his younger Brother poſſeſſed of his Dominion, fled into Tranſylvania, where he was by the appointment of the Hungarian King, apprehended and laid faſt in ſtrait priſon at Belgrade, for that he had without juſt cauſe (as it was laid to his charge) moſt cruelly executed divers Hungarians in Valachia; yet ſuch was his fortune, after ten years hard impriſonment, to be again enlarged, and honourably to die in battel againſt his ancient Enemies the Turks.

The death of Wladus.

Mahomet returning out of Valachia to Conſtantinople, ſent the ſame Fleet which he had uſed in his late Wars, into the Ægeum, to take in ſuch Iſlands as being before under the Conſtantinopolitan Empire, had upon the loſs of the City put themſelves under the Protection of the Venetians; but eſpecially the Iſle of Mitylene, called in ancient time Leſbos; pretending that Nicholaus Cateluſius Prince thereof, did harbour the Pirats of Italy, and other places; and alſo bought of them ſuch Priſoners, and other Booty, as they continually took from the Turks at Sea, or alongſt the Sea coaſt, out of many places of his Dominions; pretending alſo the chaſtiſing of the ſaid Prince, for that he had by treachery ſlain his eldeſt Brother, and ſo unjuſtly taken upon him the Government. His Fleet thus ſet forward, he himſelf with a ſmall Army paſſed over into Aſia, and came by land to Poſſidium a City of Ionia over againſt Mitylene. From whence he embarked himſelf over the narrow Strait into the Iſland, where after he had once landed his Army, he in ſhort time overran the whole Iſland, and miſerably ſpoiled the ſame, leading away all the Inhabitants thereof into Captivity; who ſhortly after were ſold at Conſtantinople like Flocks of Sheep, and from thence diſperſed into all parts of his Dominions. After he had thus harried the Country, and left nothing therein unſpoiled, he beſieged the Prince in the City of Mitylene, whereof the Iſland now taketh Name; and with his great Ordnance continually battered the ſame by the ſpace of 27 days (in which time many ſharp Aſſaults were alſo given by the Turks, whereby the Defendants were greatly diminiſhed and waſted. The Prince perceiving himſelf not able long to hold out, offered to yield up the City, with all the ſtrong Holds in the Iſle, upon condition that Mahomet ſhould therefore give unto him ſome other Province, or like value to the Iſland; which his Offer Mahomet accepted, and by ſolemn Oath bound himſelf for performance of that he had promiſed. Whereupon the Prince came out of the City, and humbled himſelf before him, excuſing himſelf for the receiving of the Men of War (wherewith he was charged) as done for no other purpoſe, but that they ſhould forbear to ſpoil his own Country, much ſubject to their fury; utterly denying that he had at any time bought, or ſhared any part of ſuch Prizes as had by thoſe Pirats by Sea or Land been taken from the Turks. With which his excuſe, Mahomet ſeemed to be reaſonably well contented, and with good words cheared him up; nevertheleſs as ſoon as the City, with all the other ſtrong Holds in the Iſle, were by the Princes means delivered into his hands, he no longer made reckoning of his Turkiſh Faith, but cruelly cauſed many of the chief Citizens of Mitylene to be put to death; and three hundred Pirats, whom he found in the City, to be cut in two pieces in the middle, ſo to die with more pain. And when he had placed convenient Garriſons in every ſtrong Hold in the Iſle, he returned to Conſtantinople, carrying away with him the Prince, and all the better ſort of the Inhabitans of Mitylene, that were left alive, together with all the Wealth of that moſt rich and pleaſant Iſland, leaving it almoſt deſolate, none remaining therein more than his own Garriſons, with a few of the pooreſt and baſeſt people. Mahomet after he was arrived at Conſtantinople, caſt the Prince Nicholaus, with Lucius his Coſin (whoſe help he had before uſed in killing of his elder Brother) into cloſe Priſon; where they ſeeing themſelves every hour in danger of their lives, to win Favour in the Tyrants ſight, wickedly offered to renounce the Chriſtian Religion, and to turn Turk. Which Mahomet underſtanding, cauſed them both to be richly apparelled, and with great Triumph to be circumciſed, and preſently ſet at liberty; yet ſtill bearing in mind his old grudge, he ſhortly after, when they leaſt feared any ſuch matter, clapt them both faſt again in Priſon, and there cauſed them to be moſt cruelly put to death. A juſt Reward for bloody Murtherers, and Apoſtacy, who to gain a little longer life, were content to forſake God.

Shortly after it fortuned, that Stephen King of Boſna (in ancient time called Mæſia Superior) who ſupported by the Turkiſh Emperor, had wrongfully obtained that Kingdom againſt his own Brethren, refuſed now to pay ſuch yearly Tribute as he had before promiſed; for which cauſe Mahomet with a ſtrong Army entred into Boſna, and laid Siege unto the City of Dorobiza; which when he had with much ado taken, he divided the pleople thereof into three parts; one part whereof he gave as Slaves unto his Men of War, another part he ſent unto Conſtantinople, and the third he left to inhabit the City. From Dorobiza he marched to Jaziga, now called Jaica, the chief City of that Kingdom, which after four months Siege was delivered unto him by Compoſition; in this City he took the Kings Brother and Siſter Priſoners, with moſt of the Nobility of that Kingdom, whom he ſent as it were in Triumph unto Conſtantinople. The other leſſer Cities of Boſna following the Example of the greater, yielded themſelves alſo. But Mahomet underſtanding that the King of Boſna had retired himſelf into the fartheſt part of his Kingdom, ſent Mahometes his chief Baſſa with his European Souldiers to purſue him; wherein the Baſſa uſed ſuch diligence, that he had on every ſide ſo incloſed him before he was aware, that he could by no means eſcape, which was before thought a thing impoſſible. So the King for ſafeguard of his life was fain to take the City of Clyſſa for his Refuge; where he was ſo hardly laid to by the Baſſa, that ſeeing no other remedy, he offered to yield himſelf upon the Baſſaes faithful promiſe by Oath confirmed, that he ſhould be honourably uſed, and not to receive in his Perſon any harm from the Turkiſh Emperor. Whereupon the Baſſaes Oath to the ſame purpoſe was with great Solemnity taken; and for the more aſſurance, conceived in writing, firmed by the Baſſa, and ſo delivered to the King; which done, the King came out of the City and yielded himſelf. The Baſſa having thus taken the King Priſoner, carried him about with him from place to place, and from City to City, until he had taken poſſeſſion of all the Kingdom of Boſna; and ſo returning unto his Maſter, preſented unto him the Captive King; who was not a little offended with him, for that he had unto him ſo far engaged his Turkiſh Faith. But when the poor King thought to have departed, not greatly fearing further harm, he was ſuddenly ſent for by Mahomet; at which time, he doubting the worſt, carried with him in his hand the writing wherein the Baſſaes Oath for his ſafety was compriſed; nevertheleſs, the faithleſs Tyrant without any regard thereof, or of his Faith therein given, cauſed him preſently to be moſt cruelly put to death, or as ſome write, to be ſlain quick. Thus was the Chriſtian Kingdom of Boſna ſubverted by Mahomet, in the year, 1464. who after he had at his pleaſure diſpoſed thereof, and reduced it to the form of a Province, to be (as it is at this day) governed by one of his Baſſaes; in great Triumph returned to Conſtantinople, carrying away with him many a woful Chriſtian Captive, and the whole Wealth of that Kingdom.

The great wars betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, are at large written by Marinus Barletius, in 13 Books, De vita,& geſtis Scanderbegi, from whence this Hiſtory is taken; and were done betwixt the years 1450. and 1467.

Mahomet following the Example of his Father Amurath, had from the beginning of his Reign by one or other of his great Baſſaes or expert Captains ſtill maintained Wars againſt Scanderbeg the moſt valiant and fortunate King of Epirus; the greateſt part whereof, although it did in the courſe of time concur with the things before declared, and might by piece-meal have been amongſt the ſame in their due time and place inſerted; yet I have of purpoſe for divers reaſons wholly reſerved them for this place; firſt, for that I would not interrupt the courſe of the Hiſtory before rehearſed, with the particular accidents of this War: And then, for that the greateſt heat of this Hereditary War, delivered as it were from hand to hand, from the Father to the Son, hapned not long after this time; when as Mahomet having conquered the Kingdom of Boſna, had ſurrounded a great part of Scanderbegs Dominion; wherein I had reſpect alſo unto the Readers eaſe, who may with greater pleaſure and content, and leſs pains alſo, view the ſame together, than if it had been diſperſedly ſcattered and intermedled with the other greater occurrents of the ſame time. In which diſcourſe I will but briefly touch many thing well worthy of a larger Treatiſe. And if forgetting my ſelf, I ſhall in ſome places happen to ſtay ſomething longer than the Readers haſt would require, yet I hope, that the zeal and love he bears unto the worthy memory of moſt famous Chriſtian Princes, together with the ſhortneſs of the Hiſtory, in compariſon of that which is thereof written in juſt Volumes by others, ſhall eaſily excuſe a lager diſcourſe than this: But again to our purpoſe.

Mahomet in the beginning of his Reign ſent Embaſſadors to Scanderbeg, offering him Peace, ſo that he would grant to pay unto him ſuch yearly Tribute as his Father Amurath had in his life time demanded. Which embaſſage the crafty Tyrant ſent rather to prove what confidence Scanderbeg had in himſelf, than for any hope he had to have his demand granted. This diſhonourable offered peace Scanderbeg ſcornfully rejected, and ſo returned the Embaſſadors as they came; and preſently upon their departure entred with his Horſemen into that part of the Turks Dominion which bordereth upon Epirus; and when he had waſted the Country, returned home laded with the Spoil thereof. In revenge of which deſpight, Mahomet ſhortly after ſent Ameſa one of his beſt men of War, with twelve thouſand Horſemen into Epirus, to requite Scanderbeg with the like Spoil of his People and Country. But Scanderbeg underſtanding by his Eſpials of the Turks coming, lay cloſe in ambuſh with ſix thouſand Souldiers upon the great Mountain Modriſſa, over which the Turks muſt of neceſſity take their way; and as they were about by night to have paſſed over that rough and ſteep Mountain, and were with much difficulty almoſt got up to the top thereof, they were ſuddainly charged by Scanderbeg his Footmen, who having the advantage of the place, made great ſlaughter of the Turks, and drave them down the Mountain amain; at which time their Horſes ſtood them in no ſtead at all, but were rather unto them an hindrance in that uneven and troubleſome ground. Now when the Turks were come to the foot of the Mountain, they were in that great fear and diſorder, again fiercely aſſailed on the one ſide by Scanderbeg, and on the other ſide by his Nepew, called alſo Ameſa, who before the Turks coming had placed themſelves with their Horſemen in places of moſt advantage; ſo that the Turks hardly beſet and forced on every ſide, were in ſhort time overthrown and put to flight. In this conflict ſeven thouſand of the Turks were ſlain, and Ameſa General of the Turks Army with divers other Captains taken, whom Scanderbeg ſent Priſoners to Croia. For joy of this Victory at Scanderbegs return, great Triumph and Feaſting was made at Croia; during which time, Scanderbeg cauſed Ameſa the Turk, with the reſt of the Turkiſh Captains, to be enlarged, to be partakers of that joy, whereof they againſt their wills had given the occaſion; and afterwards uſed them with all kind of courteſie during the time of their aboad. This Ameſa requeſted of Scanderbeg, that he might ſend a Meſſenger to Conſtantinople, to certifie Mahomet how the caſe ſtood with him and the reſt, whom happily he might think to have been ſlain in the Battle; and to procure from him their ranſome. Which his requeſt Scanderbeg eaſily granted, and ſet down their ranſome at thirteen thouſand Ducats. The news of this overthrow ſore grieved the Turkiſh Tyrant, but afterwards when he ſaw the remainder of his Army without their General and Leaders, having for moſt part loſt their Enſigns and Armor, and alſo the Meſſenger that was ſent from Ameſa, he fell into ſuch a rage that he denied to give any thing at all for his ranſome; imputing all the loſs to his Treachery, Folly, or Cowardiſe. Howbeit he was afterwards perſwaded by his Baſſaes and other great Courtiers, Ameſa his Friends, to think better of the General, of whoſe Faithfulneſs and Valour he had of long time had great experience, and alſo to ſend his Ranſome; by denying whereof, he ſhould (as they ſaid) diſcourage his other Generals and Captains, who by chance of War might hap to fall into the like danger. By whoſe perſwaſion Mahomet ſent an Embaſſador to Scanderbeg, with the ranſome demanded, and other great Preſents alſo. Upon receit whereof, Ameſa with the other Captains were ſet at liberty, and ſent with ſafe convoy out of Epirus. All the mony ſent for the Turks ranſome, Scanderbeg divided amongſt his Captains and Souldiers.

This late received overthrow filled the proud Tyrant with deſire of revenge, ſo that he determined forthwith to ſend another Army into Epirus; the leading whereof, divers of his great and moſt expert Captains ambitiouſly ſought for. For Mahomet had promiſed great Rewards and moſt honourable Preferments to him whoſe hap it ſhould be to vanquiſh Scanderbeg. Among the reſt, one Debreas (a man for his Forwardneſs and Courage, in great favour with his Soveraign) by great ſuit obtained to have that charge; promiſing with exceeding confidence unto Mahomet, to make a beginning of better ſucceſs in his Wars of Epirus, than others thither by him before ſent; for the accompliſhment whereof, he required to have no greater power than was ſent the year before. But after that Ameſa was returned to the Court, and had with long diſcourſe ſet forth the Vertues and Valour of Scanderbeg, with the invincible courage of his Souldiers, Debreas became more temperate in his Speech, and was contented to receive a new Supply; ſo that he had under his Charge fourteen thouſand Souldiers; with which Army he marched towards Epirus, and was come to a place called Pologus, where he lay with his Army encamped in a Plain in great ſecurity, fearing no danger, for that he was not as yet in the Enemies Country, neither as he ſuppoſed, near the Enemy. Of all this preparation, and of the coming of Debreas, Scanderbeg had intelligence; and being reſolved not to expect the coming of the Turks into Epirus, made choice of Six thouſand of his beſt Horſemen; with whom he marched with as much ſpeed as was poſſible into the Enemies Country, and came by night unto the Plain where the Turks lay, hoping to have been upon them before they were aware, and ſo to have overthrown them; wherein he was much deceived; for by the light of the Moon (which then ſhined all night) he was by the Turks in time deſcried, yet the ſuddaineſs of his approach with the ſtrangeneſs of the attempt, exceedingly diſmaied the whole Army of the Turks. But Debreas mindful of the promiſe he had made unto his Lord and Maſter, with chearful words encouraged his Souldiers, and preſently ſent out certain Troops of light Horſemen, to receive the firſt Charge of the Enemy, until he might ſet his whole Army in order of Battel. Betwixt theſe Troops, and others ſent out by Scanderbeg, began a ſharp skirmiſh; both the Armies ſtanding faſt, as beholders, carefully expecting the event thereof. But Scanderbeg doubting, that if his Souldiers ſhould in his firſt encounter be put to the worſt, it might tend to the great diſcouraging of the reſt of his Army; ſeconded his men with other freſh Troops under the leading of Moſes and Ameſa; by whoſe coming in, the Turks were forthwith beaten back, and chaſed even to their main Battel. In the heat of which chaſe, Moſes forgetting himſelf, had with great danger in following on too faſt, been incloſed by the Turks, had not his Fury been in good time ſtaid by Ameſa; for which overſight, he was afterward blamed by Scanderbeg, that he could not with greater moderation uſe his good Fortune, commending ſuch forwardneſs in a private Souldier, but not in ſo great a Commander.

A Battel betwixt Scanderbeg and Debreas.

When Moſes and Ameſa had thus put the Turks to flight, Scanderbeg brought on his whole Army, and fiercely aſſailed the Turks, yet troubled with the diſcomfiture of their Fellows. Debreas on the other ſide, with chearful Speech, and his own Valour, ſo encouraged his Souldiers, that Scanderbeg was there notably reſiſted, and his Fortune as it were at a ſtand; until that Muſachius, with certain Troops of reſolute men, drawn out of the left Wing of Scanderbegs Army, gave ſuch a fierce Charge upon the ſide of the Turks Army, that he brake their Ranks, and ſore diſordered that part of the Army; which when Debreas perceived, he withdrew himſelf out of the front of the Battel wherein he had valiantly ſtood againſt Scanderbeg, and came to the place where Muſachius had diſodered the Battel, and with ſuch Courage cheared up his troubled Souldiers, that his only Preſence and Valour ſeemed to be the very Life and Heart of his whole Army. Whilſt Debreas was thus buſied againſt Muſachius, Scanderbeg in the mean time with might and main ſtill charged the front of the Enemies Army; who now in the abſence of the General began to loſe their order and to give ground, making no ſuch reſiſtance as before. At which time, Moſes forcibly breaking into the thickeſt of them, took one of their Enſigns, which he threw back among his Followers; wherewith they encouraged, ſo preſſed upon their Enemies, without regard of danger, that the Turks being therewith diſcouraged, and their Battel diſordered, were almoſt ready to turn their Backs and to flie. Debreas ſeeing all in danger to be loſt, haſted with all ſpeed unto the place where he ſaw moſt peril, and did what was poſſible to have reſtored the Battel, and encouraged his Souldiers; where preſſing in among the foremoſt, he was by Scanderbeg himſelf encountered hand to hand, and ſo by him ſlain; with whoſe fall the whole Army diſcouraged, without further reſiſtance fled. Moſes purſuing them on the one ſide, and Muſachius on the other, with furious hand ſlew more in that chaſe than were ſlain in the Battel. Of the Turks were ſlain in this Battel four thouſand one hundred and twenty, and ſome Priſoners taken, but of the Chriſtians few or none; ſo that for the good fortune thereof, Scanderbeg accounted it a Victory given. All the Spoil taken from the Enemy, together with the Priſoners, was by Scanderbeg equally divided among the Souldiers. Unto Moſes he gave Debreas his Horſe and Armor; and unto Muſachius a Priſoner, which by his port and behaviour ſeemed to be a man of ſome account.

This Turk agreed with Muſachins upon a ranſome of two hundred Ducats, and preſently upon agreement made, drew forth the Mony out of a little Bag which he had kept ſecretly about him, and offered it to Muſachius for his ranſome; who receiving the Mony, told the Turk, that he muſt provide another ranſome, foraſmuch as that Mony was his own before by Law of Arms, as taken with his perſon. The Turk on the other ſide alledged for himſelf the agreement already made, with the payment of the full ſum agreed upon. This controverſie was brought before Scanderbeg; who with great pleaſure heard them both what they could ſay; Muſachius laying in hard for another ranſome, and the Turk for his liberty urging the agreement. Who when they had both ſaid what they could for themſelves, Scanderbeg ſmiling, told them, that they both contended for that which was in right his, and neither of theirs; for the Priſoner with the Mony were both mine (ſaid he) at the firſt taking of him, ſince which time I have given to you Muſachius the Priſoner, which I knew, but not the Mony which I knew not of; neither doth the concealing thereof make it yours (ſaid he to the Turk) who had by Law of Arms loſt your ſelf, together with all that you had about you. After he had thus pleaſantly diſcourſed of the matter, and brought them both in doubt, he awarded to Muſachius the Mony he agreed for, and to the Turk his deſired liberty; who glad thereof, and having alſo received his Horſe and Armor of the gift of Scanderbeg, departed, ſpeaking all the honour he could of ſo noble a Conqueror. After this Victory Scanderbeg with great triumph returned again to Croia.

When Mahomet underſtood that Debreas was ſlain, and his Army overthrown, he became exceeding melancholy; but after he ſaw ſo many of his Souldiers returned as had been ſufficient to have reſtored a loſt battel, he was ſo highly diſpleaſed with that Cowardiſe, as that he could not endure the ſight of them. The death of Debreas grieved none more than the King himſelf; for the Captains generally either envied at his hardineſs, or elſe hated his inſolency. Ameſa among the reſt took no ſmall pleaſure, that his proud Succeſſor had taken part of his evil Fortune, and ſo in part eaſed his former infamy. The great Baſſaes and Men of War ſeeing their Soveraign ſo deſirous of revenge, offered to ſpend their lives in that ſervice, whoſe forwardneſs he ſeemed not to refuſe; howbeit he had in his mind already plotted another manner of revenge. He was not ignorant, what great matters his Father Amurath had brought to paſs, by ſowing diſcord among the Princes of Grecia; which foul practiſe he purpoſed now to put in practiſe himſelf. There were at that time many famous Chieftains in Epirus, of Scanderbeg both beloved and truſted; among whom, he was in hope to find ſome one who for deſire of Wealth or Promotion, might be allured to give ſome deſperate attempt againſt the Life or State of Scanderbeg. Of all others, Moſes Golemus of Dibra (a man honourably deſcended) was moſt inward with Scanderbeg, and for his prowes and experience in Martial Affairs, of all men accounted the beſt Captain in all Epirus, next unto Scanderbeg himſelf; him, the crafty Tyrant moſt deſired to alienate from Scanderbeg, as one fitteſt to ſerve his purpoſe, and eaſieſt without ſuſpition to be dealt withal, becauſe he commonly lay with a ſtrong Garriſon in Dibra, upon the very frontiers of Epirus. Wherefore he directed his Letters unto the Governor of Sfetigrade, commanding him by all means he could poſſibly deviſe to withdraw Moſes from Scanderbeg; and not to ſpare for any Gold or golden Promiſes whereby to allure him; promiſing alſo unto the Governor himſelf great preferments, if he could win him. Upon receipt of which Letters, the Governor began forthwith carefully to deviſe, how he might beſt attempt the matter he had in charge; where after many devices, he at laſt thought upon a ſhrewd-headed Fellow, one of the Chriſtians which dwelt in Sfetigrade; whom for that he was a Chriſtian, he might without ſuſpect uſe as an inſtrument in ſo dangerous and important an action. This Chriſtian the Governor called unto him, and after he had with great Gifts and large Promiſes won him to undertake the matter, he ſent him away, fully before armed with plenteous inſtructions full of Treaſon and Deceit. When this ſubtil Meſſenger was come unto Moſes, and under pretence of great and ſecret matters of importance, had obtained to ſpeak with him in private; he after ſome diſcourſe had of matters well worth the hearing, began at length under the covert of fair glozing words, to utter his poyſon; ſhewing unto him (as a Meſſenger from the Governour) the great and good opinion the Turkiſh Emperor had of long time conceived of his Valour and Proweſs, for which cauſe his heroical Nature could not but honour him, although he were his Enemy; and therewith alſo marvel, that he being a man of that worth, could be contented to be commanded by Scanderbeg, whoſe ſtate was by him chiefly upholden, whereas if he would do wiſely, and changing his affection, follow Mahomet, an Emperor of greateſt magnificence and power, he ſhould quickly in his Court find ſuch honourable entertainment, as were to be preferred before the ſtate of Scanderbeg; or if the Soveraignty of Epirus his native Country did better pleaſe him, he might eaſily be thereunto advanced, by joining his own endeavour to Mahomets great power. It pleaſed Moſes well to hear his own Praiſes (a thing incident to haughty minds) and he liked well that he was ſo favoured of the Turkiſh Emperor; but the hope of the Kingdom of Epirus, began to work in him new conceits, and moved him more than all the reſt. Such is the force of ambitious thoughts, that they make a man forget all things, ſave themſelves; ſo glorious a thing it is, to ſtand in the higheſt place: For all that, Moſes neither in word or countenance made any ſemblance of liking, or diſliking the Meſſage. Which the wily Meſſenger taking for a ſecret conſent, and heartily glad that he had been ſo well heard; not deſiring as then any further anſwer, craved leave to depart, promiſing in ſhort time to return to him again. After the departure of this Meſſenger, many troubled thoughts began to ariſe in the mind of Moſes; his mirth was changed into melancholy, and the cheerfulneſs of his countenance was abated; his haughty thoughts were his ſolitary Companions, and the imagined Kingdom the Idol he in ſecret worſhipped; ſo that in ſhort time, he ſeemed to the wiſer ſort as a man altogether metamorphoſed. Some were ſo bold, as for to ask the cauſe of the Meſſengers coming; unto whom he anſwered, That he was one, from whom he received intelligence of matters concerning the good of the State; which his anſwer was holden for true; for who durſt once miſtruſt Moſes? Whilſt he thus was toſſed up and down with his own thoughts, as a Ship with the Billows of a rough Sea, the ſame ſlie Meſſenger, according to his promiſe came again; and for his more credit, in ſecret brought with him ſuch Preſents as well might ſeem to have been ſent from the Great Turk, with his Meſſage better framed than before. Of all which that was ſent, Moſes is reported to have received nothing but the worſt, which was, the very Treaſon it ſelf. And ſo returned the Meſſenger, with anſwer, that he could not but in good part accept of the Turkiſh Emperors great favours; and for the reſt of his requeſts, whatſoever he ſhould chance to do therein, he ſhould not from thenceforth find him any great Enemy; commanding the Meſſenger at his departure, no more to repair unto him about that matter, for fear of ſuſpition.

After that, it chanced that Scanderbeg came into Dibra, to ſee how all things ſtood there, and to conſult with Moſes for the beſieging of Sfetigrade; which City it grieved him to ſee in the poſſeſſion of the Turks. Moſes to avert Scanderbeg from that enterpriſe, wherein he muſt of force be driven to ſhew himſelf, told him, That he underſtood of late by a certain Meſſenger which came to him out of Sfetigrade, that the City was ſo well ſtored by the Turks, of all things neceſſary for the defence thereof, that it were but loſt labour to attempt any thing againſt the ſame; wherefore he adviſed him rather to beſiege Belgrade (not that Belgrade which is ſituated upon the River of Danubius, but another of the ſame name) in the Confines of Epirus, then holden by the Turks, but diſtant from Sfetigrade about an hundred and forty miles; of the taking whereof, there ſeemed to be more hope. By this perſwaſion, Scanderbeg reſolved with himſelf to make proviſion for the beſieging of Belgrade. And foraſmuch as his Souldiers of Epirus alwaies uſed to the Field, were not ſo fit for the beſieging of Towns, he thought it good to pray aid out of Italy, from his old Friend Alphonſus King of Naples, with whom he had been of long time acquainted, and unto him much beholden. Wherefore he ſent two of his Noblemen Embaſſadors unto him, with certain rich Preſents, and familiar Letters of this purport.

Scanderbeg craveth aid of Alphonſus King of Naples.

Our Souldiers of Epirus, know only how to fight with men, and them to vanquiſh; with Walls they know not how to deal. You Italians (as I underſtand) have skill in that kind of ſervice, and take pleaſure therein; wherefore now at this preſent, I have need of your help and cunning. There be certain Towns of our Enemies in Epirus, yea almoſt in the heart of our Kingdom, which eye-ſore I have of long deſired (if it pleaſed God) to take out of my ſight; but being occupied with continual Wars, had no leiſure until now, happily to attempt any thing againſt them. This time I have choſen as moſt fit, to ſatisfie my deſire, both for the ſeaſonableneſs of the time of the year, and for that Mahomet ſpareth me leiſure; whoſe fury I have twice calmed. You underſtand in few words, what I have need of; all other things are almoſt in readineſs, and we only look for your help. Lend me ſuch Souldiers as know how to fight a far off, I mean Harquebuſiers and Canoniers, for of others we have ſtore plenty. But happy is Apulia, my Alphonſus, under thy Government, from whence men fit for all ſervices may be drawn as out of a moſt plentiful treaſury. Whenſoever we have requeſted men fit for ſervice, either in Peace or War, you have beautified both our Court and Camp. By you the Kingdom of Epirus hath been ſupported with civil Policy, and warlike Strength; all ſort of People, of what condition ſoever; yea every corner of Epirus ſoundeth forth thy praiſe, both at home and abroad. But for mine own part, I do ſo lovingly embrace your kindneſs, and ſo firmly retain the remembrance of your deſerts towards me, that ſometime I wiſh you that fortune (although in ſo doing I may ſeem unkind) which (as the common ſaying is) proveth, but getteth not Friends; to the intent, that you might by ſome more certain proof know, how much I am to you devoted.

When Scanderbeg had ſent away his Embaſſadors, he with all diligence began to provide things neceſſary for the Siege of Belgrade; wherein he had purpoſed alſo to have uſed the ſervice of Moſes. But he now in heart a Traitor both to his Prince and Country, and a Friend to Mahomet, found many excuſes to ſtay at home in Dibra; alledging firſt, that it was to be thought that ſo ſoon as the Turkiſh King ſhould hear of the Siege of Belgrade, he would invade ſome part of Epirus, thereby to withdraw his Enemies from the Siege; and then that no part of all Epirus lay nearer unto the Turks, or more in danger than Dibra; and that therefore he could not do any better ſervice, than to ſee unto the ſafety of that Country, long before committed to his charge, and in which alſo moſt part of his Living lay. Theſe his excuſes, proceeding indeed from deep Treaſon, were yet nevertheleſs thought reaſonable, and he for his provident care highly commended; and Authority given him with new ſupplies to augment the Garriſon under his command, as time and occaſion ſhould require.

Alphonſus ſendeth aid unto Scanderbeg.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fully made his preparation for the intended Siege, the Embaſſadors before ſent to Alphonſus, were returned into Epirus, and with them ſuch aid as Scanderbeg had before requeſted, and a great deal more; For Alphonſus fearing the greatneſs of the Turkiſh Emperor, in what he could furthered Scanderbeg his actions, reckoning Epirus not above ſixty miles diſtant from his Dominions, to be the ſtrongeſt Walls of his Kingdom in Apulia (as not many years after, it by proof appeared, when as the Turks having taken Otranto, put all Italy in no ſmall fear.) With this aid he alſo wrote loving Letters unto Scanderbeg, thanking him for his Preſents, and for the good opinion he had of him, willing him to make as bold of all his things, as of his own. But when he came to make mention of the Souldiers he had ſent, Alphonſus, after the manner of his pleaſant nature, merrily wrote unto Scanderbeg, That he had ſent him Italian Souldiers which could according to his deſire, fight well both with Men and Walls, but better with Women; and that therefore the Epirots were beſt to take heed, that they whoſe help they required for fight afar off, proved not alſo good Warriors at hand at home in their Houſes. The great commendation Scanderbeg had given of the King, was by him referred unto the exceſs of his love, and by the King requited with the like.

Scanderbeg beſiegeth and diſtreſſeth Belgrade.

Scanderbeg now furniſhed with all things needful, ſet forward, and according to his former determination, came and encamped before Belgrade, with an Army of fourteen thouſand good Souldiers; and in ſhort time had ſo diſtreſſed the City, that the Turks were glad to take truce with him for ſixteen days, which time expired, they promiſed to deliver up the Town, if they were not before relieved. Upon concluſion of this truce Scanderbeg encamped himſelf upon an high Hill near unto the City, with three thouſand Horſe, and a thouſand Foot, and appointed Muſachius and Tanuſius, with the reſt of his Army, to remove farther off into a large Plain, where they might encamp themſelves in a more wholſome and freſh Air, in that hot ſeaſon of the year, during the time of the truce. At which time he appointed alſo five and twenty Scouts to keep continual Watch upon the top of the high Mountain, to diſcover afar off the coming of the Enemy, and to give warning thereof unto the Camp by making a fire upon the Mountain; by the negligence of which Watch, Scanderbeg received a great overthrow, as hereafter followeth.

The news of the Siege of Belgrade was brought unto Mahomet, at ſuch time as he was ready to have paſſed into Aſia againſt the Emperor of Trapezond; which great enterpriſe he was loath to give over, for the relief of Belgrade, and yet to loſe that City unto Scanderbeg, grieved him, much; wherefore he reſolved with himſelf ſo to do the one, as that he would not altogether neglect the other. And ſo holding on his intended journey into Aſia himſelf, with ſuch fortune as is aforeſaid, he ſent Sebalias one of his great Baſſaes, with forty thouſand Horſemen to relieve Belgrade, promiſing him great rewards if he could bring him Scanderbeg either alive or dead. This Baſſa was of the Turks accounted for a wary Captain, but not ſo couragious, alwaies more politick than forward: He having received his charge, ſet forward with all ſpeed poſſible, no leſs careful of that he was commanded, than was Mahomet himſelf, and by great journies came on ſo faſt, that he ſtill prevented the fame of his coming; and by his Forerunners intercepted, or rather (as ſome write) corrupted the Watch which Scanderbeg had before placed upon the Mountains; ſo that no ſign was given unto the Camp, of the Enemies, as was expected. By means whereof, Sebalias with all his power were upon that part of Scanderbegs Army, which lay in the Plains, before they were well aware of his coming; ſo that moſt part of them had not ſo much leiſure as to bridle their Horſes, or to put on their Armor. In which ſo ſuddain a fear, Muſachius armed himſelf, and put his Souldiers in ſuch order, as the ſhortneſs of the time and the Enemies approach would permit; doubting much, whether it were better to fight or to flie; but ſeeing no leſs danger in Flight than in Fight, he reſolutely received the Enemies charge, as a man deſirous beforehand to revenge his own death. And at length (ſeeing his men ſlain about him by heaps, and that courage muſt needs give place unto fortune) fiercely attempted to have broken through the midſt of his Enemies, and ſo to have fled unto the Mountain where Scanderbeg lay; but he was ſo beſet, that no way was poſſible to be made; wherefore reſolving there to die, he deſperatly fought, to the great admiration of his Enemies, untill that he, with all there with him, were every man ſlain. Tanuſius, on the other ſide, after he had given divers brave attempts to have reſcued his couſin Muſachius, finding by proof, that he could do him no more good therein, but to become the wofull companion of his death, exhorted all the reſt yet left, for ſafegard of there lives to flie: in which doing, moſt of them were ſlain, for the Baſſaes great Army ſo filled all places thereabout, and ſo eagerly purſued the Victory, that it was almoſt impoſſible any way to eſcape. Scanderbeg lying upon the Mountain, and ſeeing the overthrow of moſt part of his Armie, was about many times to have deſcended from the Hill to have holpen them in what he might, or elſe to have there died with them: but yet ſtaied, being thereto earneſtly requeſted by his other moſt expert Captains; and perſwaded, not deſperatly to thruſt both himſelf and them all into the manifeſt peril of aſſured death.

Sebalias having ſlain Muſachius and put Tanuſius to flight, followed the chaſe with the greateſt part of his Army, ſo that few were left in the great Plain, except ſuch as ſtaied to rifle the dead. Scanderbeg taking that opportunity, came down from the Hill whereon he ſtood, with his four thouſand Souldiers, and in a moment ſlew all ſuch Turks as he found in his way; and after following in the tail of the Turks Army, cut off a great number of them, and brought a general fear upon the whole Army; inſomuch, that Sebalias perceiving that he gained not ſo much in chaſing of Tanuſius but that he loſt more in the rereward of his Army, by the purſuit of Scanderbeg, left the chaſe, and turned upon his fierce Enemy; where after a ſharp skirmiſh begun, the wary Baſſa fearing in the maintaining of that diſordered Fight to have the Victory wrung out of his hands by Scanderbeg, cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, ſo to call together his diſperſed Souldiers, and in better order to encounter his dangerous Enemy. Scanderbeg in the mean time having aſſembled the remainder of his Army, valiantly again encountred the Turks, who thought in this battel to have made an end of the Wars in Epirus; and with his own Hand ſlew Achmat and Barach, two valiant Souldiers of the Turks; which like ſtout Champions had before ſworn unto Mahomet the death of Scanderbeg, if they ſhould chance to meet with him. In this laſt skirmiſh a great number of the Turks were ſlain; but Night drawing on, Sebalias retired with his Army to a Mountain near unto the City, and Scanderbeg likewiſe to another almoſt two miles off; and in the dead time of the night riſing with his Army, returned in ſafety into Epirus, leaving ſtrong Garriſons upon all the ſtrait paſſages as he went, for fear leſt the Baſſa proud of this Victory, ſhould forthwith break into Epirus. This was the only and greateſt overthrow that Scanderbeg had hitherto received of the Turks; wherein he loſt two thouſand Horſemen and three thouſand Foot (moſt part whereof were of the Italians ſent from King Alphonſus) together with his Tents and great Artillery, and about eighty of his Men taken Priſoners. And of the Turks were alſo ſlain three thouſand.

Scanderbeg flieth by night into Epirus.

The next day Sebalias perceiving that Scanderbeg was retired, commanded the bodies of the ſlain Turks to be ſought out and buried; but of ſuch Chriſtians as they yet found breathing, the Turks cut off their Hands and Feet, and ſo left them among the dead. The Head of Muſachius and of many other the ſlain Chriſtians, which by their Armor or Apparel were thought to be of the better ſort, were by the Commandment of Sebalias cut off; which becauſe he could not for the diſtance of the place, and heat of the weather, without great annoiance carry with him to Conſtantinople, as the barbarous manner of the Turks is, he cauſed them to be ſlain, and ſtuffed with Chaff, and ſo to be carried as the vain Trophies of his Victory. Afterwards, when he had repaired the battered Walls of Belgrade, and put a new ſupply of ſeven hundred freſh Souldiers into the City, beſide the old Garriſon therein before, and ſet all things in good order, he returned with great Triumph to Conſtantinople. And the more to ſet out the glory of his Victory, at ſuch time as he entred the City, he firſt cauſed the captive Chriſtians to be led in Chains before him; after whom were born the Enſigns taken from the Chriſtians, with the aforeſaid Heads thruſt upon Launces, and after them all the Spoil; laſt of all came Sebalias himſelf with his Souldiers, as great Conquerors, and was of the People received with ſuch Applauſe and Joy, as if he had conquered ſome great Kingdom. No man was now ſpoken of but Sebalias, his praiſes were in every mans Mouth, he was the only man (as they ſaid) that did ſhew that Scanderbeg was to be overcome; no preferment was now thought too great for him, or Reward ſufficient to countervail his deſert. The poor Chriſtian Captives were afterwards for the moſt part ſold; of the reſt, ſome were alive thruſt upon ſharp Stakes, ſome hanged upon iron Hooks, ſome otherwiſe cruelly at the Victors pleaſure tortured to death.

Moſes lately before corrupted by the practiſe of the Governour of Sfetigrade, hearing of the great loſs Scanderbeg had received at Belgrade, thought it now a moſt fit time for his revolt. But foraſmuch as the Fact, in the nature of it ſelf foul, ſeemed even to himſelf the doer thereof, a great deal fouler and more diſhonourable, for that he had therein no complices; he thought it good, if it were poſſible, to allure ſome others into the Fellowſhip of his Treaſon, ſo to diminiſh the infamy of himſelf, in communicating the ſame with many, and to appear with greater credit before the Turkiſh Tyrant, than if he ſhould as a contemptible Fugitive come all alone. Wherefore upon the bad news from Belgrade, he ſeemed at the firſt very penſive, and much to lament the misfortune of Scanderbeg, and the common miſery of the Country of Epirus, with many words amplifying the ſame; and then on the contrary part, ſetting forth to the uttermoſt the Force and Power of the Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet, thereby to ſtrike a greater terror and diſtruſt into the minds of them with whom he was converſant; but unto ſuch as were more ſecret and inward with him, he diſcovered the great affection and favour the great Emperor Mahomet had of long born him, with the large offer of his Gifts and Preferments, aſſuring them of the like alſo, if they would conform themſelves unto his appetite; ſeeking hereby ſo much as he could, to allure them into the participation of his moſt excreable Treaſon; yet when he had ſaid what he could, he found none but a few of the baſer ſort of the common Souldiers, which were willing to hearken unto him or to follow him. When Moſes ſaw how much he had laboured, and how little prevailed, fearing to be diſcovered, he fled by night to Sfetigrade, accompanied with a few baſe Fellows, and eaſily obtained the Governors paſs, with ſafe conduct to Conſtantinople; where he arrived a little before the return of Sebalias from Belgrade, and was of Mahomet both joyfully received and honourably entertained.

When Scanderbeg underſtood that Moſes was thus revolted, at the firſt report thereof he was ſo troubled with the ſtrangeneſs of the Fact, that he ſtood ſpeechleſs as a man aſtonied; but after he had pauſed a while, and upon further enquiry had found it out to be true, he according to his heroical diſpoſition, ſaid no more, but that he could eaſily have Moſes excuſed, for that he was carried away with the violence of ſuch Fortune as might have alienated the mind of a right conſtant man. And when divers of his Friends (according to the manner of the World) with hard ſpeeches ſeemed to aggravate his offence; he could not abide to hear the ſame, but commanded them to hold their peace, and no more to uſe ſuch ſpeeches; wiſhing that all Treaſon and evil Fortune were together with Moſes gon out of Epirus. Upon this news Scanderbeg accompanied with Ameſa his Nephew, and a Troop of Horſemen, preſently entred into the Country of Dibra, and there with all care cauſed moſt diligent inquiry to be made, if any could be found partakers of the Conſpiracy with Moſes. But finding none, he much rejoyced in the fidelity of his Subjects; and having ſet all things in good order in that Province, returned himſelf to Croia.

Moſes remaining in the Turks Court, ceaſed not to ſolicite Mahomet to proceed in his Wars againſt Scanderbeg, promiſing to do therein great matters, even to the ſpending of his life in that ſervice. But the crafty Tyrant thinking it not good to truſt him too far before he had further trial of him, delaied him off to the next Spring, pretending that the year was too far ſpent to begin Wars. In the mean time he cauſed all Moſes Talk, his Behaviour and Actions, to be diligently obſerved and noted; and oftentimes himſelf diſcourſed with him concerning the managing of that War; all which he did eſpecially to ſound the depth of Moſes his Thoughts. And finding nothing in him but the moſt aſſured and undoubted ſigns of a mind devoted to his ſervice, and altogether ſtranged from Scanderbeg; in the beginning of the Spring he committed to his charge the leading of fifteen thouſand Horſemen for the invading of Epirus, ſuch men as Moſes himſelf ſhould make choice of; for a greater number he required not for the vanquiſhing of Scanderbeg. Theſe Souldiers although they deteſted (ſo few in number) to enter that fatal Country of Epirus, as men fair warned by other mens harms, yet heartned on by the opinion they had conceived of their new General, and the hope they had by his means to find Friends in that Country to join with them, were the willinger to go. So Moſes furniſhed with a notable Army, and all warlike proviſion he could deſire for the deſtruction of his Country; and blinded with the imagination of a Kingdom, ſet forward, and marching through Thracia and Macedonia, forgetting the Loyalty due unto his Soveraign, and the love he ought to have born unto his native Country, came and entred into Dibra.

Mahomet ſendeth Moſes with fifteen thouſand ſelect men to invade Epirus.

Scanderbeg by his eſpials underſtanding of the coming of Moſes, as alſo what ſtrength he was of, ſtood not now upon any policy againſt him who had of long been privy to all his Stratagems, but was ready even at his firſt entrance with true Valour to encounter him. As both the Armies ſtood ranged in order of Battel, a Meſſenger came from the Turks Camp, to know of Scanderbeg, if any one of his Army durſt to prove his Fortune hand to hand againſt one of the Turks, before the beginning of the general Battel. By which Meſſenger anſwer was returned, That the Challenge ſhould be accepted. The name of the Turk which made this brave Challenge was Ahemaze, a man for his Valour and Courage of great name amongſt the Turks. Upon this proud Challenge, Zacharias Groppa, a Gentleman of no leſs reputation among the Chriſtians, haſtily ſtept forth before Scanderbeg (as if he had been afraid to have been prevented by ſome other) and requeſted, that he might be the man to abate the Turks Pride. Scanderbeg embracing him, commended his noble mind, and wiſhing him good Fortune, gave him leave to carry with him into the Field the firſt honour of the Chriſtian Army. As he was arming himſelf, his Companions and Fellows in Arms ſtanding about him, wiſhed unto him not more Courage or Strength than he had, but only the Fortune of Maneſſi. Upon his Armor he put on many rich Jewels and Ornaments, the Allurements or rather the Rewards of the Enemy, if he could vanquiſh him. The Turkiſh Champion was no ſooner come into the Plain betwixt both Armies, and made ſhew of himſelf in great bravery, as if his match had yet been ſcarcely found, but he ſaw Zacharias come forth bravely mounted, and ready to charge him; to whom Ahemaze calling aloud, ſaid there would be time enough for him to haſten to his death, and therefore requeſted to talk with him before. So when he had learned of him both his name and place, he propounded ſuch like Conditions of the Combat, as had been long before derided by Maneſſi; whereof Zacharias in no better ſort accepted. In few words it was agreed upon betwixt them, That each of them ſhould abide his own Fortune, without any help or aid of others; and that the Victor ſhould have full power over the Body and Spoil of the vanquiſhed. Thus agreed, they withdrew themſelves one a good diſtance from another, and with their Launces charged, ran together with ſuch force, that with the violence of the encounter they brake their Launces one upon the other, and were both Horſe and Man overthrown. But unhorſed, they nimbly recovered themſelves, and with their Scimitars fiercely aſſailed the one the other on foot. Fortune it ſhould ſeem had determined to beautifie that Combat with variety, ſtanding a great while indifferent to both. After many ſturdy ſtroaks given, without any hurt done, by reaſon they were ſo ſtrongly armed, it fortuned that both their Swords were beaten out of their Hands; then grapling together with their bare Hands, as if they had been two unarmed Wreſtlers, after long ſtrugling till they were both almoſt out of breath, Zacharias overthrew the Turk, and lying upon him, with his dagger, above the Gorget thruſt him into the Throat, and ſlew him; and ſo riſing up, with the Sword that firſt came to his Hands, cut off the Turks Head; at the ſight whereof the Chriſtian Army gave a great ſhout for joy, to the great diſcomfiture of the Turks. To be ſhort, Zacharias deſpoiling the Turk of his Armor, and what elſe he thought good, returned loaded with the Spoil of his Enemy, and preſented unto Scanderbeg the proud Turks Head; for which he was of him afterwards moſt honorably rewarded.

A Combat betwixt a Turk and a Chriſtian.

Into this place yet reeking with the Blood of the late ſlain Turk, came Moſes, and with a loud voice challenged Scanderbeg hand to hand; thinking indeed that he would not have adventured his Perſon; but when he ſaw him ready to come forth, he ſhamefully forſook the place, and returned with ſhame enough into his Army.

The Battle betwixt Scanderbeg and Moſes.

Preſently after both Armies upon ſignal given ſet forward, and ſo began to joyn Battel; where at the firſt onſet Scanderbeg ſo valiantly charged the Vauward of the Turks Army, that they were glad to give ground; which Moſes perceiving, relieved them with new ſupplies, and riding now here, now there, with his Preſence and Courage reſtored the Battel, in many places almoſt loſt. Howbeit, the Epirots encouraged with the beginning of their good Fortune, ſtill prevailed upon their Enemies, and after great ſlaughter made, came to the Strength of their Battel; where Moſes had placed moſt of his beſt Souldiers, as his moſt aſſured and laſt refuge; in this place the Turks fought with exceeding Courage, and Moſes warily obſerving in what part of the Battel Scanderbeg himſelf was, directed his moſt Forces againſt him on purpoſe, if poſſibly he might, to have ſlain him; whereof he miſſed but a little; for a couragious Souldier of the Turks by chance encountring with Scanderbeg, with his Horſemans Staff bare him quite backward upon his Horſe, in ſuch forcible manner, that the Turks for joy gave a great ſhout, thinking verily he had been ſlain; but Scanderbeg recovering himſelf again, and chafed with ſuch an unwonted diſgrace, furiouſly aſſailed the ſame Turk with his Sword, and after a great Fight ſlew him. A great part of the Turks Army being already overthrown by them that had the leading of the Wings of Scanderbegs Army, divers of the common Souldiers thruſt the Heads of the ſlain Turks upon the points of their Spears, in token of Victory, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Turks; and now joining themſelves with Scanderbeg, more fiercely charged the main Battel of the Turks than before. Nevertheleſs, Moſes encouraging his Souldiers, did what was poſſible for a man to do, and even with his own Valour a great while ſtaid the courſe of the Victory; until he ſeeing the ground about him covered with the dead bodies of his beſt Souldiers; and that there was no remedy but that he muſt either flie or there die, turned his Back and fled. In which Flight, many of the hindermoſt of the Turks were ſlain; as for Moſes himſelf, he eſcaped by ways to him well known, only with four thouſand men, the poor remainder of ſo great an Army; the reſt, to the number of about eleven thouſand, all choice men, were ſlain; whereas of the Chriſtians were not paſt an hundred loſt, and about eighty wounded. Of all the Turks that were taken, only one was ſaved; who being a man of good account, had yielded himſelf to Zacharias, and was afterward ranſomed; the reſt were all by the common Souldiers, without Pity tortured to death, in revenge of the Cruelty by them ſhewed at Belgrade; Scanderbeg himſelf either not knowing thereof, or winking thereat.

Moſes with the reſt of his diſcomfited Army, lay ſtill a while upon the Borders of Epirus, and would fain have perſwaded them, after the departure of Scanderbeg, to have followed him again into Epirus, to have ſurpriſed the Garriſon left in Dibra, in number not above two thouſand; promiſing to bring them upon the ſame Garriſon, before they ſhould be aware of their coming. But the Turks having him now in contempt, were about by general conſent to forſake him, and to return home. And ſo Moſes ſeeing no remedy, returned with them to Conſtantinople, with countenance as heavy as if he had been a condemned man now carried to the place of Execution; and the Turks which had not long before had him in great admiration, expecting that he ſhould have ended the Wars in Epirus, began now to diſgrace him as faſt, and to ſpeak all the evil of him they could deviſe. Yea the Tyrant himſelf (although he could blame nothing in the Man, but his Fortune) was ſo highly offended with him for the loſs of his Army, that he had undoubtedly put him to moſt cruel death, had not the great Baſſaes, and others near about him, perſwaded him otherwiſe, ſaying, That in ſo doing, he ſhould alienate the minds of all others from revolting unto him, or attempting any great thing for his ſervice. So was he by their mediation pardoned his life; but withal ſo diſgraced, that he had little or nothing allowed him afterwards for his neceſſary maintenance; all which deſpightful contumelies he outwardly ſeemed patiently to bear; but was inwardly ſo tormented with melancholy and grief, that he could neither eat nor drink; the remembrance of the foul Treaſon committed againſt his Prince and Country, was day and night before his Eyes; and the diſgraces of the Turks Court inwardly tormented him with intollerable grief; the ſight of the Tyrant (who meaſured all things by the event) filled his Heart with ſecret indignation; and to return again to his natural Prince, of whom he had ſo evil deſerved, he was aſhamed; ſometime the clemency and princely nature of Scanderbeg, whom he knew of old, ſlow to revenge, and eaſie to be intreated to forgive, heartned him on to think of return; and by and by, the conſideration of his foul Treaſon overwhelmed him with deſpair. Thus with contrary thoughts plunged too and fro, tormented with the unſpeakable griefs of a troubled conſcience, not knowing what to do, purpoſing now one thing, and by and by another; at laſt he reſolved to forſake the inſolent Tyrant, and to ſubmit himſelf to the mercy of Scanderbeg; wiſhing rather to die in his Country for his due deſert, than to live with infamy, derided in the Turks Court. Reſting himſelf upon this reſolution, one Evening he got ſecretly out of the Gates of Conſtantinople, and travelling all that night and the day following before he reſted, by long and weary journeys, came at laſt unto his native Country of Dibra. The Garriſon Souldiers beholding their old Governor all alone, full of heavineſs, as a man eaten up with cares; moved with compaſſion, forgetting the evils he had been the occaſion of, received him with many tears and friendly embracings, and brought him to Scanderbeg, who by chance then lay not far off. Moſes coming unto him with his girdle about his Neck, in token that he had deſerved death (as the manner of that Country was) found him walking before his Tent, and there with heavy cheer falling down upon his Knees at his Feet, ſubmitted himſelf unto his mercy, and with great humility and ſigns of repentance, craved his moſt gracious pardon. Which his requeſt Scanderbeg preſently granted, and taking him up by the Hand embraced and kiſſed him, in token he had from his Heart forgiven him; and within a few days after, cauſed all ſuch things of his as were before confiſcate, to be again reſtored unto him; with all ſuch Offices and Promotions as he had before enjoyed; and by open Proclamation commanded, That from thenceforth no man ſhould either publikely or privately ſpeak of that Moſes had treſpaſſed. Mahomet underſtanding that Moſes was returned again into Epirus, and honoured of Scanderbeg as in former time, was much grieved thereat, and fumed exceedingly; firſt, for that he had at all truſted him; and then, that he had ſo let him ſlip out of his Hands; being verily perſwaded, that all that Moſes had done, was but a fineneſs of Scanderbeg to deceive him.

Moſes flyeth from Conſtantinople.

Shortly after that Moſes was returned into Epirus, Mahomet by like practice allured unto him Ameſa, Scanderbeg his Nephew; promiſing to make him King of Epirus in his Uncles ſtead. For by that means, the crafty Tyrant thought it a more eaſie way to draw the minds of the people of Epirus from Scanderbeg unto him deſcended of the Princes Blood, than to Moſes, or to any other Stranger he ſhould ſet up. Ameſa upon this hope of a Kingdom, fled to Conſtantinople; and becauſe he would clear the mind of the Tyrant of all Suſpition and diſtruſt, he carried with him his Wife and Children, as the moſt ſure Pledges of his Fidelity. This Ameſa was of Stature low, and the Feature of his Body not ſo perfect as might ſufficiently expreſs the hidden Vertues of his Mind; he was of Courage haughty above meaſure, ſubtil and of a pregnant Wit; wonderful painful, and thereto courteous and bountiful (the chief means whereby aſpiring minds ſteal away the Hearts of Men) whatſoever he got of himſelf, or had by the gift of his Uncle, he divided it among his Souldiers or Friends; he was very affable, and could notably both cover and diſſemble his affections; for which things, he was above all others both beloved and honoured of all the People of Epirus, next to Scanderbeg himſelf. At his firſt coming to Mahomet, he filled not his Ears with great Promiſes and vain Praiſes of himſelf as had Moſes;

but only excuſing his own revolt, laboured to perſwade him, That he had for juſt cauſes left his Uncle, with a deſire now faithfully to ſerve him. And to that purpoſe ſpake unto him as followeth.

Ameſa his firſt ſpeech unto Mahomet.

If it ſhould pleaſe thee (moſt noble Mahomet) to call to remembrance the old injuries, and antient diſpleaſures by us committed againſt thine imperial Majeſty, we might ſeem now rather to have come hither to receive the juſt guerdon of our evil deſerts, than upon any hope of honour or preferment. For what could have been done more in diſgrace of the Othoman Empire, than that you have ſeen long ſince done by us, in the moſt dangerous time of the Hungarian War; rather of a malicious and ſet purpoſe, than for that we were juſt Enemies? Whenas in the ſame perfideous courſe, I my ſelf being a helper and partaker therein (for now no excuſe is to be pretended for our doings, more than repentance) your Fathers Army was betrayed at Morava, and the Kingdom of Epirus by great Treachery wreſted out of your Fathers Hands; the only cauſe of ſo many Calamities, and of ſo much bloodſhed. But vain is this fear, and our ſuſpition needleſs, with ſo wiſe and merciful a Prince; eſpecially for that my years then green, and youth prone unto the harm of it ſelf, and a mind not reſting upon his own reſolutions, deceived me. I believed mine Uncle (for the ignorant believe many things) and allured with the deſire of Soveraignty (the proper diſeaſe of that age) and too much credulous, I forſook you and followed his promiſes, but diſcretion growing with years, I have by little and little perceived both the ſlie perfideous dealing of mine Uncle, as alſo that my revolt from you was more hurtful unto my ſelf than to any other. Scanderbeg recovered, and alſo enlarged the Kingdom of Epirus; but not without my great labour and help. I expected long time, that he ſhould have given me, if not my Fathers whole Inheritance, yet at leaſt ſome part thereof, as a ſmall reward of my ſo great travel and danger. Not long after he married a Wife, and hath begot a young Heir, a new Succeſſor in his Kingdom; unto me for ſhame of the World, becauſe I ſhould not altogether lead a private life, he hath aſſigned a baſe corner of Epirus; where he enjoying the reſt, I might lead a poor and contemptible life. In this caſe I had much ado to bridle my affections, and could never digeſt that injury; yet the iniquity of the time, with the inſolent diſpoſition of the man, compelled me to ſmother up my thoughts, and to make fair weather, leſt finding ſome ſuſpition, he ſhould craftily have intrapped me, as he did of late George Streſie his Siſters Son; whom wrongfully charged with feigned ſurmiſes, he hath almoſt deprived of all his Poſſeſſions. I would willingly have fled unto the Feet of your Highneſs, I would gladly have forſaken my ingrateful Uncle with the ſtains of his infamous Kingdom; but that the remembrance of the old Rebellion, and many Injuries ſiththence done, did make me afraid, until that now (God I think ſo appointing it) I came moſt gladly, following your moſt Royal Faith and Promiſe. You had ſcarcely beckned unto me, you had ſcarcely invited me, having of long intentively waited every occaſion, but ſtraight way I came with ſuch ſpeed, as if I would have flown; I lingred not, I expected not either Scanderbeg or his evil hap, or your more proſperous ſucceſs, as of late did Moſes; leſt I might thereby juſtly ſeem either for fear or regard of ſome eminent danger, rather to have provided for mine own ſafety than to have embraced your magnificence. Neither have I left any thing for you in me to ſuſpect, nor any cauſe wherefore I ſhould deſire to return again into Epirus; here are preſent moſt ſure bonds of my love, and faithful Pledges of my Loialty. Behold (worthy Mahomet) you have whaſoever is dear unto me, yea whatſoever Nature could give, pleaſing unto men in the courſe of mans life. Theſe have I brought unto thee, which ſhould with violence have been taken from an Enemy; ſuch Pawns as might aſſure thee of the Faith of a moſt doubtful man. More than this, I have brought nothing; for in ſo great ſpeed and ſecret departure, I could not have regard of my Subſtance. And if I might have had time to have truſſed up my traſh at leiſure; yet I know not how, I ſhould have thought it a kind of baſeneſs, to have brought with me any part of the poor reliques of mine old Fortune; eſpecially unto thee, of all other the richeſt. Only my Fidelity I lay down before thee, for any thing greater I have not; and if thou deſire of me any other Bond for more aſſurance, I refuſe not whatſoever your Highneſs ſhall appoint; for I came not hither to ſet down Covenants and Agreements of my ſelf, but to receive them from you. I dare not promiſe to vanquiſh mine Uncle, and to ſubdue Epirus with an Army of fifteen thouſand men; the misfortune of Haly-Baſſa and other your Generals; yea and the late and rare Victory of Sebalias, with great bloodſhed gained, may ſerve for examples. In me you ſhall neither want diligence nor faithful ſervice; as for other things concerning the event of this War, and for the revenge of the injuries by you received; you being a Prince of power invincible, and of a moſt deep judgment, are not to be adviſed by me your unskilful Vaſſal.

Ameſa honourably entertained by Mahomet.

This Speech of Ameſa, ſeemed unto Mahomet free from all diſſimulation, foraſmuch as he knew moſt part thereof to be true; and his Wife and Children brought unto his preſence, confirmed the reſt. Wherefore commending his good affection, he appointed him honourable entertainment, referring other matters unto a further time.

Upon the approach of the Spring, Mahomet deſiring nothing more than to be revenged upon Scanderbeg, entred into conſultation with his great Baſſaes, concerning the invaſion of Epirus; unto which Counſel Ameſa was by Mahomet admitted, and his wicked device for the deſtruction of his Country, of all others beſt liked. After the matter had been long too and fro debated, it was concluded, That Iſaac the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, ſhould with an Army of fifteen thouſand be ſent againſt Scanderbeg, and Ameſa with him, having the charge of five thouſand Horſemen; and the Baſſa to proclaim Ameſa King of Epirus; thereby to perſwade the Epirots, that Mahomet invaded Epirus rather for the diſpleaſure he bare againſt Scanderbeg, and for the advancement of Ameſa, than for any ambitious deſire he had to take unto himſelf that Kingdom.

Great was the preparation for this War, and the expectation thereof greater. Flying Fame had in ſhort time filled every corner of Epirus with the report of theſe News; adding thereunto (as the manner is) a great deal more than was true. Whereupon Scanderbeg without delay, ſent for his great Captains and Men of War into Dibra, where that Tempeſt was firſt to be expected; and when they were all aſſembled, he declared unto them the greatneſs of the danger, and what he thought thereof himſelf, as followeth.

A notable ſpeech of Scanderbeg unto his Captains how the Turks were to be withſtood at their coming to Epirus.

Amongſt all other things which God hath left to vex and grieve the minds of men in ſo great variety of Worldly Affairs, we ſee (right worthy Souldiers) theſe two the greateſt, Hope, and Fear. The firſt a more comfortable thing, and proper to couragious minds (I may not ſay) of light belief; the other a thing of more diſcretion and ſafety, which although it uſe to defer the deſires of men, yet hath it power at length excellently to cure and ſeaſon the ſame. Hereupon is it eaſily to be gathered, That the great Chieftains of former times have gained more Honour and greater Victories, by fearing all that was to be feared, than others in ſhew more hardy, which feared nothing. Hereupon the great Charthaginentian Captain uſed to call Q. Fabius (whom the Romans ever thought to ſlow and too fearful) his great Enemy: But Terentius Varro he called a greater Enemy unto his own Country and the people of Rome, than to himſelf. But wherefore do I wrongfully call that Fear, which might more truly be called Diſcretion, or wholſome Policy? Call it as you will, it is not much material; but this one thing no man can deny, That thereof hath riſen the ancient Diſcipline of War, and the old and ſevere Government of Martial Affairs. This adviſed carefulneſs cheriſheth and nouriſheth Hope it ſelf, it doth nothing raſhly; it hath Eyes before, behind, and on both ſides; it weigheth in indifferent ballance things paſt, preſent, and to come. You may now perceive to what end my Speech tendeth. I would firſt confer with you, and know your Opinions, before I determine any thing of the order of this War; that either I might yield unto your Opinion, or elſe (as you have always hitherto done) to mine. You hear now with your ears, what Preparation, what War-like Proviſion is daily made againſt us. Loe the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, all the Flower of Europe, and whole ſtrength of the Othoman Kingdom knocketh at our Gates. I want not courage (neither ever did) to prove my Fortune againſt him, not without your Honour: But I think it better to uſe policy and wary heed againſt ſo great an Enemy, than our wonted force and courage. That notable Overthrow of Haly-Baſſa, ſo many great Victories by us atchieved, our minds by ſo many good haps confirmed, perſwade me to think that we have both courage and ſtrength to Encounter him in plain battel; but the uncertain events of War, and Fortune never ſufficiently known, maketh wiſe men to forget what is paſt, and to fear that is to come. It was never proper to any man, it was never given by Inheritance, always to overcome; new Occurrents require new Correſpondents; neither may you, for that you conquered yeſterday, preſume to aſſure your ſelf to divide the ſpoil of your Enemies to day. Victory is like a Traveller, and goeth hither and thither, not reſting long in a place; and although it be for moſt part both gotten and kept by courage and diſcretion, yet oftentimes, when you have moſt carefully and politiquely diſpoſed of all things, the fortune and chance of War have therein a great ſway. I was wont to require (I remember it well) only valour and courage in my Souldiers, contemning all external accidents and fortunes haps; if you did promiſe unto me couragious Minds, I aſſured you of all good hap and proſperous Succeſs; but that loſs we received at Belgrade (the remembrance whereof my mind feareth, and always abhorreth to think upon) hath much changed my former Cogitations, and made me to deem far otherwiſe of worldly matters, and the uncertainty of Fortune. What if that day had been longer? or Sebalias of more courage? might not the State of Epirus have that day been utterly overthrown? We were then rather by God preſerved, than by any thing that was in our ſelves: What remained more, but that we ſhould like Cowards have yielded our ſelves to have been bound of the Conquerors? The night defended us, yea even God himſelf defended us; who took from them both policy and force, and gave us time to breath and eſcape away. We were then but as a prey, expecting but the coming of the Victor: Howbeit he took nothing from us, he carried little or nothing away with him, being too much careful to keep the Honour he had already gained, and peradventure in fear of them of whom he was not without cauſe moſt feared. I ſpeak not this of purpoſe to terrifie any of you, but rather to admoniſh you, and to conſult with you, how ſo great Preparations may be fruſtrated and overthrown, and ſome notable Victory by us atchieved, without the price of our blood, or the loſs of ſuch things as we have. The number of our Enemies is great, and ſo great, as until this day we never ſaw in Epirus greater, except at ſuch times, as they came to beſiege our Cities, and to devour us all. Now if we ſhall meet them in the plain Fields in a ſet battel, the event thereof will be doubtful, many of us muſt needs fall, many of us muſt die (I would I might be a falſe Prophet) before ſo great an Army will either fly or be overcome, your Victory ſhall be mingled with tears, and the heavineſs of the Conqueror not much unlike the ſorrow of the conquered. Was it but a few that we loſt at Belgrade? is that loſs ſo to be recovered? What Flower of Chivalry, hardly to be in many years reſtored? How many worthy men were there ſlain? Epirus muſt needs in ſhort time be unpeopled, if we ſhall ſo deſperately only ſeek for ſuch glorious Victories. Wherefore if we will do well, we muſt ſo fight to day, as that we may fight to morrow alſo. Neither are our Enemies and we in like caſe. The loſs of forty or fifty thouſand is leſs unto the Turkiſh Tyrant, than the loſs of an hundred of you is to me. We are in all but a few, and therefore carefully to be kept; which if we regard not for our own ſakes, yet let us do it for our Wives and Childrens, whoſe welfare and liberty dependeth on our lives: I know the number of you, I know your Faces and Countenances, and almoſt every one of your Names, which maketh me alſo more careful of your health. And yet I would not refuſe to try the whole fortune of this battel in plain Field, if we might thereby end all the Wars againſt the Turks for ever; if I were in hope ſo to find an end of our labours and travels hereafter, I would gladly adventure my life with yours, for the perpetual quiet and peace of our Poſterity; but a new Enemy always ariſeth, and we muſt ſtill look for new Wars. When this Iſaac is gone, another Iſaac will ere long come in his place; we ſhall be always exerciſed with new Wars, and incloſed with new dangers: It is the deſtiny of Epirus (as far as I can ſee) and we our ſelves are born thereto. Wherefore we muſt gather our wits together, we muſt well husband our Forces, and ſo divide our Patrimony, as that we may always have ſomething to content our Creditors, when they ſhall chance to come upon us. Yet ſhall God (no doubt) give an end alſo unto theſe Troubles; for extremities cannot be of long continuance, and you your ſelves ſhall at length take reſt; yea the ſtrong and puiſſant Enemy, wearied with ſo many vain Attempts, will at laſt have enough thereof, and leave off his perpetual hatred againſt us; then ſhall it be to you no ſmall pleaſure to remember ſo many labours and dangers paſt. Thus have I declared unto you the commodities and incommodities enſuing the Victory in plain battel. But what if we be vanquiſhed? Where have we any hope of relief left? From whence may we expect help? Will the bloody Enemy, inflate with Victory, expect whilſt we again recover our ſtrength and encounter him again with new Forces? No, he will purſue us and chaſe us ſo long as any of us are left; and having overcome us, will pour out the reſt of his fury upon our Towns and Country, then ſubject to his injury. But ſome of you peradventure will ſay, that they are by policy to be overtaken, and not to be met in open Field; of which opinion I alſo am my ſelf; yet happily differ from you in the time of doing the ſame. Then I think it beſt to deceive them, when they think they cannot be deceived; when as they being as it were in poſſeſſion of a ſuppoſed Victory, like men overjoyed, ſhall caſt no peril. Now they come even from the Gates of Conſtantinople, full of diſtruſt, prying into every corner, as men before warned by others harms, and ſo many dreadful examples of their fellows: Beſides that, they have with them my graceleſs Nephew and domeſtical Foe Ameſa, who will teach them to foreſee and ſhun ſuch Snares as in times paſt he with us was wont to lay for them. Wherefore we muſt now tower up unto the height of ſome notable and ſtrange policy, whereby both our Country may be from danger preſerved, and alſo ſome great Victory, without our own bloodſhed (which ſeldom chanceth) obtained; which to the maintenance of our ancient Glory and Renown, we have to this day by many moſt notable Victories gained: But time and ſpace, and the ſight of the Enemy, ſhall furniſh us with this device. Now (that my Diſcourſe may come to the purpoſed end) firſt of all, all things ſubject either to the fury er victory of the Enemy, are to be removed out of the way; all people, of what Age, Sex, or Condition ſoever, are to be brought out of the Country into places of ſafety; and then, our Towns are to be furniſhed with ſtrong Garriſons and all other neceſſary Proviſion, againſt all the chances of Fortune. Beſides, who knoweth the ſecret deſigns of the Tyrant? or whether he himſelf (of long time deſirous of Revenge, and thirſting after our Blood) will follow the Baſſa at the heels, or no? Perhaps I may believe and fear more than is needful; but it is good to fear all that may be feared, that we may indeed fear nothing. If all things ſhall thus be ſet in order, if there ſhall nothing be left in the Fields or in the Villages, that may enrich, feed, or fear cur Enemies, and which may withdraw our care and thoughts from our Enemies, undoubtedly we ſhall be Victors. And if you will be ruled by me, and follow my direction in theſe Wars, I will aſſuredly deliver your Enemies into your hands to be ſlain at your pleaſure; and (by the leave of God) will make the Name and Valour of the Epirots more terrible unto the Turk, than ever it hath been in the time of our Anceſtors. I flatter not my ſelf, I deceive you not; if any thing may be promiſed in worldly Actions, this I aſſure you of, and this will I take upon me. But theſe things are better done than ſaid. In the mean while, to ſpend no more time in longer talk and diſcourſe (than which, no greater loſs can be to Souldiers) let every one of us take a part in this Charge, for the good diſpoſing of all things, and how to withſtand the Enemy. I will not command any thing to others which I will not my ſelf do; I will refuſe nothing, or reckon any thing baſe, which may tend to the common Honour or Profit of us all.

This Speech of Scanderbeg was well liked and joyfully received of all the Hearers, ſo that many beſought him to manifeſt to them how he purpoſed to proceed in thoſe Wars; whereunto he with chearful countenance anſwered, That it was enough for him, if they did but believe him, promiſing himſelf in Perſon to be in the moſt dangerous actions as far as any of them, wherewith they reſted contented. And preſently diſpatching his Lieutenants into divers parts of his Kingdom, as he thought moſt convenient, provided, that all things were in ſhort time conveyed out of the Country into the ſtrong Towns and other places of Refuge. No Corn, no Cattel, or other things of any worth was left in the Country; but all left deſolate, in like manner as was before at the coming of the great King Amurath to the Siege of Croia.

The Epirots remove all their things out of the Country into the ſtrong Towns before the coming of the Turks.

By this time Iſaac the great Baſſa was come into Epirus, accompanied with Ameſa; and as he marched, ſtill ſent before him his Scouts and Eſpials, carefully to view every corner of the Country, for fear to be entrapped as others before him had been; directed in his Journey for moſt part by Ameſa. Scanderbeg had in readineſs ſuch an Army as he had purpoſed to uſe againſt his mighty Enemy, but lay with ſix thouſand Horſemen only in ſhew, as if he had determined with them to have given them battel, but meaning indeed nothing leſs. For as ſoon as the Baſſa was come in ſight, he with thoſe Horſemen, according as he had before appointed, as if he had been diſcouraged with the very ſight of the Turks, turned his back and fled. And becauſe he would not give them any occaſion to ſuſpect it to be done for ſome policy or fineneſs, and ſo to make them more careful, he fled not into the Mountains or Woods, as his wonted manner was, but directly toward Lyſſa, a Town of the Venetians ſtanding upon the Sea coaſt, as if he had quite deſpaired of the keeping of Epirus, and fled thither for Refuge. The Baſſa ſeeing him fly, was glad thereof, and ſent certain Troops of Horſemen to purſue him, and diligently to mark which way he took; but encamped himſelf with his Army in the Plains of Dibra, near unto Oronychium, where Scanderbeg lay before; and there reſted his Army, weary of long travel, expecting the return of his Horſemen, ſent after Scanderbeg. But upon their return, when it was for a certainty reported by them, That Scanderbeg with an handful of men was fled out of Epirus, and not an Enemy to be ſeen, the Turks began to rejoyce, and proudly to triumph, that they had without any loſs driven the Enemy out of the Country; yet much grieved, that they could no where find any thing to ſatisfie their greedy deſires; for why, all things were ſo clean gone, as if the Country had been ſwept againſt their coming, which might have been a ſufficient cauſe for them to have diſtruſted ſome great matter; but they flattering themſelves, ſuppoſed all this to be done for fear of them, upon extream deſperation; ſuch is the frail condition of men, to loſe ſtrength of body, common ſenſe, yea, their reaſon and underſtanding, when ſome great miſchief is appointed for their Overthrow or Deſtruction. The Baſſa ſeeing the Enemy fled, and now no cauſe of fear, conſulted with his chief Captains, what were now beſt to be done? Ameſa ſtill perſwading him not to remove, but there to ſtay a time, and to expect the farther event of matters. But the greater number, whoſe opinion prevailed, ſaid it was better to go farther into the Country; and to take the ſpoil thereof before the Country people ſhould convey away all their Subſtance into places of ſafety, as they had done there in Dibra, and leave them nothing but the bare ground and empty Cottages. By this perſwaſion, the Baſſa early next morning in good order ſet forward; commanding by general Proclamation, That no man upon pain of death ſhould break his Array or ſtraggle from the Army. Yet before he ſet forward, he called Ameſa unto him; whom after he had highly commended, and with great vehemency inveighed againſt Scanderbeg, he with the great applauſe of the whole Army in the name of Mahomet created him King of Epirus. That day he marched not far, by reaſon of the great heat; for it was then about the midſt of July. Yet when he had well wearied himſelf with that days travel, finding neither Enemy nor any thing elſe worthy to be accounted in any part of a Victory, he encamped at night, keeping diligent Watch, and ſending forth his Scouts every way, but eſpecially towards Lyſſa. The next day, which was the third day after the Baſſaes coming into Epirus, he ſet forward again, and came at length into Æmathia, and there encamped that night.

Ameſa is by the Baſſa created King of Epirus.

When Scanderbeg (flying for fear, as the Turks ſuppoſed) was gone a great way out of their ſight towards Lyſſa, and come even to the Borders of his Kingdom, he there ſtaid all the reſt of that day. And a little before the going down of the Sun, he with a few ſelect Horſemen departed from the Army, and with painful travel got up to the top of the High Mountains, from whence a man might by day well diſcover all the Plains of Æmathia. There he appointed one Peieus Emanuel, a politick and valiant Gentleman, with certain Horſemen to mark diligently which way the Enemy held, and by certain ſecret and appointed waſtings and ſigns, to give knowledge thereof to the Army. After ſuch Order taken, he returned himſelf, and came again to the Camp after midnight. And preſently riſing with his Army, and fetching a compaſs about, came undiſcovered, and ſecretly encamped himſelf as near as he could unto the Mountains where his Scouts lay, with Eagles eyes waiting for the leaſt moving of the Enemy. The Baſſa deſirous to get as far as he could into the Country, before the heat of the day, began early in the morning to ſet forward, and came to the Plains of Pharſalia, through the World ſpoken of for the great battel in them long time before fought, between the two moſt famous Chieftains Cæſar and Pompeius; and now once more to be made famous, by the ſlaughter of the Turks. Here the Enemy finding ſome ſtragling Cattel, and other ſmall things which the Country people had in their haſty flight left behind them, fell to ſeeking after Booty, and, as men without fear, ſpent that day in roaming up and down the Country, in hope to find ſomething; and at night encamped without any great Watch, but towards Lyſſum, from whence they (in great ſecurity) looked for the coming of Scanderbeg; and as it were in diſgrace of him, carried Ameſa in Triumph up and down the Camp, as if he had been already poſſeſſed of the Kingdom of Epirus. Scanderbeg lying on the other ſide of the Mountains, perceived by his Eſpials, which way the Enemy lay; and with great ſilence under the covert of the Mountains and Woods, ſecretly bent his courſe the ſame way, until he came to a Mountain called Tumeniſt, at the foot whereof he encamped that night. The next morning the Baſſa holding on his way, came and encamped not far from the ſame Mountain, and there ſtaid himſelf with half his Army, and ſent Ameſa with the other half to burn and ſpoil the Country; who about noon returned to the Camp with ſuch prey as he had got, with his Souldiers well wearied with travel, and the heat of the day. Scanderbeg like a careful Houſholder, who being about to entertain and feaſt ſome honourable Perſonages, truſteth not to his Wife and Servants, but looketh to the beſtowing of his Proviſion himſelf, carefully ordering and diſpoſing and ſetting forth all things, eſpecially if his Proviſion (for want of ability) be ſhort, to welcome ſo great Gueſts; and ſetting all things forth to the greateſt ſhew, ſeeketh at leaſt to fill the eyes of his Gueſts, although he doubt to ſatisfie their Appetites; ſo he carfully viewing all the Mountains and thick Woods thereabouts without reſting, ſet Moſes in one place, Tanuſius in another, and all the reſt in places moſt convenient. He appointeth every man what to do, and inſtructeth them, and conſiderth of every particular circumſtance himſelf; and ſo divideth his Forces, as might beſt ſerve his purpoſe, and make the moſt terrible ſhew to the Enemy; for which purpoſe he in every Company placed more Trumpets, Drums, and other Inſtruments of War, than he had before at any time uſed. When he had ſo to his moſt advantage beſtowed ſo many of his Captains and Souldiers as he thought good, and as the nature of the places would give leave, he with 4000 Horſemen and the like number of Foot, ſpeedily marching up the rough Mountain of Tumeniſt, from thence plainly beheld in what Order the Turks Camp lay in the Plains below. The Turks, eſpecially they which were lately returned with Ameſa from the ſpoil of the Country, lay ſcattered abroad in the fields, with their Horſes unbridled and unſadled, reſting their weary bodies; ſome got under the ſhadows of Trees were victualling themſelves; ſome having filled their Bellies, lay faſt aſleep on the green Graſs; the reſt were paſſing the time, ſome with one kind of ſport, ſome with another, as Souldiers do in field when they have little or nothing to do; for it was then the hotteſt time both of the year, and of the day, being about the midſt of July, and the noon-time of the day. The like negligence was alſo in that part of the Camp where the Baſſa himſelf lay; every man taking his eaſe and pleaſure, with ſmall regard of Horſe or Armor; for being out of fear of Scanderbeg, whom they thought to have been a great way off at Lyſſum, they lay as men without care wrapt up in ſecurity, the common deſtruction of great Armies and Commonwealths. Ameſa with the great Captains, were at the ſame time all together in the Baſſaes Pavilion, conſulting what courſe they were beſt to take, to do ſomething to the contentment of Mahomet, and their own commendation; ſome ſaid it were beſt with Fire and Sword to deſtroy all they could in Epirus; and ſo having laid the Country waſt, to return. Others thought it better to march directly to Croia, to prove if the Citizens could be perſwaded to yield themſelves and receive Ameſa for their King; otherſome to threaten them with a continual Siege, and utter ruine of the Country, if upon the vain expectation of help from Scanderbeg they ſhould refuſe to ſubmit themſelves. As for Scanderbeg himſelf, who then lay hovering over their heads, he was in all that Conſultation leaſt feared; who from the top of the Mountain, beholding the ſecurity and diſorder of the Turks Camp, and delighted with the ſight thereof; encouraged his Souldiers, and martialled them in ſuch order as they were to follow him, for the charging and terrifying of the Enemy. But firſt of all he determined to oppreſs the Turks Scouts, which lay at the foot of the Mountain; for which purpoſe he himſelf with a few Horſemen firſt ſecretly deſcended the Mountain, the reſt of his Army following ſhortly after, and ſo ſuddenly came on the Scouts, that he ſlew them all except one, who eſcaping by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe, came running to the Camp as one half affrighted, crying out that Scanderbeg was coming. The Turks ſuſpecting nothing leſs than the coming of him that way, at the preſent inſtant hardly believed that he was ſo nigh; when as he following him at the heels as faſt as he could, with his Horſemen and his Footmen after them, was in a moment as if it had been a ſudden Tempeſt, broken in amongſt the unarmed Turks, and there making great ſlaughter of them, filled all the Camp with ſudden tumult and fear. Ameſa who at the firſt noiſe had ſpeedily got him to his Charge, with his Souldiers ſome half-armed, ſome on Foot, having no leiſure to bridle their Horſes, was the firſt that made head againſt Scanderbeg. The Baſſa alſo did what he might in that ſudden fear and ſhortneſs of time, to arm his Men, and to put them in order; but whilſt thoſe things were in doing, the Souldiers which lay in ambuſh in the Woods, came down the Mountain with ſuch horrible ſhouts and noiſe of Inſtruments of War, as if Heaven and Earth ſhould have preſently gone together; the Hills and Vallies with their hollow Ecchoes, encreaſing the terrour of the Alarm. Inſomuch, that the Turks diſmayed, and fearing that all the Force of Epirus, with the Countries adjoyning, had come upon them, began to fly on every ſide, before that Moſes and the reſt that lay in ambuſh were come into the Plains. Ameſa acquainted with his Uncles Stratagems, as much as he could encouraged the Turks; crying aloud and telling them, That ſuch vain Tumults and Terrors were not to be feared, being but the bare ſhifts and devices of their Enemies to cover their own weakneſs; and by his own valour ſtayed many which before were about to have fled. In this while, the Baſſa having put his Men in beſt order he could, was coming to the Aid of Ameſa, hardly charged by Scanderbeg; but in his ſetting forward, he was ſo valiantly encountred on the one ſide by Moſes with his Horſemen, and on the other by Tanuſius and Emanuel with their Footmen, that he was enforced, not without great loſs, again to retire unto his Trenches.

All the hope of the battel depended upon Ameſa, who ſtill with great courage withſtood his Uncle; exhorting his Souldiers valiantly as men to endure that firſt Aſſault, which ſhould afterwards bring them moſt aſſured Victory; heartning them on with hope of ſpeedy help from their Fellows if they would but a while endure the fury of their Enemies, whoſe hearts (as he ſaid) would preſently be diſcouraged, if they prevailed not in that their firſt and deſperate Attempt, having nothing elſe to truſt unto. By which perſwaſion the Turks were again encouraged, accounting it a great diſhonour to fly and leave their Chieftain in the field. But when they ſaw Scanderbeg ſtill to prevail upon them, and that no help came as they hoped (for many were by Scanderbegs Horſemen ſlain as they were arming themſelves; many were by the way cut off as they were coming, and the reſt put to flight) they which before fought valiantly with Ameſa, turned their backs and fled alſo. Scanderbegs Horſemen purſued the chaſe, and made great ſlaughter of the Turks, and in the ſame chaſe took Ameſa Priſoner. Scanderbeg, having overthrown that part of the Turks battel, was coming with a thouſand Footmen and ſome Horſemen, to have aided Moſes againſt the Baſſa; but before his coming, Moſes to blot out his former Infamy, had with invincible courage put the great Baſſa with all his Army to flight; and Scanderbeg following the chaſe, gave him not leave to look behind him, until he was got out of Epirus. Many were in this chaſe taken Priſoners, and amongſt the reſt one Meſites a Sanzack, a man of great account amongſt the Turks. In this battel, beſide the Priſoners, were taken twenty of the Turks faireſt Enſigns. As for Horſes, Armor, and other ſpoils taken in the Field, and in the Camp, all which fell to the Souldiers ſhare, it is almoſt incredible to be told. The number of the ſlain Turks is of divers diverſly reported; they which write of the moſt, reckon up thirty thouſand; and they which ſpeak of the leaſt, account twenty thouſand. Of the Chriſtians were loſt but ſixty. Now if any account it ſtrange, that ſo great a Victory ſhould be gained with ſo little loſs; not to ſpeak of that is written in Holy Writ, let him but read the ancient Hiſtories of the Romans, or the Chronicles of our own Country, and he ſhall in them find Victories no leſs ſtrange. There was to be ſeen the ſudden and ſtrange alteration of theſe worldly things, no more indeed (whatſoever we account of them) to be reckoned of, than of things we have not. Scanderbeg poſſeſſeth the rich Pavilion, erſt belonging to the great Baſſa; and other of his Captains enjoy Tents, with much other rich Furniture never prepared for their uſe. Ameſa, which the ſame day as a Victorious Conqueror over-ran a great part of Æmathia with his Horſemen, and was carried in Triumph with the general Acclamation of many thouſands of valiant Souldiers, and honoured as a King, and of them ſo called; is now led through the Chriſtian Army to his Uncle, with his hands bound behind him as a Slave, ſpeechleſs and confounded, unable to hold up his head for ſhame; whoſe miſery moved moſt of the beholders to compaſſion, and forced tears out of the eyes of many.

A notable Victory of the Christians.

The next day after this great Victory, Scanderbeg cauſed the bodies of the ſlain Turks to be buried, together with their Horſes; which he did not for any regard of them, but that their loathſome Carkaſes ſhould not infect the Country; and after that, returned in great Triumph to Croia. By the way as he went, the Country people, which were before for fear of the Turks fled into the Woods and Mountains in great multitudes met him, as he did others alſo out of the Cities, whoſe mouths were all full of his worthy Praiſes. Before him went the Captive Turks with their hands bound behind them, excepting ſuch as were enforced to carry the Turks Enſigns. Next unto them followed the great Baſſaes rich Pavilion, in ſuch manner ſupported by the Souldiers, as if it had been in the field. Then came Scanderbeg himſelf with the Turkiſh Sanzack, and Ameſa following him; for Ameſa had with great and humble Suit obtained of his Uncle, that he might not, as he well deſerved, be carried bound among the other Captives. Laſt of all came Scanderbeg his Victorious Souldiers in goodly order, every man leading a ſpare Horſe taken from the Enemy, and loaded with ſpoil. So when he was come to Croia, and there of his Subjects joyfully received, he brake up his Army; and gave every man leave at his pleaſure to depart. The Sanzack and Ameſa, were committed to ſafe keeping, until farther Order was taken for them. Ameſa afterwards was for his Treaſon worthily condemned to perpetual Priſon, and by an Embaſſador from Scanderbeg ſent unto King Alphonſus to Naples, there to be kept in durance; and with him was alſo ſent an honourable Preſent of part of the ſpoil taken from the Turks, in token of the Victory. What became afterward of this Ameſa, concerneth not much the courſe of our Hiſtory; yet to ſatisfie the deſirous, I think it not amiſs with him to ſtray a little out of the way.

When Ameſa had remained a year in Priſon at Naples, Scanderbeg underſtanding of the death of Alphonſus, by his Embaſſador requeſted of Ferdinand his Son, to have Ameſa reſtored to him again. But which means he was brought back again into Epirus, and caſt in Priſon at Croia; but not in ſuch ſtraight manner as before; for Scanderbeg according to his accuſtomed Clemency, began now to forget the injury to him before done; and at laſt overcome with the continual Supplication and Tears of his Nephew, pardoned him his life; and reſtoring him to his former liberty, received him alſo into his former favour. But Ameſa remembring what Pledges of his Loyalty he had left with Mahomet at Conſtantinople, and fearing what would become of his Wife and Children, if he ſhould haſtily uſe that his liberty, giving his Uncle moſt humble thanks, brake unto him his mind concerning that matter, as followeth, The Speech of Ameſa to Scanderbeg

Whereas you of your own gracious goodneſs only, without any deſert of mine, have regarded my Life and Welfare, it behoveth me alſo to be careful for the life of others; leſt whilſt I receive your exceeding bounty with too much deſire of mine own Health and Honour, I do at this preſent, by this ſame benefit of yours, caſt away them, whom I have long ſithence by mine own Treachery undone. Mine unfortunate and guiltleſs Wife is with Mahomet, my little and innocent Children are with him alſo; theſe yet live, and ſhall live, ſo long as the Tyrant ſhall think, that I live in heart his; but when he ſhall once perceive by this your gracious dealing that I am fallen from him, the cruel Creditor will forthwith cut and rend in pieces the Pledges of my Faith, and their innocent blood ſhall pay the guilt of their Fathers offence. Wherefore the Othoman Tyrant is of me by ſome device to be deceived, that I may in the mean time preſerve thoſe Pledges, until I may by ſome fit occaſion afterwards redeem the ſame. I will by your leave this night take my flight out of Croia, as if I had broken Priſon, and eſcaped againſt your will, and ſo fly unto Mahomet, making the greateſt ſhew I can of my wonted Love and Loyalty towards him; not omitting to hear, or ſpeak unto that credulous King ſuch things concerning your Eſtate, as I was wont in my better Fortune; that having ſo cleared my ſelf of all ſuſpition, which he perhaps hath conceived by reaſon of my Captivity and long ſtay with you, I may at length, with my Wife and Children, ſo eſcape from him: Wherein you may help me much, if you ſhall openly make ſhew as if you were grieved with my eſcape, and ſeem to be highly offended with the Keepers of the Priſon for the ſame. In the mean time, whilſt I ſhall ſtay in the Tyrants Court expecting ſome fit time for my eſcape; I will ſtand you in ſtead of an Intelligencer, ſo that your Enemy ſhall not to my knowledge either attempt or go about any thing againſt you, which ſhall be kept from your hearing or knowledge.

Scanderbeg refuſed not to grant whatſoever he had requeſted, but ſaid unto him:

The anſwer of Scanderbeg to Ameſa.

Ameſa, ſithence we have granted you life, with all the good things thereunto belonging, we will not prohibit you to uſe that our Gift to your moſt good, and to the preſervation of them who for ever may moſt juſtly call upon you, as debtor unto them, for their welfare and liberty. Go thy ways, proceed, take thy time and occaſion as it ſeemeth unto thee beſt; and at length reform thy ſelf, whilſt thou yet haſt ſufficient time and ſpace. We now believe you in all things, and well like of this your device: Ameſa you ſhall herein deceive no man but your ſelf, if you ſhall longer follow the Faith and Court of the barbarous King, whereas like danger is both of Body and Soul both to thee and thine. Whenſoever thou ſhalt return unto us thou canſt not do us a greater pleaſure; and in what regard thou haſt heretofore been with us, in the ſame thou ſhalt be with us again.

The ſame night Ameſa by ſecret Order from Scanderbeg, eſcaped both out of Priſon and out of Croia; and in the morning it was all over the City, that he was gone, and the Keepers ſharply rebuked for their negligence. He coming to Conſtantinople, eaſily perſwaded Mahomet, that he was by chance eſcaped, with all things elſe that he told him; yet was he not for all that, ſo well graced of him as before; not for any diſtruſt he had in the man, but for the evil ſucceſs he had in the former Wars. Now whether Ameſa neglected his promiſed return, or could find no opportunity to perform the ſame, is uncertain; but certain it is, that ſhortly after he died at Conſtantinople, poiſoned as was thought by the commandment of Mahomet, who could no longer endure the ſight of him, whom he reckoned the Author of the notable Overthrow received in Æmathia. This was the woful end of this noble and valiant Man, well worthy of remembrance, had not his haughty thoughts ſoared too high with the deſire of Soveraignty.

The death of Ameſa.

When Mahomet underſtood in what manner Iſaac Baſſa was overthrown, and his Army diſcomfited, he was therewith much grieved, and juſtly blamed the Baſſaes ſecurity; yet ſuch was his credit with his Soveraign, that the matter was in better ſort paſſed over than was ſuppoſed it would have been. Neverthеleſs, Mahomet in revenge thereof would willingly have imployed all his Forces upon Scanderbeg, if his more urgent Affairs would have ſo permitted. For at the ſame time, beſides that great Wars began to riſe betwixt him and the Venetians (which continued for many years after) he was certainly informed, That the Chriſtian Princes were making a ſtrong Confederation againſt him. At which time Mahomet diſdaining openly to ſue for a Peace at Scanderbegs hands, cunningly practiſed by ſuch as were ſent to redeem the Priſoners, and alſo by the Sanzack himſelf, to perſwade Scanderbeg to require Peace of him; aſſuring him, that if he did but ask it, it would for a long time be eaſily obtained. Which thing Scanderbeg, well acquainted with the Turkiſh Policy, utterly refuſed to do. Wherefore Mahomet for the defence of his Countries bordering upon Epirus, ſent two of his moſt expert Captains, Sinam and Hamur, with each of them 14000 Souldiers into Macedonia, expreſly charging them not to enter at any time or upon any occaſion, into Epirus, or by any means to provoke Scanderbeg; which his Commandment they ſo well obſerved, that the Epirots by the ſpace of almoſt two years enjoyed the fruits of Peace, although there was no Peace at all concluded. So that the remembrance of old Injuries wearing out with time, at length by the mediation of the ſame Captains, a Peace for a year was agreed on betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg. In which time he paſſed over into Apulia, and there notably aided King Ferdinand againſt the French, the proceeding wherein, as not pertinent to our Hiſtory, I of purpoſe paſs over.

A Peace for a year concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

After that the time of the Peace before concluded was expired, all things now going well with Mahomet as he deſired, he reſolved according to his wonted manner to trouble the quiet Eſtate of Scanderbeg; and ſo ſending a new ſupply of Souldiers to Sinam-beg, who then lay with a ſtrong Garriſon upon the Frontiers of Epirus, commanded him with all his Power to make Wars upon Scanderbeg. Sinam accordingly, with an Army of 20000 Men, entred into Epirus, where he was forthwith encountred by Scanderbeg, and his Army utterly overthrown, ſo that but few eſcaped by flight with Sinam himſelf. Preſently after he ſent Aſam-beg, another of his Captains, into the ſame Service, with an Army of thirty thouſand, whom Scanderbeg alſo in plain battel vanquiſhed at Ocrida; in which battel Aſam himſelf was ſore wounded, and finding no way to eſcape, was glad to yield himſelf Priſoner to Scanderbeg, by whom he was courteouſly uſed, and afterwards ſet at liberty. Juſſum-beg following Aſam with eighteen thouſand into Epirus, was ſet upon by Scanderbeg alſo, and having loſt part of his Army, was glad by ſpeedy flight to ſave himſelf with the reſt. After all this, Caraza-beg, an old Captain and a man of great experience (who had been a great Commander, and a Companion with Scanderbeg in the time of old Amurath) requeſted of Mahomet, that he might prove his Fortune againſt his old acquaintance Scanderbeg, aſſuring him of better Succeſs than before. The long and approved experience of this old Leader put Mahomet in ſuch hope of good ſpeed, that he gave preſent Order for the levying of ſuch an Army as Caraza had requeſted, and for ten thouſand more than he had at the firſt required. With this ſtrong Army, in number almoſt forty thouſand, Caraza ſet forward, having before filled the minds of men with the expectation of ſome greater matter to have been by him done. Scanderbeg underſtanding certainly that Caraza was coming, ſtood more in doubt of the Man than of his Power; and therefore aſſembled greater Forces than he had uſually done before; and to welcome him, ſent two thouſand of his beſt and moſt expert Souldiers ſecretly into the Enemies Country; who lying in ambuſh amongſt the Woods and Mountains, whereby Caraza muſt needs paſs, ſuddenly ſet upon four thouſand Horſemen (the forerunners of Caraza his Army) who marching diſorderly, and fearing no ſuch matter, were in a trice overthrown, and moſt part of them ſlain; thoſe few that eſcaped fled back again to the Army, as if they had come in poſt to bring tidings of ſome haſty News to the General. With which ſo unfortunate a beginning, Caraza was ſo diſcomfited, that if he might for ſhame, he could have been content to have returned again and gone no farther; yet for his Honours ſake holding on his way, he came into Epirus; where whilſt he was (after the manner of old men) long in reſolving what courſe to take, he was upon the ſudden aſſailed by Scanderbeg, before he could well put his Men in order of battel. At which time there fell ſuch a vehement ſhower of Rain, that both the Armies were glad to retire before any great hurt was done. Three days together it rained continually (for it was about the later end of Autumn) all which time Scanderbeg ceaſed not in one place or other to trouble the Turks Camp; ſo that the old General, partly diſtempered with the extremity of the Weather, which for the violence thereof he took to be ominous; and more diſcouraged with the reſtleſs Attempts of Scanderbeg, roſe with his Army, and retiring back by the ſame way he came, returned to Conſtantinople. Where he was well derided of Mahomet, that having promiſed ſo much, had performed ſo little; yet afterwards was again by him in ſome ſort commended, for that he had with leſs loſs looked upon Scanderbeg than other his Generals before ſent againſt him.

Mahomet perceiving that Scanderbeg was not to be ſubdued but with ſuch Forces as he was not then at leiſure to imploy on him, thought it not amiſs to prove if he could by fair Speeches and glorious ſhews of Friendſhip get within him, and ſo bring him to confuſion; for which purpoſe he ſent unto him an Embaſſador with rich Preſents, and Letters of this Purport.

Sultan Mahomet, Lord and Emperor of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, and of all parts of the World, unto Scanderbeg, Prince of Albania and Epirus, ſendeth greeting.

The Letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I Think Friend Scanderbeg, that no Acquaintance can be greater, or Friendſhip more firm, than that which hath grown of long and mutual converſing and living together, and eſpecially if the ſame have taken beginning from Childhood and tender Years, as you know it hath done betwixt us Two; who have of long time, even from our Childhood, lived together in great Love and Friendſhip, when as you firſt lay as Hoſtage in my Fathers Court. Wherefore beloved Scanderbeg, when as I call to remembrance all thoſe things, with others, wherewith our Youthful years were then delighted; and being mindful alſo of all thoſe things which you have oftentimes done for the advancement of our Empire and Kingdom, and for the glory of the Othoman Family, I cannot chooſe but embrace thee with ſingular Zeal and Affection. For I take God to witneſs, that nothing could chance more welcome or pleaſing unto me in my life, than to have thee with me, and for a while to enjoy thy Company. Neither needſt thou to fear any thing to come unto me, for that my Souldiers without my Knowledge or Commandment have of late broken in and ſpoiled thy Kingdom; which thing as reaſon required, was unto me exceedingly diſpleaſing; neither did it any whit offend me, that they were by thy Forces vanquiſhed and overcome, and ſo received the juſt Reward of their evil deſerts, and that all things fell out with thee according to the equity of thy Cauſe, and as thy Heart could have deſired. But to let theſe things paſs, the remembrance of our old Love and Friendſhip perſwadeth me to come to agreement, and to joyn together with thee in a perpetual League of Amity; to the intent that our ancient Acquaintance and Familiarity, which by reaſon of long abſence is almoſt worn out, may again take life, increaſe, and be confirmed. Of which Peace, let theſe be the Capitulations, if they ſhall ſeem unto you reaſonable; for I know it belongeth unto him that requireth not the Peace, to appoint the Conditions of the ſame. Firſt, we require of you freely and peaceably to ſuffer our Armies to paſs through your Kingdom, for the beſieging of the Cities and invading of the Countries ſubject to the Venetians our Enemies: Then, to deliver unto us your Son John in Hoſtage, whom we will always uſe as one of our own natural Children: And afterwards, that our Merchants and Men of Trade, may peaceably come and travel into all parts of your Kingdom with their Merchandize, and there freely and ſafely uſe their Negotiation: Laſt of all, that your Self in Perſon may at your pleaſure ſafely and without all fear repair unto us, and in like manner return again. In which things if you will yield unto us, I promiſe in the Faith of a King, to grant unto you and your Kingdom ſincere Peace, with perpetual Tranquility; and that there ſhall not be any more dearer unto me than your Self; and will never to the uttermoſt of our Power permit your Kingdom to be infeſted or moleſted by any of our Subjects, or others. Whatſoever you ſhall further receive from us by the mouth of our Embaſſador Muſtapha, you may thereto give full Credence. Fare you well. From our Imperial Palace at Conſtantinople the 10th of May, 1461.

Scanderbeg having received theſe Letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, returned him Anſwer by the ſame Meſſenger as followeth.

The Souldier of Chriſt Jeſus, George Caſtriot, otherwiſe called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, unto Mahomet Prince of the Turks, greeting.

The Anſwer of Scanderbeg to the former Letters of Mahomet.

Y*Our Letters (moſt Magnificent) are delivered unto us, wherein you write of your exceeding Love and ſingular Affection towards us, confirmed as you ſay by old Acquaintance; which being grown up betwixt us, and by tract of time firmly rooted, and as it were into nature converted, ſhall always retain his force and ſtrength. But foraſmuch as it ſeemeth unto you good to awake the ſame, having of long time and many years lien as it were aſleep; and to make a motion that we ſhould enter into a certain new League and Confederation, whereof amongſt other Conditions* of the League by you propounded, this is one, That your Forces may freely paſs through my Kingdom, to invade the Venetians; Unto this your Requeſt, worthy Mahomet, it ſtandeth neither with Equity nor with mine Honour to conſent, for ſo much as the Venetians are my eſpecial good Friends and Confederates. As for that you deſire to have my Son John with you in Hoſtage for the better aſſurance of the Peace betwixt us, I ſhould peradventure do it (moſt noble Mahomet) *if fatherly affection would give me leave; but ſithence I have no more but him, and he as yet a tender Child, it is not for the good either of him or us, to have him now taken from us, when as he ought of us to be moſt tenderly cheriſhed, and carefully inſtructed. As for that you requeſted concerning your Merchants, That they may freely and ſafely Traffique into my Kingdom at their pleaſure, I can be content thereunto, and wiſh heartily that there might be a free Entercourſe for our Merchants indifferently with their Commodities into both our Kingdoms. Further, whereas you earneſtly perſwade me boldly and without fear to come unto you, that by ſuch Enterview and Perſonal Preſence, our great deſire, grown of long abſence, might be the better ſatisfied; in this thing moſt excellent Prince, I cannot but praiſe your moſt Honourable Diſpoſition, and commend your good Nature; and would therefore boldly follow your perſwaſion, if my other urgent Affairs, with the Government of my Kingdom, would ſo permit. But what ſhall I do? My Son John (as I ſaid before) but little, and as yet unfit to Govern; and my people (as you know) love always to have ſomething to do, being by Nature a fierce and reſtleſs Nation, whom I my Self have much ado to Rule and Govern: For all that I will come unto you according to your deſire, expecting only a more commodious time. So fare you well, and love me ſtill. From our Camp the 30th of May, 1461.

When Mahomet had received theſe Letters, and well peruſed the ſame, he writ to him again in manner following.

Sultan Mahomet, Emperor of all the parts of the World, unto Scanderbeg Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, greeting.

e Let- rs of ahomet Scan- erbeg for con- ding of rpetual ace be- ixt m.

YOur Letters we have received by our Embaſſador Muſtapha, wherein you give us to underſtand, that you like none of the Conditions of Peace by us propounded, but only that concerning our Merchants and men of Trade, that they might freely and at their pleaſure uſe their Traffique and Trades with their Merchandize to and fro, and upon this condition only you grant us Peace. This your Offer we accept of, and all the reſt of your excuſes we willingly admit; wherefore I promiſe unto thee (my loving Scanderbeg) and will perform all that thou doſt require, and upon that Reſolution reſt; and will ſo long as I live obſerve and keep a ſincere and inviolable Peace with thee for ever, except thou firſt give cauſe of violating the ſame. And for that purpoſe have we with our uſual and Imperial Seal ſigned theſe our Letters, which we by our Embaſſador Muſtapha have ſent unto thee, as thereby confirming unto thee this perpetual Peace. Wherefore you alſo (if you be ſo content) may ſubſcribe, and with your Seal confirm this of Ours, that I in like manner may have alſo your like Conſent and Agreement. And would farther, That you would Command knowledge thereof to be made by open Proclamation through all your Kingdom, as I will in like manner cauſe to be done through mine. And for the more manifeſtation of this my love towards you, I would alſo that you ſhould underſtand, That of mine own meer motion and bounty, I do freely give unto you all thoſe things, which you by force of Arms have taken from my Father in Albania and Epirus, ſo that you may poſſeſs and enjoy the ſame, as if they had always been yours and your Anceſtors: Wherefore I give, grant, and confirm unto thee and thy Heirs, all the Right, Title, or Intereſt, which I heretofore had therein, and from henceforth will always account and repute thee as Prince of Albania and Epirus, and ſo call thee. And as I have promiſed thee in the Faith of a King, will never hereafter with Wars moleſt thee or thine, except thou thy Self give cauſe thereof. Wherefore after you have with your Seal confirmed theſe things, you may commend them to our faithful Embaſſador Muſtapha, to be by him brought unto us; unto whom I would you ſhould in all things give full Credit. So fare you well, and render us love for love. From our Imperial Palace at Conſtantinople, the 22. of June, 1461.

A Peace concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

Upon receit of theſe Letters, a Peace was concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, and the ſame by publique Proclamations ſolemnly publiſhed through both their Kingdoms, to the great rejoycing of many. Which Peace was for a ſeaſon faithfully kept on both ſides, until that the Turks lying in Garriſon upon the Frontiers of Epirus, began after their wonted manner again to fetch Preys and Booties out of the Countrey. Of which Injuries, Scanderbeg by Letters complained to Mahomet; who anſwered that he was altogether ignorant thereof, and ſeemed in ſhew to be much offended with the Inſolency of the Doers thereof; and forthwith cauſed many things to be again reſtored. By which means the Peace before concluded, was ſtill as before continued.

A little before the concluſion of the aforeſaid Peace, great Wars began to ariſe betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, who all this while being in League with the Turk, peaceably followed their Traffique and Trades of Merchandize, little or nothing at all regarding their Neighbours Harms and Miſeries, until that now the flame and fire began to take hold upon their own houſes, and as it were to awaken them out of a dead ſleep. For Mahomet after he had ſubverted the Empire of Conſtantinople, and driven Thomas and Demetrius the Emperors Brethren out of Peloponneſus (now called Morea) reſted not ſo contented, but by his Lieutenants and other great Captains began to diſturb the quiet of the Venetians, who then held in their poſſeſſion Methone, Corone, Neapolis, Argos, with divers other ſtrong Towns in Peloponneſus, ſtanding upon the Sea coaſt. And now it chanced that about this time, Joſue, Mahomet his Lieutenant in Peloponneſus, had by the Treaſon of a Greek Prieſt, upon the ſudden ſurpriſed the City of Argos; and Omares another of his great Captains, having firſt ſpoiled the Country about Naupactum (now Lepanto) entred farther into the Territory of the Venetians about Methone and Corone, making havock of whatſoever came in his way. With which Injuries plainly tending to open War, the Venetian Senators being much troubled, ſate oftentimes in Counſel, deliberating with much care what courſe to take in a matter of ſo great importance. Some being of opinion, that it were beſt to ſend Embaſſadors to Mahomet, ſo to make proof if the matter might by fair means be redreſſed; others on the contrary part deeming it to be to no purpoſe ſo to do; foraſmuch as ſuch great and manifeſt Outrages, nothing differing from plain Hoſtility, could not poſſibly be done without the Tyrants knowledge and expreſs Command. After the Senators had oftentimes met together, and with many great Reaſons debated the matter too and fro, and yet for all that concluded nothing (as in conſultations of great matters with a multitude, it moſt commonly falleth out to be a harder matter, and to require longer time, to bring the multitude to ſome certain reſolution, than it is afterwards to perform the ſame in action.) In this ſo great a diverſity of opinions concerning ſo weighty a cauſe, at length one Victor Capella, a noble Gentleman and grave Senator, ſtept up in the midſt of the Senate, and there frankly delivered this notable Speech unto the reſt, concerning the matter propounded, as followeth:

The notable Speech of Victor Capella to perſwade the Venetians to take up Arms againſt Mahomet.

I have before this at other times by long experience often noted (moſt noble Senators) that in all our greateſt Conſultations of matters moſt concerning our Common State, ſome are always ſo addicted or rather wedded unto their own conceits, that they can hardly with patience endure to hear the reaſonable opinion of others contrary to their own, the chief cauſe of our ſlow Reſolutions. Wherefore I have thought it good, briefly at this time to call upon you for reſolution; foraſmuch as I ſee we muſt of neceſſity take up arms, be we never ſo loath or unwilling: For to my underſtanding, you do but betray the State, in delaying the time to make preſent War upon the barbarous Enemy. Yet many principal Men amongſt us, adviſe us to beware, that we do not raſhly or unadviſedly determine of matters of ſo great conſequence; and think it requiſite that we ſhould ſend Embaſſadors unto the Tyrant, to expoſtulate with him his unjuſt dealing in breaking his Faith and League; and withall to requeſt him to obſerve the Conditions of the Peace before agreed upon, if happily he may rather by perſwaſion than by Arms be moved to change his purpoſe; and if by this means nothing may be obtained, then at length they think it neceſſary to reſolve to make War upon him. They alledge further, That if we ſhall attempt War, our Cities in the Continent, bordering upon the Ionian in Peloponneſus, with divers others of ours in the firm land, will not be able to hold out very long, but for want of neceſſaries muſt needs periſh with the firſt of the trouble; beſides that, if thoſe places ſhall be waſted and ſpoiled, great loſs (as they ſay) ſhall enſue thereby unto moſt of us in private: The greateſt motive (perhaps) wherefore they think it moſt convenient to defer the Wars, and for that purpoſe to ſend our Embaſſadors unto him. Of which Embaſſage, firſt by your leave a few words. At ſuch time as theſe our Embaſſadors, Men of great wiſdom and reach, not long ſince came unto him, he had them in no regard; but dallying off the time with fraudulent, deceitful, and gloſing Speeches, did indeed ſuch things to the contrary as we leaſt hoped; wherefore I cannot well deviſe (if we ſhould ſend them, or ſuch others again) what eſpecial thing of all that we then gave them in charge, they ſhould now propound unto him, having already ſaid what is to be ſaid; except they ſhould ſay, That whereas we are not of ſufficient ſtrength and power to wage War againſt him, we would be glad to decide the matter by talk, and by that ſimple means to redreſs our Injuries; and upon the matter, to ſhew our ſelves preſt and ready to fall to agreement with him, according as ſhall ſtand with his good pleaſure and liking. Truly this were good plain dealing, but it will not ſerve our turn. Argos is already taken from us, and he maketh open War upon us; wherein he doth but prove our courage, and try how long we will put up theſe Injuries. If we will quietly digeſt theſe, he will then confidently and without fear proceed further; but if we ſhall, as beſt beſeemeth us, valiantly reſiſt him, he ſhall be glad of ſuch reſt as we ſhall give him; and when he knoweth not well which way to turn himſelf, ſhall be as glad as we to lay down Arms, and to ſeek for Peace; whereas if we ſhall do otherwiſe, I fear we ſhall repent our ſelves when it will be too late. It is reported, that as ſoon as he was come into Peloponneſus, he went himſelf in Perſon unto Eubœa, to view the City of Chalcis: And going a ſecond time out of Peloponneſus, ſounded the depth of the paſſage, and came within the ſight of the City, of purpoſe to have aſſaulted it, if he had found opportunity; at which time he himſelf rid over that ſtrait of the Sea betwixt Boœtia and Eubœa with his Horſe, and curiouſly viewed in what place he might moſt conveniently paſs over with his Army to beſiege the City. Verily theſe are the moſt manifeſt ſigns of War, whereby any man may ſufficiently prove, that he hath long ſince reſolved (ſo ſoon as he is ready) to make War upon us. Whilſt we are yet dreaming in the midſt of our long Conſultations, he will proceed in the Wars he hath begun; and cutting us ſhort, augment his own Dominions. Then will he blame his Lieutenants and Captains, as Authors thereof; but ſtill be doing that beſt ſerveth his purpoſe. And whilſt no man oppoſeth himſelf againſt him, his Power daily increaſing, he will do the beſt he can, ſuddenly to ſwallow us up, being unprovided. For he may eaſily raiſe great Forces, that by ſufferance of others, maketh himſelf of great ſtrength there where he had before no footing. Shall we then ſay that we have no Wars with this encroaching Tyrant? Some I know feed themſelves and others alſo, with vain hopes, ſaying, That he will never turn his Forces upon us, nor ruinate our Eſtate, although he might at eaſe do it: Wherefore (ſay they) let us refrain from Wars, and uſe our peace and quietneſs; yet omitting nothing in the mean time that ſhall be needful for our ſafety. But foraſmuch as it plainly appeareth unto all men, by that which is before ſaid, That he hath already indeed proclaimed War againſt us, invading our Countries, ſurpriſing our Cities, and killing our people; Whether think you it more expedient or profitable for us, to ſit ſtill and ſuffer our Dominions to be taken from us, or rather by open War to make the barbarous King know the greatneſs of our Power and Strength? For if we ſhall enter into open War, we being in Arms ſufficiently provided for all Events, and with careful eye attending all his Attempts, ſhall eaſily avoid both himſelf and all his devices; who if he be ſuffered to run ſtill on forward with his proſperous ſucceſs, people will daily more and more fall unto him, in hope to live the better, as his Friends. For which cauſe, I think it better to prefer an Honourable War, before a doubtful Peace. As for delay, it hath hurt many great States, and our ſelves moſt of all; whereby we have in ſome ſort betrayed the Empire of Grecia, with the woful Emperor himſelf, when as this Tyrant battered the Walls of Conſtantinople; for our Traffique was much holpen by the Grecians, whom we then left to themſelves. After that, we deſpiſed and rejected the pitiful Complaints of the Princes of Peloponneſus, who with tears craved our Aid; and now we ſee that famous Country loſt, and fallen into his hands, through our ſloth and negligence. Of late, when as the King of Boſna humbly requeſted our Aid, and promiſed fully to requite our courteſie, and whatſoever elſe we ſhould do in his behalf; we ſuffered his Kingdom to be loſt, and himſelf to be cruelly murthered of the Turks. For all theſe things by us thus neglected, we cannot eſcape the infamous report of all the reſt of the Nations in Europe, but that they will ſay, That we for the greedy deſire of Trade and filthy Gain, have forſaken, and for our parts betrayed whole Kingdoms and Nations, agreeing with us both in Manners and Religion; and to have ſtood ſtill looking on, until they were ſubdued and brought into Thraldom by the Turks. Wherefore in few words to ſhut up the matter, If we ſhould joyn in League with the Hungarians, and enter into Arms, we ſhould ſo be able to keep our own; whereas if we ſhall uſe delays, and hunt after Peace, we ſhall in ſhort time ſee, that he will ſuddenly devour us being unprovided, and wreſt from us, all our Provinces and Territories which border upon him. And therefore it is (in my opinion) beſt to ſend our Embaſſadors into Hungary, with a great maſs of Mony, to ſtir up that warlike Nation into the fellowſhip of this War. And beſide the Navy we now have in readineſs, to put to Sea as many more Ships and Gallies as we are able. The great Biſhop alſo is not to be forgotten, but by all means to be drawn as a chief man into this War. Beſides all this, we muſt do what we can to raiſe up Rebellion againſt the Turk in Peloponneſus; which will be no hard matter to bring to paſs. For if the Peloponneſians riſe in Arms with one of their poor Princes which revolted from the Turkiſh King, and forſaking all that they had, adventured themſelves into all manner of peril and danger; what think you they will do, if they ſhall ſee ſo great Forces coming both by Sea and Land againſt the Turkiſh King? It were good alſo, that we ſhould ſend two thouſand Italian Horſemen into Peloponneſus, to animate the People; who when they ſhall ſee us thus to proceed, will undoubtedly preſently revolt from the Turks, and yield themſelves with their Country unto us, from whence we may moſt commodiouſly vex and moleſt this Tyrant; for there is no where better entrance into his Kingdom, than by the way of Peloponneſus. So that joyning in League with the Hungarians, we ſhall beſet him on every ſide; they all along the River Danubius, and we out of Peloponneſus. Let us not therefore ſit ſtill with our hands in our boſoms, ſuffering our Countries to be taken from us, and our Subjects made Bondſlaves to the Turks; but encouraging them by our example, animate them to take up Arms, and valiantly to reſiſt the cruel and barbarous Tyrant.

The greater part of the Senate moved with this grave Senators Speech, decreed without delay to make Wars, and to ſend their Embaſſadors to the Pope, the King of Hungary, and other the Chriſtian Princes their Neighbours, to pray aid of them in theſe Wars againſt the Turks. According to this Decree, the Venetians for defence of their Territory ſent one Bertholdus Eſte, a valiant Captain, with an Army into Peloponneſus; where at his firſt coming, he in ſhort time recovered the City of Argos, before loſt. And departing thence, marched through the Country with his Army of fifteen thouſand men, unto the Strait of Corinth, called Iſthmus. At which place Aloviſus Lauretanus, Admiral for the Venetians (by appointment before made) met him; and there joyning their Forces together, with great labour in the ſpace of fifteen days fortified all that Strait from the Ionian to the Sea Ægeum, with a continual Rampier and double ditch in length about five miles. In which work they uſed the help of thirty thouſand men; and in doing thereof were much furthered by the ruines of the old Wall before deſtroyed by Amurath. The Venetian Commanders having fortified this Strait, incamped before Corinth, and laid ſtrait Siege unto it; where at the ſecond aſſault, Bartholdus the General deſirous by his own forwardneſs to encourage his Souldiers, was in that aſſault grievouſly wounded with a Stone caſt down upon him from the Wall, of which hurt he ſhortly after died. Nevertheleſs the Siege was ſtill continued by Betinus Calcinatius, who ſucceeded in Bartholdus his place. But whilſt the Venetians lay thus at the Siege of Corinth, ſuddainly news was brought unto the Camp, That Mahomet was coming with a great Army himſelf in Perſon, to raiſe the Siege, and to deſtroy the new fortifications at Iſthmus. Whereupon the Venetians left the Siege, with purpoſe to have defended the late fortified Strait; but after that it was certainly known, that Mahomet was even now at hand with an Army of fourſcore thouſand Turks, Betinus diſtruſting with his ſmall number to be able to defend the Strait againſt ſo puiſſant an Army, left the place ſo lately before fortified, and with all his Army retired to Neapolis to keep the Sea coaſt.

Shortly after, Mahomet without any reſiſtance at all entred with a world of men by the Strait into Peloponneſus; and when he had with the great ſlaughter of the Country People roamed up and down about Argos, he came to Neapolis, and in moſt terrible manner aſſaulted the City twice; both which times he was notably repulſed by the Venetians, and many of his men ſlain. Departing thence, he deſtroyed and waſted the Country about Methone (now Modon) and Corone, and aſſaulted the City of Juneum, but with no better ſucceſs than he had before Neapolis. Wherefore Winter now drawing on, he returned with his Army to Conſtantinople.

After his departure the Venetians ſpoyled all that part of Arcadia which was ſubject to the Turks, requiting him with like injuries as he had done them before. Not long after, Lauretanus the Venetian Admiral had the Iſland of Lemnos delivered unto him by one Cominius a famous Pyrat, who had ſurpriſed the ſame, and taken it from the Turks; but diſtruſting how he ſhould be able to keep the ſame, delivered it over unto the Venetians. Shortly after, Urſatus Juſtinianus, a great Magnifico amongſt the Venetians, was ſent to ſucceed Lauretanus their Admiral; but whilſt he was ſcouring the Ægeum with a Fleet of two and thirty great Gallies, Andreas Dandalus General of their Forces at Land, inconſiderately encountring with the Turks Horſemen between Mantynia and Pytheme, was by them overthrown and ſlain, and with him divers other Gentlemen of great account; in which skirmiſh fifteen hundred of the Venetians were ſlain alſo with their General. And as Fortune is never more conſtant, than in miſchief, ſo at the ſame time Urſatus General at Sea, landing his men in the Iſland of Lesbos, beſieged the City of Mitylene, and gave thereunto two great aſſaults, wherein he loſt five thouſand men; and underſtanding that the Turks Fleet was coming to relieve the City, raiſed the Siege, and ſailed into Eubœa, and from thence paſſed over into Peloponneſus, where he ſhortly after died for ſorrow and grief of mind. In whoſe place the Venetians ſent another famous Captain called Jacobus Lauretanus.

The Venetians enter into confederation with other Chriſtian Princes againſt the Turk.

The Venetians well conſidering the great power of the Turkiſh Emperor, laboured by their Embaſſadors, to draw as many of the Chriſtian Princes as they could into the Fellowſhip of this War; but eſpecially the great Biſhop, by whoſe means they were in good hope to be greatly ſtrengthned. Pius the ſecond of that name was then the great Biſhop; who at firſt anſwered the Venetian Embaſſadors, That he muſt take away the little Turk, before he had any thing to do with the great; meaning thereby, Sigiſmundus Maletaſta Prince of Ariminum, whom he deadly hated, for that he took part with the French againſt the Aragonians. Howbeit, the Wars in Italy being well appeaſed, Pius ſtill ſolicited by the Venetians, made great preparation againſt the Turks; giving it out, That he would in Perſon himſelf go unto thoſe Wars; and by his Authority (then much regarded) procured great aid out of Germany, France, Spain, and other Countries alſo further off. At which time alſo voluntary men in great number reſorted out of all parts of Chriſtendom into Italy, ready to adventure their lives in thoſe religious Wars. At the ſame time alſo the Venetians had with much ado by the working of Paulus Angelus Archbiſhop of Dirrachium, perſwaded Scanderbeg to renounce the League which he had before made with the Turk, and to enter into Arms again; which he preſently did, and ſpoyled the Borders of the Turks Dominions next unto him. Wherewith Mahomet was no leſs troubled, than with all the reſt of the great preparation of the Chriſtians againſt him; fearing that (as it was then reported) he ſhould be made General of the Chriſtian Army, which Mahomet feared might tend to the utter ruin of his Kingdom; ſo dreadful was the name of Scanderbeg amongſt the Turks. Wherefore thinking it moſt convenient for his Affairs, to reconcile him if it were poſſible, by his Embaſſador ſent for that purpoſe, wrote unto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet, Emperor of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, unto Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenſes and of the Epirots, greeting.

The Letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I Have always had thy fidelity and upright dealing in great admiration, moſt noble Prince Scanderbeg; for which cauſe I thought it a thing incredible, that thou being a Prince of ſuch an heroical and Princely perfection, ſhouldſt ſo inconſiderately and without any occaſion break the Faith and League which thou not long ſince ſolemnly contractedſt with me. For as I am advertiſed, thou haſt entred into the Confines of our Dominion with a great Army, and with Fire and Sword deſtroying all that thou couldſt, haſt carried away with thee a great Booty. Of which thing I know right well, that the Venetians are the only cauſe, by whoſe Counſel and Perſwaſion thou haſt been ſet on to do this deed; and ſeduced by their allurements and ſubtil perſwaſions, haſt made War upon me, and art become the faithleſs breaker of thine own League, and of the ſacred Law of Nations. Yet do I little or nothing blame thee therefore, regarding more the cauſe of the ignominy, than the deſpight it ſelf, and lay the blame upon them who have alwaies been my Foes and capital Enemies, rather than upon thee. But alas, what is this unto me (Scanderbeg) that thou haſt done, which poſſeſs ſo many and ſo large Dominions? Didſt thou think to do ſo great hurt unto our Kingdom, by ſpoyling a little peece of our Country, and by ſtealing our Cattel, more like a Thief and Robber, than an open Enemy? Which thing I yet account not worth the name of an Injury. But if thou think it ſo good, proceed in theſe thy doings; for I make more account of thy Friendſhip and Love, than of whatſoever is to me deareſt; becauſe (as thou knoweſt) I have always born unto thee an eſpecial favour, and loved thee moſt entirely. And therefore as often as I call to remembrance our tender years and old familiarity whilſt we lived together in my Fathers Court at Hadrianople, I cannot but think my ſelf bound unto thee in all Courteſie. And therefore my good Scanderbeg, I moſt heartily requeſt and entreat thee, That we renewing the former concluſions of Peace, may of new confirm the ſame by ſolemn Oath; wherewith if the former Peace had been eſtabliſhed, thou wouldſt not have ſuffered thy ſelf to have been now of the Venetians ſo circumvented or ſeduced. It is therefore needful, that we now again for ever confirm a League and Peace betwixt us by ſolemn and ſacred Oath on both ſides; which if thou ſhalt do, (as I hope thou wilt, and in this be adviſed by me) thou with thy Poſterity ſhalt undoubtedly always reign in peace, and in ſafety poſſeſs whatſoever is yours. Whereas if thou ſhalt do otherwiſe, believe me it will repent thee, and that right quickly. Thou knoweſt already my force, which whether thou be able to withſtand or not, thou wert beſt to be well adviſed. The poor Princes thy Neighbours, the Venetians thy Seducers, cannot deliver thee from my Forces and Power. Doſt thou not ſee the Grecians almoſt all rooted out before thy Face? the Emperors of Conſtantinople and Trapezond by us deprived of their Empires? the Princes of Servia and Raſcia deſtroyed? the King of Boſna put to death and all the Kingdoms of Aſia, with many other Kings and Princes more, vanquiſhed, and overthrown, and made ſubject unto me? Wherefore Scanderbeg, I adviſe thee in this to follow my Counſel, keep thy Promiſe, and ſo believe me thou ſhalt not be deceived. Concerning theſe matters, we have given further Commandment to our Embaſſador and Servant Muſtapha, which cometh unto thee; unto whom doubt thou not to give credence in any thing. Farewel. From our Imperial City of Conſtantinople, the ſeventh of May, 1463.

Scanderbeg having by the aforeſaid Meſſenger received theſe Letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, returned anſwer as followeth:

The Champion of Chriſt Jeſus, George Caſtriot, otherwiſe called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, to the moſt Excellent Mahomet, King of the Turks, greeting.

Scanderbeg his Anſwer to the Letters of Mahomet.

Y*OU marveel (moſt noble* Mahomet) that my Souldiers (as you ſay) contrary to the League and the conditions of our Peace, have entred into your Confines, and from thence carried a great booty. Of which thing (you ſay) the Venetians are the Authors, whom you call your mortal Enemies; inferring afterward, that you are little therewith offended, for that you are a moſt mighty Prince, and can eaſily diſgeſt ſuch unkindneſs, for the great love you bear unto me; and the rather, for that I did it deceived (as it pleaſeth you to ſay) by others. All theſe things you can eaſily forgive and forget, ſo that I will by ſolemn oath confirm the ſame conditions of Peace that were in our former League betwixt us agreed upon. And thereunto you do greatly urge me, you admoniſh and counſel me to follow your adviſe, as tending to the great profit and ſecurity of me and my Poſterity, leſt happily whilſt I ſeek to pleaſe the Venetians, I incur your heavy diſpleaſure. Beſides this, the more to terrifie me, you reckon up as it were in a Catalogue, the People, Nations, Kings and Princes, by you overcome and ſubdued. But what is that which is ſo ſtrange (I pray you) and which you ſo much marvel at (moſt Noble Mahomet?) Is it not for that my Souldiers did that in the Confines of your Dominions, whereof they were (of right) ſorry; and had thereof to me complained, that your Souldiers had before done the like in their Goods and Poſſeſſions. Wherefore if they alſo upon a military bravery (as is your manner of phraſe) have made themſelves whole, and done one ſhrewd turn for another, revenging injury received, and not inferring any of new; there is no cauſe that you ſhould either think it ſtrange or blame me. I would my ſelf have reſtrained my Souldiers, although they were grievouſly injured (I will plainly confeſs unto you a troth) I would have appeaſed their angry minds, enflamed with deſire of Revenge; if you (a Prince of all others moſt rich and bountiful) would either have taken order, that full reſtitution might have been made unto them of all ſuch things as they had loſt, or elſe would with condign puniſhment have chaſtiſed the inſolency of your Souldiers; which you would ſeem to cover with the term of military wantonneſs or bravery; an excuſe ſcarce currant amongſt Children. For although offences are in all places grievous, yet ought they moſt of all ſo to be deemed in Martial Affairs. What I pray you, would you have me to take it for laſciviouſneſs in your men of War? eſpecially when I had received ſo great loſs, when as you might with a word firſt have reſtrained them from doing of it, and at your pleaſure corrected corrected them after the deed was done. Wherefore (moſt excellent Mahomet*) take you alſo in good part theſe our terms, which you have accuſtomed hitherto moſt gloriouſly to give and ſell unto us, whilſt you alwaies cover your reach with ſome excuſe or ſhew of Right. As for that in excuſing me, under colour of old acquaintance and friendſhip, you invey againſt the* Venetians, verily you do them wrong; for why, theſe good, juſt, and vertuous Princes are not to be ſlandered by you, as ſeducers of me or others. Beſide, what need that invincible State to enter into Counſel with me, or (as it pleaſeth you to ſay) to allure me to fall at odds with you, or to proſecute you as their Enemy? Who of themſelves, yea, (I ſay) of themſelves alone, when occaſion ſhall require, are able to dare you in plain battel, and to abate your pride. Furthermore, whereas you adviſe me to reject their Friendſhip, your labour is therein but loſt; for what man is ſo deſperate, or hated of his Subjects, that would not chuſe rather to err with that moſt honourable Senate, than to be in the right with you? eſpecially I, who have of long time been confederate with them, and am of all others unto them moſt dear; which you for all that had no regard of, but (according unto your untruſty dealing) breaking in ſunder the bonds of Peace, ſpoiled and waſted their Territory in Peloponneſus. Neither can your great Threats terrify me, which you after the Turkiſh manner thunder and pour out againſt me, except I will be overruled by you: For it is the part of an Albaneſe both to endure when need ſhall require, and alſo to do ſuch things as beſeem a man of courage. You cannot make me afraid, being but a ſmall Prince, with my honourable Friends the Venetians. And what are you? ſo great an Emperor of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, and of all parts of the World, as you vainly term your ſelf? Truly you make me ſmile, and other Chriſtian Princes laugh you to ſcorn, in uſurping falſely to your ſelf the ſtately ſtile of the Emperor of the World. What poſſeſs you in Aſia the greater? verily nothing. Is all yours in Aſia the leſſer? not ſo. What have you in Europe? except Thracia, Myſia, part of Grecia, and Peloponneſus, with the Iſle of Mytelene. As for Africk, you never ſet your foot therein. Is this to be Emperor of the World? But ſuppoſe, ſuppoſe (I ſay) worthy Mahomet, that all from the fartheſt part of the Ocean were yours, you ought not therefore ſo to ſwell, as to contemn all others. Ceaſe to boaſt, and learn now (if you can) the ſpecial, but true examples of human fragility. Where are now the Aſſyrians, which ſometime ſwayed the World? Where be the Medes? Where be the Perſians? and to be ſhort, where are the Romans, the great Commanders of all? Verily Tamerlane the Scythian King (called the Terror of the World*) was far greater than you; who in triumph, drew before his Chariot thy great Grandfather* Bajazet in Chains; who had before won ſo many Victories, whom nevertheleſs he overthrew in the Plains of Armenia, with three hundred thouſand Turks, having in his Army (as is reported) twelve hundred thouſand men, greater than Xerxes or Darius, whoſe Armies covered the Seas, and dried up the Rivers before them as they went, yet for all this (Noble Mahomet*) they are all caſt out by him that caſteth out all Nations, the Finger of the Higheſt hath brought them all to nought. Wherefore learn to know your ſelf to be a man alſo. Truſt not too much to the multitude of your Souldiers, and ſtrength of your Armies; for oftentimes great and puiſſant Armies have been overthrown with far leſs, as all Hiſtories bear witneſs; whereof it is commonly ſaid,* Thou ſhalt not praiſe the Valour of the General, before he be brought to the Triumph. And do you not think, Mahomet, that God will favour the better cauſe? You know, you well know, that all your Kingdom is violently gotten, that it is wrongfully and unjuſtly poſſeſſed; for which cauſe I am not afraid, not only to withſtand you when you ſhall come, being ſo great a Prince; but alſo valiantly and couragiouſly to dare you into the Field, and by the Power of God, both to hope for, and have a notable Victory over you. We have Souldiers alſo, which know how to uſe their Weapons, to march before their Enemies, and how to bear themſelves in the heat of the Battel. Wherefore, to that you ſay unto me for the new confirming of the former League, you labour now but in vain to circumvent me with ſuch fair gloſſes, I have your Faith in ſuch diſtruſt, and your Friendſhip in deteſtation; foraſmuch as you cunningly and ſubtilly, after the manner of your Anceſtors, whatſoever you do, or whatſoever you promiſe unto me, it tendeth all to no other end than to thruſt me out of my Kingdom. Yet thus long I have by Gods help well eſcaped all your Policies, all your Crafts and Deceits. But I hope there will in ſhort time be an end of all theſe matters, when all your Slights and Devices ſhall not eaſe you, neither your working Head or Turkiſh Pride any thing profit you. It is not I alone that ſo much ſtomack you, there cometh after me a great number of Chriſtian Princes; behold, the whole Chivalry and Glory of the Chriſtian Common-weal is in Arms, and coming againſt thee with all their force: all the Kings and Princes of Chriſtendom have combined themſeves together, with the great Biſhop, againſt thy State, and will in ſhort time be preſent to deſtroy thee and thy Kingdom. Wherefore (worthy Mahomet*) I have thought it good in regard of our old Friendſhip (although the ſame hath by you been greatly empaired and violated) to forewarn you of all theſe things, that you might gather your Wits together and in time provide for the ſafety of your ſelf and your Kingdom. You ſee the force and power of ſo many great Princes, from which whether you can eſcape or no, I know not; yet you may, if you will follow my advice, you may, I ſay, make both your Name and Empire, of great, greater; of famous, moſt renowned; of fortunate, moſt happy and bleſſed; if caſting off from you the groſs Errors of the* Mahometan Superſtition, you will embrace the Faith and Truth of Chriſt Jeſus, and at length have regard of your Souls health. And you which excel all your Predeceſſors in highneſs of Spirit, and pregnancy of Wit, ſuffer not your ſelf and your Subjects as it were by Inheritace to be longer blinded in your wilful errors; but do that (as a wiſe Prince) of your own accord, which otherwiſe you will ſhortly of neceſſity be conſtrained to do. To ſay, Had I wiſt, hath ever been accounted a great diſgrace from the Mouth of an Emperor. At length amend and meaſure your ſelf. Behold, Almighty God doth offer you means, whereby you may quiet the whole ſtate of your Kingdom, and all our Kings and Princes love, honour and reverence you. Neither let the ambitious deſire of Soveraignty or immoderate care of thoſe things you poſſeſs, trouble you from ſo doing; For whatſoever you have unjuſtly and unlawfully uſurped, the Chriſtian Princes will grant, confirm, and eſtabliſh unto thee, as if they had been your own by ancient Inheritance. So ſhall you be a true Monarch indeed, and rule and reign lawfully, if you ſhall embrace this Faith, and worſhip God aright; which ſo ſoon as you ſhall feel the ſweetneſs of, you will be ſorry that you knew it no ſooner; you will grieve at the time you have loſt, and utterly deteſt and abhor all that filthy Superſtition which the moſt filthy falſe Prophet Mahomet hath left amongſt you. From our Camp the 26 of May, 1463.

With theſe Letters Scanderbeg diſmiſſed the Turks Embaſſador. About which time he received Letters from the great Biſhop, that he accompanied with the Chriſtian Princes, would without delay come over into Epirus with a ſtrong Army of valiant Chriſtians to joyn their Forces with his, againſt the common Enemy of the Chriſtian Religion; exhorting him in all their names to denounce War againſt the Turkiſh King. Which thing Scanderbeg moſt joyfully undertook; and without delay with all his Power brake into the Turks Dominion, burning and deſtroying the Country before him as he went; from whence he returned laden with the Spoil there gotten.

When Mahomet had peruſed Scanderbegs Letters, and certainly underſtood of the great preparation made againſt him in Italy, as alſo of the great Spoil of late made by Scanderbeg, he became exceeding melancholy, as a man much troubled in mind, which dayly more and more increaſed; for that he ſaw not the wonted chearfulneſs in his men of War, but all full of heavineſs and deſpair, as if they had been men already vanquiſhed. Nevertheleſs, he ſpeedily took order for the levying of a great Army; fortifying his Cities and ſtrong Holds, leaving nothing undone that was poſſible, for the aſſurance of his State. And to repreſs the fury of Scanderbeg, ſent Seremet Baſſa with fourteen thouſand Souldiers to lie upon the Borders of Epirus, with charge only to attend upon him. Who mindful of his charge, came into Macedonia, unto the City Ocrida, now called Alchria; in the very Confines of Macedonia towards Epirus, and there lay with his Army; ſome part thereof lodged in the City, and the reſt in places more convenient near about the ſame.

The coming of the Baſſa, as alſo the manner of his lying, was not unknown to Scanderbeg, who deſired nothing more than to be doing with him. Wherefore he ſecretly in the night marched towards Ocrida with twelve thouſand Souldiers, and being come within three miles of the Town, lay cloſe in ambuſh, and upon the breaking of the day ſent out five hundred Horſemen towards the Enemy, under the conduct of Peicus Emanuel, and Petrus Angelus, two valiant and expert Captains, to draw him if they could into the Field. But Scanderbeg had before commanded them, that if the Enemy did come forth to fight, they ſhould make but ſmall reſiſtance, but retire back as if they had fled, and ſo to train him on to the place where the Army lay. Which was ſo well performed by the two ſkilful Captains, that the Baſſa with all his Power was according as they could have wiſhed, drawn into the Field, and brought to the very place where Scanderbeg lay; who ſuddainly riſing up with all his Army, aſſailed the Turks on every ſide, and ſlew them as Deer encloſed in a toyl. In this Battel ten thouſand of the Turks were ſlain, the Treaſurer of the Army with twelve other of great mark were taken Priſoners, and brought bound to Scanderbeg, who were preſently ranſomed for forty thouſand Ducats.

Scanderbeg having obtained the Victory, returned with triumph into Epirus, daily expecting the coming of the great Army out of Italy; But fatal Deſtiny, the mighty controller of mens higheſt deſigns, had not ſo appointed. For when Pius the great Biſhop had out of all parts of Chriſtendom aſſembled a great Army (whereof the greateſt part were voluntary Souldiers) and all things were now in ſuch readineſs, that he had put himſelf upon the way, and was come to Ancona, a City upon the Sea-ſide (where Chriſtophorus Maurus Duke of Venice came unto him, with ten Gallies well appointed, to have accompanied him in thoſe Wars; and all men were now in expectation of ſome great matter to have been done) ſuddainly he fell ſick of a Fever, and died in the year 1464. Whereupon the Army was forthwith diſperſed, and all that great preparation fruſtrated, to the exceeding grief of many Chriſtian Princes; and no leſs joy of the Turks, who now rejoyced to ſee themſelves delivered of ſo great a fear.

About this ſame time, Victor Capella chief perſwader of this War betwixt the Venetians and the Turks, was by the Senate ſent General of their Forces at Sea, in ſtead of Lauretanus, whoſe year was then expired. He having received the charge from Lauretanus, and ſailing out of Eubœa, in ſhort time took from the Enemy the City of Aulis in Peloponneſus over-againſt Chalcis, and alſo the City of Larſum in the Gulf of Theſſalonica, with the Iſle of Himber. Afterwards landing his Men by night at Pyræus, he ſuddainly ſurpriſed the City of Athens (now called Sethina) ſometime the Mother of learning, and moſt noble City of Grecia; and from thence carried away with him into Eubœa all the People he there found, as his Priſoners, together with the rich Spoil of that City. Whilſt he lay in Eubœa, he was perſwaded that the City of Patras in Peloponneſus would be delivered unto him by the Chriſtians that dwelt therein, if he did but ſhew himſelf before it. Whereupon he departed from Eubœa, and coming into the Gulf of Patras, landed four thouſand Footmen under the leading of Barbaricus, and two hundred Horſemen, of whom one Nicholaus Ragius was Captain. Barbaricus marching towards Patras, was come within a mile of the City; when many of the Horſemen and of the unruly Mariners, diſorderly ſcattering abroad, neglected the intended ſervice, and ſought after pillage all about the Country. The Turks Garriſons taking this opportunity, ſet upon them with their Horſemen, and ſo, eaſily overthrew them, being ſcattered and out of order. At the firſt encounter, Barbaricus himſelf was ſlain; Ragius Captain of the Horſemen was taken, and alive empailed upon a ſharp ſtake. Of all them that were landed, ſcarce a thouſand were left, who ſaved their lives by flying unto the Gallies. With this overthrow Victor the Venetian Admiral was greatly diſcomforted, yet having conceived ſome hope of better ſucceſs, in few daies after attempted again to have taken Patras, but with like hap as before; for having loſt a thouſand of his Men about the City, and the reſt glad to take their refuge to the Fleet, he was conſtrained with great diſhonour to depart thence. And ſo full of Sorrow and Heavineſs returning into Eubœa, oppreſſed with Melancholy, there ſuddenly died.

The Venetians deceived of the great hope they had conceived of the general preparation made againſt the Turks, and much troubled with the hard proceeding of their Wars againſt ſo mighty an Enemy; by their Embaſſadors ſollicited Mathias, not long before choſen King of Hungary, to joyn in League with them, and to take up Arms againſt the common Enemy, offering preſently to furniſh him with a great ſum of Mony, beſide a large yearly penſion for the maintenance of thoſe Wars; for which he ſhould to his power by Land defend all their Territory betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique, againſt the invaſion of the Turk.

This Mathias ſirnamed Corvinus, was the younger Son of the moſt famous Captain Jo. Huniades, whoſe elder Brother Uladiſlaus, a Gentelman of ſuch Courage as might well ſhew whoſe Son he was, being not able to digeſt the injuries and diſgraces done unto him and his Brother, by Ulricus Count of Cilie, and Uncle to Ladiſlaus the young King of Bohemia and Hungary; for the deſpite he alwaies bare unto their Father Huniades, ſlew the ſame Ulricus at Alba Regalis, even in the Kings Court. Which outrage the young King was glad for the preſent to wink at, and alſo to grant him pardon; as having taken away the man, whoſe immoderate power well ſtood not with the Kings ſafety; but indeed fearing the Citizens of Alba, and the Men of War, who exceedingly favoured the Sons of Huniades for their Fathers ſake. For all that, Ladiſlaus returning into Bohemia, cauſed both the Sons of Huniades upon the ſuddain to be apprehended, and moſt cruelly executed, Uladiſlaus being then about ſix and twenty years old. Mathias the younger Brother was kept in Priſon, expecting nothing elſe but to be partaker of his Brothers hard Fortune, as undoubtedly he had, had not Ladiſlaus the young King, upon the ſuddain, as he was upon the top of his marriage with Magdalain the French Kings Daughter, by untimely death been taken away. After whoſe death the Hungarians for the love they bare unto the remembrance of Huniades, by a military Election, choſe this Mathias his youngeſt Son, then in priſon at Prague, to be their King. Whereof Pogebrach (who after the death of Ladiſlaus, of an old Governor had made himſelf the young King of Bohemia) having ſpeedy intelligence as he was ſitting at Supper, ſent for Mathias his Priſoner, and when he was come, commanded him to ſit down at the upper end of the Table; whereat the young Gentleman, being then but about eighteen years of age, and ſore abaſhed, began to crave pardon. But when the King would needs have it ſo, and that he was ſet, the King to quiet his troubled thoughts, willed him to be of good chear, for that he had good news to tell him. Good news, ſaid he, if it would pleaſe your Majeſty to grant me liberty. Yea that, ſaid the King, and more too; and then ſaluting him by the name of the King of Hungary, brake unto him the whole matter, how that he was by the general conſent of the Hungarians, choſen their King. And ſo in few daies after, married to him his Daughter; which done, he furniſhed him with all things fit for his Eſtate, and Royally accompanied him into Hungary, where he was with great joy and triumph received of the Hungarians; over whom he afterwards gloriouſly reigned for the ſpace of eight and thirty years. In which time he notably enlarged the Kingdom of Hungary, and became a far greater terror unto the Turks, than ever was his Father Huniades. And therewithal (which is not to be accounted in the leaſt part of his praiſes) was alwaies a great favourer and furtherer of good Letters and ingenious Devices.

Mathias of a Priſoner choſen King of Hungary.

But to return again unto our purpoſe, Mathias having well conſidered of that the Venetians had requeſted, anſwered them, that they had many times before in like caſe refuſed to give aid unto the Hungarian Kings his Predeceſſors; yea, and that more was, thought it a thing not reaſonable, that any ſuch thing ſhould be requeſted at their hands, foraſmuch as they then received no harm from the Turk, but were in League and Amity with him; ſo that the Hungarian Kings wanting their help, had many times received greater loſs from the Turks, than otherwiſe they ſhould have done, if they had been by them aided. Yet for all that, he was content to forget all ſuch unkindneſs, and to grant them what they had requeſted; promiſing the next Spring to invade the Turks Dominion, and according to their requeſt, to take into his protection all their Territory betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique; which thing he moſt honourably performed. For with the firſt of the Spring he paſſed over Danubius at Belgrade with a puiſſant Army, and raſed the Forts which the Turks had built thereabouts; and ſo entring into Servia, laid all the Country waſt before him; and afterwards laden with Spoil, returned home, carrying away with him twenty thouſand Captives. Neither ſo reſted, but with great good Fortune maintained great Wars againſt Mahomet during all the time of his reign; and afterwards againſt Bajazet his Son alſo, wherein he moſt commonly returned with Victory; ſo that it is of him as truly as briefly written, That no Chriſtian King or Chieftain, did more often or with greater fortune fight againſt the Turkiſh Nation, or had of them greater Victories.

Mahomet delivered of the great fear he had before conceived of the general preparation of the Chriſtian Princes againſt him, determined now to work his Will upon ſuch as were neareſt unto him, and afterward not to forget them that were farther off. The proceeding of Scanderbeg, with the late overthrow of Seremet with his Army in Epirus, ſtuck in his Stomach; in revenge whereof, he now ſent unto Balabanus Badera, a moſt valiant Captain, with fifteen thouſand Horſemen, and three thouſand Foot, to invade Epirus. This Balabanus was an Epirot born, a Churles Son of that Country; and being of a Boy taken Captive of the Turks, as he was keeping of his Fathers Cattel, and of long time brought up in ſervitude amongſt them, framing himſelf both to their Religion and Manners; after long ſervice got the credit of a good common Souldier. But when as at the taking of Conſtantinople, it was his fortune to be the firſt man of the Turks Army, that gained the Top of the Walls, and entred the City, he was for that piece of Service ever afterwards of Mahomet greatly eſteemed; and beſide his other great Preferment, now ſent General of his Army into Epirus. Who as ſoon as he was come to Alchria (a City upon the Frontiers of that Country) ſent many rich Preſents to Scanderbeg, making ſhew as if he had been deſirous peaceably to lie upon the Borders committed to his Charge, without farther purpoſe to trouble his Country; yet indeed waiting nothing more than ſome notable opportunity, ſuddainly to do him the greateſt miſchief he could. But Scanderbeg well ſeeing into the malice of the man, rejected his feigned Friendſhip and Gifts, and in deriſion ſent him a Spade, a Mattock, a Flail, with other ſuch Inſtruments belonging to Huſbandry; willing him to take in hand thoſe Tools, and to follow his Fathers trade of life, and to leave the conducting of Armies unto men of greater skill and better place. Which diſgrace Balabanus took in exceeding evil part; purpoſing in himſelf, if ever it lay in his power, to be thereof revenged. Wherefore knowing that Scanderbeg with a ſmall power lay not far off upon the frontiers of his Kingdom, he determined ſuddainly in the night to ſet upon him before he were a ware of his coming, and ſo if it were poſſible to overthrow him, but Scanderbeg having knowledge thereof by his Scouts, ſet forward in good order to have met him. When Balabanus perceiving that he was diſcovered, ſtaid upon the way, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbeg; who had then in his Army but four thouſand Horſemen, and one thouſand and five hundred Foot, but all choice men, and moſt expert Souldiers, and then lay in a large pleaſant Valley called Valchal; At the farther end whereof Balabanus lay alſo encamped, near unto a rough and woody Hill which encloſed that part of the Valley. Whilſt both Armies thus lay within view one of another, Scanderbeg well conſidering the ground the Enemy had taken, and that it was like he would offer him Battel, with chearful ſpeeches encouraged his Souldiers; ſtraitly charging them upon pain of his diſpleaſure, That if the Enemy upon the fortune of the Battel, ſhould chance to flie or to retire, they ſhould not in any caſe purſue them farther than the Straits of the Hill whereby the Enemy lay; gheſſing too truly, that he would in ſo convenient a place leave part of his Army in ambuſh, as a ſure refuge to truſt unto whatſoever ſhould befal. When he had thus encouraged and inſtructed his Souldiers, he roſe with his Army, and in good order retired unto the riſing of an Hill, which was a good way behind the place where he before lay; of purpoſe to have the advantage of the ground, if the Enemy ſhould follow to give him Battel. Balabanus ſeeing him retire, and the ſmall number of his Army, thought verily that he had fled for fear; and therefore to ſtay him who meant nothing leſs than to flie, ſet forward in great haſt. The Turks thinking upon ſo great advantage to have found no great reſiſtance followed after Scanderbeg as if they had had him in chaſe; and by that time they were come to the place where he ſtaied, were by their haſt greatly diſordered and out of array. Scanderbeg his old truſty Souldiers nothing diſmaied with the haſty coming and hideous clamour of the Turks, received them with great Courage; ſo that there began a fierce Battel, with much ſlaughter on both ſides, which for a great while ſtood doubtful. Yet ſuch was the invincible Courage of Scanderbegs reſolute Souldiers, that the Turks (who as then fought in great diſorder) were at laſt put to flight, and with much ſlaughter chaſed unto the Straits of the Mountain, where Scanderbeg had before commanded his men to ſtay. But certain of his beſt and principal Captains forgetting what he had ſaid unto them; and led on (whether with the heat and fury of the Battel, or rather with inevitable deſtiny, is hard to ſay) unadviſedly purſued the Enemy into thoſe Straits, whereof they were by Scanderbeg before warned, and charged that they ſhould not enter; where they were on every ſide beſet with their Enemies, ariſing out of ambuſh; and after they had a long time deſperately fought as Wild Beaſts incloſed with Hunters, at laſt oppreſſed with multitude, were together taken and brought to Balabanus, by whom they were forthwith ſent to Mahomet to Conſtantinople. Who as ſoon as he heard of their taking, is reported with great rejoycing to have ſaid, Now am I ſure that the Strength of Scanderbeg is broken. The names of the principal men which were there taken, was Moſes Golemus of Dibra, the greateſt Captain of Epirus next unto Scanderbeg himſelf; Giuriza Uladerius, Scanderbeg his Kinſman; Muſachius, Scanderbeg his Nephew by his Siſter Angelina; Ginius Muſachius; Johannes Perlatus, who valiantly defended Sfetigrade againſt Amurath; Nicholaus Beriſius, Georgius Chucca, and Ginius Maneſius: whereof every one of them was able to have conducted a great Army, and might worthily have been accounted amongſt the greateſt Captains of that Age. The taking of theſe worthy men brought ſuch a general ſorrow and heavineſs upon Epirus, that the Victory was nothing accounted of, every man lamenting the loſs of ſuch notable Leaders. Scanderbeg careful of their deliverance, preſently ſent an Embaſſador to Mahomet, requeſting that he might redeem his Priſoners, either by exchanging of others for them, or elſe for ſuch ranſome as it ſhould pleaſe him to ſet down. But he knowing them to be Scanderbeg his beſt Captains, would neither exchange them for others, nor grant that they ſhould be ranſomed for any Gold; But after he had uſed them with all the deſpight he could deviſe, cauſed them all by little and little, to be ſlain quick; in which miſerable torment they lived fifteen days, and ſo died. Scanderbeg hearing thereof, was therewith rather encouraged than diſcouraged; and in revenge thereof, with Fire and Sword entred into the Turks Dominion, ſparing nothing that he could either burn, or poſſibly by any other means deſtroy.

The Battel betwixt Balabanus and Scanderbeg.

Mahomet glad of the taking of theſe notable men (although they were bought with the lives of many of his People) commended Balabanus highly, as the only man that knew how to fight againſt Scanderbeg; and in reward of his good ſervice, ſent him divers rich Gifts, with commandment to repair again his Army, and to proceed in his Wars ſo happily begun. Which thing Balabanus with all diligence performed. Yet truſting more unto his Policy, than his Strength, lying at Alchria, ſent again divers rich Preſents to Scanderbeg, as deſirous to live in peace by him; but ſeeking indeed to bring him into ſecurity, and ſo ſuddainly (if it were poſſible) to entrap him. Which things Scanderbeg well perceiving, rejected his feigned Friendſhip together with his Preſents, as ſent from a baſe Peaſant. Whereupon Balabanus entred into a new device, and by ſecret means, with great rewards corrupted Scanderbeg his Scouts, whereof ſome were Balabanus his Kinſmen, though it were to Scanderbeg unknown. By which practice, he had upon the ſuddain in the night oppreſſed Scanderbeg, lying encamped in Oronychium, if Scanderbeg himſelf (who commonly ſpent moſt part of the night in careful watch) going about the Camp, had not in the ſilence of the night a far off perceived the coming of the Enemy by the noiſe of his Horſes; and thereupon with wonderful celerity putting his Army in ſuch order as he beſt could, was ready to receive him; and at laſt after a great Fight, put him to flight; and having him in chaſe, ſlew moſt part of his Army, Balabanus himſelf with a ſmall remnant hardly eſcaping.

Now when Mahomet underſtood that Balabanus was overthrown, and his Army loſt, he was in doubt, whether to ſend another General, or elſe again to prove the fortune of the old. But after he had well conſidered, that Balabanus was a right valiant Captain, and one that well knew the Country of Epirus, and withal a mortal Enemy to Scanderbeg; he reſolved to ſtay upon him, and not to ſend any other. So committing to his charge fourteen thouſand Horſemen and three thouſand Foot, ſent him again to invade Epirus; and the more to encourage him, promiſed to make him King of that Country, if he could ſubdue Scanderbeg. Balabanus with his Army coming to Alchria, and ſtill in vain plotting how he might circumvent his wary Enemy; after his wonted manner ſent divers Preſents to Scanderbeg; which he ſtill ſcornfully refuſed. Three months he lay ſtill at Alchria, with nothing more troubled than with his own thoughts; but finding nothing that pleaſed himſelf, he determined to adventure by plain force to ſubdue him. And upon that reſolution marched with all his Army into the great Plains near unto Sfetigrade, whither Scanderbeg came with his Army alſo, which then conſiſted of eight thouſand Horſemen and fifteen hundred Foot; with which ſmall power he refuſed not to joyn Battel with Balabanus, being in number two to one. But after they were come to handy blows, to have ſeen Scanderbeg his Men fight, a man would have thought them rather to have been raging Lyons than Men, they ſo furiouſly furiouſly aſſailed their Enemies, without regard of peril or danger, as men nothing afraid to die. Scanderbeg with great skill governed that Battel, carefully providing for every danger; himſelf valiantly fighting in the head of this Battel, but not without care of the reſt, ſtill ſending ſpeedy relief where moſt need was, and bringing in freſh ſupplies inſtead of them that were wounded or ſlain, performed all the parts of a moſt worthy Chieftain and valiant Souldier; where moſt peril was, there was he ſtrait, and at his preſence danger fled, as if Victory had attended upon him. But whilſt he thus fought in the midſt of his Enemies, his Horſe fortuned to be ſlain under him, and falling down with him, ſore bruiſed one of his Arms, whereof he complained long time after. The Turks ſeeing him down, preſſed on fiercely to have ſlain him; but he was quickly reſcued by his own Souldiers and remounted. And forthwith encountring with one Suliman, a great Commander in the Turks Army, ſlew him in fight hand to hand; whereupon ſuch a terror fell upon the Turks, that they began to retire, and after a while to betake themſelves to plain Flight. Scanderbeg purſuing them with ſuch execution, that of that great Army few eſcaped with Balabanus to carry news home.

Balabanus now thrice vanquiſhed by Scanderbeg, and in the laſt Battel having loſt what he could loſe, except he ſhould have loſt himſelf, returned to Mahomet at Conſtantinople, of whom he was ſharply rebuked for the great overthrows he had ſo often received. At which time Balabanus at firſt gave place to the Kings Fury; but afterwards when the heat was over, he with a large diſcourſe cunningly excuſed himſelf, imputing all theſe miſhaps unto the appointment of God, and the fortune of War; and in the end told Mahomet plainly, That it was but in vain to ſend ſuch ſmall Armies into Epirus.But if it would pleaſe him at once to ſend two valiant Captains with a puiſſant and ſtrong Army, who dividing the ſame betwixt them, and entring at one time into divers parts of Epirus, might ſpoil the Country before them, and encloſe Scanderbeg betwixt them, if he ſhould adventure to give either of them Battel; being before reſolved neither of them to offer him Battel, or yet to accept of the ſame being by him offered, except the other were alſo at hand; and ſo by mutual conſent to undertake him, but never ſingle. By which courſe he promiſed unto him an eaſie and aſſured Victory; for as much as it were impoſſible for any man ſo beſet, and as it were on every ſide coupt up with his Enemies, either to eſcape, or yet to make any great reſiſtance. This perſwaſion of Balabanus ſo well fitted the Tyrants humor, that he appointed Balabanus himſelf to be the man to put his own device in execution; giving him Commiſſion to levy ſuch an Army as he ſhould think ſufficient for the performance of that ſervice; and withal to aſſociate unto himſelf for his Companion whichſoever of his Captains he pleaſed. Balabanus according to his Commiſſion, took muſters of the men of War, and made choice of forty thouſand good Souldiers, and choſe one Jacup Arnauth (otherwiſe called James the Epirot, becauſe he was alſo born in Epirus, a valiant Captain) to be his Companion; whom he ſent with ſixteen thouſand Souldiers by the way of Theſſalia and Grecia into Epirus, commanding him in no caſe to joyn Battel with Scanderbeg, until he himſelf were alſo come into the Country with the other part of the Army. And ſo ſetting both forward, Balabanus taking the nearer way through Thracia and Macedonia, came firſt into Epirus with twenty thouſand Horſemen and four thouſand Foot, and encamped in the Valley of Valchal. Scanderbeg both by his Eſpials and Letters from his ſecret Friends in the Turks Court, having certain intelligence of all Balabanus his intent and purpoſe, had in readineſs againſt his coming a ſtrong Army of eight thouſand Horſemen and four thouſand Foot, all choice Souldiers. And now hearing that he was come into Epirus, and incamped in Valchal, ſent out three Eſpials to diſcover in what order he lay; one of which Spies was Balabanus his Kinſman (but not ſo known to Scanderbeg) by whoſe perſwaſion the other two when they had taken full view of Balabanus his Army, and ſhould have returned to Scanderbeg to have given intelligence of that they had ſeen, like falſe Traitors went over to Balabanus, and diſcovered unto him all that they knew concerning Scanderbeg; hoping therefore to receive ſome great reward, as their Fellow had before born them in hand. Scanderbeg marvelling that his Eſpials returned not again as they were appointed, and doubting that they had been by the Enemy intercepted, and uſing many times in matters of ſuch importance to truſt himſelf beſt, preſently went out with five luſty Souldiers, and rid forth to diſcover the manner of the Enemies lying. Balabanus like a crafty Fox, miſtruſting that Scanderbeg deceived of his firſt Spies would for like purpoſe ſend forth others, laid certain Horſemen in ſecret ambuſh in divers places, to intercept them if it were poſſible. Theſe Horſemen lay not ſo covert, but that they were in good time deſcried by Scanderbeg and his Followers (who with Argus Eyes, pried into every Buſh and Thicket as they went) before he was altogether fallen into their danger; and yet but ſo that he came to handy ſtroaks, where Scanderbeg and his Followers oppreſſed with multitude, were glad to flie as faſt as they could into the next Wood, the Turks Horſemen following them at the Heels. It fortuned that as they were flying, a great old Tree was fallen croſs the way, which Scanderbeg putting Spurs to his Horſe, leapt over with one of his men after him; the other four not able to get over, turned back upon the Turks, and there fighting were ſlain. One of the Turks which ſo hardly purſued Scanderbeg being well mounted, forced his Horſe, to leap the Tree, and ſtill followed after Scanderbeg; who looking back and ſeeing but one, turned upon him and ſlew him; the other Turks having ſlain four of Scanderbegs men which could not get over the Tree, returned. And Scanderbeg accompanied but with one of his Followers, came back again to his Camp; and there with all ſpeed put his Army in readineſs to go againſt Balabanus before the coming of his Companion, with the other part of his Army. Upon which reſolution, after he had with chearful perſwaſions encouraged his Souldiers, and filled their minds with hope of Victory, he ſet forward, and came with great ſpeed into the Valley of Valchal where Balabanus lay. Scanderbeg had divided his Army into four Squadrons; whereof Tanuſius had the leading of one, Zacharias Groppa of another, the third was committed to Peius Emanuel, and Scanderbeg himſelf conducted the fourth. So ſetting forward, he ſent before certain Companies of Harquebuſiers and Archers, to provoke the Enemy and to draw him forth unto Battel. Balabanus alſo ſhewed himſelf with his Army in ſeemly order before his Tents, but there ſtood faſt and would not ſtir, expecting continually the coming of his Fellow. Which Scanderbeg perceiving, and that he ſought but to dally out the time, and as one unwilling to fight had again retired his Army into the ſafety of his
